A Remarkable Surgical Operation has been performed on three epileptic patients by an English surgeon. He opened the skull and removed a part of the brain in each case, and all three patients have been cured of their fits. They were exhibited on August 14th at the meeting of the British Association at Brighton, and appeared to be quite well. The operation was an outcome of a long series of experiments which Mr. Victor Horsley has made during his study of brain disease. He discovered that the whole brain does not control the body in bulk, but is divided into minute departments, each having its special function. One part of the brain controls one part of the body and no other. The next step was to localize these several parts, and this was carefully done. It thus became possible, by observing which part of the body of an epileptic patient was most violently convulsed, to fix the exact spot in the brain that was the seat of disease. An incision was made, and the diseased spot removed. The loss did not injure the patient, as the functions of the brain removed were after a time performed by corresponding parts of the opposite hemisphere. This discovery marks a new era in surgery, and promises, when perfected, relief to some of the most grievously afflicted of the human race. The news will bring joy into many a home. Sufferers may now hope to have the evil that has brought them so much misery eradicated. The surgeon will, however, still be powerless where the mischief has afflicted the whole of the brain, as he cannot supply a new organism. That is always the case in spiritual maladies, but in these the sufferer can apply to the great Physician, who is not so limited. He promises to take the stony heart out of the flesh and give a new heart (Ezek. 11 : 19, 20).

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"The Lord hath appeared of old unto me, saying, Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love: therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn thee."
--JEREMIAH 31: 3.

The Power of Fear—Love More Potent—God's Dealings—I. Not Understood without His Appearance—Because of Selfishness—Because they are Mysterious—Must be Personal—Must be Repeated—II. Perceived after the Appearance—Gentle Drawings—Early in Life—When they were Recognized—III. The Drawing Force—IV. Its Great Motive—Everlasting Love.

THE dread of divine justice has often driven men to seek mercy. Many have been caught in the whirlwind of wrath, and in their dismay they have fled for refuge to that Man who is a covert from the tempest. Hence the Lord does not decline to work upon the minds of the guilty by motives drawn from fear. Notice the twenty-third and twenty-fourth verses of the previous chapter: "Behold, the whirlwind of the Lord goeth forth with fury, a continuing whirlwind: it shall fall with pain upon the head of the wicked. The fierce anger of the Lord shall not return, until He have done it, and until He have performed the intents of His heart." This is by no means a solitary passage. Holy Scripture is strewn with solemn from the wrath to come. Our dear Redeemer, whose lips are as lilies dropping sweet-smelling myrrh, in great tenderness of heart warned men of the sure result of their sins; and none used stronger or more alarming language than He did concerning the future of ungodly men. He knew nothing of that pretended sympathy which will rather let men perish than warn them against perishing. Such tenderness is merely selfishness excusing itself from a distasteful duty. He spoke of weeping and gnashing of teeth, of a worm which dieth not, and of a fire which is not quenched. Brethren, like our Lord, we do not hesitate to warn men of judgment to come. "Knowing, therefore, the terror of the Lord, we persuade men." We dare not quit this solemn duty lest it cost us our own souls: we dare not cease to sound the trumpet of alarm lest the enemy destroy our people, and their blood be required at our hands.

Still, the master-magnet of the Gospel is not fear, but love. Penitents are drawn to Christ rather than driven. The most frequent impulse which leads men to Jesus is hope that in Him they may find salvation. Love wins the day. One hair from the head of love will draw more than the cable of fear. I am glad, therefore, that I have to speak to God's people this morning, and set forth God's love as the reason why they should love Him in return. "We love Him because He first loved us" is the great law of the Christian life.

I. Our first observation will run on this wise—God's dealings with us are never understood till He Himself appears to us. He must speak, or

WE CANNOT INTERPRET

His acts. "The Lord hath appeared of old unto me, saying: Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn thee." The Lord had been drawing these people, but they did not know it. God had been loving them with an everlasting love, but they did not recognize it. Nor could they know or recognize His lovingkindness till the Lord Himself visited them in person, and removed the scales from their eyes.

For first, man is not in a condition to perceive God till God reveals Himself to Him. By nature, brethren, we are blind Godward; yea, deaf, and in all ways insensible toward the great spirit. By nature we are dead to the presence of the Lord. Naturally man is an atheist. When the "Essays and Reviews" made a great deal of stir, an experienced preacher said concerning them, "Essays and Reviews" do not trouble me, nor any of the nostrums of modern doubt, for my heart is a deviser of worse things than 'Essays and Reviews': my evil heart is a fountain of atheism." Brethren, worse difficulties have occurred to us than any that have ever been penned by the most notorious infidels. By nature we are as the fool who said in his heart, "There is no God." Man, therefore, living in alienation from God, does not trace the inward drawings of divine love up to their source: He regards them as common things, and treads them out as sparks from an earthly fire.

Besides this, my brethren, we are so selfish that, when God is drawing us to Himself, we are in our own things to notice the hand which is at work upon us. We crave the world, we sigh for human approbation, we seek for ease and comfort, we desire above all things to indulge our pride with the vain notion of self-righteousness; and, therefore, we look not after God. Rather do we cry with Pharaoh, "Who is the Lord, that I should obey His voice?" God may draw long before we will budge an inch away from those gods which our own selfishness hath set up. Young Samuel answered to the call of Jehovah at midnight; but with us there is neither hearing nor answering. How can we see God while our eyes are blinded with self? The Lord must appear to each one of us, or we shall remain ignorant of His ways.

Moreover, dear friends, God must explain His dealings to us by revealing Himself to us, because those ways are in themselves frequently mysterious. Take Israel for an instance. The Lord moved Pharaoh to treat Israel with great severity, and to make them serve with rigor. They made bricks without straw, and the tale of bricks was doubled, till they cried by reason of their taskmasters. How was Israel to perceive that Jehovah was at the back of all this?

How were the Israelites to understand, till God explained it, that this rough usage on the part of Pharaoh was to and make them willing to go out even into a desert that they might escape from the tyrant? When Pharaoh began to kill their firstborn, when he refused to let them go for a few days to offer sacrifice, and oppressed them more and more, how were they to know that this was a part of the plan of Jehovah who had loved them with an everlasting love? God's dealings with His chosen are often so mysterious that they cannot know them till they know Himself.

So it is when the Lord works eternal life in the soul. He does not usually begin by giving the man light, and peace, and comfort. No, but He sorely plagues him with "darkness that might be felt." He makes sweet sin to become bitter; He pours gall into the fountains of His carnal life till the man begins to be weary of the things which once contented him. The awakened man sees more of anger than of lovingkindness in his griefs, and the idea of everlasting love never enters His imagination. That God is drawing Him with bands of love, and cords of a man, is a truth of which he has no inkling. God must reveal Himself to the man, or else He will not discover the hand of the Lord in the anguish of His spirit.

This appearance of the Lord

MUST BE PERSONAL.

"The Lord hath appeared of old unto me." I do not think any man knows the Lord by merely reading Scripture, nor by being convinced in His judgment of the truth of the Gospel. There is a special manifestation of the Lord unto the conscience, and the heart, and the soul of every man who is indeed taught of God. A personal revelation by the Holy Ghost is needed to bring home to us the revelation of the Book. The result of it is conversion, or the new birth; and this is always effected by the Spirit of God. "No man can come to Me," saith Christ, "except the Father which hath sent Me draw Him;" and no man understands those drawings except the same Father shall come unto Him, and manifest Himself to Him. Till we know the Lord by personal revelation, we cannot read His handwriting upon our hearts, or discern His dealings with us.

This appearance

NEEDS TO BE REPEATED.

The text may be read as a complaint on the part of Israel. Israel says, "The Lord hath appeared of old unto me"—as much as to say, "He has not appeared to me lately." Of old He was seen by brook, and bush, and sea, and rock; when Jacob met Him at Jabbok, and Moses in the wilderness at the burning bush; but now His visits are few and far between. Oh, that He would appear now! I pray at this time that those of you who are mourning after that fashion may be able to rise out of it. It is not the Lord's desire that He should be as a stranger in the land, or as a wayfaring man that tarrieth but for a night. He is willing to abide with us. What Jesus has done He will still do. Once you walked by the way, and your heart burned within you because Jesus spake with you; He has said: "I will come again." Recall those happy periods, but only recall them with this resolve, "I will behold my Lord again. I will again delight myself in Him." Do not let the text be the epitaph of a long-ago appearance; but let it be the dawning of a new day, whose sun shall no more go down.

II. Secondly, when the Lord does so appear, that He has been dealing with us. "The Lord hath appeared of old unto me, saying: Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love: therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn Thee." What exceeding love the Lord showed to us before we knew Him! Let us now look back and remember the love of longsuffering, which spared us when we delighted in sin. The next admirable discovery is the Lord's restraining grace. We now see that the Lord held us back from plunging into the deepest abysses of sin. He would not let us commit crimes by which we might have ended our lives before conversion. He kept us back from sins which might have linked us in sad connections, and led us into such circumstances that we never might have been brought to hear His Word, or seek His face at all. Since the Lord has appeared to me, He has made me see His restraining hand where once I saw nothing but the cruel disappointment of my hopes. Blessed be God for those crooks in my lot which kept me from poisonous pleasures!

WE THEN PERCEIVE

The text chiefly dwells upon drawings. I beg you to refresh your memories by recollecting the drawings of the Lord toward you while you were yet ungodly. They began very early with some of us; even as little children we had great tenderness of conscience, and many movements of the Spirit which as others did. Those drawings were continuous with some of us; we can hardly remember when we were without holy impulses, though we did not yield to them. When we left the parental roof, those drawings followed us to our first situations. Do you recollect them? Before you knew the Lord Jesus, His holy Spirit strove with you. Often these were very gentle drawings; they were not such forces as would move an ox or an ass, but such as were meant for tender spirits; yet sometimes they tugged at you very hard, and almost overcame you. Drawing supposes a kind of resistance; or, at any rate, an inertness; and, truly, we did not stir of ourselves, but needed to be persuaded and entreated. Some of you will recollect how the Holy Spirit drew you many times before you came to Him.

There are times with men, before conversion, when a sort of softness steals over them, when they feel as if they could not hold out much longer against appeals so reasonable and so gracious. A mother's prayers come up, perhaps her dying words are heard again; or the death of a little child touches the parent's heart as nothing else has done. The man is under holy influences, he knows not how; there are angels in the air around him, though there are devils in the heart within him. The man cannot be at peace in sin; he is restless till he finds rest in Jesus. It is the Lord drawing all the while; and after the Lord has appeared to us we see it to be so. Do you remember when at last the Holy Spirit drew you when at last, without violating your free will, He conquered it by forces proper to the mind? Blessed day! He drew you. You did not know much about it then, but you see it now.

After I had found grace and salvation a little time elapsed before I had surveyed the work of the Lord upon me; and when I did so, I learned much. Sitting down one day, I meditated upon where I was, and what I was. I said to myself, "I have believed in Jesus Christ, and I have passed from death unto life. To God be praise!" Then I saw, as in a glass, the ways of God toward me; but it was not till the Lord Himself had appeared unto me that I had this conception of His ways. He Himself, by His Spirit, expounded to me the whole system after this fashion: "I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn thee." We understand the drawings of the Lord after we have seen the Lord Himself, but not till then.

III. Then we proceed a step further, and we perceive that lovingkindness was

THE DRAWING FORCE:

"therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn thee." At first we think God has dealt sternly with us, but in His light we see light, and we perceive that the drawing power, which has brought us to receive mercy, is the divine lovingkindness. Love is the attractive force.

What multitudes of persons have been drawn to the Lord first by His lovingkindness in the gift of His dear Son! Perhaps there is no greater soul-saving text in the Bible than this, "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." I must have conversed with more than a hundred persons who have found the Lord through this blessed verse. I am speaking very moderately, for I think I might say that I have known several hundreds who have been

by this pole-star text. What a drawing there is in the fact that God gave His Son to redeem the guilty! Next, the hope of pardon, free and full, attracts sinners to God. "Thy sins, which are many, are all forgiven thee," makes a man run after Christ. Oh, what a draw there is in that word, "Let the wicked forsake His way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, for He will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for He will abundantly pardon"! Thus doth lovingkindness draw us.

It may seem somewhat strange to you, but that form of lovingkindness which mainly drew me to the Lord was this—I saw a good deal of the instability of character in young men who began life with bright prospects and fair promises, and I trembled for my own future. I had known schoolfellows who were held up as patterns to me, who acted very disappointingly after they left home; and I thought within myself: Oh, for a spiritual life insurance! Oh, for a way of putting my soul into secure keeping, so that I shall not become the prey of sin, but shall be kept by the grace of God even to the end! The belief that I should find this permanence of grace in Christ Jesus drew me more than anything else to Jesus. I see it now, and bless His name for using such a magnet.

Brethren, since we have known the Lord, has it not been His lovingkindness that has always drawn us? His mercies are more than the hairs of our head; by day and by night He is drawing, drawing, drawing with those bands of love; and one of these days our whole body, soul, and spirit will so yield to the sweet compulsion of almighty love that the whole man will remove to be with Him where He is, and still to feel His lovingkindness as we behold His glory. All this was always true, but we could not see it till the Lord appeared to us, and declared the gracious fact that with lovingkindness He had drawn us. The fact is precious, and the knowledge of it is exceedingly joyful.

IV. Lastly, I believe the appearing of the Lord to a man is the great means of teaching him divine truth. Then we learn that of the divine drawings is everlasting love. I do not want to preach any longer, but I want you to think. Description is not needed so much as meditation and realization. Think you hear the voice which with a word made heaven and earth! Think you hear it as a still small voice, whispering in your ear: "I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn thee." Perhaps the less I talk about this the better, for words cannot express the inexpressible.

Notice, the Lord has done it. It is an actual fact, the Lord is loving you. Put those two pronouns together, "I" and "thee." "I," the Infinite, the inconceivably glorious—"thee," a poor, lost, undeserving, ill-deserving, hell-deserving sinner. See the link between the two! See the diamond rivet which joins the two together for eternity: "I have loved thee." It is not, "I have pitied thee," nor "I have thought about thee," but "I have loved thee." God is in love with you. I think Aristotle said that it was impossible for one to be assured of another's love without feeling some love in return. I am not sure about that; but I think it is quite impossible to enjoy a sense of God's love without returning it in a measure. Soul, dost thou return it?

Certain divines have tried to cut the heart out of that word "everlasting," and to make it out that it means a terminable period, but it is idle to argue with men to whom words are mere shuttlecocks to play with. Most plainly that which is everlasting LASTS FOREVER.

You and I may live till we grow old and decrepit, but the Lord will not leave us, for it is written, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love." We shall come to die, and this shall be a downy pillow for our death-bed, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love." When we wake up in that dread world to which we are surely hastening, we shall find infinite felicity in "everlasting love." When the judgment is proclaimed, and the sight of the great white throne makes all hearts to tremble, and the trumpet sounds exceeding loud and long, and our poor dust wakes up from its silent grave, we shall rejoice in this divine assurance: "I have loved thee with an everlasting love." Roll on, ye ages, but everlasting love abides! Die out, sun and moon, and thou, O time, be buried in eternity, we need no other heaven than this: "I have loved thee with an everlasting love"! Brethren, the Lord's appearing unto us has taught us great things in teaching us everlasting love.

Alas for you, poor heart, to whom this text does not belong! There stands

THE GOLDEN CHALICE.

Oh, that you were athirst, for then you might drink of it! You have not seen the Lord, for you have not sought Him. You know not that you are drawn, for you have never come to Christ, nor have you believed in His great sacrifice. If there were no hell hereafter, it would be hell enough to me not to enjoy everlasting love. I count that man a wretch undone who has never heard the sweet, full music of this text. What! Do you live without God? Do you despise His love? If there were no hereafter, it is unhappiness enough to be lost to the infinite delight of knowing the love of God. Oh, that you would now believe in Jesus, and find peace through His blood!

But oh, you that have this cup of blessing, drink of it to the full! Live upon this assurance! Go away singing because of it! Let not trouble disturb you—why should it? Let nothing vex you—why should it? Let no ill deed done to you by another provoke you; be ready to forgive because you see that the Lord has loved you, and therefore you can love the most unlovable. None are too vile to share in our love, since God has loved us.

O Lord, appear to each one of us now! Appear to us, and say: "I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn thee." Grant it, Lord! Grant it for Thy sweet love's sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

IRELAND'S FUTURE.*

A MAIN reason, which governed me in the offer of last December, was my full conviction that if the Tory Government had acted as many were then inclined to hope, the proposal would have an impartial hearing from the Liberal party, and an amount of support far more than sufficient, as in 1829 and 1846, to make up for Orange and Tory defections, so as to secure the speediest and easiest, which would in my judgment have been also the most satisfactory, accomplishment of the great design.

With regard to that design, I do not venture to forecast the future, beyond the expression of an undoubting belief that a measure of self-government for Ireland, not less extensive than the proposal of 1886, will be carried. Whether the path will be circuitous; whether the journey will be divided into stages, and how many these will be; or how much jolting will attend the passage; it is not for me to say. Nor is it for me to conjecture whether in this, as in so many other cases, the enemies of the measure are the persons designed finally to guide its triumphal procession to the Capitol. But I hope that, should this contingency once more arise, every Liberal politician, irrespective of any misgivings (should he be tempted to entertain them), as to the motives of the men, will remember that his inexorable duty is to extract the maximum of public profit from their acts.

If I am not egregiously wrong in all that has been said, Ireland has now lying before her a broad and even way, in which to walk to the consummation of her wishes. Before her eyes is opened that same path of constitutional and peaceful action, of steady, free, and full discussion, which has led England and Scotland to the achievement of all their pacific triumphs. Like the walls of Jericho, falling, not in blood and conflagration, but at the trumpets' peal, so, under the action of purely moral forces, have an hundred fortresses of prejudice, privilege, and shallow prescription, successively given way. It is the potent spell of legality, which has done all this, or enabled it to be done. The evil spirit of illegality and violence has thus far had no part or lot in the political action of Ireland, since, through the Franchise Act of 1885, she came into that inheritance of adequate representation, from which she had before been barred. Ireland, in her present action, is not to be held responsible for those agrarian offences, which are in truth the indication and symptom of her disease; from which her public opinion has, through the recent beneficial action, become greatly more estranged; and to which she herself ardently entreates us to apply the only effectual remedy, by such a reconciliation between the people and the law, as is the necessary condition of civilized life. The moderation of the Irish demands, as they were presented and understood in the Session of 1886, has been brightly reflected in the calm, conflicting, and constitutional attitude of the nation. I make no specific reference to the means that have been used in one deplorable case, under guilty recommendations from above, with a view to disturbing this attitude, and arresting the progress of the movement; for I believe that the employment of such means, and the issuing of such recommendations, will eventually aid the cause they were designed to injure. It is true that, in the close of the last century, the obstinate refusal of just demands, and the deliberate and dreadful acts of Ireland's enemies, drove her people widely into disaffection, and partially into the ways of actual violence. But she was then down-trodden and gagged. She has now a full constitutional equipment of all the means necessary for raising and determining the issues of moral force. She has also the strongest sympathies within, as well as beyond, these shores to cheer, moderate, and guide her. The position is for her a novel one, and in its novelty lies its only risk. But she is quick and ready of perception; she has the rapid comprehensive glance, which the generals she has found for us have shown on many a field of battle. The qualities she has so eminently exhibited this year have already earned for her a rich reward in confidence and good will. There is no more to ask of her. She has only to persevere.

THE EFFECT OF A WELCOME.

AN incident reported from Selma, Ala., to the Watchman shows how much good may be done by a hearty welcome to a stranger. A young man said to a friend: "I want to tell you how I became a Christian. I had heard the fellows talk a great deal about the Young Men's Christian Association, telling me of their reading-room and lectures, and that their meetings were held for men only, and I had often thought I would go up and see what kind of a place it was; but I put it off, until one Sunday I concluded to see just why the meeting was for men and not for ladies as well; so I went up the stairs carefully to look in and see what was going on. Just as I got where I could see in, a fellow got hold of me, and giving me a hearty slap on the shoulder he says, 'Come right in; we're glad to have you with us,' and gave me a good seat before I thought where I was; and I found a crowd of young men singing, talking and praying; real earnest, cheerful-looking fellows, and

I didn't stay long before I thought they had just what I wanted, and I got right up and told them so, and now I am a member of the Association and of the church, and I feel that that meeting saved me."

THE FAWCETT MEMORIAL.

(See Illustration.)

THE valuable services rendered to the cause of woman suffrage by the late Professor Fawcett, the blind statesman, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on November 27th, 1884, have been acknowledged in an appropriate manner. Soon after his death Lady Louise Goldsmid issued an appeal to the women of England for subscriptions to erect a suitable memorial to him. It was not only by advocating the concession of the suffrage to them that Professor Fawcett served the women of his country. He endeavored to promote their employment in trades and professions, and especially desired that they might be admitted to practise in the medical profession. It is largely due to his efforts that many avenues of usefulness and honorable independence are now open to ladies which half a century ago were closed to them. Recognition of this fact was general, and grateful women sent in their money to the fund.

It was decided to expend the fund in erecting a drinking fountain, and this has now been completed. It stands in a conspicuous position on London's great promenade—the Thames Embankment. It is made of granite, and in its centre is a bronze medallion in high relief of the deceased statesman, the work of the eminent lady sculptor, Miss Grant. It was formally unveiled and dedicated on July 27th by Lady Louise Goldsmid.

FOR HIS WIFE'S SAKE.

JOHN MARTYN was pacing the parlor of the old farm-house, sighing and wringing his hands. It was a substantially furnished room, not elegant but comfortable, and as John Martyn had played around it as a child, as his father had before him, he loved every article of furniture in it, and would not have changed it for furniture of newer fashion. He took little note of it now, however. He walked up and down incessantly, staying only at the door to listen, Presently a footstep was heard on the stairs, and Martyn turned to the door immediately and beckoned some one in. It was a quiet, observant, self-reliant-looking man of about fifty years of age who entered and looked sadly at the farmer.

"Doctor," said Martyn, "is there any hope?"

"I believe that depends on you now," said the doctor. "I have done all I can. But she wants Lotta, and there is just a chance that if Lotta came it might save her. You need not tell me about your oath, I know all about that. I don't say you were wrong to swear that she should never enter your doors again. I don't say you were right. I would not presume to pass judgment on that. You ask me as a friend and a doctor what the chances are, and I say that if your wife could see her daughter by her bedside it would do her more good than all my prescriptions. It is for you to decide."

"How long do you think she—" Martyn could not finish the question. His wife was very dear to him. Until the last few days he did not know how dear she was.

"I cannot tell. She is sinking now. I am afraid the most we could expect is a few days."

Martyn sank into a chair, and resting his elbows on the table, and covering his face with his hands, he groaned heavily.

"Oh God, help me!" cried the agonized man.

"I have refused her many a time, and I can't bear to tell her now. Go up again, doctor, and tell her I'm going to fetch Lotta. I'll come up and kiss her good-by the last thing when the horse is ready."

"You are a brave man," said the doctor, laying his hand on his friend's shoulder; "you have conquered yourself, and that is no small victory. I'll go up and tell your wife. It will be the most effective visit I ever paid. But lose no time, or she may die before you get back. Remember, I told you it is only a chance. The mischief may have gone too far."

Half an hour later John Martyn was driving hard behind his fleetest horse to the big city twenty miles from the farm. He shuddered as he thought of the work before him. He revolted from it as the most hateful thing in life, but he set his teeth firmly and went on. He drove to a hotel and put up his horse. Then he walked quickly to the nearest police station. He did not know where to find his daughter, and it turned him sick to think that it was from the police he was most likely to get information of her. Three generations of his family had lived in the old farm, and before that he had been able to trace them in the same State, and not one member of it had disgraced the name. It was this girl, for whom he was seeking, who had been the first to tarnish the fair record. The thought maddened him. His daughter, living in this city in open shame, and he here to invite her back to his home! Love had never required a harder sacrifice than when Martyn's love for his wife demanded that he bring his daughter to the home she had disgraced.

"Yes," said the superintendent, "we can find her. This officer will take you to her place, and if she is not there he knows where to look."

"I can't do it, sir," said Martyn, with a white face. "I could not bear to see it. Let the man go and fetch her here. I suppose she would come."

"Perhaps so; he can try it. Her sort like to stand well with us. Williams, go to Lotta Martyn's place and give her my compliments, and I want to speak to her about a little matter of business. Tell her it is not an arrest. She need not be frightened."

Time passed heavily with Martyn. The detective was gone more than an hour. He grew restless, and at last the superintendent advised him to go and get his horse around, that no time might be lost when Lotta came. He obeyed, and so it happened that when Lotta and her escort approached the station the horse and buggy she knew so well stood at the door. Her father was standing there too, with pallid, troubled face. Forgetting that she had heard nothing of the trouble from the detective, who had not been present while he explained it to the superintendent, he simply pointed to the buggy, and motioned to Lotta to get in. He thrust a bill into the detective's hand, and mounted himself without a word.

No word was spoken on the journey either. Martyn was dreading lest, after all, they would be too late, and, as mile after mile was covered, his dread grew into conviction. He urged his horse to greater and greater speed, feeling that he was riding a race with death. Lotta clung to the splash-board in amazement, wondering if her father had gone demented. His hat blew off, but he did not notice it. The wild speed was kept up, the villagers drawing aside in terror as they passed, until the farm was reached.

"Your mother wants you," said Martyn then, speaking as Lotta had heard him speak in the bygone time. She went in wondering as her father went around to the stables. Her mother was not in the well-remembered room where Lotta expected to find her, and, divining the true cause, hurried upstairs to the bedroom. The doctor met her at the door.

"Be careful," he said, "she is very weak. Don't make a scene. Speak to her quietly, as if you had been there all the time."

Lotta tried to obey, but it was useless. The mother recognized her instantly, and held out her arms. Lotta ran to her and laid her head on her mother's bosom. The father found them locked in that embrace when he entered the room. The look of heartfelt gratitude which shone in his wife's eyes was his reward for his self-conquest, and he felt that it was enough.

"God bless you, John, for this," she said, releasing Lotta, and throwing her arms around her husband's neck.

"You will get well now?" he said, eagerly.

"Oh, yes, I hope so. I feel new life already."

A Race with Death.

Martyn would have gone away then, but his wife would not have that. She must see that Lotta was forgiven, or the deed of love was only half done. To satisfy her John took his daughter in his arms and kissed her, saying, in a whisper, as he did so, "for your mother's sake."

The doctor was quite right; the mother recovered from that day, and Lotta lived to be a comfort and a blessing to both her parents, seeking, by earnest endeavor, to atone for the sorrow and shame she had caused them.

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

The Intellectual Tournament.

THERE was a perceptible rustle of expectant movement in Literary Hall as the question for debate was read by the chairman. Many were present to whom the Bible was a precious book; others there were who were beginning to doubt its infallibility, and others again who were illustrations of the maxim that a little knowledge is a dangerous thing, for in their self-conceit they had decided that the Bible was an obsolete book, which the nineteenth century had outgrown. Professor Rich was aware that these three classes were among the audience, and therefore, in a few well-chosen words, he introduced the subject with an intimation that the question having been raised in his class, it was thought desirable that it should have full light and freedom of debate. He hoped that those who were troubled with doubts about it might be helped by the remarks of his young friends.

He called the debater on the affirmative, and Mr. Wentworth came forward, manuscript in hand. This last fact banished half of Leroy's fears of defeat; for he knew his opponent could not give his speech the force necessary to carry conviction, standing there with that paper before him. Yet it was a strong speech, Leroy admitted that. Its greatest fault was lack of definiteness. It discussed general principles too much. It did not scrutinize closely enough the discoveries and theories of science and the Biblical account of the creation, nor did it venture on anything like a minute comparison of the two records. It tried to prove that God, being the Author of the Bible and also of nature, the Bible and true science must be in harmony; which proposition covered too wide a field for any man to prove in an hour's speech. But still the speaker went on and carried his audience well to the end.

Whispered comments passed from one to another as Wentworth took his seat.

"An unanswerable argument," said one.

"An impregnable position," said another. "He takes his stand on the infallibility and veracity of God, and he cannot be beaten there."

"I believe with Wentworth," said a third, "but I fear he will be beaten. He has made the mistake that preachers so often make of begging the question. Nobody needed to be convinced of the truth on which he has spent so much time. Any man with a grain of common sense knows that if God is the Author of the Bible and the Creator of the world, that the one cannot contradict the other. The trouble with Ransom and his set is that they contend that they do contradict each other, and Wentworth's business was to show that they do not. You will see Ransom smash him."

"Perhaps Wentworth could not prove that there was no contradiction."

"Perhaps not, and so he ought not to have ventured on the discussion. Things of this kind ought to be done well or not at all. Many a good cause is injured by an incompetent champion."

"Oh, you think his cause is good, though you are expecting that he will be smashed!"

"Good! of course it is good; the truth is with him. Ransom has no solid ground under his feet, but he will make it appear that he has, if I do not mistake. He will doubtless do what oratory has been very apt to do in every age—convince the audience of the truth of a fallacy. The majority of all the orators the world has seen have been in the wrong."

"You are a miserable cynic. You ought not to come here at all. Now be quiet and let us hear Ransom. I am open to conviction, for one."

"Well, you had better settle in your mind before he opens what you will do if he does convince you. If one witness contradicts another, you must believe one and disbelieve the other. You will have to take your choice between the Bible and science. Bah! you ought to have more sense than to get into such a dilemma."

While this conversation had been going on in whispers in the rear of the room, the suggestion had been introduced on the platform that the discussion be adjourned, to give Mr. Ransom time to prepare a reply to the weighty arguments adduced. The suggestion came from the kindly Dr. Lester, who had enjoyed the speech of his young friend Wentworth, and, having had little contact with sceptics, really believed it unanswerable. At any rate, he thought, so strong a speech could not be answered on the spur of the moment, and therefore in fairness to Ransom he suggested delay.

"What do you say, Mr. Ransom?" asked Professor Rich. "If you would like to bring up new guns into the field time will be allowed you. This war is to be conducted with the utmost courtesy."

* Copyright reserved by the author.

"Thank you, Professor, for the opportunity. I do not need to take advantage of it. As none of my guns have been dismounted in the action so far, I will, with your permission, use them first. At a later stage of the engagement, perhaps, new guns or an ambulance may be needed, and then we can adjourn."

"Very well," said the Professor, smiling. "Open fire." And Leroy stepped upon the platform.

"The argument I have to lay before you," he said, "is not directly a reply to my opponent. I propose to deal with the question in its practical aspect, which, it seems to me, is the only legitimate method of settling it. I admired our friend's argument, which was ingenious and pretty; but, having learned by experience that sometimes these logical structures, which look beautiful to the eye, have a flaw in their foundation or construction, I do not feel safe in trusting them. There is no need to do so in this case, because we have the facts within reach. Here are the two records, both accessible. Do they agree? That is our question. As we approach it our friend kindly informs us that both records come from one source, and therefore they must be in accord. We say, 'Thank you for your encouraging assurance. If you are right, doubtless they do agree; but we will see if it is so.'"

It is as if a government auditor, being sent to examine the condition of a bank, should be met at the doors by an intelligent person, who says: 'This affair is all right. The system of bookkeeping adopted here is infallible. The cashier and clerks are intelligent and honest. They are most excellent men, respected by every one. They have had the care of the books and the care of the money, so it must be all right.' What would the auditor reply if he did his duty? 'I am pleased to hear it; my duty will be an easy and a pleasant one. I will begin by counting the cash. What balance do the books say ought to be here?' The business man goes about his work in a business way; he does not trust to theories, he counts the cash. That is the system I propose to follow. If the auditor found that the securities in the vault did not agree with the balance shown by the books he would say, 'There is something wrong with those books.' When you have heard the remarks I have to offer, perhaps you will say the same thing. So now, if you please, we will take my opponent's roseate view just as an encouraging assurance, and proceed to examine the hard stone and metal, and see if the account given in the venerated Book agrees with the facts."

There is no need to follow our hero over the well-worn ground which the assailants of the Bible have so often trodden. He discussed the nebular hypothesis, the theory of the earth's molten condition, the vast antiquity of the world and animals and man, the order of the creative days, the fact of light being made too late to do the work it did, vegetation and fowls being in reversed order, ridiculed Hugh Miller's panorama theory, and called it the "side-show theory, and a mighty mixed side-show at that." He contended that the most luxuriant vegetation—the coal-plants of the carboniferous period, tree-ferns, calamites, lepidodendrids, etc.—flourished before the period when the Bible says light was created. "Could such huge plants," he asked, "have grown in the dim, imperfect light of which the harmonizers speak? No!" He said that, according to the best geology, the lower orders of plants and animals were contemporaneous, or nearly so, both appearing first in the remote Archæan time. "And yet," said he, "the Bible teaches that animals were not created until the fifth day!"

He went over all the geological periods and subperiods with perfect familiarity according to the accepted scientific decisions, and then set them by the side of the Genetical periods and held the picture up before the audience. Quoting from Christian geologists, he contended that their views were incompatible with the Biblical record. Now and then he held the Mosaic record up to ridicule until the audience was shocked, while a few of the more reckless broke into convulsive laughter.

"What are we to do with this Mosaic record?" he asked. "Let it be put into its proper category with the mythologies and superstitions of Egypt, India, Persia, and Greece. Put it there where it belongs, and I am ready to study it with delight as the childhood thought of a remote age, and I will glean whatever good I can from it; but if you tell me I must believe it as a historical record—that I must accept it literally or perish forever, I discard it—I discard it!"

It was an effective attack, and more than one of the auditors was disturbed by it. Carrie West especially was distressed as she listened. She had never studied geology with much interest, and was astonished at the disclosures thus made. Was it, indeed, a fact that in the crust of the earth there were objects found which disproved the statements of the Word of God? Could it be possible, she asked herself, that these rocks and fossils were tangible evidence that the world did not come into existence in the way that the Bible said it did? She shuddered, for she saw clearly the use that might be made of such evidence. She perceived that Leroy would contend, if not here and now, at other places and times, that any book, which opened with incorrect statements must be unreliable throughout, and that if the statements which could be tested proved to be false, then the statements of spiritual revelation, which could not be tested, must be doubted. While the audience was laughing and applauding, she had a difficulty in restraining her tears. To her it was no light matter to hear the Word of God impeached. She suffered then as she would have suffered had she heard some dearly loved friend charged with revolting crime. In such a case she would have cried, "It cannot be; I know him too well; he could not be guilty of such crimes." So now, she said in her heart, "It is incredible; Mr. Ransom and his teachers must be under a horrible mistake. There is a fallacy somewhere." She recalled her attention to the speaker just as he paused before commencing his peroration, on which, if he followed the custom of the college, he would use all the rhetorical skill at his command.

Throwing back his head, drawing himself to his full height, and raising his voice, he said: "Ladies and gentlemen, there is a great warfare waging to-day between the votaries of Science and the Bible, and I am free to admit that there are valiant warriors on both sides. Let them fight. Let them fight it out until Truth shall be enthroned upon the mountain-tops and shall wield her mild sceptre over the plains and valleys of the world; yea, until she shall wave her standard over every institution of learning in the land, shall establish it in every mansion, in every cottage upon the green hillside, and in every heart. If the Bible gain the victory, so be it; we will bless its God and march to the conquest of the world under the banner of the cross. If Science win the palm-branch of victory, we are content; there will be a grand revolution in the realms of thought, and I believe that the principles of Truth, illuminated by the light of Reason and heightened by the teachings of Science, will press their way onward and upward, conquering and to conquer, until the victory is complete."

A volley of applause shook the building as Leroy stepped from the platform. Evidently his speech had carried the audience with him, and his victory was complete. He made his way to his seat at the side of Carrie West, anxious for her verdict on his effort. It was not in her kindly nature to spoil his moment of triumph by criticism. She could conscientiously praise his eloquence and argumentative powers, while wishing that they were better employed, and this she did.

"I congratulate you, Mr. Ransom," she said, "on your success. That is one of the finest speeches I ever heard. If you had been addressing a jury, you would have carried your client's case. It was worthy of a United States senator. I consider it a masterly performance."

Apparently others were of the same opinion, and among those who gathered around the young orator to congratulate him were many whose admiration was not qualified, as Carrie's was, by dislike of the cause in which the effort had been made.

"Your speech is the beginning of a revolution," said one. "We shall hear less now about the authority of the Bible. You have struck the shackles from the limbs of thought."

"Good for you, Ransom," said another. "After this we shall not have our mouths stopped with some passage of Scripture as an authoritative dictum. You have done us all a service."

One after another they came, and Carrie's heart sank as she listened. Her presentiment was realized. The speech was evidently regarded as an impeachment of the authority of the Bible. The sacred Book had fallen in the esteem of the students who had heard the argument. Henceforth it would be said in the college that in one case at least the Bible was in the wrong, and if wrong in one it might be wrong in all. Who could estimate the effect of the speech for time and eternity? It was awful to contemplate. How many of these young people, who had hitherto been restrained from sin by the warnings of Scripture, might now give rein to their passions and evil propensities, despising those warnings! What an awful responsibility!

On their way homeward Carrie was silent. She rightly judged that the words which must be spoken, the words that alone could deliver her conscience, must not be spoken now if they were to have weight. Flushed with triumph, Leroy was in no mood to listen to them calmly; but the opportunity would come, and Carrie prayed that courage and power might be given her to use it well.

"Mr. Ransom," called out a voice behind them, which they recognized as that of Dr. Lester, "I congratulate you, though I do not agree with you."

"Thank you, doctor," said Leroy. "I hope some day I may be able to congratulate you on agreeing with me."

Dr. Lester's hearty laugh at the retort was heard ringing merrily. "Ah!" he said, "if that day should ever come I shall be needing sympathy, not congratulation. Good-night."

"How strange it is," Ransom said to Miss West, "that a man of Dr. Lester's intelligence should be so timid and prejudiced! You see, even he is afraid of conviction. I pity a man who dare not accept any truth that antagonizes his sentiments."

"You may not have understood Dr. Lester," said Carrie; "I do not think he is a timid man. Perhaps his intellect is not convinced. We must not impute unworthy motives to those who do not agree with us."

"No, but I fancy my argument should have convinced him."

Carrie laughed at the egotism of the remark. It was little likely that Leroy had told the learned professor that evening anything that he had not heard before. Ransom's knowledge of geology was but second-hand stuff collected from books accessible to Dr. Lester, and with which he was probably perfectly familiar. To her it was a comfort to think that the erudite doctor, who must have known all this, still held to the old Book. That fact might encourage some who were not so learned.

But Leroy was disposed to think every one who did not agree with him prejudiced or pusillanimous. He could not understand why people who have believed the old Book for years, who have been comforted by it in many a sorrow, who have no other solid ground of hope for the world to come, whose dear ones have died with its sweet promises on their lips, saying, "Meet me there," before they went away, who have often wept for joy at the sweet prospect of reunion in paradise—he could not understand why such people would not give up all their hopes and beliefs after one hour's harangue against the grand old Book!

JESUS INTERCEDING.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 19, John 17: 1-10; 20-26. Golden Text, ver. 13.

Degradation that was Glory—Christ's Power over all Flesh—Work Among the Heathen—What Eternal Life is—The Work Declared Finished—Prayers for His Own—Glorified in Them—The Ineffable Unity—The Only Union Possible for the Church—His Heart's Prayer—An Answered Prayer.

THERE is nothing exclusive in the love of God. The veil is rent from the top to the bottom; the way into the holiest of all lies open; and here, in this wonderful chapter, we may draw near and listen while Jesus holds communion with His Father. "Father," He prays, "the hour is come; glorify Thy Son, that Thy Son also may glorify Thee." He was about to undergo suffering and humiliation, ignominy and degradation beyond all that man had suffered hitherto; His face was to be "marred more than any man, and His form more than the sons of men." Yet when face to face with His Father He calls it "glory." His Father's will was always glory to Jesus, whatever it might cost Him. For the joy set before Him He endured the cross, despising the shame (Heb. 12:2). And this joy He thus expresses, "As Thou hast given Him to give eternal life to as many as Thou hast given Him." Oh, what a rest is this! Jesus has power over all flesh, to give them eternal life! We have not power to give eternal life. Some really devoted missionaries have given their lives without seeing one single satisfactory convert. But Jesus has all power to convert the heathen, and He is looking for a people who can go out into heathen lands counting upon Him, without any regard to what they are in power, learning, influence, or ought else. Instead of turning away dispirited and disheartened from some hardened, worldly, self-righteous or infidel sinner, it is blessed to turn him over to Him who has power over all flesh to give eternal life to as many as God has given Him. And how many are these? The Father said to the Son, "Ask of Me, and I will give Thee the heathen for Thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for Thy possession" (Ps. 2:8). Let Christian workers go forth in the consciousness that Jesus, who is with them and in them, has power over all those among whom they work, to give them eternal life; then they will deal more with Jesus than with the people, and He will not fail to do the work.

"And this is life eternal, that they might know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent." There are numbers of so-called conversions where souls are led to know something about Jesus, about the plan of salvation, about His work as our Substitute, without coming to a personal, face to face acquaintance with Himself. Eternal life is life, not mere knowledge, not mere feeling. It is God coming down to dwell in us and taking us up into oneness with Him. We cannot know Jesus without letting Him have a place in our lives—a place where He can move, speak, act, and be recognized. Eternal life is Jesus in us. "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life" (1 John 5:12). Eternal life makes Jesus present to us, so that it is not an effort, but a second nature, to pray to Him and praise Him, and our hearts turn easily to Him with love and confidence.

"I have glorified Thee on the earth." Yes; Jesus was the express Image of the Father, "merciful and gracious, longsuffering, and abundant in goodness and truth" (Ex. 34:6). Words and works of mercy marked the footsteps of Jesus. He "went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil"

(Acts 10:38). Sinners and sufferers were alike welcomed and blest by Him, and always His Father who dwelt in Him did the works, these works of mercy, and everywhere the Father was glorified in the Son.

"I HAVE FINISHED

the work which Thou gavest Me to do." Thank God, the work of Christ in redeeming us is a finished work; nothing remains to be accomplished—"Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law," it is finished. The sinner is saved by a work already finished, the struggling believer is delivered by a finished work, the sick one is healed by a finished work.

Christ's one petition for Himself in His last prayer was that He might be glorified, He the Man, the Sacrifice for sin, just about to be made a curse for us and made sin for us, that across the dark chasm of suffering He, as the God-man, might be glorified. And then He began to pray

FOR HIS OWN.

He knew all things that should come upon Him. He knew what the defection of the disciples would be, that He should be betrayed, denied, forsaken by them; yet, knowing this, He says of them: "They have kept Thy Word. . . . They have known that all things whatsoever thou hast given Me are of Thee. For I have given unto them the words which Thou gavest Me; and they have received them, and have known surely that I came out from Thee, and they have believed that Thou didst send Me. I pray for them; I pray not for the world, but for those whom Thou hast given Me; for they are Thine. And all Mine are Thine, and Thine are Mine; and I am glorified in them." How could Jesus, knowing the sin which was in them, speak thus? Did He make light of sin? Let Gethsemane, let the cross, bear witness. No; but Jesus saw beyond the sin. He saw already the repentant tears of Peter and the deep humility and brokenness of his heart; He saw all the twelve self-emptying and then filled with the Holy Ghost. Jesus sees the end from the beginning, and, unless we are persisting in wilful, determined sin He has His eye on the conquests of His grace, the pardon, the deliverance, the consequent deeper consecration and acquaintance with Him which comes out of present failure.

"I AM GLORIFIED IN THEM"

is a wonderful word, when we remember all which transpired that same night. Jesus saw how the very disappointment in themselves through their great failure would leave more room for Him in their hearts and lives, and they who now so signally failed Him were to be ultimately true Christ-bearers. His faith, His foreknowledge, saw it accomplished. And oh, how tenderly He prays for them, and the one mastering desire of His heart comes out in the petition, "Holy Father, keep through Thine own name (not through their faith or faithfulness, but through Thy faithfulness) those whom Thou hast given Me, that they may be one as we are."

ONE.

Life is union with that which produces and sustains life. Jesus lived by the Father (John 6:57), and said: "I and My Father are one" (John 10:30). He takes up the prayer further on, "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on Me through their word. That they all may be one; as Thou, Father, art in Me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that Thou hast sent Me. And the glory which Thou gavest Me I have given them; that they may be one, even as we are one: I in them, and Thou in Me, that they may be made perfect in one; and that the world may believe that Thou hast sent Me, and hast loved them, as Thou hast loved Me." The Romish Church has an idea of unity, but it is oneness in the Church, not oneness in God the Holy Trinity. It consists in an unquestioning obedience to man and belief in man's infallibility, while at the same time there is the utmost devotion and reverence for religion, and a sensuous love to the person of Christ and of holy men; but really it is holiness, not the Holy One, which is worshipped.

The unity of the Church has been a problem throughout the Christian age; it will never be accomplished externally till Jesus comes again. But there exists at this moment, and there has existed ever since Jesus sent down the Holy Ghost, a Church as really one as the members of the body are one with each other, communicating with each other through the head. And this is the only possible unity which can last in the true Church of Christ. As we are united to Jesus in heart and spirit, as our will is entirely yielded up to Him, we are brought necessarily nearer to every other Christian. Every thought of self separates from God and from God's children, every thought of Christ brings near to Him and to them. There is a tedious brother, but God has patience with him, and this makes me patient with him. There is an unlovable, an overbearing sister, but Jesus welcomes the office of conquering and dwelling in that sister to live His own life in her; if I am one with Him, I fall into His place, and so become united to her and love her with His love. It is never anything in us which can unite us to others. All natural attractions wither before the coming of God, but Christ in us welcomes, receives, loves all others. When Jesus has a Church on earth really, practically united in Him, one in Him, His bride will have made herself ready, and the Lord will come.

But meanwhile, while the Lord is bringing this about, what is

HIS HEART'S PRAYER?

"Keep through Thine own name those whom Thou hast given Me. . . . I pray not that Thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that Thou shouldest keep them from the evil." Did Jesus Christ get His prayers answered? Are they answered now? Yes, always when our faith puts a personal signature to them. We may count on being kept from evil while we rely on the intercession of Jesus. He has given us our place if we are His. "They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." He does not say, "They ought not to be of the world," but "they are not." By right of their birth from above, "born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God," by right of their eternal life, they are not of the world. As an earthly monarch gives his servants a certain standing and position by his word of mouth, so Jesus constitutes us "not of the world," an unworldly and heavenly people. We may be true or untrue to our position, faithful or unfaithful, but anyway God has given us that position, it is ours by gift, and we are responsible to take it and be true to it. It was a joy to Him to give it us; Jesus spoke these words that His joy might be filled to the full in us. None are such a rejoicing people as those who enter into the thoughts of Jesus toward them.

Four times in this wondrous prayer Jesus speaks of the Word: "They have kept Thy Word;" "I have given them the words which Thou gavest Me;" "I have given them Thy Word;" "Sanctify them through Thy truth; Thy Word is truth." With the Bible open we hear Jesus speaking now, praying for us now, blessing us now. It is our precious means of communicating with Him; let us prize it as He Himself prized it. "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" (Matt. 4:4).

"HE CARETH FOR YOU."

"Casting all your care upon him; for he careth for you." I. PETER, v. 7.

How strong and sweet my Father's care!
The word, like music in the air
Comes answering to my whispered prayer—
"He cares for thee."

The thought great wonder with it brings,
My cares are all such little things,
But to the truth my glad faith clings,
He cares for me.

Yet, keep me ever in Thy love,
Dear Father, watching from above,
And let me still Thy mercy prove
And care for me.

Cast me not off for all my sin,
But make me pure and true within
And teach me how Thy smile to win
Who carest for me.

O still, in summer's golden glow,
Or wintry storms of wind and snow
Love me my Father: let me know
Thy care for me.

And I will learn to cast the care
Which like a heavy load I bear
Down at Thy feet in lowly prayer
And trust in Thee.

For nought can hurt me, shade or shine,
Nor evil thing touch me, or mine,
Since thou, with tenderness divine,
Dost care for me.

Strong Words of Praise.

"The crowning work of this publisher's extensive list. It is the scheme of the project or to present in a convenient form and at a moderate cost, a complete survey of the written literature of all ages and all peoples. It is gotten up in a style that would make it suitable to the handsomest of libraries, while in price no one need say he cannot afford to buy it. It is one of the most remarkable schemes in the annals of publishing, and I am sure men of moderate means in the reading world will not be slow to appreciate it."—The Keynote, Philadelphia.

"In these volumes we have one of the best, and certainly the cheapest, work of the kind we have ever seen. It contains biographical notices, criticisms, and specimens of the writings of every eminent author, who has by his writings made a distinctive mark in the history of human culture and progress. In the case of foreign authors, the translations which have best caught the spirit of the original have been chosen. The literature of our day holds a very prominent place. So far as it has gone the collection is very full and complete, the two first volumes containing notices of about one hundred and eighty authors, with nearly as many specimens of their works. SELF-SATISFACTION. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Editor of the Charleston "News and Courier"—A View in Charleston, S. C., Before the Earthquake.

CAPTAIN DAWSON, Editor of the Charleston "News and Courier."

THE accomplished journalist whose portrait accompanies the picture of Charleston on the first page rendered a service to the whole country by the vivid description of the earthquake which he gave to the Associated Press on September 1st. It was prepared for the News and Courier, but the compositors refused to work in a building shaken and cracked from roof to basement, while the ground had not ceased to throb. The Associated Press, however, gave it a wider audience than it would have had, and it appeared on Thursday morning in all the important daily journals of the country. A long extract from it appeared on page 566 of our last week's issue. It speaks strongly for the power of the journalistic instinct in any man that in such an agitating time, and in the midst of circumstances so distressing, he had the self-control to sit down and write so able an article.

Captain Dawson's own position must have produced some trepidation. He lives in a massive brick residence in Bull Street, near Rutledge Street, and was in his room on the second story when the first shock occurred. He says the house seemed literally to turn on its axis. The first shock was followed by a second and a third. The air was filled with the cries and shrieks of women and children. From every side came the cry, "God help us!" "God save us!" "Oh, my God!" When the first agony was over it was found that the ceiling of every room in the house was cracked, the big cistern was broken apart, the huge tank in the attic was pouring its flood of water into the bedrooms. In the parlors, the statues had been wrenched from their bases and thrown to the floor. In the hall the massive lamp had actually been turned around. In front of the house was a large porch with heavy pillars and solid marble steps; all this was swept away as though it had been shaved off with a razor. And what was Captain Dawson's experience was that of hundreds of others in Charleston.

CHARLESTON, S. C.

THE picture on the first page, of Charleston as seen from the tower of St. Michael's Church, gives some idea of the beauty of the stricken city before its terrible visitation. It is the chief commercial city of the South, and one of the oldest and most beautiful cities of the country, rich in historical associations. It is picturesquely situated at the confluence of the Ashley and Cooper rivers, in latitude 32° 45' North, and longitude 79° 57' West, and is eight hundred and four miles from New York. The rivers run a parallel course for nearly six miles, widening as they approach the sea, and thus gradually narrowing the site of the city to a peninsula. The city is laid out with some regularity, the streets generally crossing each other at right angles. The general level of the city is only from eight to nine feet above the level of the harbor at high tide. The city has a general length of two miles north and south, and is a mile and a half in width. The streets are from sixty to seventy feet wide, and the business houses, which are situated principally along the water front and on the extreme south, are mainly built of brick, and many of them from four to five stories in height. The residences are mostly of wood, and have large, open grounds around them, ornamented with trees and shrubbery.

THE PRINCIPAL STREETS.

The two principal streets are King and Meeting, which run north and south, nearly parallel, the whole length of the city, but converge to intersection near the northern limits. King Street contains the leading retail stores, and is the fashionable promenade. The jobbing and wholesale stores are principally in Meeting Street, and the banks and brokers' and insurance offices are in Broad Street. The Battery is a popular promenade, lying near the water's edge, and commanding an extensive view of the bay. It is surrounded by fine private residences, and many of these can also be found in Meeting Street, below Broad, in Rutledge Street and avenue, and at the west end of Wentworth Street. The roads leading out of the city along the Ashley and Cooper rivers are singularly beautiful, and afford interesting drives.

POPULATION.

In 1800 the population of the city amounted to 18,711, and the United States census of 1870 places the population at that time at 48,956. In 1880 the official census recorded but 49,984, and at the present time it is said to be but little over 50,000. After the Civil War business seemed seriously depressed, and, for a decade, there was but little commercial or social activity. In 1879, however, Mr. W. E. Courtney was elected Mayor, and under his energetic administration the city rapidly regained its former enterprise and activity. The streets were widened, paved with Belgian blocks and generally improved, and the city seemed to have awakened to a new period of enterprise and progress. At the expiration of Mayor Courtney's term he was re-elected, and this year his grateful constituents sent him to Europe on a well-earned vacation. He had not returned when the earthquake occurred. The first news he had of it was when he arrived at Quarantine of New York, on Sunday, September 5th, and the New York papers were handed to him. His distress may be imagined as he read of the devastation of the city.

THE HISTORY OF THE CITY

has been an eventful one. As early as 1671 some straggling French emigrants settled on the bank of the Ashley River, near what is now Old Charleston, but for some unknown reason abandoned their beautiful settlement after a few months' residence. From that time to 1679 the site was not utilized, but in the latter year an English Colony, under the guidance of William Sayle, fixed upon the place as a permanent residence. Sayle was chosen Governor of the Colony, and for some time occupied the western side of the Ashley River with his colonists. When he died the colonists decided to remove to the west side of the Cooper River. Here the settlement gradually thrived and increased, and at the beginning of the Revolution its population was nearly 12,000. At the first breath of trouble with the mother country, the citizens of Charleston became active sympathizers with the Revolutionary party, and manfully bore their part in the war which followed. Three attempts were made by the British to reduce the city, but it was only after a six weeks' resistance against twelve thousand red-coats and a naval force that the city surrendered to Sir Henry Clinton, May 12th, 1780.

IN THE CIVIL WAR

Charleston bore its share of the troubles that were going. She was the first city to take an active part in Secession measures, and it was against Old Sumter, the grim fort which guards her harbor, that the first shot of the war was fired on April 12th, 1861. An assault upon the city by the Federal forces April 6th and 7th, 1863, proved unsuccessful, and the city remained in Confederate possession until General Sherman captured it February 17th, 1865. The Union troops managed to extinguish a great fire which had been started, but only after much damage had been done. During the course of the war the city had been frightfully riddled and defaced many of the public buildings and churches being torn to pieces by shot and shell. At the close of the war, the city was rapidly rebuilt, and in 1870 was again in a prosperous and thriving condition.

PREVIOUS DISASTERS

to this one of August 31st have rendered the city a place of mourning. Nearly half a century ago it was almost totally destroyed by fire. On April 27th, 1838, the fire started and burned with increasing ferocity for twenty-eight hours. The flames were checked only by the blowing up of a wide swath of buildings across their path. Before they were extinguished eleven hundred and fifty-eight buildings were destroy-

In 1861 a fire broke out in the business portion and destroyed public buildings, business edifices, and dwellings to the amount of nearly $10,000,000. In 1778 and 1796 there were also very disastrous fires in Charleston, the former destroying two hundred and fifty-two houses, and the latter causing a loss of $2,500,000. Several other serious fires have also devastated the city at various intervals, and altogether the city has suffered a loss of not less than $25,000,000 from this single cause.

Since the last important fire in 1861, the devastated district has not been entirely rebuilt, and there are lots in this district which are today vacant. The district over which the fire raged reached westward from the junction of Meeting and Broad streets, and is still known as the "burned district."

THE CYCLONE LAST YEAR.

Last year a new destroying element vented its wrath on Charleston, a terrible hurricane and wind storm sweeping over the city on the 25th of August. The storm lasted through the night, and at one time reached a velocity of eighty miles an hour. Along the river and harbor front the damage was great, Boyce's Wharf being completely demolished, and a number of fishing smacks, yachts, and other vessels sunk. Four piers were blown down at the Atlantic Company's dock, the Cotton Exchange Building was seriously damaged, and the convent of the Sisters of Mercy unroofed and otherwise damaged. Along Rutledge Avenue, the most aristocratic street in the city, the loss was very serious, and the Citadel Baptist Church, the Plymouth Church, the St. Philip Street Synagogue, the Trinity Methodist Church, the Mount Zion Presbyterian Church, and other religious edifices all suffered more or less damage. Nearly a mile of the Northeastern Railroad tracks were swept away, and all the railroad property in the city torn up and seriously damaged. Altogether, the loss was estimated at fully $800,000.

also have visited Charleston before this. The earliest historical records show that the town was slightly shaken by an earthquake on May 19th, 1754. This was followed on April 4th, 1799, by a violent shock, accompanied by a rumbling sound and a high wind. A slight shock was felt on September 10th, 1811. Two months later there were violent and repeated shocks. Six of them were distinctly felt. Slight shocks were felt on January 24th and February 4th, 1812. There were shocks of earthquake, accompanied by a rumbling and hissing sound, on February 7th, 1843. The most violent earthquake of the series occurred on December 19th, 1857, when houses and other buildings were slightly shaken up.

Thus prior to the terrible havoc and loss of life caused by the earthquake of Tuesday, the city had passed through two fierce and destructive sieges in time of war, through four devastating conflagrations and through a hurricane and a wind-storm which destroyed nearly a million dollars' worth of property.

ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH, from the tower of which our picture was taken, stands in the heart of the city, and is an ancient edifice which has many interesting associations. Its construction was begun in February, 1752, and its cost was $32,755.87 of our present currency. The building is of brick, rough cast, and is now colored white. It is one hundred and thirty feet long, sixty feet wide, and its steeple, which is so badly shattered by the earthquake that it threatened to fall, is one hundred and eighty feet high, and a model of architectural beauty. This steeple has been a prominent landmark of Charleston, and could be seen for miles from the ocean. During the bombardment of Charleston, in the Civil War, it was a favorite aim for the batteries on Morris Island, but singularly it was never struck, although the body of the church was several times disfigured by bursting shells. St. Michael's was first opened for service in February, 1761; the bells and clock were imported from England in 1764, and the organ in 1768.

THE STORY OF THE BELLS

forms an interesting chapter of Revolutionary history. When the British evacuated Charleston in December, 1782, Major Traill, of the Royal Artillery, seized them on the pretence that they were a military perquisite. The citizens made an appeal for their return on the ground that they had been purchased by private subscription, and Sir Guy Carleton issued an order for their restoration. But they had already been shipped to England, where they were purchased by a Mr. Ryhinen, and reshipped. They arrived in Charleston in November, 1783, and were at once replaced in the belfry.

In 1861, when the Civil War began, the bells were sent to Columbia for safety, and when that city was burned by Sherman two were stolen and were never recovered, and the rest were so badly injured by the fire as to be useless. In 1866 they were again sent to England to be recast, and this was done by the successors of the firm which had originally cast them one hundred years before. In February, 1867, the eight bells, as nearly as possible identical with the original chimes, were landed in Charleston, and after a duty of over $2000 had been paid on them they were placed in the old steeple of St. Michael's. For the citizens of Charleston these bells appealed with the same sentiment that attaches to the chimes of Trinity Church, New York.

ST. PHILIP'S CHURCH,

which is seen in the distance in the picture, is another famous Episcopal Church of the city, and is situated on the eastern side of town, near the street locally known as "The Bay." It is well known in South Carolina as the church at which the Rev. William B. W. Howe, D.D., now Bishop of the Episcopal Church in South Carolina, officiated prior to his elevation to the bishopric. The edifice is the fourth which has occupied the same site. The first was built in 1681, and the present church was dedicated in 1838, to take the place of the one destroyed by fire in 1835. It was a very beautiful edifice, with a graceful spire on the western extremity, rising two hundred feet toward the heavens. The interior, with its lofty arched roof, profusely ornamented, and supported by Corinthian columns, was remarkable for the elegance and correctness of its architecture. It was originally furnished with an excellent chime of bells, but these were broken up and cast into cannon during the great Civil War, and the means of the society had not yet been sufficient to replace them. St. Philip's was one of the sights of Charleston which every visitor was taken to see. It was in the direct line of the earthquake, and apparently felt its full force. In one of its two cemeteries rest the remains of John C. Calhoun, South Carolina's famous statesman.

OTHER FAMOUS BUILDINGS

are the City Hall, which is an imposing building, entered by a double flight of marble steps and standing in an open square. The Post Office, a venerable structure, the original material for which having been brought from England in 1761. It was much battered during the siege of Charleston. The Custom House, situated just south of the market wharf on Cooper River, is of white marble, in the Roman-Corinthian style, and is one of the finest edifices in the city. The Academy of Music, corner of King and Market streets, is one of the finest theatres in the South. It is sixty by two hundred and thirty-one feet, and, beside the theatre, with accommodations for twelve hundred people, it contains two large halls for concerts, lectures, etc.

THE EFFECTS OF THE EARTHQUAKE

on the edifices of the city have not been reported in detail at the time of writing. It is, however, stated that hopes are entertained of repairing both the great churches which, at first, it was believed would have to be torn down and rebuilt.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Anxious About Husband and Child.—At a recent meeting Mr. G. Clarke, an evangelist, related: "At the close of our meeting one night a lady came up to me and said: 'Mr. Clarke, if I give my heart to Jesus to-night, what will be the result? I am a wife and mother; and shall I have always to attend prayer-meetings, and leave my husband and child alone?' 'No,' I said, 'perhaps you will not be able to attend any meetings, but it will make you ten million times a better wife and mother to take Jesus home with you.' 'Oh,' she said, 'I thought after one got converted, they had to be constantly attending prayer-meetings and such places!'"

Long Sought, but Found at Last.—Another evangelist observed: "At the close of one of our meetings, I asked a man if he were a Christian, and he said: 'No; there is no use talking to me; I have tried over and over again; I am too bad to be saved.' 'Thank God,' I said, 'there is hope for you when you have come to that point—to see your own inability to face the future. It is then that the Lord takes you and lets you see that after you have tried all you can to save yourself, and have failed, you must look to Him alone for salvation.' Before parting, he took hold of my hand, and said: 'I have found something that I have been looking for all my life.'"

Choristers on the Battle-Field.—Mr. Campbell White remarked: "An American officer was lying out on the battle-field. His wounds were bare and exposed to the keen frosty air of a winter night, and one would have thought that in such a position singing would not be in his mind; but he was living in the joy of Christ, and amid his sufferings, great as they were, he raised his voice, and sang:

"When I can read my title clear
To mansions in the skies."

The influence was good. A wounded soldier next him took up the words, and then another and another joined in the singing, and soon the battle-field became vocal with holy song. The thoughts of their sufferings were forgotten as the words rose in the still frosty air, and went up like incense to heaven."

Going to the Wrong Door.—"I Heard of One of Rev. Murray M'Cheyne's elders who was awakened to a sense of his sin, and of his great need of a Saviour. He was in deep darkness and distress for a few weeks, but one Sunday after Mr. M'Cheyne's faithful preaching he found his way to the Lord. At the close of the service, he told Mr. M'Cheyne, who knew of his spiritual concern, that he had found the Lord. When he was asked to explain how this happy change had come about, he said: 'I have been making a great mistake. I have always been coming to the Lord as something better than I was, and going to the wrong door to ask admittance; but this afternoon I went round to the sinner's door, and for the first time cried, like the publican: "Lord, be merciful to me a sinner;" and, oh, sir, I received such a welcome from the Saviour.'"

A Child's Vision of Christ.—"A Lady Lost her husband by death, but she had one little child left her, to remind her of him whom she so dearly loved; and how she cherished that baby girl no one knew but herself. But there came a time when the child's health began to decline. First a cough set in, and then followed rapid consumption. The robust little frame began to droop, and the face that was once so bright became thin and wan. The mother's heart was almost broken, for the doctor gave her no hope, and one day he called her aside and told her as tenderly as possible that her child had but a few hours to live. With a brave heart she determined to make the last hours of her darling as bright as possible, and, going into the shaded room, she bent over the child. At that moment a fit of coughing seized the little one which almost took the spark of life away, but it still fluttered, and the mother whispered:

"Your cough will soon be gone, darling; Jesus is going to take you to heaven to see papa." And then remembering how fond the little one was of pretty things, she continued: "And you will see the pearly gates and the streets of gold, and the beautiful river clear as crystal!" "Oh, mamma, I don't want to go; I am so tired," she said. The mother burst into a flood of tears, and then quickly checking herself she lifted the little weak form from the bed into her arms, and paced the room singing gently to her. The child opened her eyes, and said: "Mamma! Look at Jesus! He is so beautiful! I never thought He was like this before. Good-by, mamma, I am going to Him." The little spirit was gone to her rest."

A Sunshiny Face.—A Christian Worker Observed: "A few days ago, a gentleman, sitting next to me on the platform, said: 'Do you see that young lady there? There is no doubt of her being a Christian.' 'No,' I replied, 'one could see at a glance that she has the joy of the Lord.' For her face seemed to light up with holy joy when the name of Jesus was mentioned. In the after-meeting I went down, and without inquiring if she were indeed a Christian, for her look said she was, I said to her: 'Will you go and speak to some one and tell them how you have found that joy?' She willingly consented, and in a few moments had imparted the secret of the joy with which she herself was overflowing through a child-like faith in Christ. Oh, what an effect it would have if every one who is called by the name of Christ would show by their very look that they were living in communion with God, and that they had a joy that the world has not!"

Dignifying Common Duties.—At a Meeting of Christian workers recently a sister said: "I heard of a lady who took charge of a sewing class of young girls, and one night she was explaining to them that it was not only by working in a meeting or delivering tracts, or teaching in a Sunday-school that one could serve the Lord, but also by performing the every-day duties of life, cheerfully and willingly, whether they be small or great. At the close of the class that night one of their number waited behind to speak to the lady. She said, 'I have just waited to tell you how much you have cheered me to-night. I hold a very responsible position in our household; there are two invalids on whom I have to attend, and many other duties which I cannot enumerate, and all these I perform heartlessly and unwillingly, because I never thought I could be serving Christ in doing these things. But now I will take pleasure in those very duties which have been so long a burden to me, and perform them, as you have told me, as unto the Lord and not unto man.'"

A Father Led by his Child.—Mr. J. Ray Observed: "I heard of a little girl lately who gave her heart to the Lord, and afterward became very anxious that her parents also should become followers of the Saviour. Her daily prayer was that they should be born again. One night she was sitting with her father wondering how she should best break this subject to him, when she said: 'Father, may I sing something for you?' 'Surely, child,' replied the father, fondly caressing the little one who sat at his feet. She began the beautiful hymn beginning with 'There is a fountain filled with blood.' She sang the hymn throughout. It seemed to impress the father a little, but he made no remark. 'Father, may I read a bit to you?' the little messenger asked, looking up into her father's face. 'If it pleases you, you may,' he replied. She opened her Bible, and read in the third chapter of John. The man's hand was seen to tremble as his child read the wonderful story of Christ and Nicodemus. 'Will you let me pray, father?' she asked, as she closed the book. 'You cannot pray, child,' he said. 'I will try, father,' she answered, and on bended knee she prayed that God would save her father and mother. The father's heart was touched, and there, while his little child was praying, he gave himself to Christ."

MORNING breaks upon Beer-sheba. There is an early stir in the house of old Abraham. There has been trouble among the domestics. Hagar, an assistant in the household, and her son, a brisk lad of sixteen years, have become impudent and insolent, and Sarah, the mistress of the household, puts her foot down very hard and says that they will have to leave the premises. They are packing up now. Abraham, knowing that before his servant and her son will be very long and across desolate places, in the kindness of his heart sets about putting up some bread and a bottle with water in it. It is a very plain lunch that Abraham provides, but I warrant you there would have been enough of it had they not lost their way. "God be with you!" said old Abraham as he gave the lunch to Hagar and a good many charges as to how she should conduct the journey. Ishmael, the boy, I suppose, bounded away in the morning light. Boys always like a change. Poor Ishmael! He has no idea of the disasters that are ahead of him. Hagar gives one long, lingering look on the familiar place where she had spent so many happy days, each scene associated with the pride and joy of her heart, young Ishmael.

The scorching noon comes on. The air is stifling and moves across the desert with insufferable suffocation. Ishmael, the boy, begins to complain and lies down, but Hagar rouses him up, saying nothing about her own weariness or the sweltering heat; for mothers can endure anything. Trudge, trudge, trudge. Crossing the dead level of the desert, how wearily and slowly the miles slip! A tamarind that seemed hours ago to stand only just a little ahead, inviting the travellers to come under its shadow, now is as far off as ever, or seemingly so. Night drops upon the desert, and the travellers are pillowless. Ishmael, very weary, I suppose instantly falls asleep. Hagar, as the shadows of the night begin to lap over each other—Hagar hugs her weary boy to her bosom and thinks of the fact that it is her fault that they are

IN THE DESERT.

A star looks out, and every falling tear it kisses with a sparkle. A wing of wind comes over the hot earth and lifts the locks from the fevered brow of the boy. Hagar sleeps fitfully, and in her dreams travels over the weary day, and half awakes her son by crying out in her sleep, "Ishmael! Ishmael!"

And so they go on day after day and night after night, for they have lost their way. No path in the shifting sands; no sign in the burning sky. The sack empty of the flour; the water gone from the bottle. What shall she do? As she puts her fainting Ishmael under a stunted shrub of the arid plain, she sees the blood-shot eye, and feels the hot hand, and watches the blood bursting from the cracked tongue, and there is of Beer-sheba, "We shall die! We shall die!" Now, no mother was ever made strong enough to hear her son cry in vain for a drink. Heretofore she had cheered her boy by promising a speedy end of the journey, and even smiled upon him when she felt desperately enough. Now there is nothing to do but place him under a shrub and let him die. She had thought that she would sit there and watch until the spirit of her boy would go away forever, and then she would breathe out her own life on his silent heart; but as the boy begins to claw his tongue in agony of thirst, and struggle in distortion, and begs his mother to slay him, she cannot endure the spectacle. She puts him under a shrub, and goes off a bow-shot, and begins to weep until all the desert seems sobbing, and her cry strikes clear through the heavens; and an angel of God comes out on a cloud, and looks down upon the appalling grief and cries: "Hagar, what aileth thee?" She looks up and she sees the angel pointing to a well of water, where she fills the bottle for the lad. Thank God! Thank God!

I learn from this Oriental scene, in the first place, what a sad thing it is when people do not know their place, and for their business! Hagar was an assistant in that household, but she wanted to rule there. She ridiculed and jeered until her son, Ishmael, got the same tricks. She dashed out her own happiness, and threw Sarah into a great fret; and if she had stayed much longer in that household she would have upset calm Abraham's equilibrium. My friends, one half of the trouble in the world to-day comes from the fact that people do not know their place, or, finding their place, will not stay in it. When we come into the world there is always a place ready for us. A place for Abraham. A place for Sarah. A place for Hagar. A place for Ishmael. A place for you and a place for me.

OUR FIRST DUTY

is to find our sphere; our second is, to keep it. We may be born in a sphere far off from the one for which God finally intends us. Sixtus V. was born on the low ground, and was a swineherd; God called him up to wave a sceptre. Ferguson spent his early days in looking after sheep; God called him up to look after stars, and be a shepherd watching the flocks of light on the hill-sides of heaven. Hogarth began by engraving pewter pots; God raised him to stand in the enchanted realm of a painter. The shoemaker's bench held Bloomfield for a little while; but God raised him to sit in the chair of a philosopher and Christian scholar. The soap-boiler of London could not keep his son in that business, for God had decided that Hawley was to be one of the greatest astronomers of England.

On the other hand, we may be born in a sphere a little higher than that for which God intends us. We may be born in a castle, and play in a costly conservatory, and feed high-bred pointers, and angle for gold-fish in artificial ponds, and be familiar with princes; yet God may better have fitted us for a carpenter's shop, or dentist's forceps, or a weaver's shuttle, or a blacksmith's forge. The great thing is to find just the sphere for which God intended us, and then to occupy that sphere, and occupy it forever. Here is to make a plough. There is a man God fashioned to make a constitution. The man who makes the plough is just as honorable as the man who makes the constitution. There is a woman who was made to fashion a robe, and yonder is one intended to be a queen and wear it. It seems to me that in the one case as in the other, God appoints the sphere, and the needle is just as respectable in His sight as the sceptre. I do not know but that the world would long ago have been saved if some of the men out of the ministry were in it, and some of those who are in it were out of it. I really think that one half the world may be divided into two quarters—those who have not found their sphere and those who, having found it, are not willing to stay there. How many are struggling for a position a little higher than that which God intended them. The bondswoman wants to be mistress. Hagar keeps crowding Sarah. The small wheel of a watch which beautifully went treading its golden pathway wants to be the balance-wheel, and the sparrow with chagrin drops into the brook because it cannot, like the eagle, cut a circle under the sun.

In the Lord's army we all want to be brigadier-generals! The sloop says: "More mast, more tonnage, more canvas. Oh, that I were a topsail schooner, or a full-rigged brig, or a Cunard steamer!" And so the world is filled with cries of discontent, because we are in the place where God put us and intended us to be. My friends, be not too proud to do anything God tells you to do; for the lack of a right disposition in this respect the world is strewn with wandering Hagars and Ishmaels. God has given each one of us a work to do. You carry a scuttle of coal up that dark alley. You distribute that Christian tract. You give ten thousand dollars to the missionary cause. You for fifteen years sit with chronic rheumatism, displaying the beauty of Christian submission. Whatever God calls you to, whether it win hissing or huzza; whether to walk under triumphal arch or lift the sot out of the ditch; whether it be to preach on a Pentecost or tell some wanderer of the street of the mercy of the Christ, or of Mary Magdalene; whether it be to weave a garland for a laughing child on a spring morning and call her a May Queen, or to comb out the tangled locks of a waif of the street, and cut up one of your old dresses to fit her out for the sanctuary—do it, and do it right away. Whether it be a crown or yoke, do not fidget. Everlasting honors upon those who do their work, and do their whole work, and are contented in the sphere in which God has put them; while there is wandering, and exile, and desolation, and wilderness for discontented Hagar and Ishmael.

II. Again, I find in this Oriental scene a lesson of

when she goes forth trudging in the desert. What a great change it was for this Hagar! There was the tent, and all the surroundings of Abraham's house, beautiful and luxurious, no doubt. Now she is going out into the hot sands of the desert. Oh, what a change it was! And in our day we often see the wheel of fortune turn. Here is some one who lived in the very bright home of her father. She had everything possible to administer to her happiness—plenty at the table, music in the drawing-room, welcome at the door. She is led forth into life by some one who cannot appreciate her. A dissipated soul comes and takes her out in the desert. Cruelties blot out all the lights of that home circle. Harsh words wear out her spirits. The high hope that shone out over the marriage altar while the ring was being set, and the vows given, and the benediction pronounced, have all faded with the orange blossoms, and there she is to-day broken-hearted, thinking of past joys, and present desolation, and coming anguish. Hagar in the wilderness!

Here is a beautiful home. You cannot think of anything that can be added to it. For years there has not been the suggestion of a single trouble. Bright and happy children fill the house with laughter and song. Books to read. Pictures to look at. Lounges to rest on. Cup of domestic joy full and running over. Dark night drops. Pillow hot. Pulses flutter. Eyes close. And the foot whose well-known steps on the door-sill brought the whole household out at eventide crying: "Father's coming!" will never sound on the door-sill again. A long, deep grief ploughed through all that brightness of domestic life. Paradise lost. Widowhood. Hagar in the wilderness!

How often is it we see the weak arm of WOMAN CONSCRIPTED for this battle with the rough world. Who is she, going down the street in the early light of the morning, pale with exhausting work, not half slept out with the slumbers of last night, tragedies of suffering written all over her face, her lustreless eyes looking far ahead, as though for the coming of some other trouble? Her parents called her Mary, or Bertha, or Agnes, on the day when they held her up to the font and the Christian minister sprinkled on the infant's face the washings of a Holy Baptism. Her name is changed now. I hear it in the shuffle of the worn-out shoes. I see it in the figure of the faded calico. I find it in the lineaments of the woe-begone countenance. Not Mary, nor Bertha, nor Agnes, but Hagar in the wilderness. May God have mercy upon woman in her toils, her struggles, her hardships, her desolation, and may the great heart of divine sympathy inclose her forever!

III. Again, I find in this Oriental scene the fact that every mother leads forth

TREMENDOUS DESTINIES.

You say: "That isn't an unusual scene, a mother leading her child by the hand." Who is it that she is leading? Ishmael, you say. Who is Ishmael? A great nation is to be founded—a nation so strong that it is to stand for thousands of years against all the armies of the world. Egypt and Assyria thunder against it, but in vain. Gaulus brings up his army, and his army is smitten. Alexander decides upon a campaign, brings up his hosts, and dies. For a long while that nation monopolizes the learning of the world. It is the nation of the Arabs. Who founded it? Ishmael, the lad that Hagar led into the wilderness. She had no idea she was leading forth such destinies. Neither does any mother. You pass along the street and see pass boys and girls who will yet make the earth quake with their influence.

WHO IS THAT BOY

at Sutton Pool, Plymouth, England, barefooted, wading down into the slush and slime, until his bare foot comes upon a piece of glass and he lifts it, bleeding and pain-struck? That wound in the foot decides that he be sedentary in his life, decides that he be a student. That wound by the glass in the foot decides that he shall be John Kitto, who shall provide the best religious encyclopædia the world has ever had provided, and with his other writings as well, throwing a light upon the Word of God such as has come from no other man in this century. O mother, mother, that little hand that wanders over your face may yet be lifted to hurl thunderbolts of war or drop benedictions! That little voice may blaspheme God in the grog-shop or cry "Coward" to the Lord's hosts as they go out for their last victory. My mind this morning leaps and I see a merchant prince of New York. One stroke of his pen brings a ship out of Canton. Another stroke of his pen brings a ship into Madras. He is mighty in all the money markets of the world. Who is he? He sits this morning beside you in the Tabernacle. My mind leaps thirty years forward from this time, and I find myself in a relief association. A great multitude of Christian women have met together for a generous purpose. There is one woman in that crowd who seems to have the confidence of all the others, and they all look up to her for her counsel and for her prayers. Who is she? This afternoon you will find her in the Sabbath-school, while the teacher tells her of that Christ who clothed the naked, and fed the hungry, and healed the sick. My mind leaps forward thirty years from now, and I find myself in an African jungle; and there is a missionary of the cross addressing the natives, and their dusky countenances are irradiated with the glad tidings of great joy and salvation. Who is he? Did you not hear his voice this morning in the first song of the service?

My mind leaps forward thirty years from now, and I find myself looking through the wickets of a prison. I see a face scarred with every crime. His chin on his open palm, his elbow on his knee—a picture of despair. As I open the wicket he starts and I hear his chain clank. The jail-keeper tells me that he has been in there now three times—first for theft, then for arson, now for murder. He steps upon the trap-door, the rope is fastened to his neck, the plank falls, his body swings into the air, his soul swings off into eternity. Who is he, and where is he? This afternoon playing kite on the city commons. Mother, you are this morning hoisting a throne or forging a chain; you are kindling a star or digging a dungeon.

A CHRISTIAN MOTHER

a good many years ago sat teaching lessons of religion to her child, and he drank in those lessons. She never knew that Lamphier would come forth and establish the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting, and by one meeting revolutionize the devotions of the whole earth, and thrill the eternities with his Christian influence. Lamphier said it was his mother who brought him to Jesus Christ. She never had an idea that she was leading forth such destinies. But oh, when I see a mother reckless of her influence, rattling on toward destruction, garlanded for the sacrifice with unseemly mirth and godlessness, dancing on down to perdition, taking her children in the same direction, preparing them for a life of frivolity, a death of shame, and an eternity of disaster, I cannot help but say: "There they go—there they go; Hagar and Ishmael!" I tell you, there are wilder deserts than Beer-sheba in many of the fashionable circles of this day. Dissipated parents leading dissipated children. Avaricious parents leading avaricious children. Prayerless parents leading prayerless children. They go through every street, up every dark alley, into every cellar, along every highway. Hagar and Ishmael! and while I pronounce their names, it seems like the moaning of the death wind: "Hagar and Ishmael!"

IV. I learn one more lesson from this Oriental scene, and that is, that in it. Hagar and Ishmael gave up to die. Hagar's heart sank within her as she heard her child crying: "Water! Water! Water!" "Ah!" she says, "my darling, there is no water. This is a desert." And then God's angel said from the cloud: "What aileth thee, Hagar?" And she looked up and saw him pointing to a well of water, where she filled the bottle for the lad. Blessed be God, that there is in every wilderness a well, if you only know how to find it—fountains for all these thirsty souls this morning. On that last day, on that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried: "If any man thirst, let him come to Me and drink." All these other fountains you find are mere mirages of the desert. Paracelsus, you know, spent his time in trying to find out

THE ELIXIR OF LIFE

—a liquid which, if taken, would keep one perpetually young in this world, and would change the aged back again to youth. Of course he was disappointed; he found not the elixir. But here I tell you this morning of the elixir of everlasting life bursting from the "Rock of Ages," and that drinking that water you shall never get old, and you will never be sick, and you will never die. "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters." Ah! here is a man who says: "I have been looking for that fountain a great while, but can't find it." And here is some one else who says: "I believe all you say, but I have been trudging along in the wilderness and can't find the fountain." Do you know the reason? I will tell you. You never looked in the right direction. "Oh," you say, "I have looked everywhere. I have looked north, south, east, and west, and I haven't found the fountain." Why, you are not looking in the right direction at all.

where Hagar looked. She never would have found the fountain at all, but when she heard the voice of the angel she looked up, and she saw the finger pointing to the supply. And, O soul, if to-day with one earnest, intense prayer you would only look up to Christ, He would point you down to the supply in the wilderness. "Look unto me, all ye ends of the earth, and be ye saved; for I am God, and there is none else!" Look! Look, as Hagar looked!

Yes, there is a well for every desert of bereavement. Looking over the audience this morning, I notice an unusual number of signs of mourning and woe. Have you found consolation? Oh, man bereft, oh, woman bereft, have you found consolation? Hearse after hearse. We step from one grave hillock to another grave hillock. We follow corpses, ourselves soon to be like them. The world is in mourning for its dead. Every heart has become the sepulchre of some buried joy. But sing ye to God; every wilderness has a well in it; and I come to that well to-day, and I begin to draw water for you from that well.

If you have lived in the country you have sometimes taken hold of the rope of the old well-sweep, and you know how the bucket came up, dripping with bright, cool water. And I lay hold of the rope of God's mercy this morning, and I begin to draw on that Gospel well-sweep, and I see the buckets coming up. Thirsty soul! Here is

ONE BUCKET OF LIFE!

Come and drink of it. "Whosoever will, let him come and take of the water of life freely." I pull away again at the rope, and another bucket comes up. It is this promise: "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." I lay hold of the rope again, and I pull away with all my strength, and the bucket comes up, bright, and beautiful, and cool. Here is the promise: "Come unto Me, all ye who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

The old astrologers used to cheat the people with the idea that they could tell from the position of the stars what would occur in the future, and if a cluster of stars stood in one relation, why, that would be a prophecy of evil; if a cluster of stars stood in another relation, that would be a prophecy of good. What superstition! But here is in which I put all my faith. By looking up to the star of Jacob, the morning star of the Redeemer, I can make this prophecy in regard to those who put their trust in God: "All things work together for good to those who love God." Do you love Him?

Have you seen the Nyctanthes? It is a beautiful flower, but it gives very little fragrance until after sunset. Then it pours its richness on the air. And this grace of the Gospel that I commend to you this morning, while it may be very sweet during the day of prosperity, it pours forth its richest aroma after sundown. And it will be sundown with you and me after awhile. When you come to go out of this world, will it be a desert march, or will it be drinking at a fountain?

A CONVERTED HINDOO

was dying, and his heathen comrades came around him and tried to comfort him by reading some of the pages of their theology; but he waved his hand as much as to say: "I don't want to hear it." Then they called in a heathen priest, and he said: "If you will only recite the Numtra, it will deliver you from hell." He waved his hand as much as to say: "I don't want to hear that." Then they said: "Call on Juggernaut." He shook his head as much as to say: "I can't do that." Then they thought perhaps he was too weary to speak, and they said: "Now, if you can't say 'Juggernaut,' think of him." He shook his head again, as much as to say: "No, no, no!" Then they bent down to his pillow, and they said: "In what will you trust?" His face lighted up with the very glories of the celestial sphere, as he cried out, rallying all his dying energies: "Jesus." Oh, come this morning to the fountain! I will tell you the whole story in two or three sentences. Pardon for all sin. Comfort for all trouble. Light for all darkness. And every wilderness has a well in it.

A SABBATH-OBSERVING GOVERNOR.

OUR friend, Dr. W. H. Taylor, of Cincinnati, kindly sends us the following incident in the life of the late Hon. John W. Stevenson, formerly Governor of Kentucky, who died on August 10th:

For many years previous to 1868 it was the custom of the Legislature of Kentucky to send to the Governor a package of State bills on the last Saturday of each session. This was done in order that the Governor might have Sunday to examine and sign these bills, which would enable the Legislature to adjourn on the following day. But that custom ceased when Mr. Stevenson became Governor, and among the letters which he prized the most were some expressing a cordial approval of this firm action from those who had formerly criticised it in the severest terms. Mr. Stevenson also deserves the great credit, which he so frequently received, for having been one of the first of our public men to protest by his example against another impious custom, which for a long time disgraced our Christian civilization. In his earlier days, when duels were common, he was publicly challenged by a political opponent. The letter which Mr. Stevenson wrote on this occasion, and in which he gave his reasons for refusing the challenge, did very much toward breaking up this barbarous custom. That letter was also the beginning of a warm personal friendship between its author and the Hon. Henry Wilson, who always spoke with enthusiasm of his friend's action in this matter.

A CHRISTIAN HEROINE.

WHILE Christians at home are sacrificing their spiritual interest to make money, a brave young convert in the foreign missionary field has proved her confidence in God's promises by facing poverty rather than forsake the Saviour. In a letter published in the Foreign Missionary from Rev. M. E. Caldwell, at Bogota, United States of Colombia, he says: "We have among our members a very smart young girl, full of zeal and piety. She was a saleswoman in a bakery, but on account of her profession of faith in our Church she has lost her position. Her employers told her they did not want her to leave the store, for they were well satisfied with her work and wanted her to stay, but that she must promise never again to enter our church, or on the contrary she must go. They told her that the priests could give her all the religion she needed, and that she had better resolve to stay. The situation was sad for the poor girl, for she is entirely left alone to make her living, and to be cast out might mean severe suffering. She, however, replied: 'I have chosen Christ for all eternity. These temporal blessings at best are of short duration. I cannot give up the one for the other.' When asked about her future prospects, she replied: 'I am happy in my new hope; I never felt so happy before. I will trust the Lord for the future.'

WHAT AN INDIAN BOY WANTS.

A SIMPLE touching letter sent from a little redskin at the Santee Agency to some acquaintances now in Massachusetts is published in the American Missionary. The boy says: "Miss Vothrees told me to write a letter to you. I will tell you about my people. My people do not believe on God, but they believe on something else. They worship snakes and water and the thunder, and the sun. They have Indian dances and the sun-dance too. I think that dance is dreadful. The house where they dance is made of leaves. They cut themselves, and they have a post in the house where they hang themselves. They cut through the flesh on the breast and put a little stick through the flesh, and tie a string on each end and then hang them up until it cut the flesh, and after it cut the flesh it cut on the shoulder, and they tie three or four buffalo heads to draw. They draw them around until the sun sets.

"Now I know the right way. First I believe these Indian ways, now I know the right way. Now I believe in God and I try to be a Christian, and I am learning how to pray. We have boys' prayer-meeting on Sunday and on Wednesday evening. I want the people at Fort Berthold to love God and to believe on Him. But I am only a little boy, so I can't tell them now. I will ask God to help me, and I want my people to be Christians. I want you to pray for my people."

A COMMON MISTAKE.

A GOOD illustration of the need of following up prayer by effort may be found in the following anecdote related by Mr. C. H. Spurgeon:

"A scholar was remarkable for repeating her lessons well. Her schoolfellow, rather idly inclined, said to her one day: 'How is it that you always say your lessons so perfectly?' She replied, 'I always pray that I may say my lessons well.' 'Do you?' said the other; 'well, then, I will pray, too;' but alas! the next morning she could not even repeat a word of her usual task. Very much confounded, she ran to her friend, and reproached her as deceitful. 'I prayed,' said she, 'but I could not say a single word of my lesson.' 'Perhaps,' rejoined the other, 'you took no pains to learn it.' 'Learn it! Learn it! I did not learn it at all,' answered the first. 'I thought I had no occasion to learn it when I prayed that I might say it.' The mistake is a very common one."

A CHRISTIAN PHYSICIAN AMONG ZULUS.

A LETTER from Dr. Dalzell, of the Gordon Memorial Mission, in Africa, printed by Dr. Dowkontt in his Medical Missionary Record, reports encouraging progress. Dr. Dalzell says: "It was a time of weeping when my wife and I parted with the crying Zulus. The poor mothers remembered my kindness to their babies; it had been an anxious time to them when they carried them to me almost dying in their arms, but it gave me a blessed opportunity to speak to them of their souls. The Lord has honored me in my works in spite of the fearful odds against me, including war. All the long night of Isandklwana I watched and waited to see if the Zulus would attack our house. I have been enabled to baptize sixty-seven during my fourteen years of ministry. The first convert in our neighborhood, on application for baptism, was tied to a tree and assailed by the king's orders, but not before the poor martyr had first prayed for the king and his executioners. Now there is religious liberty, and the king's chief wife and child have been baptized. I have a long room, brick built, with an iron roof, in which I generally have thirty-five in-patients. Every morning I give them a short gospel address, and then attend to their bodily wants. With the help of two assistants I have given instruction in farming and industrial work."

REASON FOR PERSECUTION.

A BOY of some originality is at present at Kochi, Japan, receiving instruction in Christianity. He has had a somewhat remarkable experience, which is thus described by Mr. Allchin in a letter to the Missionary Herald:

"The boy's home is in the western part of the main island. He had a school there for little children, and his father is the physician of the village. The Buddhist priest, on making his regular tours through the villages, was accustomed to stay at their house, and on one occasion asked the youth if he had any interesting reading. He replied that he had some very interesting matter, and produced a Bible and some Christian books. In a few days the teacher noticed that his scholars were leaving one by one, and at last was obliged to close the school because so few came. It appears that the priest had gone to the villagers and warned them against sending their children to the school, because the teacher had become a Christian. The father also became enraged with the son, and for a punishment sent him to live with an uncle. Now, the young man had not become a Christian; but, having once heard a Japanese preach, had become curious to know about Christianity, and so had purchased these Christian books. The punishment did not continue long, for, cutting it short by running away from his uncle's house, he made his way across the country on foot to Kobe, a distance of over two hundred miles. One Sunday morning he turned up at Miss Dudley's house—dusty, tired, and hungry. Employment was obtained, by which he could earn his food, and he was happy. His great object in going to Kobe was to learn from the missionaries themselves what Christianity was, and, as he says, 'having learned, to return to my country and give them something to persecute me for.' This expression sounds harsh; but we found, during our trip, that his feelings are not bitter toward his relatives. Mr. Atkinson has taken him into his home as 'boy' for a few months, that he might give him personal instruction and introduce him to the Christians. He has since embraced Christianity, and has been baptized."

MARRIAGE ON TRIAL.

IN a letter published in the Missionary Herald from Mr. De Forest, who is laboring at Osaka, Japan, a singular social custom is described. He says:

"An incident occurred in connection with this church that is worthy of mention as showing the abnormal power that Japanese parents have over their grown-up children. A father, mother, son, and bride all became Christians. Shortly after, the bride visited her home, fifteen miles away, and her father, a hater of Christianity, bade her go and bring home all her effects, which she did; and for a year all endeavors to restore her to her husband have failed. She is carefully kept at home, and her father is reported to be planning to get her another husband, who knows nothing of our religion. Some may wonder why the law was not invoked to restore this wife. The reply is that in the eye of the law she was not his wife. Legal marriage consists simply in transferring the woman's name to her husband's home by means of the local official register, and this girl was given without the legal transfer; that is, was given on trial. If after a year or two things went tolerably well, and the step-mother was not too great a nuisance, the name would then be transferred.

A SUFFERER HEALED.

THE following letter, signed Sarah B. Norris, and dated September 3d, has been received from Maquoketa, Iowa:

"'Tis joy, not duty, to tell what the Lord has done for me. I had been quite delicate in health since early childhood, especially in the last five years. For some years there seemed to be no definite disease except weakness and general debility. Then I began to suffer severely from dyspepsia; about the same time I began to notice an affection of the skin upon the palms of my hands. The hands were hot and dry, with much burning and itching. The skin was hard and rough, bursting open and bleeding, so that I would have six or seven fingers bound up at one time. Soon I became a great sufferer from neuralgia almost all over my whole body. I had sick headache twice every three weeks. In addition to all this, I met with an accident three years since, which so affected my eyes, that I was fast losing my sight. I could not endure artificial light of any kind, and it was impossible for me to read but very little, even upon a bright day. I had a disease of the liver, rheumatism, a sprained wrist, a sprained ankle, and other diseases.

"I had the advice of several very skilful physicians, with but little relief. Life had long ago become a burden, and I was ready to give up in despair when Mrs. M. Baxter and Mrs. E. E. Stroud Smith came to Freeport, Ill. I attended the meetings for holiness and healing held in the Baptist Church; I had, some time before, received the blessing of sanctification, but I was now led to see that Jesus "bare our sicknesses." I went home one night and threw away all my medicines, laid aside all my instruments, etc.

"It seemed a momentous step, and I trembled violently. It was all so new to me, as I had once been much prejudiced against 'faith-cures,' and would hear nothing upon the subject. The next night the Rev. Mr. Halsey, of the Baptist Church, anointed me for healing. I asked the Lord to make me 'every whit whole,' claiming the promise that, 'What things soever ye desire when ye pray, if ye believe that ye receive them ye shall have them.' I went home confessing what the Lord had done for me. For some time Satan tempted me terribly. This was in December, 1885, and I enjoy better health to-day than I ever could have believed to be possible. It is perfect, glory to God! I am now engaged in the work of the Salvation Army, in which I am much exposed and lose much rest. I write this in jail, where I, with two others, am serving a sentence of ten days for preaching Christ. I am kept in perfect peace, because my mind is stayed on God. Hallelujah!"

MR. GEORGE MÜLLER'S ANNUAL RECORD.

IN accordance with his usual custom, Mr. Muller has issued his "Brief Narrative of Facts" for the past year. It records the receipts of money sent to him from all parts of the world to support the orphans he maintains and educates in his Orphanages at Ashley Down. The report was written in Australia, "to which country," says Mr. Muller, "I have come, accompanied by my beloved wife, after repeated pressing invitations, in order that in these Colonies also I may, in my measure, seek to benefit the Churches and preach the Gospel to the unconverted; and I have likewise been greatly helped in my service in this vast country, as was the case in the twenty-three other countries where I had previously labored in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America.

"From May 26th, 1885, to May 26th, 1886, there was sent to the institution $160,895.50. The gifts which make up this large amount were all voluntary and unsolicited. Mr. Muller has never asked any human being for help or gifts. When difficulties have come, as they often have come in the course of his work, he has committed them to God in prayer, and help has always been sent. Since March 5th, 1834, fifty-two years ago, he has received in this way more than five million dollars."

On page 20 of the "Narrative," Mr. Muller says: "God is my helper and friend. To Him are my eyes directed day by day; to Him alone I look for help, and were it otherwise, this largest of all the Orphan Institutions in the world would soon be in the greatest distress. But as my fellow-laborers and myself do not merely say that we trust in Him, but really do so, and not in friends, not in former donors, not in circumstances, and not in the reports, we are helped year after year, although we are often poor.

"I do wish in my inmost soul that the Church of God at large knew more the power of prayer and faith in these our unbelieving and sceptical days; and, among various other reasons why I am travelling from country to country throughout Christendom, I have also this particularly in view, that, by seeking to bring back professing Christians to the Bible, I may likewise thus strengthen their faith. The Christian reader will be glad to know, that my feeble efforts in this respect have been abundantly blessed everywhere. Three times I preached in the Theatre Royal in Melbourne, each time to about three thousand hearers, many of whom were of sceptical tendencies; but my statements regarding the power of prayer and faith were listened to in breathless silence. The same was the case at the great Melbourne Town Hall, when I spoke also for an hour and ten minutes. In like manner, after our arrival in New South Wales, I held very large meetings in the churches and halls at Sydney and Bathurst, and after we left Melbourne I preached six times at Geelong, in the Colony of Victoria. My dear wife and I are now at Ballarat, a large and beautiful city, the next to Melbourne in size and importance, where I have held several meetings already, and where I purpose to preach twice more before our departure for Maryborough. We shall probably visit Sandhurst after we have left Maryborough, and then return to Melbourne for some time."

THE COMING EARTHQUAKE.

John's Description—Two Unprecedented Convulsions—Seven Thousand Killed and Jerusalem Decimated—The Greatest of all Earthquakes—Islands and Mountains Disappearing—Surpassing the Earthquake at Lisbon—An Eyewitness' Description of the Lisbon Earthquake—When the Great Convulsion will Occur—How it May be Escaped—The Practical Lesson.

THE distressing details reported during the past few days of the desolation and suffering in Charleston, S. C., from the effects of the earthquake of August 31st, enable us to form some conception of the almost universal affliction which will be produced by the great earthquakes that will accompany the dire events of the final consummation. John, describing it (Rev. 6: 12-14), says: "There was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind. And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places." This earthquake is probably the same as that mentioned in another place (Rev. 11: 13), with the additional details that it destroyed one tenth of the city, and killed seven thousand persons.

THE GREATEST OF ALL

earthquakes, however, that the world has ever experienced, is the one that follows it, at the battle of Armageddon, when "there was a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake and so great. And the great city was divided into three parts, and the cities of the nations fell, . . . and every island fled away, and the mountains were not found" (Rev. 16: 18-20). Thus the mountains and islands that were moved out of place in the former earthquake disappear entirely in the latter, and the city which had already been decimated is rent in three. Consider for a moment what the earth-throes must be that can surpass the earthquakes of the past.

THE LISBON EARTHQUAKE

of 1755 stands now at the head of the awful list, with its ghastly record of fifty thousand victims. It was about the beginning of a bright November day that the flourishing capital city of Portugal was laid low. All was smiling and peaceful in the place where, ten minutes later, the air was rent with the shrieks of men, women, and children in mortal agony. The first shock is described as having been very slight, hardly more than the vibration caused by a passing wagon. Then, after an interval of two or three minutes, came another movement which caused the houses to split and crack, and this was followed in a minute more by the most awful convulsion that ever occurred in any European town. In a moment the city was a heap of ruins, and, amid a profound darkness, the crushed and mangled people passed out into eternity. Then a fire broke out, and, driven by a fierce wind, completed the destruction of the Portuguese capital. Some unfortunate people had fled in terror to take refuge on the river banks; but the tide suddenly rose and overwhelmed them, while the marble quay of the Terreiro do Paço sank with all the persons on it, and not one of the bodies ever rose to the surface again.

In a record left by an eye-witness, he says: "With regard to the buildings, it was observed that the solidest in general fell the first. Every parish church, convent, nunnery, palace, and public edifice, with a vast number of private houses, were either thrown down or so miserably shattered that it was rendered dangerous to pass by them. The scenes of horror I met with exceed all description; nothing could be heard but sighs and groans. I did not meet with a soul in the passage who was not bewailing the death of his nearest relations and dearest friends, or the loss of all his substance. I could hardly take a single step without treading on the dead or dying. In some places lay coaches with their masters, horses, and riders almost crushed in pieces; here mothers with their infants in their arms; there ladies richly dressed, priests, friars, gentlemen, mechanics, either in the same condition or just expiring."

It is a dreadful picture, with all the ghastly features of the Charleston catastrophe multiplied and intensified. Yet the Word of God says that the convulsion yet to be experienced will surpass even that—"such as was not since men were upon the earth."

WHEN IT WILL OCCUR

is shown in prophecy relatively with other events. It immediately precedes or accompanies the arrival of our Lord upon the earth to overthrow at Armageddon the hosts gathered out of all the ten nations of the Roman world, under the command of the mysterious being described in the New Testament as Antichrist, and by Daniel as "the little horn" (Dan. 7: 8), and follows at an interval of about three and a half years the earthquake described in the 6th and 11th chapters of Revelation.

HOW IT MAY BE ESCAPED,

is clearly revealed. Nearly two years before the earlier earthquake, Christ will descend into the air, and all those watchful Christians who are watching and waiting for His appearing will be caught up to meet Him in the heavens, with those who have part in the first resurrection (1 Thess. 4: 15-17). There with the Lord in safety and glory they will be spared the sorrow, and distress, and misery of the judgments being poured out upon the world, and will return only when He comes in power and might to take to Himself His power and reign. Christians who are leading idle, inconsistent, and unspiritual lives will lose this priceless privilege. They will endure all the horrors of the persecution of Antichrist's later years, and will share in the suffering of the woes of the earth.

THE PRACTICAL LESSON

is the necessity of holiness and watchfulness. All the events that are taking place in Europe show that the nations are rapidly assuming the position they will take in the last days. The time of Antichrist's appearance is evidently drawing near. The midnight cry summoning the watchful Christians to meet their Lord in the air will soon be heard. Then those who have missed that opportunity will know that immediately before them lies a time of trouble such as neither they nor their fathers have ever known, not even in the days of persecution. While the godless must suffer under the calamities and convulsions of the material world, the lot of the Christian will be far worse. His conscience will reproach him for his worldly life, and remind him that, but for that, he might have been safe with Jesus as others, whom he has known, then are. He will be given the dread alternative of openly deserting his Lord or of being mercilessly persecuted. Then the most rigorous boycotting will be enforced, for John saw that "no man might buy or sell save he that had the mark or the name of the beast, or the number of his name" (Rev. 13: 17). Thus cut off from the friendship of the world, bereft, by the mysterious disappearance of his more spiritual brethren, of Christian sympathy and comfort, and racked by self-reproach, he must wait through the years the coming of his Lord and His saints. The time for preparation grows daily shorter; the events going on all over the world echo Christ's warning words: "Watch ye therefore: for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning: lest coming suddenly He find you sleeping. And what I say unto you I say unto all, Watch" (Mark 13: 35-37).

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Capture of Geronimo and his Band is now definitely announced. On September 6th, General Miles arrived at Fort Bowie, Arizona, with Geronimo, Natchez, and three other prisoners; and Captain Lawton followed him with thirty-five more hostiles. They at once proceeded to Florida where they proposed to lodge the prisoners at Fort Marion; but they were stopped on their way by an order from General Drum, Acting Secretary of War, directing that the party remain at San Antonio until it is determined what course of procedure shall be taken against them. It is stated that the civil courts of Arizona want to try Geronimo for murder, but military officers contend that he should be tried by military commission or by court martial. The result for Geronimo would probably be the same in either case. His disposal will depend upon the terms on which he surrendered. They were not disclosed last week, but it was hinted that a promise was given to him that his life should be spared, and that he should not be tried in an Arizona court. Though the vindictive feeling against him has somewhat subsided, public opinion demands that Geronimo shall never again have opportunity to commit more outrages. If he is not to be executed he must be kept safely or there will be great indignation against the Government.

The Republican Anti-Saloon Conference Held at Binghamton, N. Y., on September 7th, preparatory to the National Conference to be held this day in Chicago, is a recognition of the progress of the Prohibition movement. It was publicly announced that the prime object of the conference was to "jump on the Prohibitionists," and the utterances of Mr. Blaine during the campaign in Maine appeared to lend probability to the assertion. Very little success attended the attempt, however, if it was ever contemplated. General Thomas W. Conway vainly endeavored to get passed resolutions denouncing the Prohibitionists, and though he was appointed chairman of the committee to carry on the anti-saloon movement, and announced his determination to fight Prohibitionists "from the word go," there was a general indisposition to condemn total abstainers who have left the Republican Party. General Conway produced his promised proofs of an alliance between Prohibitionists and Democrats, but he was met by the assertion that the relation between them was no stronger than between the Republicans and the Butler Party in the last Presidential campaign. The movement seemed from the speeches made, and the resolutions passed, to be an effort to keep total abstainers in the party instead of suffering them to go into the Prohibition camp. There is little doubt that if the Republican Party adopted the platform constructed, and honestly worked for the programme mapped out, many Prohibitionists would be won back, but it is not pretended that the party as a whole sympathizes with the movement. One of the resolutions passed demanded "of the Republican Party, to which we are proud to acknowledge allegiance, that it shall take a firm and decided stand in favor of temperance and against the saloon, and that when in power it shall adopt and enforce measures for the restriction, and, at the earliest possible moment, for the prohibition of the liquor traffic." The sincerity of the men who passed the resolution is beyond question, but their course excites the derision of Republicans who do not agree with them, and of the Prohibitionists, who regard it as a snare. Only forty-seven delegates attended the conference.

The Re-Election of Senator George F. Edmunds is assured by the election in Vermont. The returns show that the Senate is solid for him, and he has an overwhelming majority in the House. One report states that besides the Democrats there are only ten anti-Edmunds men elected to the House. This would give Mr. Edmunds a majority there of one hundred and sixty. The fact shows that untrue reports have been widely circulated during the past year through the country, or that the Vermont people have changed their mind about their Senator. It was emphatically stated in Washington, New York, and elsewhere, that the failure of Mr. Edmunds to support Mr. Blaine in 1884 would cost him his seat. Prominent Vermonters were mentioned who were so indignant at the conduct of Mr. Edmunds in the Presidential campaign that they would use all their influence to prevent his re-election, and that that influence would be sufficient for the purpose. The result does not justify the prediction, for Mr. Edmunds seems to be sure of another term. The Republican plurality for the governorship was 20,590, and Mr. Ormsbee, the candidate, had a clear majority over all of 18,463.

An Appeal for the Homeless Sufferers of Charleston has been issued by the committee of the New York Chamber of Commerce. It is signed by William E. Dodge, Chairman; John Crosby Brown, Treasurer; George Wilson, Secretary; Levi P. Morton, John Claflin, and many others. The committee present the case with much earnestness, reminding the public that "the equinoctial storms will soon be felt, and those exposed in that malarious climate, particularly women and children, will succumb to disease and death, and thus add horror to this great calamity." By the end of the week $48,872 had been received, and money was still flowing in. Funds have been opened in other large cities. In Philadelphia $30,000 was contributed.

The Deposition of a Mormon Bishop Reported by the Utah journals is an unequivocal expression of the hostility of the Mormon Church to the United States Government. Bishop Sharp, who has been deposed, is admitted by the journals that advocated his deposition to be a man of ability and integrity, whose character is above reproach. "His career," says one journal, the most embittered against him, "has elicited only our unqualified admiration." The offence which has nullified all these good qualities is the course he took when arrested and tried for polygamy. He pleaded guilty, and, in an address to the court he asserted that he had entered into a marriage covenant with each of his wives at a time when the law did not forbid "plural marriage." He did not understand that the Edmunds law required him to disown or abandon his wives. "I expect to remain," said he, "under the political disabilities placed upon me, but I have so arranged my family relations as to conform to the requirements of the law, and I am now living in harmony with its provisions, as construed by this court and the Supreme Court of the Territory. And it is my intention to do so in the future until an overruling Providence shall decree greater religious toleration in the land." That was his offence. The Mormons contend that he should have refused to obey the law and have accepted martyrdom. As he did not, they have deposed him, thus showing that obedience to the law is an offence in their eyes which ability, integrity, and irreproachable character do not palliate.

The British Parliament Has Taken Mr. Parnell's Bill for the Relief of the Irish Tenantry into consideration, and will probably begin this day the debate on its second reading. The first clause provides that leaseholders may apply to the court to fix judicial rent; the second, that tenants whose rents were fixed a year ago may apply to the court for a revaluation, and the third that the court, pending decision on applications, may suspend an ejectment on the payment of such proportion of the rent as the court may decide to be proper. It is stated that Lord Hartington has assured the Conservatives that if they will oppose the bill he and his friends will support them. As the bill is not a Home Rule bill, but simply a measure to protect tenants during the winter from undue severity on the part of landlords, it is difficult to understand the motive of Lord Hartington's opposition except on the general principle of suspecting the Irish party of disloyalty and opposing all concessions to them. If the Liberal deserters unite with the Conservatives they will be able to defeat the bill, and the coming winter will be a period of unprecedented distress and possibly violence in Ireland.

Serious Riots Took Place in Denmark Last week. For a long time past the Government has been unpopular with the people and a revolution has been dreaded. The King has insisted on keeping in power an administration devoid of statesmanlike tact and notorious for its propensity to vex and annoy the public by petty restrictions and galling exactions. Their latest blunder was forming a corps of military police decked in resplendent uniforms of blue and silver. These men are hated by the people for some cause not explained, and their appearance anywhere is the signal for disturbance. A few days ago there was a fair at Brendersleven and some drunken men were causing a commotion. A company of the hated military police was sent to arrest the noisy revellers and immediately they were assailed with sticks and stones and driven back. The fight became general, and two thousand peasants took part in it. The surrounding country districts were aroused, and organized fights with the police have occurred. The situation is critical.

Prince Alexander of Bulgaria Quitted His capital on September 8th amid general expressions of sorrow on the part of the people and the army. Had he decided to remain they would have stood by him, and they earnestly besought him to reconsider his decision. The Prince, however, remained firm, and advised them to obey the regency and hope for better times. There appears to be no doubt that, had he remained, Russia would have moved against him. In obeying her and leaving his kingdom he has acted wisely, for the act has aroused the indignation of Europe against his enemy. In Germany, Austria, and England the arrogance of Russia has excited general disgust, not unmixed with alarm. The governments are asking what right Russia has to dictate to the people of Bulgaria and compel them to abandon a ruler of their own choice. They also see that the Czar's object is to open a way for himself through the Balkans to Constantinople. The popular ovations tendered to Prince Alexander on his way from Sofia to Darmstadt were a sign that the people share the feelings of the governments. It is reported that Queen Victoria has invited the Prince to visit England, and that popular demonstrations are in preparation there. The next move on the part of Russia is anxiously awaited. In the present temper of Austria and England any attempt to place a Russian or a tool of Russia on the Bulgarian throne will bring about a dangerous crisis. Prince Bismarck is reported as saying that the peace of Europe would be promoted if Russia were subjected to "a little blood-letting."

The New Building of the Young Men's Christian Association at Worcester, Mass., now in course of erection promises to become a centre of usefulness. It is in the business district of the city, within easy reach of the class it is intended to benefit. Mr. Albert Curtis, who has given twenty-five thousand dollars toward the building, laid the memorial stone. The money raised, ninety-six thousand dollars, was contributed by over thirty-one hundred donors. The Association numbers eight hundred and fifty members, has an efficient secretary, and confines itself strictly to intellectual, moral, and religious work for young men.

An Opportunity for Christian Workers to get training for work among the poor is afforded by the Bethany Institute, No. 69 Second Avenue, New York City. The managers, Rev. and Mrs. A. G. Ruliffson, request us to inform out readers that they are prepared to receive ladies desiring to become missionaries, at home or abroad, or Bible-readers, at small expense, for a year of preparation and experience in Christian work. During the last fifteen years, two hundred and seventy-five ladies have shared its advantages, which are open to members of all Evangelical churches. Its session opens about the middle of September, and those who desire to enter upon such a course of training at the institute should apply to the superintendents at the above address for a copy of the annual statement.

A Bible Bound in Pure Gold is on Exhibition in New York. This remarkable book was printed at Oxford, England, and has been rebound in solid gold as a memento of a gentleman now deceased. The binding, which was done by William Matthews in 1851, cost four hundred dollars. The gold used on it is worth two hundred. It is now at the store of Messrs. E. P. Dutton & Co., 31 West Twenty-third Street.

Why a Revival was not Wanted in a New England church is stated by the Independent, which vouches for the truth of the story. It avers that a prominent trustee in one of the largest churches in New England successfully opposed the inauguration of revival meetings on the ground that such a meeting would destroy their new church carpets. "Besides," he is reported to have said, "what do we want with a revival? We are out of debt; our pews are all rented; our house is full, and a revival would only disturb the quiet and orderly development of the church." It would appear that a revival was needed in that church even though it was not wanted.

The Rev. Jacob Freshman Returned from Europe last week. Both he and Mrs. Freshman have benefited by the trip, which has not, however, been one of rest. Mr. Freshman took part in the meetings being held in England in connection with Jewish work, and made an exhaustive study of the methods employed there. Though there are nearly as many Jews in New York City as there are in all Great Britain, it is a remarkable fact that while several societies are working hard there and spending large sums of money in the effort to convert them, there is here but little work being done by any organization beside that of the Episcopal Church, and Mr. Freshman's individual effort. This fact should not be forgotten by the Christian churches of America, on which Mr. Freshman depends for funds to carry on his work. During Mr. Freshman's visit to Paris he found that Mr. Hirsch, the pastor of a Protestant church there, is a converted Jew who is earnestly desiring to labor for the conversion of his Jewish brethren, but precluded from doing so by the lack of funds. There are a large number of Jews in Paris who might be reached, and as America has shown its interest in evangelistic work in Paris by liberally supporting Mr. McAll's work, Mr. Freshman thinks that the cause of God's ancient people there will command similar sympathy. He therefore felt justified in assuring Mr. Hirsch of aid from America, and trusts that Christians here will make good his promise. A few New Testaments printed in Hebrew, such as Mr. Freshman has brought home with him, would do much good among the Jews of Paris if the means could be obtained to purchase them. Any donations sent to Mr. Freshman, at 17 St. Mark's Place, either for this purpose, or for his own work in New York, will be gratefully received.

An Earthquake House has stood in Cincinnati, O., for many years. The Commercial Gazette of that city says that the house was built by a prominent citizen soon after the earthquakes which shook the city in 1811 and 1812. He believed that there would be future developments of the same dread and mysterious subterranean influences, and he built in that belief. The house is a one-story structure of great superficial dimensions; the walls are of cubic dimensions sufficient to sustain at least a hundred times their present weight, and iron girders and stout iron braces in every corner render the building proof against the lateral movements which were the most destructive feature of the earthquake of 1811. This is proof in itself of the impressive lesson of that early disturbance. It is also proof that the citizen who had it built was a prudent man, who prepared to meet the danger which he believed was coming. It would be well if men manifested the same prudence in spiritual affairs. Only a small proportion of those who believe that after death is the judgment avail themselves of the perfect safety won for them on Calvary (Heb. 2:3).

One of the Suffering Families of Charleston, S. C., is in peculiarly sad circumstances. The wife and mother thus described the situation to a reporter: "My husband has been sick and unable to do much work for the past four months, and we have had a hard time providing for our five little children. About three years ago we bought our little home by monthly instalments which are nearly completed. On Tuesday night we had all gone to bed, and by nine o'clock every one was asleep. I was awakened, and the house seemed to be picked up and thrown violently down on the ground. This happened three times before I could in my terror get my little ones, whose screams added to my fright. I got all the children into the street and went back for my husband, when the second shock came. The children rushed back into the house and I met them when I was bringing my poor husband out. We were all in our night clothes. We dressed in the street, and we have not changed our clothes since, nor have we had enough to eat, although the people camped around us have shared with us what they have had. The house, as you see, is ruined, and all our savings are gone. God knows what will become of us." It is well that the lady recognizes the fact, for it must be a consolation to her. She will doubtless remember that though the house which represented long years of saving is destroyed, she has the promise God gives to all who love Him of "a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens" (II Cor. 5:1).

A Ludicrous Imposition on an Evangelist, by a wicked youth, is described by a Maine journal. It states that a revivalist of noted power both as a preacher and a singer commenced a series of services in the town. He made his home with an hospitable family whose resources were by no means large. The preacher had a voracious appetite, and his visit, though welcomed by the heads of the family, was resented by the younger branches who suffered in board and sleeping accommodation by Mr. Salem's presence. They concocted a wicked plot to get rid of him. One of the young men, who slept in the attic over Mr. Salem's chamber, removed a board from the floor and when the preacher was retiring to rest called out in a loud voice, "Salem! Salem!" The preacher heard, and, following the prophet's example, replied, "Here am I Lord." "Arise," said the voice, "and go down to the next town and preach the Gospel." The preacher responded, "Yea, Lord, I will do Thy bidding," and in the morning he went to the next town. One cannot but regret that a man so ready to obey a divine call should have been deceived by the impious trick. There is in these days of remarkable experience urgent need for caution in this matter. Persons seeking indications of their duty sometimes open the Bible at random and take the first passage on which the eye falls as a special message from God, others rely on dreams, or consult spiritualists: mediums. They are frequently misled. The apostolic injunction must not be forgotten (I John 4:1).

The Suicide of a Lover who was to have been married on October 1st is reported from Birmingham, Ala. Some time ago a young man of Elmira, N. Y., occupying a lucrative position on a railroad became engaged to a young lady residing at Birmingham. He went there on September 2d to make preparations for their marriage, but during his stay he fell into temptation and became intoxicated. He was very boisterous and disorderly, and finally was arrested and fined. As the affair was published in the local journals it was the subject of general talk, and the young man was much ashamed. His depression increased, until, on September 5th, he went out and procured small doses of morphine at several drug-stores. When he had sufficient to kill him he took it, and the next day he was found dead. He left a note behind saying that after his disgrace he could not bear to live. In common with other suicides the young man seems to have made the awful mistake of supposing that the misery of the sinner in this world is greater than that in the world beyond the grave (Ps. 9:17).

The Recognition of a Fellow-Citizen in a distant city made two men happy recently. A Chicago physician who returned from his vacation a few days ago, speaking of his trip, said: "Not long ago I was in Washington, and walking along one of the residence streets with a feeling that approximated to home-sickness, when a gentleman came out of the door of a house, came lightly down the two or three steps, and started off just ahead of me. I said without thinking, 'from Chicago?' and he turned quickly, held out his hand and said, 'Yes, are you?' We walked down the street together, and there was no sign of depression of spirits with either of us. I did not remember that I had ever seen the man's face before, but I was glad to meet a man loyal to my own city." That ought to be the case with citizens of the heavenly kingdom. Neither difference in rank nor wealth should prevent one Christian hailing another Christian as a brother and treating him as such (I John 3:14).

A Boy was Saved from a Dreadful Death, at Louisville, Ky., on September 7th, by the strength and endurance of a companion. The two boys, who live at Jeffersonville, wanted to go to Louisville, and agreed to steal a ride over the bridge on the Jeffersonville, Madison and Indianapolis Railroad. They noticed a freight train make a stop at the entrance to the bridge and began to climb upon it. Just as they sprang on the bumpers the train started, and they were afraid to move. Both were much alarmed at their perilous position, and one of them was horrified to see his companion turning faint. Seizing a brake-rod with his left hand to steady himself, he grasped the fainting boy with his right just as he lost consciousness. He held him with the strength of desperation, and continued to hold him, his feet dangling only a few inches above the cross-ties, until the train stopped on the other side of the bridge. If he had released his hold for a moment his companion would have been crushed under the wheels of the cars or dashed to pieces on the rocks in the river bed one hundred feet below. Had he been alone or with a companion less strong or persistent he must have perished. As he passes through life and into the life beyond, it may be hoped that he will then, too, not be alone. If he puts his trust in Christ he will have an Almighty Saviour able to hold him from all harm (John 10:28).

CHRISTIAN LOAFERS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

THE Israelites had conquered the country possessed by Og, King of Bashan, and Sihon, King of the Amorites; and the tribes of Reuben and Gad, having great quantities of cattle, thought that so rich a pasture-country would be eminently suitable for them and for their flocks. They were no bad judges, for the country was specially fitted for sheep-farming. They therefore asked of Moses that they might have that country to be theirs. But Moses objected. Did they mean to sit still and enjoy that country, and then leave the rest of the tribes to cross the Jordan, and to fight for their possessions? If so, he declared that it was to take—that they were selfish in seeking their own ease, and that they would be discouraging God's people, and doing all sorts of mischief. He therefore proposed to them that, if they were to have that conquered country for their own, they should at least cross the river with their brethren, and fight and continue fighting until the land on the other side of Jordan had been cleared of its old inhabitants, and the whole of Israel could take the whole of the country, and each tribe could possess its portion. He put it to them as a matter of honor, and as a matter of right, that they ought to help in conquering the rest of the land. He would have them take their full share in the war, and on that condition they might have the rich meadows of Bashan, but not else. This was clearly just and equitable, and commended itself to those concerned. They at once agreed to the proposal; and Moses, to enforce the agreement, told them in the words of the text that, if they did not keep their covenant, and give all due aid to their brethren, then they would sin against God; and they might be sure that their sin would find them out.

I. First, then,

WHAT WAS THIS SIN?

What is this sin about which the Spirit of God says by Moses, "Be sure your sin will find you out?" A learned divine has delivered a sermon upon the sin of murder from this text, another upon theft, another upon falsehood. Now they are very good sermons, but they have nothing to do with this text, if it be read as Moses uttered it. If you take the text as it stands, there is nothing in it about murder, or theft, or anything of the kind. In fact, it is not about what men do, but it is about what men do not do. The iniquity of doing nothing is a sin which is not so often spoken of as it should be. A sin of omission is clearly aimed at in this warning—"If ye will not do so, be sure your sin will find you out." What, then, was this sin? First, it was the sin of

IDLENESS AND SELF-INDULGENCE.

"We have cattle; here is a land that yields much pasture; let us have this for our cattle, and we will build folds for our sheep with the abundant stones that lie about, and we will repair these cities of the Amorites, and we will dwell in them. They are nearly ready for us, and there shall our little ones dwell in comfort. We do not care about fighting; we have seen enough of it already in the wars with Sihon and Og." Alas! the tribe of Reuben is not dead, and the tribe of Gad has not passed away. Many who are of the household of faith are equally indisposed to exertion, equally fond of ease. Hear them say, "Thank God we are safe! We have passed from death unto life. We have named the name of Christ; we are washed in His precious blood, and therefore we are secure."

Spiritual self-indulgence is a monstrous evil; yet we see it all around. On Sunday these loafers must be well fed. They eat the fat and drink the sweet, and they crowd to the feast of fat things full of marrow, and of wines on the lees well refined—spiritual festivals are their delight: sermons, conferences, Bible-readings, and so forth are sought after, but regular service in ordinary ways is neglected. Not a hand's turn will they do. They gird on no armor, they grasp no sword, they wield no sling, they throw no stone. No, they have gotten their possession; they know they have, and they sit down in carnal security,

SATISFIED TO DO NOTHING.

They neither work for life, nor for life; they are arrant sluggards, as lazy as they are long. Nowhere are they at home except where they can enjoy themselves, and take things easy. The sin of doing nothing is about the biggest of all sins, for it involves most of the others. The sin of sitting still while your brethren go forth to war breaks both tables of the law, and has in it a huge idolatry of self, which neither allows love to God or man. Horrible idleness! God save us from it!

This sin may be viewed under another aspect, as selfishness and unbrotherliness. Gad and Reuben ask to have their inheritance at once, and to make themselves comfortable in Bashan, on this side Jordan. What about Judah, Levi, Simeon, Benjamin, and all the rest of the tribes? How are they to get their inheritance? They do not care, but it is evident that Bashan is suitable for themselves with their multitude of cattle. Some of them reply, "You see, they must look to themselves, as the proverb hath it, 'Every man for himself, and God for us all.'" Did I not hear some one in the company say, "Am I my brother's keeper?" I know that gentleman. I heard his voice years ago. His name is Cain, and I have this to say to him: it is true that he is not his brother's keeper, but he is his brother's killer. Every man is either the keeper of his brother or the destroyer of his brother. Soul-murder can be wrought without an act or even a will; it can be, and is constantly, accomplished by neglect. "But oh," says another, "they can conquer the land themselves. God is with them, and He can do His own work, and therefore I do not see that I need trouble myself about other people." That is selfishness; and selfishness is never worse than when it puts on the garb of religion. Oh, my brothers, hear ye this text, and let it operate with salutary influence to produce in you constant effort for the salvation of those around you!

But with this there was mingled

INGRATITUDE OF A VERY DARK ORDER.

These children of Gad and Reuben would appropriate to themselves lands for which all the Israelites had labored. God had led them forth to battle, and they had conquered Sihon and Og, and now these men would take possession of what others have struggled for, but they are not to fight themselves. This is vile ingratitude; and I fear it is common among us at this very day. How come we to be Christians at all? We owe under God much to past ages, and much to present laborers. There is no man among us but stands immensely indebted to the Church of God. Wilt thou not hand on the light thou hast received? Verily thou deservest to perish in darkness. Art thou fed, and wilt thou not break thy bread to the hungry, or pass a cup of cold water to the thirsty? What art thou at, strange ingrate! that thou shouldst simply be a stagnant reservoir into which streams of mercy fall never to run out of thee again, but to stand and putrefy in selfishness? Remember the Dead Sea, and tremble lest thou be like it, a pool accursed and cursing all around thee!

Again, we may view this from another point of view. It is the sin of untruthfulness. These people pledged themselves that they would go forth with the other tribes, and that they would not return to their own homes until the whole of the campaign was ended. Now, if after that they did not go to the war, and did not fight to the close of it, then they would be guilty of a barefaced lie.

IT IS SACRILEGE

for any man to lie, not only unto man, but unto God. I would speak very tenderly, but if any man has been converted from the error of his ways, by that very conversion he is bound to serve the Lord. If his joining a church meant anything, it meant that he would take part in the common service of God. A do-nothing professor is a merely nominal member, and a nominal member is a real hindrance. He neither contributes, nor prays, nor works, nor agonizes for souls, nor takes any part in Christian service, and yet he partakes in all the privileges of the church. Is this fair? What is the use of him? Once more, and I will have done with this painful subject. What would their sin be? According to Moses it would be a grave injury to others. Do you not notice how he put it to them? "Moses said unto the children of Gad and to the children of Reuben, Shall your brethren go to war, and shall ye sit here?"

WHAT AN EXAMPLE

to set! If one Christian man is right in never joining a Christian church, then all other Christian men would be right in not doing so, and there would be no visible Christian church. Do you not see, you non-professing believers, that your example is destructive of all church-life? What are you at? If one Christian man, with the talent to preach, is right in not preaching, then other Christian men have a right to trifle in the same way, and then there would be no ministry left. An idler is a great waster, and makes others wasters, too.

"Oh," says one, "nobody knows me, and therefore I cannot have much influence either for good or for evil." Not over your own child—your daughter, your son? That influence which you have over even one or two little ones may spread far further than you imagine. We cannot calculate the range of moral influence; it is immeasurable. "None of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself;" for good or for evil we are yoked with the universe, and there is no possibility of severance. Oh, barren tree, do not excuse thyself because thou dost not drip with poison like the upas! It is crime enough that

THOU CUMBEREST THE GROUND!

Moses goes on to remark that if these people did not go forth to war they would discourage all the rest. It is no slight sin to discourage holy zeal and perseverance in others. May we never be guilty of killing holy desires even in children! How often has a burning desire in a boy's heart been quenched by his own father, who has thought him too impulsive, or too ardent! Yet without cold words our chill neglects may freeze. We cannot neglect our own gardens without injuring our neighbors. Do you live anywhere near a house that is not let, which has a back garden left to run to waste? All manner of seeds are blown over upon your ground; and, though you keep the hoe going, yet the weeds baffle you, for there is such a nursery for them just over the wall. One mechanic coming late among a set of workmen may throw the whole company out of order for the day. One railway truck off the rails may block the entire system. Depend upon it, if we are not serving the Lord our God, we are committing the sin of discouraging our fellow-men. They are more likely to imitate our lethargy than our energy.

If I had preached a sermon about murder or theft, you would all have escaped the lash; but few of us will be without rebuke now that I have kept the text in the setting in which God originally put it, and in which He meant it to be presented for our rebuke and exhortation.

II. Secondly, let us carefully notice what was THE CHIEF SIN IN THIS SIN?

Of course, if the Reubenites did not keep their solemn agreement to go over Jordan, and help their brethren, they would sin against their brethren; but this is not the offence which rises first to the mind of Moses. Moses overlooks the lesser, because he knows it to be comprehended in the greater; and he says, "Behold, ye have sinned against the Lord." In this he anticipated the confession of David, "Against thee, thee only have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight." To refuse to help their brethren would be disobedience to the Lord. The hearer of the Gospel is bound to be a repeater of the Gospel. We are all called upon, as we know the Lord, to tell to others what the Lord has told to us; and if we do not so, we are guilty of disobedience to a great Gospel precept.

There would be sin against God in the conduct of these people, if they did not aid in the conquest of Canaan, for they would be dividing God's Israel. Shall the Lord's heritage be rent in twain? God meant them all to keep together. They all came out of Egypt together; they all marched through the wilderness together, and now He meant them to fight His battles together. Were these to take their inheritance, and abide among the sheep-cotes, and leave the other ten and a half tribes to go over Jordan and wage the war alone? This would be scattering the family of God. Can it be that any of us are dividing the Church of God; that is, dividing it into drones and workers? This would be a terrible division; and I fear that it exists already.

III. We have now reached the last point, and the point that is most serious:

WHAT WILL COME OF THIS SIN of doing nothing? What will come of it? "Be sure your sin will find you out." Now, as the time is nearly gone, I will not do more than show that these Gadites and Reubenites would be sure to be found out by their own neglect. Their sin would find them out to their shame and sorrow if they did not lend all their strength to their brethren according to their promise. It would find them out thus: they would be ill at ease. One of these days their sin would leap upon their consciences as a lion on its prey. They would wake up and say, "We were wrong. We were bound to have taken our share in that war;" and every man among them that was good for anything would be troubled in heart because he had failed to do his duty in the hour of need.

More than that, the tribes who went not to the war would be enfeebled by their own inaction. God would have His people learn war; but if these men did not go to the fight they would not be soldierly, and they would not be able to take care of themselves when their land was invaded. How much of sacred education we miss when we turn away from the service of God!

Their sin would also have found them out, had they fallen into it, because they would have been divided from the rest of God's Israel. If they had not gone across the Jordan to fight, the ten and a half tribes would always have said: "What have we to do with you? The Jordan rolls between us, and so let it do. We do not want any connection with those who acted so basely to us in our hour of need." They would practically have cut themselves off from union with the Israel of God, and they would have secured to themselves the loss of all fellowship with earnest men. Those who are non-workers lose much by not keeping pace with those who are running the heavenly race.

To come more practically home, brethren beloved, if you and I are not serving the Lord, our sin will find us out. It will find us out perhaps in this way. There will be many added to the Church, and God will prosper it, and we shall hear of it; but we shall feel no joy therein. We had no finger in the work, and we shall find no comfort in the result. It may be that you will begin to lose all the sweetness of public services. By doing nothing

YOU LOSE YOUR APPETITE.

Many a person who has no appetite needs a wise doctor to say to him, "Of course you cannot eat, for you do not work. Exercise yourself, and your appetite will return." He that earns his breakfast enjoys his breakfast; and he who labors for Christ finds that the services of the sanctuary are exceedingly sweet to Him. If you do not work, your sin will find you out in the loss of enjoyment when present at the means of grace.

I have known this sin find people out IN THEIR FAMILIES.

There is a Christian man; we honor and love him, but he has a son that is a drunkard. Did his good father ever bear any protest against strong drink in all his life? No; he did not like the blue ribbon, of course. I will not dispute about total abstinence, but I do not feel much astonished at a boy drinking much when he sees his godly father drink a little regularly. Every man should labor by precept and example to put down intemperance, and he who does not do so may be sure that his sin will find him out.

Here is another. His children have all grown up thoughtless, careless, giddy. He took them to his place of worship, and he now inquires, "Why are they not converted?" Did he ever take them one by one and pray with them? Did he ever speak earnestly to each boy and each girl, and labor for the conversion of each one? I am afraid that in many cases nothing of the sort has been attempted. Certain mistaken individuals almost think it wrong to seek the conversion of their children while they are children, and their sin finds them out when they see them growing up in ungodliness.

Besides, if we do not look after God's children, it may be that He will not look after ours.

"No," says God, "there were

in the streets, and you had no concern about them, why should your children fare better? You never opened a ragged-school for the poor, why should I bless you? There were men in your employment by whom you gained your living, but you never spoke to them about their souls, nor cared whether they were saved or damned, and I am not going to look after your family when you have no concern for mine."

"Be sure your sin will find you out."

I do not know how this warning may come home to any brother or sister here who has been idling; but it is better that my warning should find him out than that his sin should find him out. I do not know whether there are any idlers here, though I have a pretty shrewd guess that there are. Friends, neglect of the Lord's work will come home to you, and I will tell you when it will come to you, if it does not do so before. When you are sick and ill, your faith in Christ will bring you great comfort, but you will be sorrowful if you have to say to yourself: "Oh, that I had served God while I was young!"

A FRIEND SAID TO ME,

"My dear sir, you are often laid aside, and no doubt the reason is the imprudent manner in which you worked away in your youth. You preached ten times in a week almost all the year round, year after year, and of course you wore yourself out." "Oh, yes," I said, "it may be so, but I do not regret it in the least. Thank God, I preached with all my might all over the land when I could do so, and I would again if I could only get renewed strength!" If I cannot work so much as in earlier days, I have not the misery of saying: "I wasted my opportunities, and spent my best days in ease." I do say to myself, "Would God I had done more, or had done it better; but I am thankful to be able to exonerate myself from all charge of sloth."

Thus far have I spoken to God's people, and if you think that this is rather rough upon them, what shall I say to you who do not love the Lord at all? Oh, sirs, if the fan that is in Christ's hand purges His own floor in this stern way, what will that fan do with you who are as chaff to the wheat! Tremble, ye that forget God. Hear His own words, they are none of mine: "Now consider this, ye that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver." God help you to flee from the sin of doing nothing! The Lord Jesus Christ Himself lead you into the Father's service! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

AN EXPOSURE ON A TROOP-SHIP.*

[THE scene is on board a ship on which a regiment has embarked for transportation from England to India. The colonel of the regiment, with his officers, is standing talking with the captain of the vessel on the poop.]

Suddenly a great noise and confusion was heard at the lower end of the vessel. There was a scuffling of feet, a clamor of voices, and an occasional volley of oaths. A struggle of some kind was evidently going on, and the captain called out angrily to know what was the matter. One of the ship's officers came up to him at once.

"A woman, sir, who was found secreted in the hold, and refuses to go on shore."

"Is she not on the war office list, then?"

"No, sir; she is not a soldier's wife at all. Sergeant Dale and Private Smith say they know her for an impostor. She tried yesterday to get herself passed among the women at the depot with false papers."

"Send the jade ashore at once, then; we have no time to lose; we must be off in five minutes."

"They are trying to get her into the boat, sir, but she won't go. She is like a wild cat, and clings to everything she can lay hold of. It took three men to get her up from the hold."

"Oh, bother! hoist her overboard with a rope, then. Threaten her with a ducking for her pains; there are plenty of boats to drop her into. I can't have the hands hindered from their work."

The officer touched his cap, and went off to obey orders. In another moment a shriek so wild and thrilling that it startled every one on board rang through the air. A figure was seen to burst from the crowd of sailors, with streaming hair and outstretched arms, dashing them aside with a force which seemed almost superhuman. With one bound she broke away and leaped from the fore-castle, flying rather than running along the deck, up the steps to the poop, and on till she flung herself down at Colonel Courtenay's feet, and clasped his knees with power which he could not resist. She threw back her head, showing a face once beautiful, but now distorted by an intensity of agony and passion that smote the bystanders with a sense of terrible mental pain; her long black hair, wet with the dews of anguish that stood on her forehead, fell back in masses from her flushed face; her dark eyes were full of wildness; her whole frame quivered, and her dress, torn and disordered, was stained with blood from the injuries she had received in her struggle with the men.

Clinging to Courtenay as if her life depended on the tenacity of her grasp, looking at him, speaking to him only, she gasped out: "George, George, my own George, save me, save me; don't let them send me away; I must go with you, I will go with you; I cannot live without you. Indeed I cannot; I have tried it, and I cannot; I must be with you; nothing shall tear me from you."

At this unexpected address, spoken loud enough to be heard by all present, a look of significant meaning passed among the officers of Colonel Courtenay's regiment, and from them to the captain and the men who stood around; while Courtenay himself looked down on the girl at his feet with a look of absolute fury.

"Is the woman mad or drunk?" he exclaimed, struggling with cruel violence to disengaged himself from her convulsive grasp; "how dare you attack me in this way? Here, men, drag this woman off, some of you."

At these words a cry more appalling than that which had startled them broke from the poor girl's lips; she lifted up her eyes to his face, piteous with their expression of sorrowful dismay.

"O George, my dear George, don't you know me? I am Lois, your own Lois, that you said you would love forever and ever. O George, it is you who are mad not to know me; you can't have forgotten me. You took me from my home; you took my good name. O George, you will take me with you, won't you? I'll be your servant or anything you please, only don't drive me away." She burst into tears, laying her face against him, and kissing the fierce hands with which, all the time she spoke, he had been trying to loosen her hold.

But now Mrs. Courtenay, who had been engaged at a little distance in a lively conversation, began to be attracted by the noise and excitement, and when, looking around, she saw a woman clinging to her husband, a sudden color flushed her face, and she came forward, saying: "Colonel Courtenay, what is the meaning of this?"

"Only a drunken woman, my love, who mistakes me for some one else."

Then suddenly stooping down over the girl, he said to her in an energetic whisper: "Lois, I do know you, but that lady is my wife. You can never be with me again. Go on shore quietly, and I'll give you some money."

* * * * *

Two sailors came forward and raised her gently and set her on her feet; she made no resistance; it was as though they were dealing with a corpse, but for the staring, mournful eyes. Some money which Colonel Courtenay had secretly thrust into her hand fell from her powerless fingers and rolled on the deck. A young naval officer standing near, with an unmistakable expression of disgust at the scene, kicked it with his foot into the water, and then went to help the men in taking the poor stricken girl as carefully as possible to the boat.

THE DEAD COAL.

IN the course of a sermon on the temptations of the world the Rev. Sam Jones related the following incident:

"A young lady said: 'Father, may I go to the ball to-night?' at a certain place. 'No, daughter; I don't want you to go.' 'Why, father?' 'Well, daughter, I don't like the company you will be in.' 'Well,' she said, 'father, I know all of them are not good that will be there, but,' she said, 'I am not afraid of their hurting me.' About that time there was a dead coal lying upon the hearth. He said: 'Daughter, what is that?' She said: 'A dead coal.' He said: 'Pick it up.' She picked it up in her fingers, and he said: 'Does it burn you?' 'No, sir.' 'Well, throw it down.' She threw it down, and he said: 'Daughter, what is that on your fingers?' She said: 'It is smut.' 'Well, daughter, remember when you go into bad company if they don't burn you they will smut you every time, every time; you can't dodge it, you can't dodge it.'"

WHAT AN EMBROIDERED SLIPPER DID.

A CORRESPONDENT of the St. Louis Evangelist relates an incident in the life of Mrs. Mullens, the wife of the eminent missionary, which will be new to many readers. "Mrs. Mullens had often prayed that a way might be opened for her to visit the women in the harems of India. Her chief hope was that the boys in her school, when grown men, would become her allies in some scheme of relief. But in this she was disappointed. Caste was invincible even to those who had yielded to her reasonings against its injustice and cruelty.

One afternoon her thoughts were busy with her woes, and her finished work—a slipper she was embroidering as a present for her husband—dropped from her hand as a young Baba (native gentleman), a former pupil, came to see her.

"Struck with the gay embroidery, he picked it up, chatted upon its beauty and her marvelous skill in its execution. With a sudden flash of inspiration, she said: 'Take it home and show it to your wife.' After a little parleying he consented, and after giving his wife what proved a great pleasure, he handed it to another Baba, who in turn passed it to a third who continued the passing until quite a number of Zenanas had been stirred by the story of the slipper. Then it was returned, and glowing pictures of the excitement it had caused were coupled with the thanks of the gentlemen. With another kindling of inspiration, Mrs. Mullens said: 'Your wife can learn to do that work; and if you will allow me I will teach her.' The Baba hesitated. The presence of a Christian was an offence, the touch of one pollution; how then could he admit her into the most sacred precincts of the Zenana!"

"But the wish stole, he knew not how, into his heart to provide this little enjoyment to the poor prisoner at home. Mrs. Mullens added a gentle entreaty, and the day was carried. A trial might be made. The lady went eagerly to her appointment, found an enthusiastic scholar into whose life the bright worsteds and new occupation brought variety and interest. The news of this venture with the fancy work spread from house to house till soon her hands were full of pupils. And she took another step. 'I can only teach embroidery,' she now announced, 'to those who will learn to read.' It was a startling proposition, but it was accepted, and the Zenana, firm shut to reason and entreaty, was now opened to the Christian teacher with her skeins of worsted and her Bible."

THE EARTHQUAKE AT CHARLESTON.

(See Illustrations.)

A VIVID impression of the havoc made in the beautiful city of Charleston, by the convulsion of August 31st, is produced by the four pictures here given. They are made from photographs taken on the spot, and are specimens of the ruins to be seen in all quarters of the city. It is appalling to think of the desolation effected in so short a time. Not even a lengthened bombardment could have produced so disastrous an effect. In some few cases, however, the loss will not prove so irremediable as was at first apprehended. The two churches, especially, are, we are glad to learn, less seriously injured than was reported.

An expert who was employed to examine St. Michael's, on September 6th, went all through the church, which is very much cracked as seen from the inside, and then passing along the north aisle opened the door of the tower without difficulty, no evidence of jarring being apparent. All the walls over the middle aisle vestibule were found to be sound, except that the stairway, where they ring the bell in the east wall of the tower, shows a slight crack in the side wall about twelve feet long. The wall at this point is six feet thick, and the winding stairway is built inside the wall. All above the crack just mentioned is perfectly sound. The bells were found to be in position and uninjured.

The doors of the first and second piazzas were also opened without difficulty, thereby indicating the absence of any great strain to the frame. The tower of the bell dome was found to be sound, with the exception that the copper was wrenched out of place a little on the shed outside. In the middle vestibule the flooring was shaken up, and is now about eighteen inches above its former level. The walls around the place seem to be in their true position, and are not cracked.

The porch of the church, which is so badly broken as seen from the street, had no fixed connection with the steeple, and is independent of the foundation of the latter, except as connected with it by woodwork. The body of the church, while resting against the east wall of the tower, is separate from it, and is cracked. The foundation of the steeple, in other words, is perfectly sound so far as can be ascertained.

St. Philip's Church, also, owing to the peculiarity of its construction, may be saved. The upper part of the spire is of wood and the lower of masonry. The latter has been displaced, and a large portion has fallen. It was supposed that the wooden part rested on the masonry, and must, therefore, fall now that the masonry has given way. But it is now discovered that the wooden part is independent of the masonry. It rests on gigantic columns, which pass clear down to the foundation of the church, where they are fixed in the concrete. It will, therefore, be possible to replace the masonry without taking down the spire.

reported so far are ninety-six, of which fifty-eight were killed outright on Tuesday night, and the remainder have died since then of their injuries. Much suffering and many deaths must, it is feared, yet result from the calamity. Efforts are being made to shelter the homeless poor, who are unable to leave the city. An English captain, whose ship entered the harbor on September 7th, promptly placed his vessel at the service of the authorities, and it was immediately filled by a troop of grateful people. Other shipowners have also generously detained their ships for the shelter of the poor. Tents, also, have been sent from all quarters. The Rev. Stephen Merritt, of New York, and Mr. W. L. Klopsch, who each had a large new tent at the recent camp-meetings, promptly packed them up and sent them to Charleston, and other Christian friends have nobly given tents or money. It is almost pathetic to read of poor people and even children contributing out of their poverty small sums, which are large for them, to the relief of the afflicted. Queen Victoria, when she heard of the calamity and the suffering, sent a cable message expressing sympathy, to which the President suitably replied.

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

An Ebullition.

BEFORE our young friends separated on the night of the discussion they were joined by several students who had been present, and were, like them, making their way homeward. From them Leroy obtained some consolation for his disappointment about Dr. Lester. Their congratulations were not qualified, as his had been, by an avowal of dissent from the views he had expressed. Either scepticism was more prevalent in the college before than had been supposed, or Leroy had made converts by his speech. Certain it was that his opinions were popular among the young people who spoke to them, and Carrie was sorry to see that Leroy was being supported by his friends, and stimulated to further efforts in the same sad direction. Dr. Lester was spoken of as an antiquated specimen of a school fast passing away before the new light, which was driving away the superstitions of the past.

It was a relief to Carrie that she was not left alone with Leroy, as she was thus able to maintain silence without his noticing it. She even made no protest when one enthusiastic student declared his conviction that, apart from the professors, and perhaps Wentworth himself, every one who had listened to the discussion had accepted Leroy's conclusions. It surprised and pained her to hear the opinion, but even if that were true in all cases but her own, there should be no wavering on her part. Surprised as she had been by the array of facts marshalled by Leroy, there was no element of doubt in her mind about the Bible. That, at any rate, was true, whatever science might have to say. Though she might not be able to reconcile the two, her allegiance to the Bible was unshaken. If it became necessary she was ready to declare publicly that, whatever others might do, the sacred volume would be her guide still and forever. This, however, she felt was not the time when such a declaration could be made with the best results, and so she kept silence.

But the evening was not to pass without her protest. At her own gate she and Leroy were alone. It would have been better for his peace of mind had he simply bade her good-night and left her; but the cup of his triumph needed one more drop to make it full. As he took her hand he looked her inquiringly in the face and said:

"Carrie, you, I am sure, must have been convinced that the Bible is an obsolete book?"

She would have been glad to be spared this point-blank question. She hoped to have kept back her objections until she had arranged them and prepared them in effective shape, but it could not be now. Leroy must be under no delusion as to her attitude. So she said quietly, but firmly:

"No, I am not, although you did as well as could have been done to prove it so."

"What! not convinced after all these facts! Why not?"

"Well, I will tell you where I think you were wrong, if it will not offend you."

"Not at all; proceed."

"It is this: those statements you quoted from the scientists you gave as actual facts, whereas they are only probable opinions, and many of them are disputed by other men equally able. There is no true scientist who would say positively that his theory is true, although he might strongly incline to believe it. None of them claim to have discovered the exact truth. Besides, biblical interpretation has not reached a state of perfection yet. You did not prove the premises," and she smiled archly.

"Then you admit that the two records do not agree."

"I admit that at the present stage of scientific knowledge and Scriptural interpretation no man can entirely reconcile them," she answered, frankly.

"Then which do you take—the scientists or the Bible?"

"I take the Bible."

"And I take the scientists—that's the difference. And now I must say good-night."

She laid her hand softly upon his arm, and looking into his face, said earnestly:

"God only can give you the truth; go to Him."

"I will reason it out," he protested.

"You cannot, nor can any one; it is beyond the reach of unaided reason."

"No, no; I cannot disregard the voice of reason. I must believe what my judgment tells me is true."

"A child might say that, and yet he might blunder egregiously. A father would punish him, and justly, for trusting his own judgment in defiance of parental instruction; and there is more difference between the wisdom of God and the intellect of man than between the mind of the father and his child. Faith is higher than reason."

"Not in such a case as this. I take my stand on reason."

"I hope you will soon see your mistake. Good-night."

He walked slowly and thoughtfully to his room.

Evidently, so far as Carrie was concerned, his effort had failed. In preparing his great speech he had, half-unconsciously, cherished the hope that she, at least, would be convinced by it. She had natural intelligence, good logical power, and had studied much. It seemed to him that she must be convinced. Yet here was she as firm and unmovable as ever. Leroy was not only disappointed, he was irritated and impatient. His triumph had lost all its sweetness, and, in spite of it, he went to bed depressed and unhappy.

The morning brought him no consolation, but it brought resolve. He determined that he would find an opportunity of seeing the girl he loved, alone, and would go over with her this ground of difference, and show her how illogical was the position she occupied. Surely when the situation was presented to her clearly, and brought home to her individually, she would surrender.

Miss West yielded to his importunity when he informed her of the object of the interview. She had half expected it after the conversation on the way home from the debate. It would only confirm Leroy's low estimate of the intelligence of Christians, she thought, if she declined to meet him, and would imply that she dared not face the difficulties he had unearthed. Besides, in a private conversation there would be more hope of convincing him than any one would have in public. Surrounded by friends and admirers, his pride would force him to stand his ground, while alone with her there would be less humiliation for him in yielding. Therefore she consented to an interview, and as it was a bright, warm day in spring they strolled out to a sequestered spot in the woods, where, seated on a felled tree, they could talk without fear of interruption.

Somehow Leroy felt unable or unwilling after all to enter upon the discussion at the point where it had been dropped in the walk after the public debate. He felt more at ease in his favorite topic of the defects and oversights of Christian ministers.

"I was amused," he said, "at some of Mr. Delaware's hallucinations last Sunday in church. How wild he did get! He tried to get in something about science, too, and some of the students and Professor Rich turned around and looked at me, and laughed. What does Delaware know about science? I do wish these preachers had a little more culture. Some of them are grammatical homicides, if that is possible; and it seems all of them lack greatly in knowledge. They do not seem to know anything but the Bible, and only their favorite dogmas in that, and, of course, they can repeat the creed of their church."

"I admit," replied Carrie, "that some of them do not understand themselves or their business; but that may be said of all professions. Will you bear with me while I speak somewhat plainly on this subject?"

"I am always attentive while you speak," he said.

"Infidels, for some cause or other, are not well informed in regard to the real work and standing and degree of culture in the church and ministry. They do not become intimate enough with the people of the church. One blatant infidel, whose unfairness I am glad to see even you admit, said in a lecture not very long ago: 'Everybody talks about the Bible and nobody reads it. I have read it through during the last year, and am, perhaps, the only man in America who has done so.' He must be a fool—if you will pardon that rather strong expression; but I do get indignant sometimes. Why, there are little Sunday-school boys and girls who have read the Bible through within the last year. Ministers are studying it diligently and critically all the time. Commentators and translators study it, not only in the English, but also in the original Hebrew and Greek, and they search diligently for the most ancient manuscripts that can be found. Many people in the backwoods can quote whole chapters from the Bible."

"Then, too, you think preachers are ignorant. Some are; but granted that many of them do not know as much as you do about some things, is it not probable that most of them know more about their own profession and the knowledge pertaining to it than any one else? A man cannot preach every Sunday and hold his audiences, as Mr. Delaware does, without a great deal of reading and study."

"I admit that they study the Bible and religious works," Leroy replied; "but having assumed that the Bible is literally and historically true, they do not inquire into the objections against it, but swallow it down like young robins—with their eyes shut. And I think they are lamentably ignorant of science and the insurmountable difficulties it presents to Scripture."

"Again, Mr. Ransom," she answered, sweetly, "I think you mistake, for I read only the other day the testimony of a New York bookseller, who says that he sells by far the largest number of the writings of Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Spencer, etc., to ministers—more to them than to any other class. How does that agree with your theory?"

Leroy was silent, and she continued: "Have you never heard the saying, severe but true, 'He is a fool who thinks nobody else thinks?'"

"Miss West," he exclaimed, jumping to his feet, while his face flushed hotly, "from any one else I should resent such an insinuation as an insult. The proverb is not at all opposite, and the terms employed are uncalled for."

"Please be seated, Mr. Ransom, and excuse the severe expression. I suppose that sometimes I am too outspoken to be quite courteous," she said, deprecatingly. He obeyed, and she continued: "Dr. Comstock, one of the professors in the W— Theological Seminary, used to preach for us occasionally in my native town. He would come up from the seminary on Sunday. He was a grand old man, and highly cultured. Everybody spoke of his learning, piety, and eloquence. He was in the habit of giving friendly and practical talks to young sceptics. I remember one Sunday he was discoursing on this very subject. He said there are many infidels who declaim upon these difficulties and objections to Scripture, just as if they had originated them, and then throw out the insinuation that other people, especially Christians, do not think. Now, he said, there is not a young man who passes through a single theological seminary in the land who does not go over all this ground. There is not a difficulty so loudly trumpeted abroad by popular infidelity, which is not recognized, examined, and has not for years been discussed during the term of a theological course, and settled to the satisfaction of both teachers and students. Take the great questions of the Trinity, of the origin of evil, of why God permits sin and suffering, whether God is just in punishing the wicked, how God can foreknow and yet be just, the historical difficulties in the Bible narratives, the so-called contradictions, the ancient MSS., miracles, the story of the flood, the eternity of matter, with the scientific difficulties, and a thousand others—they are all investigated in the schools. It would do infidels good to take a seminary course just to find out what they don't know, and how much the Christian ministry thinks. 'Why,' cried the old man, while his face glowed with kindly earnestness, 'if anybody is liable to become an infidel, through acquaintance with scepticism, it is one who is connected with a theological seminary; and yet of all the students who have gone forth from our institution, not one has ever turned infidel.' What say you to that?" she exclaimed, triumphantly.

He was silent for a moment. The only reply that was really apt was one that he knew must pain her, because it imputed to an adversary mean and unworthy motives, and its use might seem to her ungenerous. But she had not been careful about hurting his feelings, and as she had set him the example of hard hitting, he followed it.

"Miss Carrie," he said, "is it not all a made out thing among them to believe the Scriptures?"

The shot told. Carrie made a visible effort to control her indignation, but the color mounted to her cheeks, as she said, with carefully constrained voice: "Then you must impeach the integrity of many of the best men the world has ever seen; of all who died gladly, triumphantly, for their religion. You impeach the honesty of the self-sacrificing Christian workers in our own land and in heathen countries. Why should they form such a conspiracy? If they know that religion is a sham, why not save all this expenditure of money and energy?"

"Ah! but the preachers, Miss Carrie—are they not interested? Do they not depend for their livelihood upon the prosperity and continuance of the church? You see they are not altogether disinterested advocates of their views. Might they not be duping the people?"

"Mr. Ransom," she said, indignantly, "I cannot argue with you. You cannot mean that all the ministers are in a miserable league for mercenary purposes. Think of all the great and good men from Chrysostom to Spurgeon."

"Carrie, I take it back, partly. I believe many of them were and are sincere; but they are mistaken. In this matter they have their opinions, and I have mine."

"Is this only a matter of opinion? If so, then why not let them have their opinions in peace, instead of ridiculing and attacking them and imputing sordid motives to them continually?" She became more and more animated.

"Because they do not let me alone. I hardly ever hear a sermon without having my feelings jarred by some overt attack on my sentiments, and that without a pretence to argument."

"Which shows," she answered, "that it is not a mere matter of opinion, but a real concern for truth." And now, let me say, that many infidels are as badly in need of information as they need anything. The other day I picked up one of those infidel tracts published in New York, and as I read it, I could not help but pity the poor, deluded author, who seemed to be plunged into the deepest error simply on account of ignorance. Many sceptics do not know what the Church believes; they think the Church's faith consists not so much in the vital doctrines of Christ and the Cross as in believing the story of the flood and that of Jonah and the whale; they do not understand the principles by which the Scriptures are interpreted; they do not know what the Church is doing for the world. It seems to me men ought to inform themselves better before they trumpet themselves as public reformers, or, rather, overturners!"

Leroy's eye glittered with something like anger, as he replied: "Do you mean to say that we are deficient in information—that we are ignorant?"

"I mean to say that men ought not to be so bold in tearing down old and sacred institutions until they have thoroughly examined them and found out whether they are a blessing or a curse to the world."

He arose and said, while his voice trembled with suppressed wrath: "It is time to return to town."

They started back in silence.

"Have I offended you, Mr. Ransom?"

"You have insinuated—no, you have openly said that the assailants of the Church—and I am one of them, as you know—are too ignorant to discuss this question."

She bit her lips with irritation, but said nothing. Leroy, too, walked on silently until they reached the gate, when he lifted his hat formally and bade her good-evening.

SELF-SATISFACTION.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 26, Luke 18: 11, 12.

The Pharisee Admiring Himself—Pleased with the Survey—A Common Failing—Modern Boasters—Christian Workers Affected—God will Cure Them—The Cause of Depression—A Young Man's Disappointment—A Robbery of God—Self-Satisfaction in False Religions—How Deliverance Comes.

THE Pharisee was pleased with himself; the natural craving of the heart for satisfaction had found an object; it was no other than himself. Surveying himself, he had no fault to find but very much to admire, and he bestowed his admiration ungrudgingly. Looking at others, he compared them with himself, and always to his own advantage. Looking back from what they were to what he was, he took infinite pleasure in the favorable comparison, and even in his devotions nothing could detract his eye from

of his own goodness. The question with him was not what God thought of him, nor yet what man thought of him, but what he thought of himself; and this was the staple commodity of his prayers, "God, I thank Thee that I am not as other men are." To his eyes he was quite another being from the rest of men. He saw in them extortioners, unjust, adulterers, who were sinners more or less conscious of their sins, while he was in no way conscious of his. "Or even as this publican," he adds, as he sees the convicted sinner smite upon his breast. He had never smitten upon his breast because of sin, and so he satisfied himself there was none there; he lulled himself into a pleasing dream, to awake sometime to the realities of death and judgment, when all his self-satisfaction must be exchanged for utter despair. "There is a generation that are pure in their own eyes, and yet is not washed from their filthiness" (Prov. 30: 12).

We look upon him with contempt or pity; and yet, are there none

who are yielding to the same fascination of self-complacency? What is it that makes the converted man boast of his conversion, of the great change in him, of how warm his love is to God, if he is not in some measure pleased with himself, if he does not admire his own religiousness? This was the case with Job, and when his own righteousness failed, he could even blame God. When the heart is turned round from itself to Jesus, then conversion, experience, and all else is lost sight of in the new blessed acquaintance with Him; the Person of Jesus fills the whole horizon, they are satisfied with Him.

Winners of souls are not free from the idolatry of self-satisfaction. How many enjoy a meeting and feel quite elated when they have been used to lead souls into the light; and they talk over their method and appear to admire their way of working immensely. It is often so with young workers, and God lovingly uses them; but the time will come when the Lord will put them out of conceit with their own work, when they will be self-emptied, and will let Jesus Himself work through them without taking one bit of credit to themselves. It is wonderful how this self-satisfaction pervades our lives; one has, perhaps, a good deal of dispatch, and he admires himself for the way in which he gets through business. Another is cool and calculating, and he takes credit to himself that he is never in a hurry. One will travel some thousands of miles, and take credit to himself for the distance he has journeyed; another is a quick reader, and he admires the celerity with which he can read and take in information. Another has a taste for gardening; he congratulates himself upon it, and reaps quite as much satisfaction from his intense admiration of his own taste as he does from the sweet and lovely flowers. But one does not expect this kind of thing among Christians, yet half the depression from which Christians suffer arises from the fact that God throws down this idol of self-satisfaction, and they have not yet learned to be satisfied with Him.

"I WANT TO FEEL

just as I felt when I first experienced a clean heart; I was so happy and so free, nothing seemed a burden; I was like a bird, just as though lifted from the earth!" "Well, sister, have you done anything to grieve God?" "No; I am not conscious of doing anything wrong, but I don't feel so happy." "Has Jesus changed in any way?" "No." "Then is it in order that Jesus may be better pleased with you, or that you may be better pleased with yourself, that you desire to have back the old experience?" Ah! just there the cap fits many of us; we want to have an experience which we can admire, which will make us pleased with ourselves, while God's aim is to make us admire and be satisfied with Jesus.

A young man had definitely accepted the Holy Ghost to dwell within him as a Person, and to take the entire control of his inner and outer life. He expected to be flooded with joy and with a consciousness of power. Instead of this the Holy Spirit showed him how much of self there was in all his life and work, so that instead of being satisfied with himself he abhorred himself. He asked a Christian sister whether his experience could be right. She asked him, "Does all this knowledge of the self within you come from Satan?" "Why no; it must be the Holy Ghost's work." "What are you thinking about Jesus?" "Why, He is everything; I am like a drowning man without Him." "Then you are nothing, and Jesus is everything?" "Yes, thank God!" The next day he was filled with joy not in his own experience, for he saw himself to be utterly undependable; but Jesus was so sure, He was his guarantee against sinning. He was his power for work, He his Wisdom. He ceased to expect anything of himself, but his joy is now a deep, calm, settled joy, and a trust in and admiration of Jesus.

Every bit of credit which we take to ourselves is

A ROBBERY OF GOD.

Jesus says, "Without Me ye can do nothing." Is it not sacrilege, then, to attribute to ourselves anything that we do? Self-satisfaction does not make us right with God; it is a kind of intoxication from which we must wake up to a bitterly humbling reaction. Nothing is so natural as self-complacency, yet nothing so hinders the life of God within the soul and the power of God in the world. What, then, is the cure for this idolatry? Only satisfaction with Jesus. Paul of Tarsus was self-satisfied when he breathed out threatenings and slaughter against the first Christians; he looked upon himself as a noble, devoted defender of the Jewish faith; but when God filled and used him, Paul so sank in his own estimation that he called himself "nothing" (II Cor. 12: 11).

In all false religions, self-satisfaction holds a prominent place. In the superstitions of Rome, how easy it is for a monastic devotee to submit himself to every kind of austerity, to afflict his body, crucify his natural affections, and subdue by force of will every other tendency, only to feed this self-satisfaction, this admiration of his own holiness to the very full, so that the self, apparently mortified and trodden under foot, reigns more strongly in him than in many others who live an ordinary life! The Hindoo Fakir, the Mohammedan devotee, equally take credit to themselves, and this great outlet for self-satisfaction makes it perfectly easy to them to forego all other gratifications. The Socinian, and all who with him deny the Atonement of Christ, are satisfied with their own goodness; they believe in themselves, count upon themselves, are often morally upright, but cannot rise to Christian morality; they cannot take the ground which Jesus took, and say: "I can of mine own self do nothing." The distinguishing mark of the man of faith is that he appreciates God—"My people shall be satisfied with My goodness" (Jer. 31: 14).

of ourselves or our work comes from this root of idolatry; the power of any work of God diminishes exactly in the ratio in which man boasts of it. Boasting has more of heathenism than of Christianity; and as long as any heathenism clings to our work God cannot let it rise to its true and highest level. We have yet to see what God can accomplish in the heathen world by a company of self-emptied men and women filled with the Holy Ghost! Thank God for what He is doing, especially by the China Inland Mission and by Bishop Taylor's missionaries, who all go out without purse or scrip in simple dependence on God, either to find them work by which they may live or to supply their needs without. But they feel, and we feel, that we all need a more real, constant, moment-by-moment satisfaction with Jesus, which will leave Him free to do far more than He has ever yet done. God has had so much to do in the education of His workers that the work has been necessarily delayed; and one of the chief causes of delay has been this self-satisfaction which is born with us, and which only Christ in us can dislodge. Now, from this thing? By handing it over to Jesus, that He may crucify it with our other affections and lusts. Then if, as is likely, it may rise again and again, and if it may seem to rise more than ever before, because we are more aware of it, let there be a distinct transfer of it on the instant to Him who has undertaken it, so that it may find no lodgment for a second of time. And let us cultivate adoration of Jesus, seizing every opportunity to let our hearts out in joyous praise for what He is, that so we may more and more continually rejoice in the Lord. The psalmist David's harp was habitually fed with the sweet declarations of what he found God to be; this was the man after God's own heart.

HOW SHALL WE BE DELIVERED

"PERFECT THROUGH SUFFERING."

BY LILLA M. ALEXANDER.

Is there no other way, O God!

Except through sorrow, pain and loss,
To stamp Christ's likeness on my soul—
No other way except the cross?

Through eyes grown dim with falling tears,
In vain some other path I seek;
"The cross is heavy, Lord," I pray,
"So heavy, and I am so weak."

"I cannot drink this bitter cup,"
I plead with passionate protest;
"Lord, let it pass—Thy hand lies hard Upon me—I am sore distressed."

And then a voice stills all my soul,
As stilled the waves on Galilee;
"Can'st thou not bear the furnace heat,
If 'mid the flames I walk with thee?"

"I bore the cross, I know its weight,
I drank the cup I hold for thee;
Can'st thou not follow where I lead?
I'll give thee strength—lean thou on me."

And then, with sudden shame, I fall
Low at His blessed, pierced feet;
"Lord, teach me how to follow Thee,
And make me for Thy service meet."

"I am not worthy e'en to lift
Thy hallowed cross—Thy pain to share;
Perfect through suffering, if Thou wilt,
So I at last Thine image bear."

"I MUST DIE TO WIN."

This is a common expression, one used perhaps more frequently in connection with Life Insurance as an objection to the ordinary life plan. "It is an excellent form of provision for the family, but I must die to win."

YOU MAY LIVE AND WIN.
This refers to the Endowment plan, which meets the above objection. Take, for instance, a policy payable to yourself 10, 15 or 20 years hence. Say you die before the termination of the period—your family wins. You survive the period, the policy becomes at once a provision for your own advancing years. You have lived and won.

The "MANHATTAN" new plan meets the case. It retains the advantage of the Endowment feature, while it reduces the net cost of Life Insurance under the contract to almost nothing.
For an example of the operation of this plan

a statement will be sent to you. Mention this paper.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S VISIT TO EDINBURGH.

EDINBURGH during the past month has been a centre of interest to the people of Great Britain, for the Queen, whose public appearances for the past twenty-five years have been few and far between, has paid a visit of state to the Scottish metropolis. It is evident that the Royal visit is considered a matter of no slight importance, and the Queen may well consider whether, if so small a mercy evokes such enthusiasm from the press and people as did her visit, she may not undertake to exhibit herself on a more extended scale.

The London Times goes into the following ecstasy on the subject: "It cannot but be highly gratifying to all the Queen's loyal subjects that in this, the jubilee year of her most eventful reign, she should have given so many evidences of her desire to emerge from the retirement in which she has so long been shrouded, and to take her rightful place in various kinds of public pageantry. The great personality which occupies the throne of England cannot afford to conceal itself, or can conceal itself only at the risk of occasioning disorders which it would be far better to prevent than to remedy. Every appearance of her Majesty affords ample testimony of the love which her subjects feel for her, and shows that this has in no way been impaired, possibly it has even been increased, by the sad circumstances which so long in some degree withheld her from them; but they none the less rejoice to see that the cloud is passing away, and they will hope that the year of jubilee may be marked, among other things, by a more complete resumption of that visible headship of the State which the Queen cannot delegate, and for which, as long as she is able to accomplish its duties, no delegate would be acceptable."

accorded by Edinburgh to the Queen was one of extraordinary enthusiasm. It was a welcome which, in the opinion of many capable of judging, has never been surpassed for its magnitude and cordiality. A few minutes before eight o'clock in the morning the castle guns firing a Royal salute announced to the citizens the safe arrival of their sovereign from the South. In accordance with her express desire, her Majesty was allowed to alight quietly, and with a minimum of ceremony. Lord Provost Clark, stepping forward, said: "On behalf of the citizens, I have to welcome your Majesty to your capital of Scotland," while his youngest daughter, dressed in white, presented her Majesty with a beautiful bouquet of orchids. The Queen graciously acknowledged both the speech and the gift of flowers, and having bowed to Major-General Elliott, she entered the carriage, followed by Princess Beatrice and her husband, Prince Henry of Battenberg. Notwithstanding the early hour, the streets outside the station were crowded with citizens, and the moment the Royal carriage emerged from Canal Street a loud cheer of welcome was raised, a demonstration renewed again and again. Princes' Street was gained, and the Royal party went to Holyrood Palace.

At half-past three o'clock the Queen again made her appearance. The Royal carriages were opened, and the party left Holyrood for the Exhibition building. The demonstration of welcome along the route, about three miles in length, was most enthusiastic; and was renewed with, if possible, redoubled emphasis as they

a picture of which appears on the first page. The grand hall of the Exhibition was seated for about 1600 persons. A magnificently upholstered canopied seat, erected for the accommodation of her Majesty, occupied one end of the oblong, the other was filled by the organ, with a raised platform, in front of which the members of the Choral Union were seated. The space between was occupied by the invited guests, leaving in the centre a broad pathway covered with crimson cloth for the passage of the Royal procession to and from the throne.

After her Majesty had taken her seat the Marquis of Lothian, the convener, presented an address elaborately emblazoned on vellum in the Renaissance style. The Queen accepted the address, and in a firm, clear voice, read the speech in reply prepared for her. When the applause had subsided the choir commenced a new hymn, "Lord of Heaven, of Earth, and Ocean," written for the occasion. Her Majesty then received a number of the officials, headed by the Lord Provosts of Edinburgh and Glasgow, and the Dean of Guild Gowans, who presented the official badge of the Exhibition and the official catalogue, which were smilingly accepted. The procession then re-formed, and, amid much cheering and waving of handkerchiefs, her Majesty left the Grand Hall to begin

of the Exhibition. As arranged, she limited her visit that afternoon to "Old Edinburgh," with the antique appearance of which the Queen was much pleased. In passing through the women's section, her Majesty halted at the Shetland stall, and spoke a few words to the native women at work. The Queen also accepted from Sheriff Thomas a shawl in Shetland wool, manufactured at Unst. The Queen and Royal party also examined several of the Irish exhibits. After which she left the building and returned to

HOLYROOD PALACE.

This ancient building was decorated and illuminated for the occasion. It is a place rich in historical associations. It was originally an abbey, founded in 1128 by David, King of Scotland. The present structure consists of a quadrangle ninety-four feet square flanked by towers. The front is only two stories high, surmounted by a double balustrade. The portico is adorned by well-proportioned columns, supporting a cupola in the form of a king's crown. The other three sides of the building are each three stories in height. The length of frontage is about two hundred and thirty feet; from back to front not quite so much.

THE ROYAL APARTMENTS

are on the east side, that which is nearest the Firth, of whose sparkling waters a glimpse can be obtained from the windows. Since its restoration by Charles II. the Royal apartments have been occupied by the Duke of York, afterward James II., by the Pretender in 1745, by Charles X. of France, by the Duke of Cumberland, by Louis XVIII. of France, by her Majesty and the Prince Consort and the Royal Family, on their way to Balmoral, and by the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Edinburgh, when they were studying at Edinburgh University. Above the picture-gallery in the northwest tower are Queen Mary's apartments, where the intrepid reformer, John Knox, soundly rated the beautiful sovereign, whom he characterized as a "bonny bit of painted clay." Queen Mary's bedroom, with the State bed, is still on view.

Adjoining this room, where by back-stair entrance the Italian musician, Rizzio, gained access, is Queen Mary's boudoir, where, at a supper-party, the fascinating favorite, dragged from the Queen's table, was slain at the top of the secret stairs by Darnley and his friends, fifty-six dagger wounds being counted on the musician's body. The tradition is that these blood-stains are ineradicable; and the attendants aver that they reappear at the same place even upon new flooring.

former Scotchmen are only now beginning to realize. He was an austere man, caring little for royalty or for those who made courteous obeisance. But he dared to tell the truth to a Queen, and because that truth was necessarily disagreeable to such a Queen as Mary, he has been held up to obloquy by historians. His countryman, Carlyle, was one of the first of our day to recognize the true greatness of the man. The following eloquent passage from one of his works tells us what his penetrating vision saw in him:

"It seems to me hard measure that this Scottish man, now after three hundred years, should have to plead like a culprit before the world, intrinsically for having been in such way as it was then possible to be the bravest of all Scotchmen. Had he been a poor half-and-half he would have crouched into a corner like so many others; Scotland would not have been delivered, and Knox would have been without blame. He is the one Scotchman to whom of all others Scotland and the world owe a debt; he has to plead that Scotland would forgive him for having been worth to it any million unblamable Scotchmen that need no forgiveness. He bared his breast to the battle; had to row in French galleys, wander forlorn in exile, in clouds and storms; was censured, shot at through his windows; had a right sore fighting life; if this world were his place of recompense he had made but a bad venture of it. I cannot apologize for Knox. To him it is very indifferent these two hundred and fifty years and more what men say of him. But we having got above all those details of his battle, and, living now in clearness on the fruits of his victory, we, for our own sake, ought to look through the rumors and controversies enveloping the man into the man himself."

The house in which he lived, and from which he went to preach to Mary of righteousness, temperance, and judgment, ought to be a honored shrine to every lover of liberty, civil and religious. It stands there in the High Street, still very picturesque, cornered to the heart's content—a house of many gables and more numerous chimneys and curiously small-paned windows. A thrifty coffee-house keeper has taken a portion of it facing the Tron Church, and has painted in glaring black letters on a white ground, "John Knox's Coffee-House." No remonstrance has induced him to keep from vulgarizing the hallowed building where Knox used to preach out of a little window to the crowd below. It is conjectured that Knox only occupied the second floor, where he once narrowly escaped an assassin's bullet.

REV. WILLIAM HANNA, D.D.

ASSOCIATED with the city of Edinburgh is the eminent preacher and author whose portrait appears on the first page. He was the son-in-law and biographer of Dr. Chalmers, the valiant hero of the Disruption of the Scottish Church in 1843, and for many years the colleague of Dr. Guthrie. He died May 24th, 1882, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. Dr. Hanna was a son of Professor Hanna, of Belfast, Ireland, in which city he first saw the light in the year 1808. After passing through Glasgow University, young Hanna studied divinity under Dr. Chalmers, who is said to have been quick to recognize the powers of his pupil. In 1835, having been licensed to preach the Gospel, he was presented by the crown to the living of East Kilbride, Lanarkshire, and two years later he removed to Skirling. About this time Dr. Hanna married Agnes, eldest daughter of Dr. Chalmers. Being thus brought into close relationship with the founder of the Free Church, it was only natural that Dr. Hanna should have quitted the Established Church with so many of his brethren at the Disruption about four years later. Nearly the whole of the congregation at Skirling followed his example and cast in their lot with the Free Church, and to that congregation he continued to minister during the succeeding six years. He was instrumental in turning many from sin to righteousness, the blessing of God resting richly upon his labors.

At the death of Dr. Chalmers, Dr. Hanna removed to Edinburgh to prepare the life of his illustrious father-in-law, which work was in due time published in four volumes, and met with a well-deserved popularity. Dr. Hanna subsequently became colleague to Dr. Guthrie in the pastorate of Free St. John's, a post he occupied for a period of fifteen years.

In addition to his "Memoirs of Dr. Chalmers," Dr. Hanna published several works, which were widely circulated, including, "Martyrs of the Scottish Reformation," "Wycliffe and the Huguenots," "The Earlier Years of Our Lord," "The Ministry in Galilee," "The Close of the Ministry," "The Passion Week," "The Last Day of Our Lord's Passion," and "The Resurrection of the Dead." Some of these volumes are characterized by great beauty, and have passed through several large editions.

His style as a writer was singularly pure and graceful, and his powers of description remarkable. The following anecdote of which occurs in his life of Dr. Chalmers will serve as an illustration of his work. The incident occurred during a vacation tour on which Dr. Hanna accompanied Dr. Chalmers with Mrs. Hanna and some other ladies. Dr. Hanna says: "While staying at Rosstrevor, a picnic party proceeded across the bay to visit the ruins of Carlingford Castle. The day was fine, the company numerous, the scenery enchanting, and Dr. Chalmers was in the highest spirits. We dined on a green knoll near the ruins, and as dinner proceeded some old crones from a neighboring village were seen hanging around us in the hope of sharing the spoil. When Dr. Chalmers was told that the inhabitants of the village spoke the Irish language he declared that it would be quite an acquisition to him to hear a new set of vocables uttered by a native. To gratify his curiosity one of the most picturesque of the villagers was selected, and a sixpence was given to her to come forward and speak a sentence or two of Irish.

"By this time we were all upon our feet and had formed a circle, in the centre of which stood Dr. Chalmers; fronting him the old and greedy-looking crone, and beside her the village doctor, who was to act as an interpreter. 'Well, sir, tell her now to say something in her own tongue.' A sentence was accordingly spoken, and turning eagerly to the interpreter, Dr. Chalmers asked, 'What was it that she said?' 'Why, doctor, she says that she wants another sixpence.' The revolt was instantaneous from curiosity to intense disgust and indignation. Addressing himself instantly to the woman, he said: 'It is too bad; you must really learn to set limits to your unbridled appetency.' An interpreter was evidently as much needed as before.

"When Dr. Chalmers had done with her—leaving her, however, quite untouched by his rebuke—a good lady of the company stepped forward to inquire of her whether it really could be true that she worshipped the Virgin. She appeared to be much provoked, and the village doctor, who had no relish for such kind of conversation, cut the colloquy short and sent the woman away. The lady, fearing that she had really hurt the woman's feelings, followed her to a retired place, and telling her that she had no intention whatever to give her pain, in proof of her good-will put a shilling into her hand. The woman looked for a moment at the shilling, then at the donor, and with a toss of hand and head, she said in tones of the greatest glee, 'Och! and what does your ladyship think that I care about the Virgin?'"

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Dying Office-Bearer.—Mr. Riddell said at a recent meeting: "I shall never forget what one, who was an office-bearer in my church, said to me on his dying bed. I asked him if he enjoyed sweet communion with the Lord; he shook his head, while a look of dread passed over his features, as he said: 'No, sir; when I go to pray there is no one there to speak with me.' It was a sad reply from one who was about to pass into another world."

Experimenting Upon the Lord.—A Christian friend said: "Some people talk of trying the Lord: to experiment upon Him, as it were. But the Lord will not be so dealt with. I heard of a man some time ago who had a very quick temper. After he had failed to control his temper himself, he said, 'I will try the Lord, just as an experiment, to see if He can keep my temper.' Of course in a very short time the man lost his temper as usual. We must step right out on to the Word of God in reply to the Saviour's 'Come.' Anything short of this is not faith, but sight."

A Disappointed Preacher.—Mr. Salmond remarked: "An incident has come to my mind of a minister who was called to address a meeting in a country district. With a carefully prepared sermon he set out on his labor of love and found to his disappointment only a mere handful of people. He thought it a pity to deliver such a sermon to so small an audience, and had almost selected another text to speak from, when it was strongly impressed upon him to deliver the sermon which he had prepared. He did so, and by means of it, a soul entered into light, and eventually did much to further the Gospel of Christ."

A Prayer on the Roadside.—"I Spoke to a man in a gospel meeting a little while ago, and he told me that a few nights previous he had come to the meeting, and the speaker's text was, 'Whosoever therefore shall confess Me before men, him will I confess also before My Father which is in heaven.' He left the meeting much disturbed by the speaker's words, and as he walked home along a dark country road, meditating on the words of the text, he was constrained to kneel down and pray, 'Oh, Lord Thou knowest that I am not ashamed of Thee, but I am dreadfully ashamed of myself!' But before he reached his home that night he had resolved to bear witness for Christ."

A Providential Dream.—"A Gentleman spent a large sum of money on a piece of land in Cornwall for mining purposes. He set a band of men to dig it. They toiled on for many days, digging deeper and deeper, never coming to anything of value. At length the gentleman's heart failed him, and the search being fruitless, in despair he gave orders that the men should cease their work. But that night he had a dream. He thought he digged just a little further and came to metal. In the morning, with renewed courage, he told his men to resume their work, and before they had digged many hours they came to the hidden treasure. They had been very near it, but not at it when the gentleman had given up in despondency. In like manner many come short of salvation. Oh, so near the kingdom; one step more, and they would be inside; but alas! the step is not taken, and the door is shut upon them."

A Dissolute Persian Saved.—A Christian minister said: "About twenty miles from a missionary station in Persia, there lived a man, one of the wildest, most dissolute and defiant of all the nominal Christians. A work of grace was going on at the missionary station. Would this hardened, impenitent heart remain obdurate? The question was soon answered. One day he was seen to enter the mission chapel at the close of a meeting. Seriousness and anxiety were depicted on his face. He was distressed and full of shame, sank into the nearest seat, and the tears were seen silently falling. When a missionary spoke to him he cried out, 'Oh, my sins! my sins! they are higher than the mountains!' That night he could not sleep; he was in sore distress until the morning, when peace came as he realized that Christ is a great Saviour. Like him who in the ferocity of his character he had much resembled, and out of whom Christ had cast the legion of devils, he was found sitting at the feet of Jesus in his right mind. He was constantly exclaiming, 'My great sins, and my great Saviour.'"

Led to Christ through a Lily.—A Minister of the Gospel observed: "A sick woman was brought to Christ by hearing the voice of God speaking to her through a single flower. A white lily grew through clay and mire, by the edge of a lake. A little boy came by and plucked the solitary flower, and scarcely knowing what to do with it carried it home, and told his mother where he had found it. His mother advised him to carry it to a certain sick woman, and tell her that he had found it growing through the mud and mire, and that God was its only Gardener. The little fellow did as he was bid, and laid it on the woman's pillow. When she was left alone, and looked at the purity of the lily, she thought, 'If God can make that flower, which grew through the clay and the mire, so white and without a single stain, is He not more willing to cleanse and make me white?' She found that He was far more willing when she sought to be made pure, and there and then gave herself to Christ and found cleansing in His most precious blood."

What a Brother's Tear Did.—The Rev. Mr. Gullan remarked: "I remember a sea-captain telling me the story of his conversion. He said he had a brother who was a Christian, and whom he almost hated because he was a continual reproach to him. He often tried to justify himself by saying that there was not so much difference in their conduct after all. On day while on a voyage the captain met with an accident. In the momentary anger and out of a malicious desire to annoy his brother, who was standing but a few steps from him, he uttered a fearful oath, and then looked up with angry defiance at his brother, expecting a lecture, or at any rate a few reproachful words. But he was surprised to hear him say nothing, but hastily brush away a tear that had sprung unbidden to his eye. He sought his brother, who had gone aside and to God to have mercy upon him. Soon he was by his side asking his forgiveness, and not only that, but he was truly sorry for his past sinful life, and vowed by God's help to lead a better and nobler one. When speaking of it to his brother afterward, he said: 'Ah, brother, it was not your lectures, it was not your reproaches, but it was that tear which you brushed from your eye that led me to Jesus' feet.'"

A Question by the Well.—Mr. Blacketer Related: "A lorryman was driving along a country road, and as he passed a well by the wayside he saw there a young man standing, who looked up as the carter passed by, and inquired: 'Do you know Christ? Because if you do not I want to recommend you to Him this morning.' The carter looked at the young man, but passed on without a word. However he could not help quietly repeating to himself the simple sentence that had fallen from this stranger's lips. Years passed by, but this stranger by the well had not lost his reward, although as yet he had not seen any fruits of the few words which he had spoken that morning. One day they met on the street. The lorryman approached the young man, and holding out his hand, he asked: 'Do you remember speaking to me by a well at the roadside some years ago?' 'Yes, I do,' answered the young man. 'Do you remember what you said?' asked the other. 'No,' he replied, 'I do not.' 'I will tell you, then. You said, "Do you know Christ? Because if you do not I want to recommend you to Him this morning." Your words were not in vain. I could not rest; I could not stay away from Christ. I went to Him accepting salvation on God's terms, and since then I have been a happy Christian.' 'Cast thy bread upon the waters, and thou shalt find it after many days.'"

FATHER JACOB, you are wrong! You think your son Joseph is dead, but he is Prime-Minister of Egypt, and has the keys of the great corn-crib. You think that circumstances are all adverse, but they will turn out well. In all your life you never made a greater mistake than when you said: "All these things are against me."

A great multitude of people are under SEEMING DISADVANTAGES, and I will to-day, in the swarthiest Anglo-Saxon that I can manage, treat their cases; not as a nurse counts out eight or ten drops of a prescription, and stirs them in a half glass of water, but as when a man has by mistake taken a large amount of strychnine, or Paris green, or belladonna, and the patient is walked rapidly round the room, and shaken up, and pounded until he gets wide awake. Many of you have taken a large draught of the poison of discouragement, and I come out by the order of the Divine Physician to rouse you out of that lethargy.

I. First, many people are under the disadvantage of given them by parents who thought they were doing a good thing. Sometimes at the baptism of children, while I have held up one hand in prayer, I have held up the other hand in amazement that parents should have weighted the babe with such a dissonant and repulsive nomenclature. I have not so much wondered that some children should cry out at the christening font as that others with such smiling face should take a title that will be the burden of their lifetime. It is outrageous to afflict children with an undesirable name because it happened to be possessed by a parent or a rich uncle from whom favors are expected, or some prominent man of the day who may end his life in disgrace. It is no excuse, because they are Scripture names, to call a child Jehoiakim, or Tiglath-Pileser. At this very altar I baptized one by the name Bathsheba! Why, under all the circumambient heaven, any parent should want to give to a child the name of that loose and infamous creature of Scripture times I cannot imagine. I have often felt at the baptismal altar, when names were announced to me, like saying, as did Rev. Dr. Richards, of Morristown, N. J., when a child was handed him for sprinkling, and the name given: "Hadden't you better call it something else?"

Impose not upon that babe a name suggestive of flippancy or meanness. There is no excuse for such assault and battery on the cradle when our language is opulent with in meaning, such as John, meaning "the gracious gift of God;" or Henry, meaning "the chief of a household;" or Alfred, meaning "good counsellor;" or Joshua, meaning "God, our salvation;" or Ambrose, meaning "immortal;" or Andrew, meaning "manly;" or Esther, meaning "a star;" or Abigail, meaning "my father's joy;" or Anna, meaning "grace;" or Victoria, meaning "victory;" or Rosalie, meaning "beautiful as a rose;" or Margaret, meaning "a pearl;" or Ida, meaning "God-like;" or Clara, meaning "illustrious;" or Amelia, meaning "busy;" or Bertha, meaning "beautiful," and hundreds of other names just as good, that are a help rather than a hindrance.

But sometimes the great hindrance in life is not in the given name, but in the family name. While legislatures are willing to lift such incubus, there are families that keep a name which mortgages all the generations with a great disadvantage. You say: "I wonder if he is any relation to so and so, mentioning some family celebrated for crime or deception. It is a wonder to me that in all such families some spirited young man does not rise, saying to his brothers and sisters: 'If you want to keep this nuisance or scandalization of a name, I will keep it no longer than until by quickest course of law I can slough off this gangrene.'" When the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States met in this building in 1876, two estimable men of the sweetest disposition stopped at the same house, and one had the misnomer of being Mr. Sour, and the other the misnomer of being Mr. Pickle. And your city directory has hundreds of names the mere pronunciation of which has been a life-long obstacle. If you have started life under a name which either through ridiculous orthography or vicious suggestion has been an encumbrance, resolve that the next generation shall not be so weighted. It is

NOT BEMEANING TO CHANGE A NAME.

Saul of Tarsus became Paul the Apostle. Hadassah, "the myrtle," became Esther, "the star." We have in America, and I suppose it is so in all countries, names which ought to be abolished, and can be, and will be abolished for the reason that they are a libel and a slander. But if for any reason you are submerged either by a given name or by a family name that you must bear, God will help you to overcome the outrage by a life consecrated to the good and useful. You may erase the curse from the name. If once it stood for meanness, you can make it stand for generosity. If once it stood for pride, you can make it stand for humility. If it once stood for fraud, you can make it stand for honesty. If once it stood for wickedness, you can make it stand for purity. There have been multitudes of instances where men and women have magnificently conquered the disasters of the name inflicted upon them.

II. Again, many people labor under the misfortune of

INCOMPLETE PHYSICAL EQUIPMENT.

We are by our Creator so economically built that we cannot afford the obliteration of any physical faculty. We want our two eyes, our two ears, our two hands, our two feet, our eight fingers, and two thumbs. Yet what multitudes of people have but one eye, or but one foot. The ordinary casualties of life have been quadrupled, quintupled, sextupled, aye, centupled, in our time by the Civil War, and at the North and South a great multitude that no man can number are fighting the battle of life with half, or less than half, the needed physical armaments. I do not wonder at the pathos of a soldier during the war, who, when told that he must have his hand amputated, said: "Doctor, can't you save it?" and when told that it was impossible, said, with tears rolling down his cheeks: "Well, then, good-by, old hand; I hate to part with you. You have done me a good service for many years, but it seems you must go. Good-by."

A celebrated surgeon told me of

of one of the New York hospitals, when a poor man with a wounded leg was brought in before the students to be operated on. The surgeon was pointing out this and that to the students, and handling the wounded leg, and was about to proceed to amputation, when the poor man leaped from the table and hobbled to the door, and said: "Gentlemen, I am sorry to disappoint you, but, by the help of God, I will die with my leg on." What a terrific loss is the loss of our physical faculties!

The way the battle of Crecy was decided against the French was by the Welshmen killing the French horses, and that brought their riders to the ground. And when you cripple this body, which is merely the animal on which the soul rides, you may sometimes defeat the soul.

Yet how many suffer from this physical taking off! Good cheer, my brother! God will make it up to you somehow. The grace, the sympathy of God, will be more to you than anything you have lost. If God allows part of your resources to be cut off in one place, He will add it on somewhere else. As Augustus, the emperor, took off a day from February, making it the shortest month in the year, and added it to August, the month named after himself, so advantages taken from one part of your nature will be added on to another.

SOME FAMOUS SUFFERERS.

But it is amazing how much of the world's work has been done by men of subtracted physical organization. S. S. Preston, the great orator of the South-west, went limping all his life, but there was no foot put down upon any platform of his day that resounded so far as his club foot. Beethoven was so deaf that he could not hear the crash of the orchestra rendering his oratorios. Thomas Carlyle, the dyspeptic martyr, was given the commission to drive cant out of the world's literature. Rev. Thomas Stockton, of Philadelphia, with one lung raised his audiences nearer heaven than most ministers can raise them with two lungs. In the banks, the insurance companies, the commercial establishments, the reformatory associations, the churches, there are tens of thousands of men and women to-day doubled up of rheumatisms, or subject to neuralgias, or with only fragments of limbs, the rest of which they left at Chattanooga, or South Mountain, or the Wilderness, and they are worth more to the world, and more to the Church, and more to God than those of us who have never so much as had a finger-joint stiffened by a felon.

Put to full use all the faculties that remain, and charge on all opposing circumstances with the determination of John of Bohemia, who was totally blind, and yet at a battle cried out: "I pray and beseech you to lead me so far into the fight that I may strike one good blow with this sword of mine." Do not think so much of what faculties you have lost as of what faculties remain. You have enough left to make yourself felt in three worlds, while you help the earth, and bask hell, and win heaven. Arise from your discouragements, O men and women of depleted or crippled physical faculties, and see what, by the special help of God, you can accomplish!

The skilled horsemen stood around Bucephalus, unable to mount or manage him, so wild was the steed. But Alexander noticed that the sight of his own shadow seemed to disturb the horse. So Alexander clutched him by the bridle, and turned his head away from the shadow, and toward the sun, and the horse's agitation was gone, and Alexander mounted him and rode off, to the astonishment of all who stood by. And what you people need is to have your sight turned away from the shadows of your earthly lot over which you have so long pondered, and your head turned toward the sun—the glorious sun of Gospel consolation, and Christian hope, and spiritual triumph.

And then remember that all physical disadvantages will after awhile vanish. Let those who have been rheumatized out of a foot, or cataracted out of an eye, or by the perpetual roar of our cities thundered out of an ear, look forward to the day when this old tenement-house of flesh will come down and a better one shall be built. The resurrection morning will provide you with

A BETTER OUTFIT.

Either the unstrung, worn-out, blunted, and crippled organs will be so reconstructed that you will not know them, or an entire new set of eyes, and ears, and feet will be given you. Just what it means by corruption putting on incorruption we do not know, save that it will be glory ineffable; no limping in heaven, no straining of the eyesight to see things a little way off; no putting of the hand behind the ear to double the capacity of the tympanum; but faculties perfect, all the keys of the instrument attuned for the sweep of the fingers of ecstasy. But until that day of resurrection comes let us bear each other's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ.

III. Another form of disadvantage under which many labor is

LACK OF EARLY EDUCATION.

There will be no excuse for ignorance in the next generation. Free schools and illimitable opportunity of education will make ignorance a crime. I believe in compulsory education, and those parents who neglect to put their children under educational advantages have but one right left, and that is the penitentiary. But there are multitudes of men and women in mid-life who have had no opportunity. Free schools had not yet been established, and vast multitudes had little or no school at all. They feel it when as Christian men they come to speak or pray in religious assemblies or public occasions, patriotic, or political, or educational. They are silent because they do not feel competent. They owe nothing to English grammar, or geography, or belles lettres: They would not know a participle from a pronoun if they met it many times a day. Many of the most successful merchants of America and men in high political places cannot write an accurate letter on any theme. They are completely dependent upon clerks, and deputies, and stenographers to make things right. I knew a literary man who in other years in Washington made his fortune by writing speeches for Congressmen, or fixing them up for the Congressional Record after they were delivered. The millionaire illiteracy of this country is beyond measurement.

Now, suppose a man finds himself in mid-life without education, what is he to do? Do the best he can.

in a former pastoral charge that I ever heard speak on religious themes could, within five minutes of exhortation, break all the laws of English grammar, and if he left any law unfractured he would complete the work of lingual devastation in the prayer with which he followed it. But I would rather have him pray for me, if I were sick or in trouble, than any Christian man I know of, and in that church all the people preferred him in exhortation and prayer to all others. Why? Because he was so thoroughly pious and had such power with God he was irresistible; and as he went on in his prayer sinners repented and saints shouted for joy, and the bereaved seemed to get back their dead in celestial companionship. And when he had stopped praying, and as soon as I could wipe out of my eyes enough tears to see the closing hymn, I ended the meeting fearful that some long-winded prayer-meeting bore would pull us down from the seventh heaven.

Not a word have I to say against accuracy of speech, or fine elocution, or high mental culture. Get all these you can. But I do say to those who were brought up in the day of poor school-houses, and ignorant school-masters, and no opportunity, you may have so much of good in your soul and so much of heaven in your every-day life that you will be mightier for good than any who went through the curriculum of Harvard, or Yale, or Oxford, yet never graduated in the school of Christ. When you get up to the gate of heaven no one will ask you whether you can parse the first chapter of Genesis, but whether you have learned the fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom; nor whether you know how to square the circle, but whether you have lived a square life in a round world. Mount Zion is higher than Mount Parnassus.

UNCONGENIAL MARRIAGE.

IV. But what other multitudes there are under other disadvantages! Here is a Christian woman whose husband thinks religion a sham, and while the wife prays the children one way the husband swears them another. Or here is a Christian man who is trying to do his best for God and the Church, and his wife holds him back and says on the way home from prayer-meeting, where he gave testimony for Christ:

"What a fool you made of yourself! I hope hereafter you will keep still." And when he would be benevolent and give fifty dollars, she criticises him for not giving fifty cents. I must do justice, and publicly thank God that I never proposed at home to give anything for any cause of humanity or religion but the other partner in the domestic firm approved it. And when it seemed beyond my ability and faith in God was necessary, she had three fourths the faith. But I know men who, when they contribute to charitable objects, are afraid that the wife shall find it out. What a withering curse such a woman must be to a good man!

Then there are others under the great disadvantage of POVERTY.

Who ought to get things cheapest? You say those who have little means. But they pay more. You buy coal by the ton, they buy it by the bucket. You buy flour by the barrel, they buy it by the pound. You get apparel cheap because you pay cash. They pay dear because they have to get trusted. And the Bible was right when it said: "The destruction of the poor is their poverty."

Then there are those who made a mistake in early life, and that overshadows all their days. "Do you not know that that man was once in prison?" is whispered. Or, "Do you know that that man once attempted suicide?" Or, "Do you know that that man once absconded?" Or, "Do you know that that man was once discharged for dishonesty?" Perhaps there was only one wrong deed in the man's life, and that one act haunts the subsequent half century of his existence.

Others have unfortunate predominance of some mental faculty, and their rashness throws them into wild enterprises, or their trepidation makes them decline great opportunity, or there is a vein of melancholy in their disposition that defeats them, or they have an endowment of over-mirth that causes the impression of insincerity.

Others have a mighty obstacle in their

for which they are not responsible. They forget that God fashioned their features, and their complexion, and their stature, the size of their nose, and mouth, and hands, and feet, and gave them the gait and the general appearance; and they forget that much of the world's best work and the Church's best work has been done by homely people; and that Paul the Apostle is said to have been hump-backed, and his eyesight weakened by ophthalmia, while many of the finest in appearance have passed their time before flattering looking-glasses, or in studying killing attitudes, and in displaying the richness of wardrobes—not one ribbon, or vest, or sack, or glove, or button, or shoe-string of which they have had brains enough to earn for themselves. Others had from the start. They were born wrong, and that sticks to one even after he is born again. They have a natural crankiness that is two hundred and seventy-five years old. It came over with their great grandfathers from Scotland, or Wales, or France. It was born on the banks of the Thames, or the Clyde, or the Tiber, or the Rhine, and has survived all the plagues and epidemics of many generations, and is living today on the banks of the Hudson, or the Andros-coggin, or the Savannah, or the La Plata. And when a man tries to stop this evil ancestral proclivity he is like a man on a rock in the rapids of Niagara holding on with a grip from which the swift currents are trying to sweep him into the abyss beyond.

Oh, this world is an overburdened world, an overworked world! It is

AN AWFULLY TIRED WORLD.

It is a dreadfully unfortunate world. Scientists are trying to find out the cause of these earthquakes in all lands, cis-Atlantic and trans-Atlantic. Some say this and some say that. I have taken the diagnosis of what is the matter with the earth. It has so many burdens on it and so many fires within it, it has a fit. It cannot stand such a circumference and such a diameter. Some new Cotopaxi or Stromboli or Vesuvius will open and then all will be at peace for the natural world. But what about the moral woes of the world that have rocked all nations, and for six thousand years science proposes nothing but knowledge, and many people that know the most are the most uncomfortable?

In the way of practical relief for all disadvantages and all woes, the only voice that is worth listening to on this subject is the voice of Christianity, which is the voice of Almighty God. Whether I have mentioned the particular disadvantage under which you labor or not, I distinctly declare, in the name of my God, that there is a way out and of you. You cannot be any worse off than that Christian young woman who was in the Pember-ton Mills when they fell some years ago, and from under the fallen timbers she was heard singing: "I am going home to die no more."

Take good courage from that Bible, all of whose promises are for those in bad predicament. There are better days for you, either on earth or in heaven. I put my hand under your chin, and lift your face into the light of the coming dawn. Have God on your side, and then you have for reserve troops all the armies of heaven, the smallest company of which is twenty thousand chariots, and the smallest battalion one hundred and forty-four thousand, the lightnings of heaven their drawn sword.

An ancient warrior saw an overpowering host come down upon his small company of armed men, and, mounting his horse with he threw it in the air, crying: "Let their faces be covered with confusion!" And both armies heard his voice, and history says it seemed as though the dust thrown in the air had become so many angels of supernatural deliverance, and the weak overcame the mighty, and the immense host fell back, and the small number marched on. Have faith in God, and though all the allied forces of discouragement seem to come against you in battle array, and their laugh of defiance and contempt resounds through all the valleys and mountains, you might by faith in God, and importunate prayer, pick up a handful of the very dust of your humiliation, and throw it into the air, and it shall become angels of victory over all the armies of earth and hell. The voices of your adversaries, human and Satanic, shall be covered with confusion, while you shall be not only conqueror, but more than conqueror, through that grace which has so often made the fallen helmet of an overthrown antagonist the footstool of a Christian victory.

A Society to Befriend Working Girls has established a home in New York at 356 West Thirty-third Street, in which forty girls can be accommodated. It is not intended to make the place a charity, but to provide a clean, healthy home with moral and religious surroundings for girls who are engaged in labor, and who have difficulty in finding a suitable boarding place. The terms are fixed at the lowest rate at which it is possible to cover expenses. "We want this building to be a friend's house," one of the directors said, "to which any girl may come for advice and sympathy and assistance. If she is ill we have skilled physicians to attend her. If she wants to increase her earning powers by learning housekeeping, or dressmaking, or stenography, or book-keeping, or almost any other occupation for which women are fitted, she can come and learn. If she wants a shelter we will give it to her. If she wants a resting spell in the country, we will try and get it for her. A pleasant, cheery evening, our rooms are open for her. We will give when giving is a necessity, but what we chiefly want to do is to help. Charity, in the ordinary sense of the word, pauperizes; but friendship is an aid to independence."

CHANGING THE TIME OF FLOGGING.

A PATHETIC incident of Sunday-school work is thus told by Mr. Moody: "A young lady was sent to a boarding-school, and was there led to Christ; not only so, but taught that she ought to work for Him. By and by she goes home, and now she seeks, in one way and another, to work for Him, but without finding how. She asks for a class in her church Sunday-school, but the superintendent is obliged to tell her that he has already more than enough of teachers.

"One day, going along the street, she sees a little boy struck by his companion, and crying bitterly. She goes up and speaks to him; asks him what the trouble is? The boy thinks she is mocking him, and replies sullenly. She speaks kindly, tries to persuade him to school. He does not want to learn. She coaxes him to come and hear her and the rest singing there; and so next Sunday he comes with her. She gets a corner in the school of well-dressed scholars for herself and her charge. He sits and listens, full of wonder. On going home, he tells his mother he has been among the angels.

"At first at a loss, she becomes angry, when a question or two brings out that he has been to a Protestant Sunday-school; and the father, on coming home, forbids his going back, on pain of flogging. Next Sunday, however, he goes, and is flogged, and so again, and yet again, till one Sunday, he begs to be flogged before going, that he may not be kept thinking of it all the time. The father relents a little, and promises him a holiday every Saturday afternoon, if he will not go to Sunday-school. The lad agrees, sees his teacher, who offers to teach him then. How many wealthy young folks would give up their Sundays to train one poor ragged urchin in the way of salvation?

"Some time after, at his work, the lad is on one of the railway cars. The train starts suddenly; he slips through, and the wheels pass over his legs; he asks the doctor if he will live to get home; it is impossible. 'Then,' says he, 'tell father and mother that I am going to heaven, and want to meet them there.' Will the work she did seem little now to the young lady? Or is it nothing that even one thus grateful waits her yonder?"

THE tendency noticed in many special meetings to depend on human instrumentality frequently results in the work suddenly ceasing when the clergyman or evangelist who has led them is withdrawn. Many Christians grieve as they witness this who make no effort themselves to carry on the work. An incident related in Thy Healer furnishes a hint to such brethren. Mrs. Fox, the lady who gives the testimony, says that in the place where she lives there was great spiritual darkness, but it pleased God to send there a strange clergyman to conduct a mission at a time when the rector of the parish was sick. She says:

"I was in great doubt whether any blessing would come, as the missionary was High Church. However, he was a very clever man, and preached wonderful sermons. He preached the necessity of conviction of sin and conversion to God by the work of the Holy Spirit. He spoke earnestly to inquirers, and numbers came out of the vestry, crying, 'Oh, what shall we do when he is gone?' I felt very much for them, for there was no one to carry on the work. But one day I got him to come and see me. I said, 'What is to be done with these poor people, for there seems a good work commenced among them; but who is to carry it on when you are gone?' I told him I never had met a High Church clergyman before who knew the work of the Spirit of God in the heart. But he turned on me at once, and said, 'Do you know it? Do you know what it is to have Christ dwelling in you?' Well, I can hardly describe to you how I felt when I said I did, and he replied, 'Mrs. Fox, you must do the work that lies before you in carrying on this good work.' 'I do it. Oh, I cannot.' He said, 'Of course you cannot, but Christ in you can.' I said, 'Yes, I know how my heart yearns over souls.' 'Remember,' he said, 'it is Christ in you that yearns over souls; it is Christ that speaks.' That so strengthened me that I felt I must do something. 'One rule more,' he said, 'I will give you. Never you say a word more than your experience.' And then he gave me his blessing; he also knelt down and prayed.

"He was, as I have said, a High Church clergyman, and I asked him why he carried on such performances in church, and gave him my mind plainly. He explained what seemed to satisfy him, but it did not satisfy me. Then I asked him, 'What about the rector? Will he not object to ladies trying to carry on this work?' 'Oh, no,' he said, 'God has spoken to him in this illness. He will not be against it, but for it.' 'Then,' I answered, 'what about the curate? I am afraid he will be opposed to it.' 'Well,' said he, 'I will speak to the rector, and ask him to get rid of the curate.'

"Well, I have had six meetings a week of different kinds, and in all this new work it is Christ in me who has done all. The clergyman was the first to open the room with the Mothers' Meeting. The work has gone on even in that place which was so dead."

RECURRENT BLESSING.

IN the course of some remarks on Genesis 32: 29 Mr. C. H. Spurgeon related the following sketch of a Christian life: It was with a young man a day of seeking, and he entered a little sanctuary and heard a sermon from "Look unto Me and be ye saved." He obeyed the Lord's command, and He blessed him there. Soon after he made a profession of his faith before many witnesses, declaring his consecration to the Lord, and He blessed him there. Anon he began to labor for the Lord in little rooms, among a few people, and He blessed him there. His opportunities enlarged, and by faith he ventured upon daring things for the Lord's sake, and He blessed him there. A household grew about him, and together with his loving wife he tried to train his children in the fear of the Lord, and He blessed him there. Then came sharp and frequent trial, and he was in pain and anguish, but the Lord blessed him there. This is that man's experience all along, from the day of his conversion to this hour: up hill and down dale his path has been a varied one, but for every part of his pilgrimage he can praise the Lord, for "He blessed him there."

AN OPEN DOOR IN SIAM.

ENCOURAGING reports continue to arrive from Siam, where there is a population of nearly six millions, with no restrictions against the preaching of the Gospel. An epidemic of cholera raged there a short time ago, and Mr. E. P. Dunlap, who is laboring in Siam, remained at his post through the whole time. One of the last persons seized by the dread disease was Mr. Dunlap's little son, but he happily recovered. When the pestilence abated the missionary travelled down to a place called Chantaboon on the sea-coast, for the sake of the invalid child. Writing to the Foreign Missionary, Mr. Dunlap says:

"Before leaving home I called upon a prince who has large possessions in Chantaboon, and asked him regarding a lodging place for our party. He very kindly placed his cottage by the sea at our disposal. We found it a charming place, suitably furnished, and that the prince had also sent orders to his men to give us good attention. They received us at the steamer in comfortable boats, and during our stay served us well. We should be very grateful to the Siamese for the constant kindness shown us. Those in authority seldom, if ever, deny us.

"There was a military post near us, and I enjoyed preaching to the soldiers, and found them very accessible. The captain gave me the armory as a chapel, and in accordance with my request marched the soldiers from evening roll call to hear me preach. They seemed impressed with the Saviour's wonderful works and words, asked questions during the sermons, and numbers afterward attended inquiry meetings.

"By invitation we also held services at the house of a government official. He called in the villagers—some forty—and all gave good attention to the Gospel. I also had the pleasure of preaching in the Buddhist temple in the village. Surely we could not ask for greater liberty in preaching than was given at Chantaboon. And just so it is all over the country. In this respect there is not a more inviting field than Siam on this side the globe."

MRS. CLEVELAND ON TEMPERANCE.

A GENERAL principle for the settlement of difficult questions in the lives of women, which, if it were adopted, would do much to remove difficult questions from the lives of men also, was enunciated recently by the wife of the President. It occurs in a private letter to a friend in West Virginia, who had asked her advice about joining a temperance society, which letter has happily found its way into type. Mrs. Cleveland wrote:

"The subject to which you refer, and ask my advice, is one in which your own conscience must dictate the wisest course for yourself to pursue. You have better opportunities for knowing how you can do the most good, and, it seems to me, that should be the standard by which we women should settle all our great questions in life. It rarely occurs that a woman needs for herself the restraining influences of a temperance pledge; but if, by placing ourselves under the obligations of such an organization we can better help our fathers, brothers, lovers, and friends, I think there should be no hesitation in the matter. I know something of the Good Templars, and that they do much good work. It is quite certain you can do no harm by casting your lot on the side of temperance, and you may do much good. I do not consider it a small matter by any means, and I am glad you asked me the question. It is encouraging to know of every sister who wants to add her strength to the cause which, happily, some day will rid our land of ruined men and broken families."

A MISSIONARY'S ADVENTURES.

A LETTER describing a series of hairbreadth escapes has been sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Mr. A. Haegert, the devoted German Christian, whose portrait was published in this journal on September 14th, 1882. Fourteen years ago he resigned a lucrative office to preach the Gospel in Santhalistan, a district of India then much neglected. Mr. Haegert has been laboring among the Santhals ever since. He learned their language, went to live among them, established schools, set up a dispensary for the sick, and worked earnestly to help them in body and soul. Mr. Haegert's letter relates some of his experiences. He says:

"In Borotham three or four Brahmin priests flew at me. One caught hold of my bridle, while the others jumped about me in great excitement. About eighty or a hundred people were present. Their yelling and shouting was really Bengali, and a person must have been mobbed by them to know anything about it. I have been in very large crowds in Berlin, Paris, and London, but never heard such a hellish noise before. One was for cutting my head off, the others for smashing it to a jelly. The noise was awful; nothing could be heard distinctly. For one moment I thought that my labors would cease. The crowd grew larger and more boisterous. At last I got a hearing, and I said to the priests, 'You seem to be very excited, as if you had inflammation of the brain. Now, if you will bring me a vessel of water, I will give you some medicine which will cool you. You should have seen them, they jumped and gnashed their teeth at me, like wild beasts, showing all their molars.

"There were also about thirty Santhals present, and these men had a talk in their own language among themselves. 'Shall we allow these Bengalis to give the Sahib (missionary) a thrashing, or what do you say?' They all agreed that if the Bengalis touched the Sahib they would give them a sound thrashing, but of this I knew nothing at the time. After about three quarters of an hour I left the crowd unhurt, heartily thanking God for the deliverance. This was in 1883.

"On Monday, September 28th, 1885, I was mobbed in Kindooa. Some twenty or thirty Bengalis, the Jamjoori Zemindar's people, came yelling and jumping like demons to drive us away with their sticks, which were six feet long. Long before they came in sight we could hear their unearthly shouting. My men were fleeing, and I was thinking for a moment to get on my horse and be off; but remembering that my people could not follow me so quickly, and that these fellows would probably chase us, I determined to go and meet the foe and stand the consequence, only I prayed for Jesus to go with me. Besides, if I bolted, the country would soon hear of it and laugh and mock. We are the only Europeans in our district, and I thought it would be improper for me to run like a hare, so I walked quietly up to the shouting, hooting mob with only my umbrella; and by and by we came to close quarters. First, they rushed at me, but on coming quite close they got afraid and bolted, shouting, 'Sir, you stand there.' Still I moved quietly forward, asking what they wanted. They drew back more and more, flourishing their big sticks, and shouting louder.

"There was a Baboo Rajoo, who had boasted that he would drown the Padre Sahib, and beat him with a bamboo. This fellow was present, and I asked him, going up to them, my umbrella being my only weapon—the crowd receding more and more into the rice-fields—whether he had come to fulfil his threat. Like a lying Bengali he denied the whole. Well, I spoke to the people, and they calmed down at once. After awhile they all approached, making a profound salaam. They begged leave to go, which, of course, I readily granted. After a hymn and prayer, with the blue heavens for our roof and stars for our lamp, we fervently thanked God for this new deliverance, and then returned home. What a gracious thing it is to be always 'Safe in the arms of Jesus.'

"On the 15th of April, 1886, two of our preachers were brutally attacked in Fooljoori, and one of our brethren had his eye destroyed. Thank God, this does not occur every day.

"During last month we completed and dedicated two new chapels, twenty-five miles north, and ten miles east.

"I have trained four native preachers for medical work, and in April they opened four dispensaries, twenty-five miles north, twenty miles south, ten miles west, and twenty miles east. Three of them attended sufferers from fifty villages since above time. Pray for them."

THE ROMAN LETTER MOVEMENT IN JAPAN.

THE effort to substitute our letters for the clumsy system in vogue in Japan and China is making progress. The change will be beneficial alike to the Japanese and to the missionaries. The ordinary Japanese writing is by indivisible syllables, each of which is represented by a sign. This involves an immense amount of labor to the missionary learning the language, and to the Japanese child learning to read and write. The number of signs to be remembered is enormous, and even a bright, intelligent child requires from six to seven years to memorize them thoroughly. The superiority of our letters is becoming generally recognized among the educated classes, and a society has been formed to promote their use. The Spirit of Missions says that there are now seven thousand members of this society, and that it has all the influence of the Imperial university behind it, and the earnest advocacy of two cabinet ministers, Counts Ito and Inouye, who are liberal in their views and favorable to the introduction of Christianity.

All that is now needed is a government order decreeing the change, and this, it is expected, will be issued before long. The movement, if successful, will serve as a rapid means of increase of Christian literature, and accelerate the progress of the Christian religion in Japan. The New Testament has already been published in this style and is largely circulated.

THE KING GOING FORTH.

By Rev. W. Haslam.

His Investiture—Acclamations in Heaven—The Emblem and its Meaning—The Character of Noah's Days—Peter our Noah—The State of Society in the Last Days—A Period of Liberty and Prosperity—The Warning Unseen on Earth.

IN the fifth chapter of Revelation the Lord Jesus Christ is represented standing before the throne of the Ancient of Days to receive the sovereignty which by right belonged to Him. Thus authorized, He is the King of the whole earth, the Heir of the Land of Promise and of the throne of David. He who had been Prophet and Priest is now duly inaugurated as the King of kings and the Lord of lords.

into this office is witnessed by the living creatures, the elders, and the great company of angels. These all express their joy with triumphant acclamations. They evidently understand the import of the whole scene, and, in anticipation of the glory and power yet to be manifested, they give thanks and praise; whereupon all creation join in the chorus. In the midst of this grand tumult of heavenly triumph, the Lord Jesus Christ goes forward without delay, having taken the book, to open the seals thereof.

"I saw," says the Apostle, "when the Lamb opened one of the seals; and I heard, as it were the noise of thunder, one of the four beasts saying, Come and see. And I saw; and behold, a white horse: and He that sat on him had a bow; and a crown was given unto Him: and He went forth conquering, and to conquer" (Rev. 6: 1, 2).

What is the meaning of this emblem? It is intended to represent the Lord Jesus Christ going forth to commence the exercise of His governmental power. The same emblem or figure appears again in the nineteenth chapter of this book. There we are told that His name is called "The Word of God," and on His vesture and on His thigh a name written "King of kings and Lord of lords."

There He is going forth in a vesture dipped in the blood of His enemies, and with many crowns upon His head. Here He has but one crown given to Him; and He is now only setting out to the fight, and the victory that is to be. He has a bow in His hand, to indicate His warlike purpose; but we see not yet any arrows or sword in His possession. This is quite in keeping with the circumstances of the present time and action.

In this action upon the world at large we see the Lord's manner of dealing with those who resist and refuse Him and His message of love. The Lord knows how "to reserve the unjust unto the Day of Judgment to be punished" (II Peter 2: 9).

When Peter wrote these words he had in his mind and the people of that time. How did God reserve the unjust of that day? Not by casting them off and afflicting them, but, in the first instance, by pleading with them in mercy. Through the voice of Noah, Christ Himself preached to these people; and no doubt He pointed to the ark which was in course of preparation to confirm the warning He was giving them. The Deluge was surely coming!

In every case these warnings were more or less in vain. Men seemed enamored of destruction, and turned a deaf ear to all God's remonstrances and pleadings. Human nature is not changed; and men still disregard God's Word as they did in times past. Many people are not aware that and others are so little interested that they do not even know the subject of his warning. Noah's world was reserved unto the deluge of water; ours, as the apostle testifies, is reserved unto fire. He says that men are "willingly ignorant" of the fact that "the heavens and the earth which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the Day of Judgment and perdition of ungodly men" (II Peter 3: 5, 7).

Terrible things are coming upon the earth; but the majority of men are heedless; and some who do hear these warning words think they are not to be taken literally; others again, that they will not happen in their time. Thus no doubt it will be in the particular days of which we are speaking.

In the days which are coming, the Lord's witnesses will preach the Gospel of the Kingdom, and proclaim the Coming of the King to take vengeance; but men will not regard it. They will go on "eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage," as if the world were to continue forever.

When men reject God's Word, they become judicially hardened. We see how it is now in the case of an individual who so disregards it. God gives him up to himself and his idols. The poor infatuated and deluded creature thinks that it is well with him. He cares for no one to hinder him in his doomed career. He goes on in his own ignorant way until he is lost beyond the reach of mercy. If the rejection of God is so solemn in the case of one person, imagine what it will be in the case of many thousands, who are thus given over to their wilful and rebellious ways.

In the beginning of the days of the Son of man this will be exactly the state of things upon the earth. Unparalleled will mark this period. As when a dam or barrier is borne away, the long pent-up torrent pours itself out in headlong force, overflowing its banks and spreading desolation everywhere, so will it be when the ungodly are permitted to go forth according to their own will.

It is the counterpart of the sign or emblem in the heavens—the Lord going forth in His power, though without arrows or sword. Notice that the sign is in heaven, and not manifest upon the earth; and it is not seen by those who are most concerned in it. The world did not know when God shut the door of the ark; nor did the Jews know when the Lord left the Temple for the last time, saying, "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate" (Matt. 23: 38).

The men of the world will go on their own way, with a tide of prosperity at first, flourishing like a green bay-tree. They nor suspect any. Lifting themselves up in their pride and vanity, they will laugh at the idea of God's government, and perhaps even at His very existence. Men will desire to be their own masters; and in their selfishness and their rivalry with others they will come into endless collisions.

Predicting these days, the Apostle Paul says to Timothy, "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof" (II Tim. 3: 1-5).

Peter also, referring to this time, says, "Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of His coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation" (II Peter 3: 3, 4).

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Long Pending Dispute Between the Postmaster-General and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company has at length been settled by the company accepting the terms offered by Mr. Vilas. It will be remembered that the department refused to divide among the companies the special appropriation of $400,000 made by Congress for the purpose, but offered to pay sea and inland rates for the transportation of the mails. The companies, believing that they had a right to the appropriation, refused to carry the mails unless it was paid. Mr. Vilas made other arrangements, but renewed his offer each month. This month it has been accepted by the Pacific Company, and its steamers are scheduled. It is stated that the company has lost $40,000 by the struggle.

The Official Returns from Maine, as Stated by the chairman of the Republican Committee, give Bodwell, the Republican candidate for Governor, a plurality over the Democratic candidate of 14,000. Other returns place it at 13,351. In 1884 the Republican candidate for Governor had a plurality of 19,709. This shows a decrease of more than 5000 votes. As compared with 1884, the total vote was less by about 10,379; the Republican vote fell off by 9600, the Democratic vote decreased by 3300, but the Prohibition vote increased by 2682. This, too, in spite of the fact that prohibition was burdened this year by Neal Dow's advocacy, while in 1884 he was fighting for the Republican Party and against St. John. Though the chairman of the Republican Committee declares himself satisfied with the result, there is general disappointment expressed by Republicans elsewhere. It was thought that, as Mr. Blaine stumped every county in the State, the plurality would have been as large as in 1884, though the total vote might be less. The Republicans have elected 148 members of the Legislature and the Democrats 35. Mr. Hale's seat is therefore secure.

The National Convention of the Anti-Saloon Republicans held at Chicago on Thursday last was attended by 187 accredited delegates. Senator Blair was temporary chairman. In his opening speech he declared the loyalty of himself and his friends to the Republican Party. He said he preferred low license to free rum, high license to low license, and prohibition to high license. He also said that the anti-saloon men were determined to stay in the Republican Party, and any members of the party who did not like them might leave them and the party too. Ex-Senator Windom became permanent chairman and made a vigorous attack on the saloon power. Commissioner Hiram Price, who also spoke, is reported as making the assertion that the leaders of the Prohibitionists in 1884 were Democrats. The most important planks of the platform adopted were the third and fourth, which declared that "the National Government should absolutely prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia and in all the Territories of the United States;" and that "the best practical method of dealing with the liquor traffic in the several States is to let the people decide whether it shall be prohibited by the submission of constitutional amendments, and, until such amendments are adopted, by the passage of local option laws." Less acrimony was manifested against the Prohibitionists than was expected.

Subscriptions for the Help of Charleston continue to be sent from all parts of the country and from Europe. At the close of last week four hundred thousand dollars in all had been received. At least a million dollars are needed, and it is suggested that some help ought to come from the national Government to make up that sum if voluntary subscriptions fall short of it. New York City's contribution has reached a total of $125,000. Offers of homes for destitute people who can leave the city have been made by several places in the neighborhood. It is hoped that by the end of the month accommodation will be found for every one, and the camps broken up. Much suffering and some danger to the health of the city must result if the camps continue many weeks longer. The Relief Committee is furnishing two meals a day to seven thousand persons, two thirds of whom are colored. Some trouble owing to labor strikes has been experienced in the work of rebuilding. The bricklayers, however, are now going on with their work, and report themselves satisfied with their present wages. They are receiving five dollars a day. The brick-cleaners, who receive one dollar, have struck for a rise of fifty per cent. The deaths reported up to the close of last week as the result of the earthquake bring the total up to sixty-two, but there have been many deaths registered as by other causes which the earthquake indirectly caused or precipitated.

A Mining Disaster Occurred at Scranton, Pa., on September 13th which caused the death of seven miners. A large part of the roof of the Marvine Colliery, weighing many thousand tons of rock and coal, fell in, either crushing the men or hemming them in. Three hundred miners were at work in the colliery when the fall occurred, and about sixty were in the chambers crushed in. They noticed that there was a "squeeze" and that the roof was bulging, and ran for their lives. Many were hurt by the falling masses from the roof. Parties of miners worked in relays all the week boring through the wall of fallen debris behind which the seven men are, but were unable to reach them. The air is loaded with gas, and it is thought that they must have been suffocated if they were not crushed.

A Railroad Collision Caused the Death of fourteen persons on September 14th. An excursion train bound east on the New York, Chicago, and St. Louis Railroad ran into a freight train one mile east of Silver Creek. Both trains were running at the rate of ten miles an hour. The engines struck each other, pilot against pilot, with a terrific crash that left them both a mass of broken metal; the baggage-car of the excursion train was driven back on the smoking-car, telescoping it almost the entire length of the car. The cars in the rear were badly shaken, but not injured. Fourteen persons in the smoking-car were killed on the spot and twenty others severely injured, three of whom have since died. The accident was caused by the disregard of instructions on the part of the engineer and conductor of the excursion train. The former has absconded, but the latter testified at the inquest. He explained his conduct by saying that he had received a verbal order by a flagman which he considered superseded the instructions of the train despatcher.

Another Riot Occurred in Belfast on Sunday. The police arrested some drunken brawlers who were fighting in front of the police station, when they were surrounded by a mob and had much difficulty in getting their prisoners into the cells. There were only four policemen in the station, and the mob, taking advantage of its defencelessness, attacked the building. Shutters were torn down and windows were smashed with brickbats and paving stones. The four constables fired eleven rounds, killing one man and wounding several others. It is stated that a woman was wounded and has since died in her own house. The mob was scattered by reinforcements of police. Later the mob re-gathered in small groups, when a number of priests tried to persuade the people to retire to their homes.

The Bulgarian Difficulty Grows More Ominous daily. A significant hint to Russia has been conveyed in the reply sent by the cabinets of England, Austria, and Italy to the circular of the Sultan. They assure him that the further steps needed for the settlement of affairs in Bulgaria must be taken by the Powers acting in concert. The Sobranje, the curious constitutional assembly which has been summoned to decide on the future government of the country, has adopted a doubtful policy. While cringing to the Czar and sending him an abject letter, the Sobranje has denounced the plot against Prince Alexander, which was undoubtedly the Czar's work. European observers notice with alarm that Russia is making hasty and extensive preparations for war, and that England, Austria, and Italy are drawing closer together in diplomatic concert.

Debate on Mr. Parnell's Important Bill for the relief of Irish tenants was commenced on Monday last in the House of Commons. The administration expect to defeat it by the help of their Liberal allies by a majority of seventy. There are clauses in the bill which Mr. Gladstone's followers do not approve, and the one relating to leaseholders has been emphatically condemned by the ex-Premier. There is therefore little probability of its passing at all, and no chance of its passing in its present shape. An attempt has been made to induce Mr. Parnell to moderate the clause staying evictions in cases in which the tenant has paid one half his arrears. He has been advised to raise the limit to two thirds of the arrears. The Parnellites are agreeably surprised to find Sir Michael Hicks-Beach more conciliatory than they expected. As he is Secretary for Ireland, his attitude toward them encourages hope that some compromise may be effected on Mr. Parnell's bill. Some amusement has been caused by a lively tilt between Lord Randolph Churchill and his friends of the Scottish Protestant Alliance. They wrote to protest, on religious grounds, against the elevation of Mr. Matthews, who is a Roman Catholic, to the high post of Home Secretary. Lord Randolph replied that he observed "with astonishment and regret that in this age of enlightenment and general toleration persons professing to be educated and intelligent can arrive at conclusions so senseless and irrational" as those which they had communicated to him. To this the alliance replied, characterizing Lord Randolph's letter as insolent, and expressing their "astonishment and regret that you have not laid aside those weapons of abuse with which you tomahawked your way to power. It is a national calamity when men pitchforked into high position are destitute of decent manners." These are early days in the curious political league for such hard words to be flung at each other by the allies.

The Bible and Prophetic Conference to be held in Chicago November 16th-21st is attracting the most intense interest in the Christian churches throughout the country. Letters from clergymen of various denominations and from professors in colleges have been received by the secretary, Rev. George C. Needham, in response to the call published in our columns on September 2d (p. 550). It promises to be an assembly truly remarkable for catholicity of Christian brotherhood, as well as for earnestness. Twenty-seven papers on prophetic subjects have already been promised by eminent men, and the list is not yet complete. A partial list, which arrived too late for publication in this issue, will be published next week. Ministers desiring to sign the call or to take part in the conference should write to Rev. George C. Needham, Manchester-by-the-Sea, Mass.

Authentic News from China of the Attack on the missionaries at Chung King has been received at Davenport, Iowa, from Mrs. Gamewell, who is a native of that city. She has labored as a missionary in China since 1871. Her husband is superintendent of missions at Chung King, Western China, sixteen hundred miles from Shanghai. A private letter from her is published by the Davenport Democrat. It states that she was attacked in her house by a Chinese mob on Sunday, June 6th, while her husband was away preaching. She was beaten and ill-used, but succeeded in scaring the mob with an empty gun. Shortly afterward another attack was made, and the missionaries were driven out of their homes and robbed of all their possessions. They were not allowed to save anything but the clothes they had on. Mr. Bowen, the British resident, the missionaries of the China Inland Mission, and American Bible Society colporteurs, were treated in the same way. No one was killed, but all were stripped of their property. Mrs. Gamewell is now on her way home.

A Convention of the Young People's Association of the city of New York is to be arranged preparatory to the winter's work. In June last a letter suggesting the convention was issued by the "Young People's Association of the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church," to which forty representatives from different city churches responded, and at their meeting they unanimously adopted the following resolution: "That it is the sense of this meeting that a convention of the Young People's Associations of the city of New York would be conducive to their general growth and interest in Christian work." A committee of seven was appointed to take the matter in hand, which has arranged to receive representatives from the different churches on Monday evening, September 27th, 1886, at the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church, at eight o'clock, which assembly shall constitute a committee to act on the resolution.

A Walking Illustration to a Discourse was supplied recently in New York. At an open-air service held in the large triangular space in front of the Roosevelt slip by the Rev. James Mathews, the preacher was led to speak of the evils of the drinking habit. He said he would mention twelve reasons for abstaining from intoxicating liquor. His sixth reason was: "It debases man." Just as he had given utterance to it a miserable, drunken loafer staggered into the crowd and cast himself down full length in the dirt at the preacher's feet.

A New Way of Spending a Vacation has been adopted by three ladies of Baltimore, Md. They are deeply interested in the cause of foreign missions, and finding it difficult to arouse the country churches to a similar concern by correspondence simply, they determined to spend their vacation this summer visiting about from church to church; so that, if possible, they might leave behind them, in every church where no organization of ladies exists, a working circle specially devoted to the cause of missions. The time usually spent at a fashionable watering-place was fully occupied by the tour through the State, giving a few days to each church. In this way they hope, before the summer is over, to have an organization planted in every town of the State, which will keep alive the interest in the missionary cause in its locality.

A Conference of Sufferers from Hay Fever was held at Bethlehem, N. H., on September 11th, and there was a large attendance. The discussion centred on the new drug, hydrochlorate of cocaine, and the new galvanocautery process, both of which are used to deaden or destroy the oversensitiveness of the lining membrane of the nose. The testimony of doctors and hay-fever sufferers seems to be that hydrochlorate of cocaine gives temporary relief, but that its use is attended with danger. One reported that it had paralyzed his auditory nerve. Concerning the galvanocautery, reports were diverse—some reporting complete cure; others relief for one or two years; and still more no relief whatever. Boxes of nostrum are sent to the association yearly, but the association refuses to give its sanction to any remedy the absolute efficacy of which is not known. The association has done a great work in collecting and comparing data for the locating of exempt places in the White Mountains, Adirondacks, and California. The misery endured by victims of this disease explains the organized effort thus made to find a remedy. It is remarkable that men are not similarly anxious in spiritual matters. The malady of sin is infinitely more general, causes more misery here and threatens greater misery hereafter, and an infallible remedy is provided. Yet how few sufferers apply to it (Isa. 1 : 6, 18)!

A Bride's Dementia was Caused by the Charleston earthquake. One of the saddest incidents of the earthquake came to light only last week. A New York business man received a letter from his friends in the South giving the narrative. It stated that two young persons living near Charleston were married about a week before the earthquake, and they were enjoying the first days of their honeymoon in a visit to friends in Charleston when the terrible disaster came. The groom was hurt somewhat, not gravely, but enough to add a large measure of personal anxiety to the fears of his bride, who, naturally of a frail constitution, became mentally overwrought, and is now not merely emaciated and a wreck physically, but is pronounced hopelessly insane. The young husband bears his sorrow in a dazed sort of way that promises ill, too, for his future, seeming scarce able to comprehend what really has come to pass. Strong men speak of the severe strain the shocks put upon their nerves, so that it is not surprising that a lady of the susceptible temperament described has been mentally unbalanced by her terrible experience. There will doubtless be many such cases when that great earthquake comes which, as prophecy warns us, will accompany the last scenes of this dispensation; for then men will be "marrying and giving in marriage" (Matt. 24 : 38). But the bride of Christ will be safe, having been withdrawn to meet Him in the air as He has promised (1 Thess. 4 : 17).

A Child Among Elephants Came Near Losing his life at Orillia, Canada, recently. Forepaugh's menagerie was exhibiting in that town, and among the spectators were a mother and a chubby four year-old boy. When the performance in the circus commenced many of the people moved away from the menagerie to witness it. Suddenly they were startled by a loud shriek from the menagerie. "My child! My child!" rang through the pavilion, and roused the half dozen animal keepers. Hastening to the spot they saw the mother in the act of crawling under the guard ropes which encircled twelve huge elephants. Another glance revealed the tiny form of her baby-boy, standing in the midst of the herd, patting their squirming trunks with his diminutive hands, laughing and shouting. Unnoticed he had strayed from his mother's charge, and run under the ropes among the elephants, who were stretching their trunks out to him. The elephant keeper understood the situation at a glance, and quickly seizing the frenzied woman, handed her to an attendant, and shouting to the elephants, who were familiar with his voice and presence, entered among them, and gently raising the daring little intruder to his shoulder, carried him to his agonized parent. The child could not realize his danger, and the mother, who did realize it, could not avert it; only the keeper knew how to save the little one's life. So it is in the perils to which parents see their children exposed in the world. They alone act wisely who cry to God for the deliverance of those they love (Isa. 49 : 25).

Tenants in a Quaking Tenement in New York came near losing their lives last week. Six families lived in a very old house in Leonard Street, which has long been deemed unsafe. Recently the next house to it was pulled down to make room for a new structure. It was then seen that the wall between the two was cracked from foundation to roof. The inmates were given notice to leave the place, but they did not comply. The heavy rainstorms of Monday, however, had such an effect on the exposed wall that it shook with every passing vehicle. Even then the tenants could not be aroused to a sense of their peril. They stayed to remove their furniture, and would have done so had they not been compelled to leave by the captain of the fire brigade, who forced them out of the house, and proceeded to tear it down. So men cling to the world, where their treasures are, in spite of warnings and entreaties to seek salvation by flying to Christ (Gen. 19 : 16, 17).

A Man Trying to Sell his Body was Unsuccessful in finding a purchaser in Buffalo, N. Y., last week. A citizen of that place was accosted in the street on September 16th by a German who placed in his hand a paper on which was written: "This man would like to know if he could sell his body. Would like to know how much his children would receive after his death. He is a poor man, and would like to get $50 in advance. He is a German. Is six years in the country. He cannot speak English very well, so please write an answer." The man explained in broken English that he was willing to end his life at any time his purchaser might desire. The citizen declined to purchase, and the man then went to the medical college, but found no buyers there. It is saddening to learn that any man is in circumstances so desperate as to offer to sell his body. We often hear of men selling their souls for gain, and in this case too the terms offered included the loss of the soul. Those who offer such bargains do not reflect that the Son of God died to redeem their souls, or they might truthfully say, as tradesmen sometimes do of their goods, that they are being "sold regardless of cost" (1 Peter 1 : 18, 19).

An Unerring Sign of Approaching Marriage was recognized by the late Mr. William H. Vanderbilt in one of his acquaintances who was married recently. The gentleman is a heavy dealer in Wall Street, and was noted for his gruff and sometimes discourteous manner. For a year past he is said to have changed radically, and has not been known to say an unpleasant word to any one. The improvement in his manner was the subject of comment among a circle of Wall Street men gathered on the piazza of a hotel in Saratoga last summer, and various suggestions were made as to its cause. While the subject was under discussion the gentleman himself passed with a lady. Mr. Vanderbilt no sooner saw him than he said: "He is going to be married. Do you notice that he is carrying the lady's shawl on his arm. That is a sure sign, gentlemen, an unerring sign. When a man gets that far he's gone. I've noticed it a hundred times. It never fails—never!" It would appear that the broker's love was strong enough not only to prompt him to render delicate attentions to the object of his affections, but made him kinder and more affable to others. True love often has that transforming effect. It is always so when a man begins to love Jesus. It is one of the signs by which Jesus said we might recognize the true Christian (John 13 : 35).

IN CHRIST NO CONDEMNATION.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit."—ROMANS 8:1.

The Man who Ought to Doubt—The Apostle's Connected Experience—I. The Serpent's Gospel Refuted—The Larger Hope—Those who are Under Condemnation—II. The Believer's Position—In Christ by his Faith—As his Federal Head—By Vital Union—By His Finished Work—III. The Believer's Walk—An Interpolation—The Words Scriptural and True—IV. The Believer's Absolution—A Bold Statement—A Condemned Soldier's Dear Grapes.

YOU are well aware, dear friends, that the division into chapters has only been made for convenience's sake, and is not a matter of inspired arrangement. I may add that it has been clumsily made, and not with careful thoughtfulness, but as roughly as if a woodman had taken an axe and chopped the book to pieces in a hurry. It was a very unfortunate thing that the axe dropped down just here, so as to divide a passage which ought to have been kept entire. We once heard a friend say, "I have got out of the seventh of Romans into the eighth." Nonsense! There is no getting out of one into the other, for they are one. The field is not divided by hedge or ditch.

Our apostle, after having said, "So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin," goes on to say, without any break, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus." The fact is, that believers are in a state of conflict, but not in a state of condemnation; and that at the very time when the conflict is hottest the believer is still justified. The man who never strives against the sin which dwelleth in him, who indeed is not conscious of any sin to strive against, that is whether he knows anything at all about the spiritual life. He who has no inward pain may well suspect that he is abiding in death, abiding therefore under constant condemnation; but that man who feels a daily striving after deliverance from evil, who is panting, and pining, and longing, and agonizing to become holy even as God is holy, he is the justified man.

Observe that the text is written in the present tense. You will lose much of its force and beauty if you leave out that word "now," or regard it as a mere term of argument. This "now" shows how distinctly the statement of non-condemnation is consistent with that mingled experience of the seventh chapter, which certain good people do not appear to understand. Every child of God must know this conflict if he knows himself. Reading my text in that connection, with an emphasis upon the "now," my heart sings for joy. With all my watching, and warring—yea, with all my fears and tremblings—yet will I rejoice in the Lord even now; for "there is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus."

I. I would say, first of all, that this verse contains a refutation of

THE SERPENT'S GOSPEL.

"The serpent's gospel," say you, "what is that?" It is another name for the gospel of modern thought—that gospel which casts a doubt upon the threatenings of the law, and even denies them altogether. Quote the first few words of the text, and stop there, and this false gospel is before you—"There is therefore now no condemnation." The serpent promulgated this gospel in the Garden of Eden when he said, "Ye shall not surely die." With what greediness our first parents received that highly advanced teaching which contradicted the declaration of God—"Thou shalt surely die!" The doctrine of no punishment for any man is popular at this day, and threatens to have even greater sway in the future. Generally it comes in the serpent's favorite form of "honest doubt"—"Yea, hath God said?" Can it be so? Is He not far too merciful?

The denial of the penalty attached to sin comes out in different ways, but when put into a nutshell it amounts to this—"There is therefore now no condemnation to any man, however he may live." Some teach that you may live in sin, and die impenitent, but it will not matter, for at death there is an end of you; the soul is not immortal, men are only cooking animals. Others tell us that if you die unforgiven it will be a pity, but you will

after a purgatorial period; you may take a little longer road, but you will come to the same end in the course of time. The wrath of God and the judgment to come are mere bugbears, according to the teaching of our new apostles. This is the Gospel according to Satan—a gospel which has already ruined thousands of souls, and is now sealing up myriads in a stony-hearted unbelief which enables them to sin without fear.

Here is Paul's refutation of this doctrine of a general amnesty—"There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus." They would be condemned, every one of them, if it had not been that they are in Christ Jesus; and there is now no condemnation to them, solely because they are in Christ Jesus. Their being in Christ Jesus is the great method by which alone they have escaped condemnation. If Paul had only stopped when he had got as far as "there is now no condemnation," every drunkard and swearer and whoremonger would have cried, "Bravo, apostle, that is the gospel for us! Now you speak

LIKE A MAN OF THOUGHT."

But Paul was too honest to court popularity by pandering to man's desire of immunity in sin. He believed the terrible truth that the impenitent sinner is under condemnation, and believing that truth, he spoke it plainly. He did not deal out comfort hand over head, catch it who can; but he put it thus—"There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus."

It is a work of almighty and sovereign grace, to put men into Christ Jesus; by this method they escape condemnation, but by no other. I understand Paul tacitly to tell us that those who are not in Christ Jesus are under condemnation; and this is a terrible truth. "He that believeth not shall be damned" is as much the declaration of our Lord Jesus as that other divine sentence, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." As many as believe not in Christ Jesus, and repent not of sin, have before them at this moment "a fearful looking for of judgment and of fiery indignation." O sirs, I must tell you these things. It is as much as my soul is worth to be silent about them. If you think that I find any pleasure in them you misjudge me. I appeal to those who know me—am I morose? Am I without tenderness? No, it is because I love you that I warn you. You shall not perish through any flattering words of mine. I will be clear of your blood. If you are not reconciled to God by the death of His Son, you are His enemies, and to be at enmity with God is to be miserable; it cannot be otherwise. How I wish you would feel this truth, and be led by it to escape from the wrath to come before yonder sun shall again go down! God grant you may.

II. And now, secondly, we have in the text a description of

he is "in Christ Jesus." What does that mean? I am not going into any deep theological disquisitions; I speak very simply and with a view to practical results. He that believes in the Lord Jesus Christ is in Christ. By an act of simple dependence upon Jesus he realizes his position as being in Christ. By nature I am in myself, and in sin, and I am, therefore, condemned; but when the grace of God awakens me up to know my ruined state, then I fly to Christ. I trust alone in His blood and righteousness, and He becomes to me the cleft of the rock, wherein I hide myself from the storm of vengeance justly due to me for my many offences. Judge, then, my hearer, whether you are in Christ. Do you stand before God on your own footing, or do you rest upon Christ, and find your all in Him? This is not an abstruse problem, but a plain question.

Will you at home kindly read the fifth chapter, and you will perceive that believers are in Christ as their federal head. By Christ's righteous life and substitutionary death, justification has come upon all who are in Him. His righteousness and sacrifice have availed for you: "There is therefore now no condemnation." It has been my joy to preach to you for many years the blessed doctrine of substitution. If our debt was paid, it was paid, and there is an end of it; a second payment cannot be demanded. You know the story, the very excellent story, which I think was first told by Mr. Moody, of the man who in the French war was drawn for a soldier, but a friend stepped in, and was accepted as his substitute. That substitute served in the war till he was slain in battle. The man for whom he served was drawn a second time, but he declined to serve. He appeared before the court, and pleaded that he had been drawn once, had served in the war by his substitute, and must now be because his representative had been killed. He pleaded that his substitute's service was practically his service; and it is said that the law allowed his plea. Assuredly it is according to divine equity even if it be not according to human law. No criminal can be hanged a second time; one death is all the law requires; believers died in Christ unto sin once, and now they penally die no more. Our condemnation has spent itself upon our gracious representative.

III. Now we come to the third point, upon which we shall speak briefly, because this part of my text is not a true portion of Holy Scripture. We have before us in this verse a description of —"who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." You who have the Revised New Testament will kindly look at it. Do you see this sentence there? To your surprise it is omitted, and very rightly so. The most learned men assure us that it is no part of the original text. I cannot just now go into the reasons for this conclusion, but they are very good and solid.

Do you ask me, "How did it get into the text?" Probably the sentence now before us was put in, and allowed to remain, by general consent, in order that the great truth of the non-condemnation of those who are in Christ Jesus might be guarded from that Antinomian tendency which would separate faith from good works. But the fear was groundless, and the

was unjustifiable. We are greatly obliged to our revisers for leaving out the sentence, since it should not be there, and without it the doctrine of justification in Christ is made more clear than in the Authorized Version. In the last chapter of the Book of Revelation, service of the same kind is most properly rendered; for instead of, "Blessed are they that do His commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life," the Revisers have given us a more accurate text: "Blessed are they that wash their robes." In these two cases we have proof that the more nearly the text of Scripture is restored to its original purity, the more clearly will the doctrines of grace be set forth in it.

Again, you ask me, "Where did the man who made the gloss get his words from? The words are so good and true that they read like inspiration." Just so. The words are borrowed from the fourth verse. The Holy Ghost meant to say this very thing a little further on, in its proper place; but the good men who felt it right to tamper a little with the document must needs make him say it sooner, and therefore they copied the last sentence of the fourth verse and placed it here: "who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." Truly, there was not much hurt done, for the words are true; but no man has a right to add to holy Scripture or take from it, and I fear that many may have been brought into needless bondage by this sentence being inserted where the Holy Spirit did not place it. Beloved, when you desire to know your state, be content with this question—"Am I in Christ?" and if you can answer it from your heart, let it suffice you: "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus." Others may better judge your walk than you can judge it yourself; but your union with Christ is BEST KNOWN TO YOURSELF.

Still, the interpolated sentence is true; the man who is in Christ Jesus does not walk after the flesh, but after the Spirit. Suppose me to be now preaching upon verse four. Observe carefully that the flesh is there; he does not walk after it, but it is there. It is there, striving and warring, vexing and grieving, and it will be there till he is taken up into heaven. It is there as an alien and detested force, and not there so as to have dominion over him. He does not walk after it, nor practically obey it. He does not accept it as his guide, nor allow it to drive him into rebellion. The man who is in Christ Jesus commits himself to the guidance of the Holy Ghost.

Judge ye yourselves in which way ye are walking. Are you walking according to the flesh? Do you do whatever you like to do? Do you believe whatever you like to believe? Do you say to yourself, "I am not going to be limited by Scripture, nor by rules of holiness; these are too old-fashioned and strait-laced for me?" Then, you walk after the flesh; you are your own guide; your own wisdom and righteousness and vain desires conduct you whither they will. You are blind; and your guide is blind, and you will soon fall into the ditch. You think not so, but time will prove my words.

IV. And so I come, in closing, to notice the ABSOLUTION OF THE BELIEVER:

"There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus." What a grand sentence! I call upon you to notice it. You may have seen a well-painted picture called "Waiting for the Verdict." What interest is displayed on every face! What fear and trembling upon the countenance of the prisoner! In his wife and the friends around him what anxiety is seen! "Waiting for the Verdict" is a sad picture; but what another might be drawn of "The Favorable Verdict Received." The prisoner is acquitted! Oh, what joy! It is not possible to bring in a verdict of "Not Guilty" for you and for me, for we are undoubtedly guilty; but yet it is possible by the processes of substitution and divine grace to bring in a just verdict by which it is witnessed that "There is now no condemnation."

Notice, first, that this is a bold speech. "There is no condemnation." "But you said just now that the thing you would not that you did." Yes, but there is no condemnation. The same lips which made such a humble confession and revealed such a troublesome experience now assert positively and joyfully "There is no condemnation." Free grace makes men speak bravely when their faith has a clear view of Jesus. Though it is a bold assertion, it is proven. Whenever a man has a "therefore" at the back of what he has to say, he may say it without stammering. "There is therefore now no condemnation." Paul is always a reasoner and a great logician. Here he seems to declare his certainty. "What I say I can prove. There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, and I can prove it to a demonstration."

The devil says there is condemnation, and therefore he accuses us day and night. He was a liar from the beginning, and the father of lies! Conscience sometimes censures us, for even conscience itself needs to be enlightened and to be purged from dead works; but when conscience understands the plan of free grace, and sees things in the light of truth, it also bears witness, and the Spirit of God bears witness with it, that we are the children of God.

"No," saith the apostle, "there is no condemnation." What a broad sweep these words take! What it is! When Giant Despair's head was cut off, Mr. Bunyan says that the pilgrims danced; and well they might. Mr. Despondency and Miss Much-afraid took a turn, and even Ready-to-Halt with his crutches must needs join in. I warrant you he footed it well. When he saw the monster's head upon the pole he could not help being merry. This text sticks the giant's head up on the pole for us. "There is therefore now no condemnation." Oh, for the loud-sounding cymbals! Poor prodigal sinners have fled to Jesus and hidden in Him, and there is now no condemnation to them. Poverty? Yes, but no condemnation. Depression of spirit? Yes, sometimes; but no condemnation. Infirmities and weaknesses, and things to grieve over? Yes, plenty of them, but no condemnation. "Oh, come, let us sing unto the Lord; let us make a joyful noise to the rock of our salvation!"

"All very well," says one, "but we should like SOMETHING PRACTICAL."

Practical! this is the most practical thing that ever was, because the moment a man receives this assurance into his soul his heart is won to his loving Lord, and the neck of his sinfulness is broken with a blow. There never was, ay, never can be, a man that has realized by the witness of the Holy Ghost that he is free from condemnation who will ever go to love sin and live in it. While I am condemned I say, "Well, if I am to be sent to hell for my sin I may as well be hung for a sheep as a lamb, and therefore I will continue in sin, and get what pleasure I can out of it." Do you not know how the guilty man often feels, that since there is no hope for him, he may as well harden his heart, and enjoy himself? A mouse was caught in a trap, the other day, by its tail, and the poor creature went on eating the cheese. Many men are doing the same; they know that they are guilty, and they dread their punishment, but they go on nibbling at their beloved sins. They remind me of the soldier in

THE OLD CLASSIC STORY.

The army marched through a certain country, and the commander-in-chief ordered that there should be no plundering; not a man must touch a bunch of grapes in going through the vineyards, or he should die for his disobedience. One soldier, tempted by a bunch of grapes, must needs pluck it, and begin to eat it. He was brought before the captain, who declared that the law must be carried out, and the thief must die. He was taken out to die; and though he knew his head would be cut off, he went on eating the grapes as he walked along. A comrade wondered that he should do this; but the condemned man answered that no one ought to grudge him his grapes, for they cost him dear enough.

Such are the bravados of sinners. The breasts of wicked men are steeled rather than softened by a sense of condemnation; but once let the Holy Spirit remove the burden of their guilt, and they will be dissolved by love. Free pardon is a great conqueror. The love of Jesus soon makes men turn from sin with burning hatred. In the experience of free grace you have something to work upon; you have put a new affection into the man, and it will drive out his base affections. A life force is communicated to him which will cause him to forsake his old ways and turn unto the Lord. "How do you know?" says one. I know by experience and by observation. I could point you out many specimens of the power of divine grace in this assembly, but I will not do so. If I were to say, "Brothers and sisters, you who once lived in sin but have escaped from it through free grace and dying love, stand up!" what an exceeding great army would start to their feet! Yes, we know it is true, for the lips of many witnesses declare it; they say, "Jesus saved us from the worst of sins, and made us His friends by His free grace, and now we rejoice to love and serve Him." So shall it be with you, dear hearer, if you also believe in Jesus. The text shall be true of you also—"There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus." God bless you! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE PHILOSOPHER-PAINTER.*

THE humorist school of engraving gained great distinction in England; but it is of historical rather than artistic interest, as it borrowed its subjects largely from literature, politics, and contemporary customs, and would lose much from being considered from a merely artistic point of view.

William Hogarth is the master of this style. Born of poor parents he was apprenticed to a goldsmith instead of being sent to a good master, who could have prepared him for a literary career. His father had struggled in vain all his life, in spite of a good education to attain a higher position than that of a printer's overseer, and his example early showed his son the illusory character of a literary life. He turned resolutely from literature, and this man, who was to inaugurate a new style of art, began life by chasing metals, and engraving armorial bearings, figures and arabesques on silver, gold, or bronze. It was thus he learned the trade of an engraver.

After working for some years with a goldsmith he determined to leave the humble profession of a copyist and devote himself to art properly so called. He studied nature with enthusiasm, looking always at the picturesque side of every creature and of everything, and noting in his memory or on paper that which struck his attention on his rambles. The wretched life of his parents had left a tone of sadness on his observing and inquiring mind, which made him see the saddest and most painful side of humanity. Thus his ideal was not beauty of form or elegance of outline, not graceful action or noble attitude, but truth and power of expression. Though harsh and rough sometimes, his work is always full of energy and character.

Fielding said of Hogarth: "The figures of other painters breathe. Those of Hogarth think." He was right. Hogarth is more of a philosopher than an artist. His paintings, often dull and inharmonious, are cleverly composed, and some figures are really artistic, but the thought is everything; the subject absorbs all attention and interest at the expense of the drawing and execution. The "Harlot's Progress," the "Rake's Progress," or "Marriage a la Mode," are really comedies in several acts, moral comedies in which the author does not shrink from a coarse and revolting representation of certain actions for the sake of teaching how terribly they are afterward expiated. William Hogarth did not confine himself merely to composing pictures, he also engraved them, a fortunate circumstance, as his works retained their original style and attractions better than they could have done in the hands of other artists. His engravings were nearly completed in etching, and then most skillfully retouched by the graver. Thinking above all of expression, he used the needle or graver for that purpose as readily as the brush, and his engravings not only possess all the qualities of his pictures, but excel them in their harmony. There is a wide difference between William Hogarth and other

English painters of manners and caricaturists. The master is anxious about the philosophical side of his work, and desirous of giving to his compositions all the value of a moral lesson, but the caricaturists who succeeded him cared little to make their works of general interest. If they intended to ridicule any one they exaggerated his physical defects, or represented him in rags, or wretched and scorned, that was all; and if they did depict one of the thousand miseries of life, they carried buffoonery to the greatest extreme; the figures, the gesture, the expression, the dress are exaggerated to such an extent that they do not always provoke even a laugh.

THE TIRED SOLDIER.

(See Illustration.)

"ANNETTE, my child, I think I will lie down a little; I am very tired." The speaker was an old pensioner who in his youth had followed the eagles of the first Napoleon, had been in the disastrous retreat from Moscow, and had seen his master's star of glory set on the field of Waterloo. He was old and feeble now, but his last days were made pleasant for him in the home of his son and the comely young matron whom he now addressed.

Annette rose as the old man spoke, and giving a glance of motherly care at the cradle by her side, in which the treasure of her life lay asleep, she went to the rough bed on which the old man had thrown himself, and put a pillow under his head and drew the coverlet over him.

"Thank you, my daughter," said the old man; "God reward you for all your kindness to me!" He lay silent for a few minutes watching the busy fingers as they plied the knitting needles. Then he said: "Annette, you have been a great blessing to us. When I came back and they told me that Pierre had married a Huguenot I was grieved. I thought this would be no home for me. Not that I cared for religion, but I had been used to think Huguenots accursed of the Church. I soon learned better. You have been like an angel to Pierre and me. We were godless men till you taught us to pray and to love the good Jesus. God bless you for it, Annette!"

Annette looked lovingly at the old man as he spoke, but she said nothing; her heart was too full to speak. She remembered well the prejudice against her that her father-in-law spoke of. She saw it in his face and manner when he came to their home, and had prayed for help to overcome it. God had blessed her beyond her hopes, and now both her husband and his father were Christian men.

The sun was near its setting, and was filling the room with golden light, and she sat on quietly knitting with the aged soldier on one side and the dear infant on the other, both locked in slumber. Presently her father opened his eyes and looked around wonderingly. "What is it, father? Does the sunlight disturb you?"

"No, daughter," was the reply; "I was dreaming, and scarcely knew where I was; I thought I must have got into the golden city that you read of. I seemed to see an angel there in the sunlight beckoning to me. Only a dream, my dear, but it was very real to me. Ah, well! it will be true some day, and thank God I am not afraid now."

He turned on his side and was soon asleep again, breathing as peacefully as his grandchild in the cradle. Annette looked at him and saw him smile in his sleep. When her child smiled so, she said, as the old nurses used to say, "the angels are whispering to him." Perhaps they were whispering to this battered old soldier too. She sat very quietly till after the sun went down, and her husband came home from his work. Then the lamps were lighted, and Pierre, looking at his father, noticed the smile too; but the face was very pale, and the breathing could not be distinguished. Annette laid her hand gently on the old man's brow, and it was cold. The old soldier was gone, and, as she had reason to know, was gone to the land to which he had seen the angel beckoning him, and, as he had said, he was not afraid.

His children who put their trust in Him is found in the life of the Christian lady whose portrait appears on the next page. From her youth she has been accustomed to look to God in all her difficulties, and has never been put to shame. In sickness she has experienced God's power to heal; in pecuniary difficulties God has supplied her need; and in Christian service the Holy Spirit has given her many souls as proofs of Divine favor. She is now residing at Niagara Falls, where her home is filled with young people whom she is training for work in heathen lands, and hitherto the cost of their board and education has been defrayed from funds for which she has made no appeal except to the Hearer of prayer.

Mrs. Osborn is now forty-two years of age, having been born October 27th, 1844, at Stoughton, Mass. Her parents were both godly persons, and her father was intensely interested in the cause of foreign missions. It was said of him that if a time of financial difficulty were to come upon him he would live on two meals a day rather than curtail his usual gifts to the foreign mission cause. His daughter inherited his devotion to that field of usefulness, and after her conversion, which occurred when she was seventeen years of age, she earnestly desired to go as a missionary to India. It was found, however, that her lungs were affected, and no missionary society would take the responsibility of sending to India one whom the dread scourge of consumption had marked for its prey. The disappointment was borne with composure, but it had its effect on her mind and body.

After the discovery of her condition the disease made rapid progress, and physicians whom she consulted pronounced her case hopeless, and intimated that her life was extremely precarious. She was liable to die, they said, at any time.

The extreme weakness and lassitude incidental to the disease were experienced to an unusual degree, and so low was she brought that death seemed to be a question of weeks, if not of days. It was then that the conviction came to her, she believed from God, that a work of usefulness in the Lord's service was before her, and she logically inferred that if this was so, God intended that she should recover. Acting upon this belief she rose from her sick-bed and went about her work. She was made whole, and was able to go through labors that a short time before seemed impossible to her.

The faith by which she had risen from the borders of the grave now took complete possession of her. Looking to God for guidance, and trusting wholly to Him, she commenced evangelistic work in the churches, especially endeavoring to lead young people to a life of faith, the joy and happiness of which she was experiencing. In all her work, which was carried on for seven years, she placed her sole dependence on God for her temporal needs, and they were fully supplied. It sometimes happened that in a strange town and penniless her circumstances for the moment seemed to have reached a crisis, but invariably before the time when the train started, by which she was to travel, sufficient funds were supplied to her, and that without seeking human aid. Once, when by excessive work rest and change were needed, she was able to go to Europe for a time, and to engage there in Christian work.

The desire for employment in heathen lands, particularly in India, revived with her renewed physical powers, and when she was thirty years of age an opportunity occurred for the realization of her long-cherished wish. Money was provided for her passage in answer to prayer, and she was guided to a part of India previously neglected. There she had the privilege of preaching to many who had never before heard of Christ. During her work in India she met Rev. W. B. Osborn, the Presiding Elder of the Bombay and Madras District of the South India Conference, familiarly known as Bishop "William Taylor's work." She and Mr. Osborn were much drawn to each other, and finally were married.

The first year of their married life was spent in Christian labor among the natives and the English-speaking peoples, after which, trusting in God for the means of travel and their daily bread, they went to Australia, where for some time they engaged in evangelistic work with remarkable success. Thence, in 1882, the money for the passage being sent in answer to prayer, they sailed for California, where Mr. Osborn organized the Ocean Grove and Ocean Park of the Pacific coast. Several months were afterward spent in evangelistic work in Oregon and Washington Territory, at the conclusion of which they travelled east, settling finally at Niagara Falls, Ontario, Canada, where they are now living. Mr. Osborn has inaugurated there the Wesley Park International Camp Ground, which promises to become a popular place of resort for religious assemblies.

The enterprise in which Mr. and Mrs. Osborn are now engaged originated in the Union Missionary Conference held at Niagara last summer, at which seventy returned missionaries of various nationalities were present. The project of founding a Missionary Institute with a Library and Museum attached was discussed and some donations were made. Mrs. Osborn took a deep interest in the scheme, and in order that no time might be lost in making a beginning, she received into her house for training several young people who had given evidence of having been called of God to labor in the foreign mission field. There they receive instruction in science from helpers in the work, in biblical knowledge, and in the language of the country to which they intend going. They do the work of the house, are taught to cut and make their own clothing, and help in Christian work.

Mrs. W. B. Osborn, of Niagara Falls, Canada.

The house is now full, and Mrs. Osborn is in correspondence with some thirty young people anxious to enter the field of missionary labor, for whom there is no room. Encouraged by past experience, and profoundly conscious that nothing is too hard for the Lord, Mrs. Osborn is contemplating the purchase of a property adjoining Wesley Park, well adapted for the purpose of a Training Institute. It comprises a large building and fifty acres of land, and is offered for twenty-five thousand dollars. It is proposed to divide one half the ground into lots and offer them for sale at two hundred dollars each. If twenty-five acres of land could so be sold, the proceeds would suffice to purchase the entire estate. Of the actual value of the lots in the market we know absolutely nothing, but should any of our readers be disposed to invest money in a purchase they may obtain particulars by writing to Mrs. Osborn, Niagara Falls, Ontario, Canada.

THE WAY OUT.

Reconciliation.

THUS the interview from which both our young friends had hoped so much had ended in mutual disappointment. Neither of them had succeeded in the object contemplated. It was as evident that Leroy had not been drawn from his attitude of antagonism to religion, as it was that Carrie West had not been convinced that she was inconsistent or prejudiced. The only result achieved was to prove that both had the power of delivering hard blows, and also that both could suffer from them.

Leroy entered his room with glowing face and flashing eyes, flung his hat across the room, and sitting down in his chair, pushed his books impatiently aside, and resting his elbows on the table, and his chin in his hands glared absently out of the window.

"Say, Mr. Dynamite," said Burt, "are you going to explode? You look dangerous."

"Don't chaff, Burt; I'm not in the mood for it."

"Oh, I won't chaff; only express your preferences, and I'm yours to command in any way! I am scared. I would not provoke you for the world. I'm quite inoffensive, but if you wish it, I will vanish."

"Don't be absurd, Burt. I have been unspeakably annoyed—insulted, in fact, and I feel mad."

"Yes, an idiot would perceive that. I don't object to your feeling mad, only don't mistake the proper object. I am not ready to depart this mortal life at present. It has its trials and vexations, but I would like to bear them a little longer. It would distress me very much if you took a fancy to ease your perturbed mind by cutting short my promising career. Let me carry a challenge to the man who has insulted you. Pistols and coffee, you know, like the German students do."

"Pshaw, Burt, don't be silly. It is not a man at all who has insulted me."

"Oh, you have been quarrelling with a woman, have you? That is bad. You were sure to get the worst of it. I understand your black looks. Still there is no need to despair while you have an ingenious friend like me to counsel you. Now, if I were you I would just go to that Miss Lost Atlantis of yours, tell her your wrongs, and set her on your assailant. I think she would champion your cause, and you could metaphorically sit on the fence and enjoy the spectacle of the battle."

"Burt, if you will stop your nonsense and listen to me I'll tell you all about it. It is Miss West herself who has wounded me."

Burt burst into a loud laugh. "Oh," he said, "this is tragic; it is romantic. Love's retribution. Go on, I am all attention."

"Well, Miss West and I had an argument about the preachers to-day, and as she seems to me to have been deluded by them and to entertain altogether too exalted an opinion of them, I showed her how prejudiced they are, and how ineffectively they go about their work. Well, sir, she fired up, and in so many words told me I was ignorant, and hinted that I did not understand what I was talking about."

"And you?"

"Oh, I—well, I suppose I lost my temper! At least I made her understand that I felt insulted, and we parted on unfriendly terms. But I was right to be indignant; don't you think so?"

"Well, that may be. You were not wise, though, if you were right. You have not learned the lessons taught by history and experience. All authorities will tell you that in the many difficulties which have occurred through the six thousand years during which men and women have been together more or less peaceably on the earth, a man never succeeds in an encounter with a woman in any way but one. He must never be provoked by anything she may say or do. They are observant creatures, are women, and they watch you closely. They lay on the rod in different ways and places, and if they see you wince they never forget how they made you do it, and where the vulnerable place in your armor is. It gives them a sense of power; they know they can punish you at any time. So if you are going to see much of Miss West you have begun badly. Besides, it was foolish to let her see the extent of your vanity. If you had taken up the cudgels for a friend it would not have been so bad; but to resent an imputation of ignorance was silly. You are not a Solon, you know."

"Then you think I was in the wrong?" Ransom asked, gloomily.

"Oh, wrong and right are not concerned in this affair! You were not wise, that is all."

"What would you do now?"

"That depends on the course you mean to take in the future. Now that you have seen the error of your ways, you will probably wish to return to your studies and forswear ladies' society in future. In that case you need do nothing. The acquaintance simply dies a natural death. If, on the other hand, you wish to be reconciled, you cannot do a better thing than go right away and ask her pardon."

"Ask pardon for being insulted!"

"Oh, yes; that is only one of the humiliations a man must expect when he becomes a lover. You need not ask it on your knees, you know. Just say that you had the toothache or rheumatism or something painful, and think you may have said something impolite. Tell her you know you are ignorant, but you hope she or one of her ministerial friends will teach you."

"Never," said Ransom. "I will tell her no such thing, and I do not care if I never speak to her again."

But he did care very much in his heart, and when, next morning, much of his irritation had cooled down, he found that he cared more than he was aware of. A reconciliation was absolutely necessary to his peace of mind. Going over the ground again, he could not help admitting that Carrie was right in a certain sense. He was ignorant, and should not have been so angry at being reminded of a fact that was true. In this very geological discussion, had he not been obliged to get his facts from the books? Not one had he discovered himself! Of the vast mines of knowledge, how little had he explored! How superficial was all his knowledge which, parrot-like, he had repeated! Yes, Carrie was right, though he was sorry that she had been ungentle in reminding him of his ignorance.

"Well," he said to himself, "I must ask pardon. That is only right. It is due to her that I should admit that I was wrong to resent her remark. I behaved badly in being so surly, and she has the right that belongs most righteously to every human being of insisting that the person who has misbehaved shall confess his fault and ask pardon before being forgiven."

That day a letter, more humble than any Leroy had ever penned, went by mail to Miss West, expressing his regret that he had failed in courtesy to her at their interview, and also his shame at discovering that, unconsciously, his vanity had grown to such inordinate proportions that it had been so easily wounded. It was a manly apology, creditable to the writer, and proving that he possessed the spirit of a gentleman. It had its effect, too. Carrie replied in a brief note, admitting that she had given provocation by her bluntness of speech, and fully accepting his apology. Both felt that the incident had drawn them nearer to each other and increased their mutual respect.

It must not be supposed, however, that Leroy in apologizing had surrendered his position of hostility to religion and its professors. A very short time afterward an incident occurred which proved that his antipathy had not been overcome. Meetings were being held in the church over which Mr. Delaware was pastor. Miss West took a deep interest in the meetings, and attended them regularly. Wherever Carrie went Ransom was attracted by the magnetism of her presence, and so it happened that he had an opportunity of observing the impressive phenomena of a real revival. One night he and Carrie were sitting together in the church. Mr. Delaware preached with more than his usual earnestness. He appealed to the love, consciences, and fears of his auditors. Leroy scowled and sneered, and particularly was he irritated when the preacher exclaimed: "Will you sink your souls to perdition?" Leroy muttered: "Wretch! does he want to scare us into his religion?" Carrie glanced at him with a troubled eye.

When the exhortation was ended, and the audience arose to sing, a number went weeping to the altar; and the members of the church gathered around them, while the earnest voice of the preacher was heard above the song, "Flee from the wrath to come! Why will ye die?"

During the services at the altar some of the active members of the church sought out their friends in the audience and pleaded with them to "come on the Lord's side." One well-meaning old lady stopped before Leroy, but his frown was so forbidding that she passed on. What reason had he for being so bearish? He pretended to pity them as poor, deluded creatures; then why be angry at them?

As the services proceeded a man was busily engaged in trying to persuade a young woman to go forward. His face was bent close to hers, and he seemed to be pleading eagerly with her. Leroy watched him with disgust and anger on his face. Now and then he almost hissed between his set teeth. He was thoroughly aroused at the scene. "Wretch! fool!" he muttered so loud that Carrie heard it and looked up. Her enjoyment of the services was all destroyed. On their way home she said:

"What was wrong with you this evening, Mr. Ransom? You seemed very angry."

"Carrie, I couldn't help it," he said. "Did you see that scoundrel talking to that girl with his face nearly against hers, and that before all the people? That man is a hypocrite, a deceitful, despicable wretch. There's no religion or principle in him. I could have choked him."

"Why? Because he was talking to that young woman? Perhaps she was a near relative or particular friend."

"Not a bit of it," he hotly returned. "I have been watching him, and I have not seen him talk to a man yet! He always talks to some woman—some young woman. He's a scawlag, I say."

"Well, you may be right," she returned, "and I'm sorry if it is true. Such people are great stumbling-blocks, I confess."

"And yet they are allowed to occupy prominent positions in the church! Why don't they kick them out, like any other nuisance?"

"The church can't always do as she would like, and the reasons may be various. But I don't justify such people, or the church in tolerating them."

"And is that all the good religion does?"

"Mr. Ransom, do people often counterfeit lead or pewter?"

"No."

"What then?"

"Gold or bank-notes, my Socratic questioner."

"And why?"

"Because they are valuable, Miss Socrates."

"That is just why people counterfeit religion."

"Well, you beat all the preachers," he said, admiringly. "You must be thinking of these things all the time."

"You have sharpened me," she laughed.

"Then, if your views are right, an infidel is of a little use after all?"

"Very little indeed to himself or society."

There was silence for a few minutes, and then Leroy said with some sadness: "Why is it, Carrie, that your God has not made these things plain, so that we would not be compelled to be in doubt at all if they are true, especially since you say they are of such importance? Why, it ought not to be possible to doubt or misunderstand such matters, if they are true."

"I do not know," she answered; "but let me ask you a question. I see you have acquired some knowledge of geology. Did you acquire it easily or by diligent effort?"

"Some more of your originality, Miss Socrates; but the cases are different. My salvation does not depend upon a knowledge of geology, but you tell me my eternal welfare depends on whether I accept the Bible or not. You see there is a great difference."

"Yes, I acknowledge that there is; but however it may be with you, I think that some sceptics give less time and effort to be right in this matter of paramount importance than they do to be right on scientific questions, in which a mistake is not so fatal. I have often wondered myself why there is the possibility of mistake, and why perfectly honest men, sitting down to read the Bible, should come to opposite conclusions—but it is so. There is much in God's way that we cannot understand; but we shall know more hereafter. It is not to be expected that finite man can fully understand the infinite God. But I will tell you how the way to see these matters may be made plain, however dark they may seem now; by trying the way the Scriptures point out."

"And what is that?" he inquired.

"Ask, and ye shall receive; 'If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him.'"

"Which sounds to me like cant," said Leroy; "very pious, but not practical. Your prescription lacks the support of experience. Just think how many prayers have been made for centuries past, and how many are still being made for the conversion of the world, and yet the greater portion is still pagan. That don't look much as if your God answered prayer. But tell me why your God does not take better care of His people. You have read the history of Christianity. It is a bad picture—quarrels, errors, superstitions, wars, carnage, inquisitions, and St. Bartholomew's Days. If the church is a mere human institution, I do not wonder at this history; but if the church is God's special protégé, why don't He take better care of it?"

"I admit the force of your doubts, and cannot explain the difficulties satisfactorily on the ground of reason. But the God of nature is the same; He permits earthquakes, tornadoes, floods, famine, and pestilence."

"Miss Carrie, have I ever justified the course of Nature? Have I ever said her rule was just? If there is a God, He is unjust in allowing all these evils; but if everything is only Nature's evolution, then we cannot call her course unjust, because she is not responsible."

"Mr. Ransom, has it come to this—you doubt the existence of God?" she asked, anxiously.

He was silent awhile. He had gradually come to this conclusion. At last he said: "Would not that view be the most rational way of accounting for the existence of evil, and free us from this eternal endeavor to reconcile the goodness of God with the facts of sin and suffering?"

"No; for then we would have no logical reason for the evils of the world; but if we take the Christian view, we can at least suppose that God, for some wise purpose, permits these things, and if we do our part, they will all be explained by and by. You, however, cannot hope for an explanation according to your views. But do you see the tendency of your scepticism? Be careful it does not ruin you. I believe it can be proved to be invariably demoralizing. I remember some time ago reading a very exhaustive statement by an eminent theologian, which convinced me of the fact. It is in a book in our reference library which you can examine for yourself. The author shows that all scepticism leads finally and logically to naturalism, and shows what has been its awful effect on the moral condition of Germany. It has, as you know, the same tendency in our country, generally and individually. Mere Deism always has a short reign. What would be the moral status of the world if all men turned materialists? But that is not all. The same theologian proves that it has another pernicious effect. You know some years ago optimism was the popular creed among certain classes of sceptics; but it is not so now, and that fact shows what is the awful tendency of unbelief. They do not say anything now, especially in Germany, about 'the best world;' they have given that up, and have sunk into pessimism; the world is a 'mishap;' the world is worse than none; this is 'the worst world.' What a despondency they have fallen into, and what a hopeless world this would be if such views were universal! Why do we not hear such howls of despair from the lips of good Christians as we do from these men? I hope you never will fall into such a pernicious belief. It would destroy all your usefulness and happiness."

"I must believe what seems to me to be true," he said, "whatever the consequence may be. The man would be a fool and a coward who hugged a lie to his breast for the sake of the comfort it gave him. If your creed is true I will accept it all the more gladly for the happiness and usefulness it may bring; but if it is not true, the happiness and usefulness will not bribe me to accept it. But I am in no danger of falling into pessimism. This world is too happy a place for me. My life is too bright."

"Ah! wait," she said, slowly, "until you meet some great sorrow."

JESUS BETRAYED.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 3, John 18 : 1-14. Golden Text, Mark 14 : 41.

Jesus Undisturbed by the Presence of Judas—Satan's Place—Jesus Always Accessible—Satan Energized by the Presence of the Godly—The Irresistible Power of a Holy Life—Involuntary Homage of the Soldiers—Jesus Bound—Forsaken by All—His Answer to the High-Priest.

"THE Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners." Not only given up by God to die for man, but betrayed by man, for whom He died! Jesus knew "all things that should come upon Him"—knew from the beginning who should betray Him; yet He could go on with His teaching, and with the manifestation of His Father, in the constant presence of this man who He knew was a devil, and the son of perdition (John 6 : 71 ; 17 : 12)! Nothing seems so impossible as to hold on in faith and love just when we are conscious of the presence of the devil in a meeting, in a household, or in a person. Yet it is just when we are most conscious of the power of the enemy that faith may be in most lively exercise. Thank God, He is stronger than Satan. We cannot too often strengthen ourselves with the fact that Christ has destroyed him that had the power of death, even the devil (Heb. 2 : 14), and that he is a conquered foe; not under our feet, but

UNDER JESUS' FEET.

It was just after His last intercessory prayer for His disciples (John 17) that Jesus was betrayed. Straight from the most glorious communion with His Father, His heaven upon earth, Jesus went out to meet the devil in the person of His own disciple. What a contrast! "He went forth with His disciples over the brook Cedron, where was a garden, into which He entered, and His disciples. And Judas also, which betrayed Him, knew the place." What then! had Jesus no place shut out from even the traitors among His disciples? No; the door into His presence and into all His grace stands open for all, even the most depraved. Any one can get at Jesus. He knows no barred doors; all His life, all His Word, all His heart, says "Come;" come, sinner, come, backslider, come, traitor Judas, back to Me!

Judas had laid his plans deep; the chief priests and Pharisees were glad enough to make common cause with Judas against his Lord; such an accession to their ranks, one of the very twelve, the bodyguard of Jesus, was the summit of their wishes. Yes; it needed this in order that they should succeed. Beloved in the Lord, in order that the machinations of Satan should succeed, it seems necessary that some child of God should subscribe to them. It was when the sons of God began to fail in the days of Noah, by their guilty marriages with the daughters of men, that God gave Satan rein, and the flood was brought upon the world of the ungodly. It was when a child of God had settled in the city of which the men were "wicked and sinners before the Lord exceedingly" (Gen. 13 : 13), that Sodom was doomed to be destroyed by fire, and the great enemy, the destroyer, had it his own way. It seems as though it were defection among God's children which set Satan free to act. It is a fearful thing when God's children are in league with the enemies of Jesus, when those who hate God count in the influence of God's children as on their side; the men of Sodom counted Lot as one of them, and when he spoke to his sons-in-law "he was as one that mocked," his words fell powerless. Abah counted in Jehoshaphat with him in his attack upon Ramoth-gilead; Jehoshaphat nearly lost his life, and met with the severe rebuke, "Shouldst thou help the ungodly, and love them which hate the Lord? therefore is wrath upon thee from before the Lord" (II Chron. 19 : 2). But all this was nothing to the defection of Judas, who had been called to be with Jesus, to preach, to heal, and to cast out devils in His name, and now was found plotting with his Master's enemies; and for what?

THIRTY PIECES OF SILVER!

Are there not among the disciples of Jesus more than a few who are in business found among the ranks of the enemies of Jesus, playing into their hands by acting unrighteously? Many things which are done "in the way of trade" or "in the way of business" cannot bear the light. "Everybody does the same" is the business man's plea; and with the respectable name of "business" attached, converted men, who wish to be considered disciples of Jesus, can cheat and lie! Others who know not God are encouraged by it, and these members of churches "strengthen also the hands of evil doers, so that none doth return from his wickedness" (Jer. 23 : 14). What is this but the sin of Judas—his making common cause with those who are enemies of Jesus? What the world wants now is not teaching, but life and power, the life of Jesus and the power of God lived out among His people. It has been abundantly proved how men can honor God with their life while their heart is far from Him; how there can be a form of godliness without the power thereof; but it has never yet been proved that men could stand against a holy life, power, and Spirit like that in Stephen, manifested in words which were irresistible and a face which was like an angel; this, though it may bring its possessor to martyrdom, is a seed of power in the church.

Judas and his company came "with lanterns, torches, and weapons." They might have spared themselves the trouble, Jesus was not so difficult to find; the Light of the world needed neither lanterns nor torches to show where He was; all the light man has must be put out in order to see Him. And weapons! Had Jesus ever lifted up His hand except to bless? It was a needless insult. "Have ye come out, as against a thief, with swords and with staves for to take Me? I was daily with you in the temple teaching, and ye took Me not" (Mark 14 : 48, 49)? There they were, men face to face with their Maker, seeking to apprehend Him! Whom seek ye? He asks. "Jesus of Nazareth," was the reply. Two words were His only answer, but in those two words were the revelation of Jehovah, the self-existing God, and the coming One—I am. He did nothing, He only spoke, but with one irresistible impulse the whole band went backward and fell to the ground. Why did they not then acknowledge Him; why did not Judas own himself the traitor? He would have lost thirty pieces of silver! And this he could not afford; it would be a bad business transaction! The devil applied his restoratives to the prostrate gang and nerved them to their work, and Jesus repeated His question and His assurance, "I have told you that I AM; if therefore ye seek Me, let these go their way." And they went; "they all forsook Him and fled" (Mark 14 : 50). But Peter, with his usual impetuosity, rushed forward in defence of his Master, and smote the high-priest's servant, and cut off his right ear. Yet Peter forsook Jesus, and soon after denied Him. Would not this act of Peter's belie the teaching of the Lord, "I say unto you, That ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also" (Matt. 5 : 39). Oh, is it not wondrous love that Jesus, just now, just at this very time, should take upon Him to remedy Peter's mistake. "Suffer ye thus far," said He. "And He touched his ear, and healed him" (Luke 22 : 51), and then to Peter, "Put up thy sword into the sheath; the cup which My Father hath given Me, shall I not drink it?" Then they

BOUND JESUS.

Dangerous men are bound, those who are not safe to be at large; thieves, murderers, seditionists, and libertines ought to be chief among the number. But Jesus was none of these!

WHAT HAD HE DONE?

He went about doing good and healing all them that were oppressed of the devil, for God was with Him. This was all, and for the sin of doing good Jesus must die. His life and teaching interfered with the influence of the chief priests and Pharisees, the real thing showed up the unreal, it seemed as though Satan was to triumph in the death of Jesus.

Peter, although, in common with the other disciples, he had forsaken Jesus and fled, yet could not go very far away, and one other disciple—the nameless one of this Gospel, the one who lay on His breast at supper, Peter's constant companion later—was also with him now, and they came, irresistibly drawn to the place where the great High-Priest, who now liveth to make intercession for us, stood at the bar of an earthly high-priest for judgment. John went in with Jesus; Peter stood without. A maid recognized him as a disciple, but Peter said, "I am not." There are times when it costs dear to acknowledge, "I belong to Jesus." There are those who count us fools, there are those who count us hypocrites, there are those whose deadliest hatred is aroused by the confession. None but himself knows how sore was the temptation to Peter just now. It was not simply that his own life might be in danger, but he beheld the Man whom He had seen ruling the waves and wind, casting out devils, raising the dead, as powerless against His enemies as any other man; could this indeed be the Messiah? Had He not said, "All things are delivered unto Me of My Father?" True, Jesus had told His disciples repeatedly that He must die, but they had never taken it in; a reigning Messiah was their expectation, and it was the downfall of every hope when Jesus was led away bound and stood at the bar like a common criminal. Oh, how often temptation has power over us because we have formed our own plans as to how God would act, and He worked in a way quite unlike what we had expected; we have though He was unfaithful to us!

The high-priest asked Jesus of His disciples and of His doctrine. What could He say of the disciples? Betrayed by one, denied by another,

FORSAKEN BY ALL,

He might have said, "They have failed Me to a man;" but He said nothing to man, and He did not withdraw what He had said to God, "I am glorified in them," for He saw beyond and above the present to His work perfected in them in the future. Precious, faithful Jesus! Of His doctrine He said, "I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, and in secret have I said nothing. Why askest thou Me? ask them which heard Me, what I have said unto them: behold, they know what I said." This was all. And one who had heard Him from the beginning of His ministry, Peter, was listening. He looked on when one officer struck Jesus, and his Master said, "If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil: but if well, why smitest thou Me?" But once having denied Jesus, sin had got possession, and until it was cast out Peter was not his own master. Again he was asked was he not one of Christ's disciples, and again he denied. A third time and a third time he denied, and then the cock crew. The prophecy of Jesus had come to pass, Peter had failed, disciples had failed, man had failed, but Jesus even betrayed, denied, condemned, never failed.

"UNTO THE END!"

"Having loved His own which were in the world, He loved them unto the end."—JOHN xiii., 1.

"Unto the end!" What strange, Sweet, wondrous love! how deep, how fond and true: For love that knows no change We seek, but seek in vain, the wide world through. Unto the end He loved The frail, weak, timid ones He called "His own," Nor ever heard unmoved Their cry for help in sorrow's plaintive tone.

"Unto the end!" All, all Who are His own are known to Him by name; No tear of theirs can fall But Jesus knows the source from whence it came. Unto the end, though Faithless and wayward we may be, With calm and ceaseless flow The tide of love divine flows strong and free!

"Unto the end!" Though wide And high along our way dark barriers frown, This truth will still abide To comfort and sustain, "We are His own" Unto the end, His own! Not death itself from Him our souls can part; His hand has overthrown All that divides us from his home and heart.

"Unto the end!" With arms Outstretched, He waits to clasp us to His breast; Where, safe from all alarms, He offers us our shelter and our rest. "Unto the end!" to live, And know that we are His, and only His! The joys that earth can give, Its sweets and its best yield no such bliss.

"Unto the end!" Thine own? O dear and blessed Master! Can it be That, never more alone, Our weary hearts may dwell in peace with Thee, Knowing that to the end Thou wilt be with us, walking by our side, Our Guardian, Guide and Friend, Until in heaven we shall with Thee abide!

Copyright. The expiration of copyright enables me now to present this great work to American readers at a popular price, yet in form worthy of the author, and worthy of the finest library. Its mechanical qualities are fairly equal to those of my best edition of "Guizot's History of France."

Whipple, the noted essayist and critic, says: "A history possessing the unity, variety, and interest of a magnificent poem. It deals with a series of facts and exhibits a gallery of characters, which to have invented would place its creator by the side of Homer; and which to realize and represent in the mode Mr. Prescott has done, required a rare degree of historical imagination."

Beyond ALL PRAISE. "This announcement is all that is needed. The work itself long ago passed beyond all praise. The thousands of people who were unable to secure it at former prices will be glad to avail themselves of the opportunity of doing so at a reduced rate."—Interior, Chicago, Ill.

"The work itself occupies too high a place among historical writings to need commendation."—The Mail, Toronto, Ontario.

Timely. "The enterprising Mr. Alden has chosen a most timely occasion for the reissue of this valuable work, and its excellent and convenient library form,

"Prescott had the genius to invest the dry facts of history with the charms of fiction; and yet he never sacrifices truth to the graces of style."—WESTLAKE.

THE venerable preacher and writer whose portrait appears on the first page, is doubtless known by reputation to many of our readers. He has labored earnestly during his long life to propagate the doctrines in which he so firmly believes, and to lead young people especially, to a realization of the fulness of blessing which God is ready to pour out on the faithful, believing heart. Dr. Mahan is now nearly eighty-seven years of age, having been born on November 9th, 1799. No record of his life would be so clear and effective as his own modest narrative, and, therefore, the bulk of this sketch is given in his own words. Dr. Mahan says:

"It was at the age of seventeen years and two or three months that I was born of God.

MY EDUCATION

from my childhood up was, especially in a doctrinal sense, a religious one. Always a regular attendant upon public worship on the Sabbath, as soon as I was able to read the first treatises put into my hands were the Assembly's Longer and Shorter Catechisms. The latter I was required to commit to memory, and to repeat to my mother from Sabbath to Sabbath, during the years of childhood.

"I had an inconceivable dread and horror of death. Wherever I was, the thought of dying and being buried was seldom absent from my mind. Often, when alone, I would cry aloud for horror at the thought of death, the coffin, and the grave. Between my ninth and thirteenth years three events occurred, in each of which I as by a miracle. In the first instance, when wholly unable to swim, and with no one present able to help me, I found myself, by a momentary accident, in water far over my head. By singular presence of mind, I moved under the water toward the shore, until, in a most exhausted state, my head rose above the surface, and I was safe. Had I moved in any direction but the one I did, death would have been inevitable (see Illustration No. 1).

"The other two escapes, which were as remarkable and providential as that, I need not detail. These events brought eternity as never before, to my apprehension. How often would I start back at the thought which would suddenly come over me that I had three times hung as by a thread over the bottomless pit, and that, had I lost my life on either occasion, eternal damnation would have been my portion! An event which made a very deep and lasting impression on my mind occurred when I was about fourteen years of age. It was the sickness and who was very dear to me. I was one of four lads who were selected to bear that silent body, so tenderly dear to us all, into the graveyard (see Illustration No. 2). With what impressive interest did the question often come home to my mind, 'Where has the spirit gone? And what if mine, instead of his, had been called for?'

"The month in which I became seventeen years of age I received the

the winter school in an adjacent town, my school-house being just four miles from my father's residence. The district was composed almost entirely of Christian families who had emigrated from the Eastern States, and nearly all of whom belonged to the same denomination as my parents. Thoughts of an eternal future began to drop one after another into my mind; and that with a force and impressiveness never before experienced. As a consequence my Bible was read with greater frequency and interest than formerly. One cause of the unusual impressions to which I was subject at this time was, as I afterward learned, what was passing between the spirit of my mother and God at my home. Immediately on my leaving, the question of my eternal interests seemed to occupy all her thoughts. Whenever she approached the throne of grace, this was the great object of her petitions, the almost insupportable burden of her prayers. I was her only son, and, with the exception of a younger sister, her only child then living. What an unspeakable blessing is

A PRAYING MOTHER!

"In a solemn state of mind I bowed the knee before God and confessed that I had no right to ask or expect any favor at His hands, and that my whole eternity hung upon His mere grace and mercy. I had no sooner pronounced these words than I was consciously encircled in the 'everlasting arms.' I was so overshadowed with a sense of the manifested love of a forgiving God and Saviour that my whole being seemed to be pervaded with an ineffable quietude and assurance. I arose from my knees without a doubt that I was an adopted member of the family of God. With 'the peace of God, which passeth all understanding,' I could look upward, and, without a cloud between my soul and the face of God, could exclaim: 'My Father and my God!'

ONE DECISIVE 'TRIAL OF FAITH'

I had in my early Christian life. The occasion was the day of the State and town elections, which occurred in early spring. That was the great gala day of the year, ordinary labor being wholly suspended, and the mass of the youth of my own age, and younger lads, always meeting at the place where the elections were held; that place being in the immediate vicinity of my father's residence, and directly under my eye wherever I moved. When I saw my former associates engaged in their sports, in which I had ever before so intensely delighted and excelled, it seemed as if the concentrated powers of 'the world, the flesh, and the devil,' in their accumulated strength, were brought to bear upon my young and susceptible mind, to induce me to join that company, and in doing so to make a final choice of the worldly instead of the religious life. As soon as I was at liberty to leave home, having the day free to myself, I took my Bible and went into the forest far out of sight and hearing of the causes of my temptation. There I spent the day in reading the sacred Word, in meditation, and prayer (see Illustration No. 3). The result of thus seeking 'grace to help in time of need' was not only deliverance from the temptation which then beset me, but a life-deadness to sinful pleasures in all their forms. From that time to the present I have not felt the least drawing toward any form of amusement not conscientiously regarded as compatible with the Christian life in its divinest forms.

"Soon after this I spent several days in the place where I was converted, going there to witness the public examination of the converts, and their reception into the church on the Sabbath. While there, a friend questioned me about my plans for the future. On my telling him that I had no definite plan in mind, he replied that the ministry was the sphere to which I was manifestly called, and that I should at once set about a preparation for it. My response was, that such a sphere appeared to me so high and sacred that it did not seem that I could ever be deemed worthy of it. In the course of the conversation, however, I was fully convinced that my venerable adviser was right. From that hour I set my face with singleness of purpose toward this high calling. In the mean time I set about my first year in college, I had taught four winter schools, all but one of which were occasions of powerful revivals of religion. Some six or eight months of one year, during my preparatory course, I spent in a society where, under a regular ministry, there had been no revival for many years. At midsummer I proposed to four or five young men, Christians like myself, that we should meet in a private room one evening each week for prayer and religious conversation. All the meetings were strictly private, and intended to be such. Individuals outside, however, soon heard that God was with us, and sought admission to our circle.

"Soon the place became too crowded, and we were necessitated to adjourn to the large school-house in the village. Not more than two or three months had passed, before the pastor came in and found a crowded audience there. He then told us with tears how that, for nearly twenty years past, himself and the members of his church had been mourning over the want of revival influence in the community, and how his heart was now rejoiced at the prospect of a great ingathering of souls. The work thus commenced continued during the winter, and the result was

A GREAT AND GENERAL REVIVAL."

At the conclusion of a prolonged preparatory ministerial course of study Mr. Mahan was appointed pastor over "a flock of God," in Cincinnati, O., in which office he showed much devotedness and realized a large measure of success. "In conformity to a life-principle," says Dr. Mahan, "I had determined to put forth my best possible efforts in any field where, for any period, my lot might be cast, and had commenced work in the city of Rochester, N. Y., with the expectation of organizing a new church there. Just as the organization was being effected, I was suddenly stricken down by an attack of inflammatory rheumatism in both knees and ankles and my left wrist. In this state, with my flesh wasted to an almost skeleton condition, I was conveyed to my father's residence where my youth had been spent. I found the church and congregation there in a perfectly dilapidated condition. The dissolution of the church and society, and the disposal of their house of worship were talked of. Emaciated and almost helpless as I was, I raised the question, 'What can I do to repair these desolations?' I proposed that the people should convey me in a chair, at the time of the Sabbath services, to their house of worship, which was near my father's residence, and there listen to me, while, thus seated (see Illustration No. 4), I should speak to them, as I was able, the 'words of this life.'

"For about three months I thus continued to serve them; and when I was able to commence labors as pastor-elect of the Congregational Church in Pittsford, near Rochester, I left Orangeville, the place above referred to, with a new and faithful pastor-elect upon the ground, and, what was of infinitely more importance, with a gracious revival of religion in actual progress, a revival which resulted in gathering into that church almost the entire society. For the amount of the population, that was one of the most powerful revivals known in the United States. Among the converts was my aged father."

Dr. Mahan took a decided stand privately and publicly in the political discussions which agitated the nation some years before the war. It needed some courage to meet the odium his attitude brought upon him. He suffered much from the world and his Christian brethren, and even his family did not escape. On one occasion he records that his two children were pelted in the street (see Illustration No. 5) because of their father's unpopularity.

Thirty years of Dr. Mahan's life have been spent as

first of Oberlin Institution, where he remained fifteen years, and where his personal advocacy of the doctrines of what is now designated as the Higher Life had a marked effect upon the students. Dr. Mahan writes:

"It was in conformity to this ideal that we aimed to educate our pupils of all classes; and the manual labor which then almost universally obtained in Oberlin, was of a class most favorable to insure the end we aimed at. As a consequence, our brightest young ladies, and those who afterward attained to the highest spheres of influence and usefulness, did most to sustain themselves, while acquiring their education, by taking in washing, and doing service as house servants in families. By laboring with all willingness and fidelity at any kind of work which came to their hands, teaching school, by agencies, and labors in the churches, during our long winter vacations, our young men worked their way through a nine years' course of preparatory liberal and theological education. Having occasion myself to employ, during our terms of study, numbers of these young men, I was accustomed to join them, and especially when any 'dirty work' was to be done. No apology was ever made. Its necessity made

EVERY FORM OF LABOR HONORABLE.

"It was this one feature of the institution, together with its religious influence, that saved it from being utterly wrecked during the crisis through which it passed a few years after my presidency commenced. In consequence of a great fire in New York City, our entire endowment fund was swept away. The occurrence which saved the college from a total wreck, and insured for it a permanent existence, was this. At this time William Dawes, Esq., living at Hudson, O., spent a Sabbath with us. As he approached the place, he passed a company of men at work on the highway, making necessary repairs—a company consisting, as he learned on inquiry of students from the college, with their president in their midst, laboring as diligently and willingly as any of his pupils (see Illustration No. 6). 'This,' said the visitant, 'appears like primitive Christianity revived.' On the Sabbath, he saw with wonder and gratitude with what power the Spirit of God was working among believers and the unconverted. So deep was the impression made upon his mind that, before he left, he called upon our treasurer, and expressed the assurance that in a few days he would send us a reliable subscription, amounting to from two to three thousand dollars. Within the time specified, he did bring us such a subscription; the amount appended to his own name being, according to my clear recollection, one thousand dollars. The result of negotiations immediately entered upon was, that that man of God closed up his large and very prosperous business, removed his family to Oberlin, and devoted his time and talents, without a salary, to the college. The consequence was, that with God's blessing, the institution was sustained during that crisis; and in a few years every item of its great debt was paid off, and a prosperous life was insured to it."

Fifteen years of his life Dr. Mahan was President of Adrian College. Latterly he has resided in England where he now is honored by a large circle of friends. We may add that Dr. Mahan's writings on "The Baptism of the Holy Ghost," "Christian Perfection," "Out of Darkness into Light; or, the Hidden Life made Manifest," "The Critical History of Philosophy," have had a large circulation, and some Christian students have received help from them.

The Exploration of Africa has been Advanced another stage by Herr Fischer, the German traveller, who reports that he has reached Wanga, north of Pangam, with the remnant of his expedition, after a journey of extreme hardship, lasting thirty-two days. The members of the expedition suffered severely from hunger. Of the two hundred and thirty natives who accompanied the party, fifty-seven died from disease and starvation or from wounds received in battle. Herr Fischer has secured a valuable botanical and ornithological collection. He will proceed to Zanzibar from Wanga.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Hard Work and Bad Wages.—A Gentleman speaking at Grover Street Hall recently said: "I was visiting a few days ago in a court in one of the back streets in this city, and there I saw an old woman who was confined to bed through rheumatic fever. When I went up to her to speak to and try to comfort her, she said, 'Oh, you need not pity me; I am just getting the result of my own doings. For many years I served the Devil faithfully, and now I am getting my wages.' On one stormy wet night she had gone out, got drunk, lost her way, and been obliged to pass the night on the street in her wet clothes. Next day she was seized with rheumatism, which had kept her in bed ever since. 'As ye sow, so shall ye reap.'"

Put Off Too Long.—"I Remember Going to see a poor woman in one of the back streets in our town, and pressing her to accept Christ as her Saviour and to put her trust in Him; but she said, 'Not to-day; I'll think over it, and perhaps to-morrow I'll accept Christ, and give up my sinful ways.' I tried to show her that 'now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation,' and that she might never see to-morrow; but she would not be persuaded, and the last words I heard as I left that house were—'I'll think over it, and perhaps to-morrow.' About a month after that, going to the same close, I was met by a woman who said, 'We had an awful sudden death here lately. Old Mrs. Stafford fell down dead in her own house; it was a great shock to us.' It was the very woman who was going to think over Christ's invitation some day, and whom, I have reason to believe, a great eternity met still undecided."

A Runaway Daughter's Death.—Mr. Weaver observed: "A few years ago I knew a young woman who had a godly mother and sister. She had been well brought up, and was often pointed to the Saviour and prayed for by both mother and sister; but she got tired of the quiet ways at home, and started, as the prodigal did, to see life. She went to Macclesfield, and there entered upon a life of sin. But the ways of sin are hard, and fast life means fast death. In the midst of her sin illness came upon her. Her brother discovered where she was, and coming to me, asked me to accompany him to visit her, as he heard she was dying. I went, and there, lying unconscious on the bare stones, was that young girl who, but a short time before, had left her mother's respectable home. But even in that short time, what a change! Sin had laid its debasing mark on her, and there she lay in her youth, stricken down by the hand of the master whom she served. When she regained consciousness I asked, 'Are you saved?' She answered, 'No!' and without speaking again she died."

A Minister's Singular Dream.—An Evangelist related that: "There was a minister, who after thinking over his sermon for a good time retired to his study to pray over it. While there, from some unaccountable cause, he fell asleep and had this dream. He thought that Satan and all his attendant devils were sitting in committee; and Satan said, 'Look here, there is a minister on earth who has a terrible sermon prepared, and if he preaches without something being done to counteract it I don't know how many souls will be saved. Who'll go and poison the minds of his congregation?' Then one jumped up and said, 'I'll go and tell them there is no God.' Satan scowled at him and said, 'Is that all you've got to say? Sit down. The people know there is a God.' Another said, 'I'll go and tell them that the Bible is not all true; that some of it certainly is, but not the whole of it.' Satan said, 'That's better, but it won't do; the people know the Bible is true.' Then a third rose and said, 'I know; let me go, and I'll tell the people that the Bible is all true, that there is a God, that they must come to Him some day, but that there is plenty of time;' and Satan laughed with fiendish glee and cried, 'Get you gone as quickly as you can;' and that devil flew to earth. Of all the excuses that Satan gives men for not coming to Christ, there is none so popular as 'there is time enough yet.' That is his favorite bait, and many a poor soul it has landed in hopeless perdition."

A Picture of Beauty.—Mr. Ewing Said: "Once when going to Italy I passed over the Alps through great mountain passes, and through wild gorges, seeing nothing of that Italy about which we have read so much. Where was the grandeur and beauty of which poets sung? Above us were the cold, bleak mountain tops, while on either side of us were narrow defiles and steep precipices. All looked barren and uninviting until coming to the top, when suddenly there burst upon our view a picture of ravishing beauty—the rich fertile fields stretching for miles, and just a glimmering of the blue sea in the distance; but had we stopped just about the top of the mountain, just almost there, should we have had that view to reward us? No; we should have lost all our former pains in coming so far, and have been just the same as if we had never started. So some people come almost to Christ through a most toilsome journey, giving up one thing, then another, coming through many difficulties, but never coming to Christ."

Seeking Water in the Desert.—Mr. William Stewart observed: "It is customary for those travelling in the Eastern deserts, when their supply of water is done, and the skins are all emptied, to send forth a messenger in search of a spring on a swift-trotting dromedary. When he is a mile from their encampment they send forth another, and a third, a mile behind him, then a fourth and so on, until the last messenger is but a mile from the camp. As soon as the foremost messenger discovers the much-wished-for water, he shouts to the man next to him, 'Water.' As soon as the welcome word borne on the clear Eastern air reaches him, he calls to the next man, and so on the word goes from man to man until it reaches the camp, when the whole company proceed whence the sound came. We can follow them in our imagination until they reach the spring, when each and all drink freely. Does not the imparting of the good news from one man to the other beautifully illustrate our Lord's words, when He says, 'Let him that heareth say, come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.'"

A Dying Infidel's Confession.—Mrs. Cole Observed: "In London there was an infidel who had among other friends one, a poor fisherman, who not only preached Christ to him by word, but by a holy and consistent life; but it did not affect him. He was as the fool who in his folly said there is no God. This infidel had also a good wife, and they had an only child. This child fell ill, and the father could only stand and watch her suffering. He could do nothing to help her; he could say nothing to comfort her; he could not pray for her, for he had always said there was no God; but he sent for a friend to pray for the recovery of his child. The friend came, but refused to pray, as the father did not believe in God. The father was in despair, and at length said, 'You pray to God for my child, and if He hears you, and she recovers, I shall live in future for Christ only.' Prayer was offered, but the Lord took the child, and the infidel parent continued to blaspheme the name of the Lord at every opportunity. But it pleased the Lord to lay him also on a bed of sickness. His wife sent for the Christian fisherman, and together they prayed at his bedside; but he refused to have anything to do with them or with Christ, saying he meant to die as he had lived. When, at last, he was unable to speak, they still prayed by him, and asked him just to hold up his hands in token that he prayed the Lord to have mercy on him; but he would not. In despair, his wife tried to force up his hands, but he would not allow her. Just as he was dying he recovered his voice, and shrieked out, 'I am lost! lost! lost forever!!!' and so he died. That was the death-bed of an infidel."

THE TERMINI OF TWO CITY ROADS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday Morning, Sept. 25, 1886.

"Ponder the path of thy feet."—PROV. 4: 26.

The Country Home—Two Boys Setting Out for the City—Good-Bye at the Front Door—Arrival in the City—Preparation—Edward's Employment—Home-sickness—New Friends—Taken to See the Sights—The Drain on Purse and Reputation—Futile Effort to Stop—Begins Gambling—Situation Lost—Sought by his Father—The Home of Nicholas—Good and Prosperous—A Church Official—Summoned by a Policeman—Edward Killed—The Funeral—The Tremendous Secret—Mills for Grinding up Men.

It was Monday, September 20, at a country depot. Two young men are to take the cars for the city. Father brought them in a wagon with two trunks. The evening before, at the old home, was rather a sad time. The neighbors had gathered in to say good-bye. Indeed, all the Sunday afternoon there had been a strolling that way from adjoining farms, for it was generally known that the two boys the next morning were to live; and the whole neighborhood was interested, some hoping they would do well, and others, without saying anything, hoping for them a city failure. Sitting on the fence talking over the matter, the neighbors would interlard their conversation about the wheat crop of last summer, and the apple crop yet to be gathered, with remarks about the city prospects of Edward and Nicholas, for those were the names of the two young men, Edward seventeen, and Nicholas nineteen; but Edward, although two years younger, being a little quicker to learn, knew as much as Nicholas.

Father and mother on Monday morning had both resolved to go to the depot with the boys, but the mother at the last moment backed out, and she said that somehow she felt quite weak that morning, and had no appetite for a day or two, and so concluded to stay.

GOOD-BYE AT THE FRONT DOOR

of the old place. Where she went and what she did after the wagon left, I leave other mothers to guess. The breakfast things stood almost till noon before they were cleared away. But little was said on the way to the railroad station. As the locomotive whistle was heard coming around the curve, the father put out his hand—somewhat knotted at the knuckles, and one of the joints stiffened years ago by a wound from a scythe—and said: "Good-bye, Edward; good-bye, Nicholas! Take good care of yourselves, and write as soon as you get there, and let us know how they treat you. Your mother will be anxious to hear."

they sought out, with considerable inquiry of policemen on street corners and questioning of car-drivers, the two commercial establishments to which they were destined, so far apart that thereafter they seldom saw each other, for it is astonishing how far apart two persons can be in a large city, especially if their habits are different. Practically a hundred miles from Bowling Green to Canal Street, or from Atlantic Avenue to Fulton.

Edward, being the youngest, we must look after him first. He never was in so large a store in all his life. Such interminable shelves, such skillful imitation of real men and women to display goods on, such agility of cash boys, such immense stock of goods, and a whole community of employees. His head is confused, as he seems dropped like a pebble in the great ocean of business life. "Have you seen that green-horn from the country?" whispers young man to young man. "He is in such and such a department. We will have to break him in some night." Edward stuck at his new place all day, so that any moment he could have cried aloud if his pride had not suppressed everything. Here and there a tear he carelessly dashed off as though it were from influenza or a cold in the head. But some of you know how a young man feels when set down in a city of strangers, thereafter to fight his own battles, and no one near by seeming to care whether he lives or dies.

But that evening, as the hour for closing has come, there are two or three young men who sidle up to Edward and ask him how he likes the city, and where he expects to go that night, and if he would like them to show him the sights. He thanks them, and says he shall have to take some evenings for unpacking and making arrangements, as he had just arrived, but says that after a while he will be glad to accept their company. After spending two or three evenings in his boarding-house room, walking up and down, looking at the bare wall, or an old chromo hung there at the time that religious newspapers by such prizes advanced their subscription lists, and after an hour toying with the match-box and ever and anon examining his watch to see if it is time to retire, and it seems that ten o'clock at night, or even nine o'clock, will never come, he resolves to accept the chaperoning of at the store. The following night they are all out together. Although his salary is not large, he is quite flush with pocket money, which the old folks gave him after saving by for sometime. He cannot be mean, and these friends are doing all this for his pleasure, and so he pays the bills. At the door of places of enchantment, his companions cannot find the change, and they accidentally fall behind just as the ticket office is approached, or they say they will make it all right, and will themselves pay the next time. Edward, accustomed to farm life or village life, is dazed and enchanted with the glitter of spectacular sin. Plain and blunt iniquity Edward would have immediately repulsed, but sin accompanied by bewitching orchestra, sin amid gilded pillars and gorgeous upholstery, sin arrayed in all the attractions that the powers of darkness in combination can arrange to magnetize a young man, is very different from sin in its loathsome and disgusting shape.

But after a few nights being late out, he says:

"I MUST STOP."

My purse won't stand this. My health won't stand this. My reputation won't stand this." Indeed, one of the business firm, one night from his private box, in which he applauded a play in which attitudes and phraseology occurred which if taken or uttered in his own parlor would have caused him to shoot or stab the actor on the spot—from this high-priced box sees in a cheaper place the new clerk of his store, and is led to ask questions about his habits, and wonders how, on the salary the house pays him, he can do as he does. Edward, to recover his physical vigor and his finances, stopped awhile, and spent a few more evenings examining the chromo on the wall, and counting the matches in the match-box.

"Confound it!" cried the young man, "I cannot stand this life any longer, and I must go out and see the world." The same young men, and others of a now larger acquaintance, are ready to escort him. There is never any lack of such guidance. If a man wants to go the whole round of sin, he can find plenty to take him, a whole regiment who knows the way. But after a while Edward's

MONEY IS ALL GONE.

He has received his salary again and again, but it was spent before he got it, borrowing a little here and a little there. What shall he do now? Why, he has seen in his rounds of the gambling table men who put down a dollar and took up ten, put down a hundred and took up a thousand. Why not he! To reconstruct his finances he takes a hand, and wins; is so pleased he takes another hand, and wins; is in a frenzy of delight, and takes another hand and loses all.

When he first came to the city Edward was disposed to keep Sunday in quietness, reading a little, and going occasionally to hear a sermon. Now, Sunday is a day of carousal. He is so full of intoxicants by 11 o'clock in the day, he staggers into one of the licensed rum-holes of the city.

Some morning, Edward, his breath stenchful with rum, takes his place in the store. He is not fit to be there. He is listless or silly or impertinent, or in some way incompetent, and a messenger comes to him and says, "The firm desire to see you

IN THE PRIVATE OFFICE.

The gentleman in the private office says:

"Edward, we will not need you any more. We owe you a little money for services since we paid you last, and here it is."

"What is the matter?" says the young man. "I cannot understand this. Have I done anything?"

The reply is: "We do not wish any words with you. Our engagement with each other is ended."

"Out of employment!" What does that mean to a good young man? It means opportunity to get another and perhaps a better place. It means opportunity for mental improvement and preparation for higher work. "Out of employment!" What does that mean to a dissipated young man? It means a lightning express train on a down grade on the Grand Trunk to Perdition.

It is now only five years since Edward came to town. He used to write home once a week at the longest. He has not written home for three months. "What can be the matter?" say the old people at home. One Saturday morning the father puts on the best apparel, of his wardrobe, and goes to the city to find out.

"Oh, he has not been here for a long while," say the gentlemen of the firm. "Your son, I am sorry to say, is on the wrong track."

The old father goes hunting him from place to place, and comes suddenly upon him, that night,

IN A PLACE OF ABANDONMENT.

The father says: "My son, come with me. Your mother has sent me to bring you home. I hear you are out of money and good clothes, and you know as long as we live you can have a home. Come right away," he says, putting his hand on the young man's shoulder.

In angry tone, Edward replies: "Take your hands off me! You mind your own business! I will do as I please! Take your hands off me, or I will strike you down! You go your way, and I will go mine!"

That Saturday night, or rather Sunday morning—for it was by this time two o'clock in the morning—the father goes to the city and rings the bell, and rings again and again, and it seems as if no answer would be given; but after a while a window is hoisted and a voice cries, "Who's there?"

"It is I," says the old man.

"Why, father, is that you?"

In a minute the door is opened and the son says, "What in the world has brought you to the city at this hour of the night?"

"Oh! Edward has brought me here. I feared your mother would go stark crazy, not hearing from him, and I find out that it is worse with him than I suspected."

"Yes," said Nicholas, "I had not the heart to write you any thing about it. I have tried my best with him, and all in vain. But it is after two o'clock," says Nicholas to his father, "and I will take you to a bed."

On a comfortable couch in that house the old father lies down coaxing sleep for a few hours, but no sleep comes. Whose house is it? That of his son, Nicholas. The fact is, that Nicholas, soon after coming to the city, became indispensable in the commercial establishment where he was placed. He knew, what few persons know, that while in all departments of business and mechanism and art, there is a surplus of people of ordinary application and ordinary diligence, there is a great scarcity, and always has been a great scarcity, of

PEOPLE WHO EXCEL.

Plenty of people to do things poorly or tolerably well, but very few clerks, or business men, or mechanics who can do splendidly well. Appreciating this, Nicholas had resolved to do so grandly that the business firm could not do without him. Always at his place a little after everybody had gone; as extremely polite to those who declined purchasing, as to those who made large purchases. He drank no wine, for he saw it was the empoisonment of multitudes; and when any one asked him to take something, he said "No" with the peculiar intonation that meant no. His conversation was always as pure as if his sisters had been listening.

He went to no place of amusement where he would be ashamed to die. He never betted or gambled, even at a church fair! When he was at the boarding-house, after he had got all the artistic development he could possibly receive from the chromo on the wall, he began to study that which would help him to promotion—study penmanship, study biographies of successful men; or went forth to places of innocent amusement and to Young Men's Christian Associations, and was not ashamed to be found at a church prayer-meeting. He rose from position to position and from one salary to another salary.

Only five years in town and yet he has rented his own house, or a suite of rooms, not very large, but a home large enough in its happiness to be a type of Heaven. In the morning, as the old father, with handkerchief in hand, comes crying down stairs to the table, there are four persons, one for each side: the young man, and opposite to him the best blessing that a God of infinite goodness can bestow, namely, a good wife; and on another side, the high chair filled with dimpled and rollicking glee, that makes the grandfather opposite smile outside, while he has a broken heart within.

Well, as I said, it was Sabbath, and Nicholas and his father, knowing that there is no place so appropriate for a troubled soul as the house of God, find their way to church. It is communion day, and what is the old man's surprise to see his son pass down the aisle with one of the silver chalices, showing him to be

A CHURCH OFFICIAL.

The fact was, that Nicholas from the start in city life honored God, and God had honored him. When the first wave of city temptation struck him, he had felt the need of divine guidance and divine protection, and in prayer had sought a regenerated heart, and had obtained that mightiest of all armor, that mightiest of all protection, that mightiest of all reinforcements, the multipotent and omnipotent grace of God, and you might as well throw a thistle down against Gibraltar, expecting to destroy it, as, with all the combined temptations of earth and hell, try to overthrow a young man who can truthfully say, "God is my refuge and strength."

But that Sabbath afternoon while in the back room, Nicholas and his father are talking over any attempt at the reclamation of Edward, there is a ringing of the door-bell and a man with the uniform of a policeman stands there, and a man with some embarrassment, and some halting, and in a round-about way says, that in a fight in some low haunt of the city

EDWARD HAD BEEN HURT.

He says to Nicholas: "I heard that he was some relation of yours.

"Hurt? Is he badly hurt?"

"Yes; very badly hurt."

"Is the wound mortal?"

"Yes; it is mortal. To tell you the whole truth, sir," says the policeman, "although I can hardly bear to tell you, he is dead."

"Dead!" cries Nicholas. And by this time the whole family are in the hallway. The father says: "Just as I feared. It will kill his mother when she hears of it. Oh, my son, my son! Would to God I had died for thee! Oh, my son, my son!"

"Wash off the wounds," says Nicholas, "and bring him right here to my house, and let there be all respect and gentleness shown him. It is the last we can do for him."

Oh, what obsequies! The next-door neighbors hardly knew what was going on; but Nicholas and the father and mother knew. Out of the Christian and beautiful home of the one brother is carried the dissolute brother. No word of blame uttered. No harsh thing said. On a bank of camellias is spelled out the word "Brother." Had the prodigal been true and pure and noble in life, and honorable in death, he could not have been carried forth with more tenderness, or slept in a more beautiful casket, or been deposited in a more beautiful garden of the dead. Amid the loosened turf the brothers who left the country for city life five years before now part forever. The last scene of the fifth act of an awful tragedy of human life is ended.

What made the difference between these two young men? Religion. The one depended on himself, the other depended on God. They started from the same home, had the same opportunities of education, arrived in the city on the same day, and if there is any difference, Edward had the advantage, for he was brighter and quicker, and all the neighbors prophesied greater success for him than for Nicholas. But behold, and wonder at

THE TREMENDOUS SECRET.

Voices come up out of this audience and say, "Did you know these brothers?" "Yes; knew them well." "Did you know their parents?" "Yes; intimately." What was the city, what the street, what the last names of these young men? You have excited our curiosity; now tell us all.

I will. Nothing in these characters is fictitious except the names. They are in every city, and in every street of every city, and in every country. Not two of them, but ten thousand. Aye, aye! Right before me to-day, and on either side of me, and above me, they sit and stand, the invulnerable through religious defence and the blasted of city allurements. Those who shall have longevity in beautiful homes, and others who shall have early graves of infamy. And I am here to-day in the name of Almighty God to give you the choice of the two characters, the two histories, the two experiences, the two destinies, the two worlds, the two eternities.

Standing with you at the forks of the road something makes me think that if to-day I set before the people the termini of the two roads, they will all of them take the right one. There are before me in this house and in the invisible audience back of this—for journalism has generously given me every week full opportunity to address the people in all the towns and cities of Christendom—I say, in the visible and invisible audience, there are many who have not fully made up their minds

WHICH ROAD TO TAKE.

"Come with us!" cry all the voices of righteousness. "Come with us!" cry all the voices of sin.

Now, the trouble is that many make disgraceful surrender. As we all know, there is honorable and dignified surrender, as when a small host yields to superior numbers. It is no humiliation for a thousand men to yield to ten thousand. It is better than to keep on when there can be no result except that of massacre. But those who surrender to sin make a surrender when on their side they have enough reserve forces to rout all the armies of Perdition, whether led on by what a demonographer calls Belial, or Beelzebub, or Apollyon, or Abaddon, or Ariel.

We have talked so much the last few weeks about

of Alexander of Bulgaria, but what a paltry throne was that from which the unhappy king descended, compared with the abdication of that young man, or middle-aged man, or old man, who quits the throne of his opportunity and turns his back upon a heavenly throne, and tramps off into ignominy and everlasting exile! That is an abdication enough to shake a universe. In Persia they will not have a blind man on the throne, and when a reigning monarch is jealous of some ambitious relative, he has his eyes extinguished so that he cannot possibly ever come to crowning. And that suggests the difference between the way sin and divine grace takes hold of a man. The former blinds him so he may never reach a throne, while the latter illumines the blind that he may take coronation.

Why this sermon? I have made up my mind that our city life is destroying too many young men. There comes, in every September and October, a large influx of those between sixteen and twenty-four years of age, and New York and Brooklyn damn at least a thousand of them every year. They are shovelled off and down with no more compunction than that with which a coal-heaver scoops the anthracite into a dark cellar. What, with the wine-cup and the gambler's dice, and the scarlet enchantress, no young man without the grace of God is safe ten minutes.

There is much discussion about which is

THE WORST CITY OF THE CONTINENT.

Some say New York, some say New Orleans, some say Chicago, some say St. Louis. What I have to say is, you cannot make much comparison between the infinities, and in all our cities the temptation seems infinite. We keep a great many mills running day and night. No rice mills or cotton mills. Not mills of corn or wheat, but mills for grinding up men. Such are all the grog-shops, licensed and unlicensed. Such are all the gambling saloons. Such are all the houses of infamy. And we do the work according to law, and we turn out a new grist every hour, and grind up warm hearts and clear heads; and the earth about a cider mill is not more saturated with the beverage than the ground about all these mind-destroying institutions is saturated with the blood of victims.

We say to Long Island neighborhoods and villages, "Send us more supply;" and to Westchester and Ulster and all the other counties of New York, "Send us more men and women to put under the wheels." Give us full chance, and we could grind up in the municipal mill five hundred a day. We have enough machinery; we have enough men who can run them. Give us more homes to crush! Give us more parental hearts to pulverize! Put into the hopper the wardrobes and the family Bibles, and the livelihoods of wives and children. Give us more material for these mighty mills, which are wet with tears and sulphurous with woe, and trembling with the earthquakes of an incensed God, who will, unless our cities repent, cover us up as quick and as deep as in August, of the year 79, Vesuvius avalanched Herculaneum.

Oh, man and woman, ponder the path of thy feet! See which way you are going. Will you have the destiny of Edward or Nicholas? On this sacramental day, when the burnished chalices stand in the presence of the people, start from the foot of the cross for usefulness and Heaven. Plutarch tells us that after Cæsar was slain and his 23 wounds had been displayed to the people, arousing an uncontrollable excitement, and the body of the dead conqueror, according to ancient custom, had been put upon the funeral pile, and the flames arose, people rushed up, took from the blazing mass torches, with which they ran through the city, crying the glory of the assassinated ruler and the shame of his assassins. On this sacramental day, when the five bleeding wounds of Christ, your king, are shown to you, and the fires of his earthly suffering blaze before your imagination, each one of you take a torch and start heavenward—a torch with light for yourself and light for others; for the race that starts at the cross ends at the throne. While the 23 wounds of Cæsar wrought nothing but the consternation of the people, from the five wounds of our Conqueror flows a transforming power to make all the uncounted millions who will accept it, forever happy and forever free.

THE INVITATION SOCIETY.

SOME time ago, a man residing in a large city was deeply impressed and grieved by seeing multitudes who neglected public worship, and he determined to make the effort to induce some of these to frequent the house of God. It required some little effort at first, but he overcame his timidity. One Lord's Day evening he went forth with his holy purpose, and meeting a young man who did not appear to be on his way to a place of worship, he respectfully addressed him, got into conversation with him, and persuaded the stranger to accompany him to worship, and, as an inducement, offered him a seat in his own pew. Succeeding in this case, he was emboldened and encouraged to proceed in this line of Christian activity and usefulness. And now, mark what a blessed result; he was the means of leading one hundred young men to become stated attendants at the sanctuary, many of whom have become truly converted to God.

A minister of the Gospel mentioned this at one of his prayer-meetings, when the idea was caught up by some persons present, who at once said, "How admirable a plan this is for doing good!" A little association was immediately formed, called the "Invitation Society." In sixteen months two hundred persons were persuaded by eight or ten of its agents no longer to forsake the assembling of themselves in the house of prayer. One of those agents, an earnest Christian in humble life, devoted himself to this work, and was the means of bringing forty to hear the Word of Life.

MR. SPURGEON'S LEVEE.

THE winter session of Mr. C. H. Spurgeon's Pastor's College opened on September 7th, when the sixty old students and twenty-one new ones were entertained at Mr. Spurgeon's house. The new men were welcomed individually, and, from what was said to each, it came out that several of the number were volunteers for the Congo and other mission service. Mr. Spurgeon said they must consider that meeting a levee; the new brethren were to be introduced, the younger ones in the glory of their perfectness. What would they turn out? He had read somewhere that marriage was illegal because it was a lottery. That taking in of new men was really a lottery, however. He used his own judgment in selection, but he was not infallible. Sometimes, those who came with the best testimonials turned out the least satisfactory; while, on the contrary, the men who were but poorly recommended developed into useful pastors. The proof of the student was in the studying. Some began well and then went lame; others could not study because it was not in them. Some thought they knew too much already; and there were those who found sweethearting an obstruction to their progress. Some failed from want of piety, or they made a mistake in choosing their vocation; and if any such were present it was hoped that they would return to their secular work. There were some who never intended to labor, because they were so clever. The work of the ministry could never be done in that manner, however. He could not do without hard work; and he advised all the students to go in for that, and work to the utmost of their power. Let them not aspire to be the smallest men in their denomination—there were a large number of that description already—let them aspire to become the best preachers.

SLAVERY IN WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

A MISSIONARY who has been laboring in Western Australia reports that slavery in a disguised form is flourishing there. It is called the "assignment system." The missionary, whose name is Mr. Gribble, says: The assignment of natives to white settlers is carried on under an unwritten law, and though the governor, in an interview I had with him recently, refused to recognize the term, yet every one who has lived in Western Australia and has made inquiry, as I have, knows the practice. The assignment is made in this way: A settler desires to possess a native, we will say, for a laborer. He makes out a paper in which the native is made to say that he offers himself for employment for such-and-such a period. The paper is signed by the settler, and witnessed by the policeman, and "crossed by the unfortunate native, who is in absolute ignorance of its contents, and whose consent is, in the great majority of cases, never asked. In such way are the natives enslaved. The system is not legal, but yet the unfortunate blacks, if they run away or commit any offence, are punished under the Masters and Servants Act of Great Britain, an act which was never intended to apply to barbarous peoples. In connection with the pearl fisheries, there has been such trouble with the native labor that the Legislature was obliged to pass an act specially dealing with the natives pearling. That, however, only relates to the punishment to be inflicted for running away. Frequently the natives are first brought into service by capture, and "assigned" afterward. The settlers are a law unto themselves. One evening, when staying at a station, I discovered a man assaulting a young black girl. I was horrified, and I asked him how he dared do such a thing. He was astonished at the inquiry, and with the most unblushing effrontery said, "She has been assigned to me by the police for six months, and I can do what I like with her."

A MODERN REHOBOAM.

THE following graphic portrait of an acquaintance has been given by Mr. C. H. Spurgeon: Well known to me was a kindly, well-disposed gentleman, who, like Rehoboam, was tender-hearted or persuasible. He was a worldling of pleasing manners, who delighted in the esteem of the circle which surrounded him. He had a great respect for religious persons, and especially for ministers; but he could not afford to be a godly man himself, for then he might have become unpopular with a large circle of worldly fashionables. He once quitted an assembly which I addressed, because, he said, "I felt almost on the go, and should soon have been converted if I had not rushed out." "There," said he, "Spurgeon, I am like an India-rubber doll when you are preaching; you can make me into any shape you like; but then I get back into my old form when you have done." He was an accurate reproduction of the soft-souled son of Solomon; a very Pliable, easily persuaded to set out on pilgrimage, but equally ready to return at the world's call.

A SACRED BATHING-PLACE.

A GRAPHIC description of the scene at the sacred bathing-place of India during the period of annual devotion is given in the Missionary Link by Miss McIntosh, who visited the place recently. She says:

"Crowds may be seen every day for a month at the confluence of the Ganges and Jumna, all intent on bathing and getting through their devotions. I visited the Mela grounds on a special bathing day. There was a strong breeze, and clouds of dust were flying in every direction. There was no mistaking those who travelled on foot, for the faces of the men, and the bare feet of the women were covered with dust. No one stood, or answered if spoken to, so we looked on at the sad sight, as we thought of those numbers without any knowledge of a Saviour's love, or the Fountain opened for sin and uncleanness. We could not speak there because the people and the priests were excited, so we moved on a little farther. There was a fat priest seated with a blanket spread before him, and a quantity of grain heaped upon it. I saw the people as they returned from bathing adding to the heap, and then going up to the priest give him pice,* and get from him a few drops of holy water to put on the head of the sacred cow, which was making an effort to break from its chain. I asked the meaning of the performance, and was told by the priest himself that those who offered grain, pice or anything else to the cow would have their sins forgiven, and in case they could not find heaven it had the power to take them there. He said, too, that in the second birth [not regeneration, but transmigration of the soul, in which they believe] the cow could, by its influence over the gods, make them human beings again instead of animals."

HOW BISHOP HANNINGTON DIED.

FURTHER details have arrived respecting the martyrdom of Bishop Hannington, who was killed by order of Mwanga, King of Uganda. Mr. Mackay, who was at King Mwanga's, reports that he had received a letter from one of the king's storekeepers, who had got details of the murder of the bishop and party; "There were fifty-three servants, and all (except two or three boys whom Luba seized for himself) were killed. S— heard from some of his friends who had been in Busoga how the massacre took place. The army of the Baganda, under Mutesa, Sembuzi, Betège, and Masudi, first arrested the bishop. They tied him up and put him into a wretched hovel, apparently deserted, for it was filthy and full of cobwebs. He complained for some days of being ill, and begged his captors to build him a new hut, which they did. Wakoli (the king's gate-keeper) then arrived. The white man and his men were at once taken to an open place outside the plantations, where the Wang'wana (porters) were all speared. The bishop implored them not to spear him, but to shoot him with his own rifle. This they did, and afterward cut off his head and feet. They allowed six days to elapse after the massacre, and then Musoke (Mwanga's page) returned to Buganda with the intelligence that all were dead. I believe that the reason for delay before reporting was that they have some notion that white men have a resurrection soon after death. This, too, explains the cutting off the head and feet probably." Mr. Mackay states also that several native converts have been put to death by the king who seems to be a modern Nero. When he wrote the missionaries were in peril of their lives but were unable to leave the country.

A REFORMED THIEF'S EXPERIENCE.

A NOTORIOUS thief who was brought under the influence of the St. Giles Mission, which has been established in one of the most squalid districts of London for rescue work, thus told the story of his life recently:

"My father was a thief, sir; I know'd nothing else but thieving. I began when I was about ten years old. I was in prison when I was just turned fourteen; I believe in the next twenty years I spent well-nigh eighteen in quod—doing two long terms. At Dartmoor I heard tell of the Mission, and how there was some chance for a fellow like me. The fact is, I'd got tired of it, and lots of 'em are; I sent in my name to the governor as wanting to be discharged to the Mission. Very well; when I comes to the Home, Mr. Wheatley, he makes me stare. Why, 'cause he spoke about pardon. I thought I might do better, and live honestly, but I'd never thought of sins being pardoned. He took me into the Home till I could pick up a trade and get a job somewhere. All the time I was working I kept turning over in my mind what he could mean about a Saviour for me. One of the fellows there—as I know'd had turned religious—came, and he says to me, 'Look here, turning over a new leaf won't do, you've got to cry to God for pardon, to take Christ as your Saviour.' Says I, 'Take Him; why, how can I take Christ?' So he spoke plain to me, and showed how Christ saved the thief on the cross, and how He died for me. I'd never heard the like before; for, more shame to me, I'd paid little attention to what the chaplain said. Well, from that day I began to see things different, and 'tweren't long after till He saved my soul. He did; and now I don't want to steal, I don't really, sir. I believe He's made a new man of me."

THE PLAGUES OF THE LAST DAYS.

By Rev. W. Haslam.

The Vision of the Four Empires—The Clay and Iron Governments—Revival of the Roman Empire—Anarchy Under Military Restraint—Foreign Wars a Necessity—The Three Horses—The Beast with Iron Teeth.

WE have an interesting prophecy of the period covered by the opening of the seals in heaven (Rev. 6 : 1-15), given us in the Book of Daniel. The great king Nebuchadnezzar had a dream "wherewith his spirit was troubled, and his sleep brake from him." The prophet revealed to him his dream (Daniel 2 : 31-35).

The king's dream sweeps over centuries of time, and refers to the four great monarchies of the world. The Babylonian; that of the Medes and Persians; the kingdom of Alexander the Great of Macedon; and the Roman Empire. This last empire was divided into two parts, Western and Eastern, represented by the two legs of iron. But it is more to our purpose here to call special attention to the two feet of the great image, composed not of iron only, but of clay and iron.

It is little suspected that many centuries intervene between the legs of iron and the feet of clay and iron. The gold of the image symbolized the irresponsible dominion of the king of Babylon; the silver, the limited monarchy of Darius; the brass, the indomitable courage of the Macedonian conqueror; and the iron, the hard military sway of the Romans; but the clay and iron represent democracy coerced under military rule. This is to be the character of the people at the time to which I am referring.

At this time we expect that the boundaries of the old pagan Roman Empire, called "the world" (see Luke 2 : 1) in the Gospels, will be clearly defined; and that the restored empire will be divided, as before, into two parts. The restored Roman Empire will be democratic in character—that is, under the rule of the people, though restrained by military power. Moreover, we are led to expect that each of these two parts will be divided into five kingdoms, answering to the ten toes of the image. These will be ruled over by ten kings, who are figured in the image as toes of iron and clay. (See Dan. 2 : 42.) This is very significant, showing that the kings will exercise their rule by means of military power.

We can well understand that the lawless and wilful ones may and will be kept in check and of the military power. But if lawless and wilful kings rise up and set themselves against their people, nations rise against nations, and kingdoms against kingdoms, who shall restrain them?

If this be the character of the ten kingdoms, and if they can scarcely keep from war among themselves, what shall it be when kings, overborne with anarchy and insubordination at home, make a diversion by declaring war with outside kingdoms! Such being the tendency of the revived Roman Empire, we cannot wonder at the events which are indicated by the opening of the second, third, and fourth seals. These emblems—the represent war, famine, and pestilence, which are to follow one another upon the earth. As to the first event, war; even now it would appear that the great nations of the world are anticipating it. Otherwise what means this universal preparation, and this eagerness in learning the terrible arts of war? If no one expects nation to rise against nation, why these costly slaughter-engines, and why this gathering and training of soldiers and navies?

War is the sure consequence of rival ambitions, and to its arbitrament appeal is made, especially when one proud nation or kingdom will not yield to the other. Whether, then, these ten kings will war with one another, or combine to carry war and devastation elsewhere, we are not told. This we do know, that there shall be wars and rumors of wars; nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom (Matt. 24 : 7). The judgment of war with its fearful results, and with even more than its wonted fatalities, is predicted; yet we are told that this is only "the beginning of sorrows" (Matt. 24 : 8). As a consequence of war, is sure to follow—famine, with none to help the poor famished ones; the fields trodden down, harvests trampled under foot, and laborers called out to the battle. This accumulation of evils must produce scarceness and famine.

After this trouble, greater and more distressing scourges are to ensue, even

PESTILENCE AND DEATH.

Fatal diseases will be induced by scarceness and unnatural food, or, may be, by the poisoned state of the atmosphere. Thousands of unburied dead will pollute the air. Death and hell are shown to be the awful followers which bring up this solemn train of evils. Untold misery, surpassing anything which has taken place before, remains to fall upon the rebellious ones who will be on the earth at this time.

It will be observed that the plagues which are to overtake men, as mentioned in the Book of Revelation, are plagues which have occurred in the past. Also, that the

which are coming have all been let loose upon the world before, though not to the same extent or with the same severity. God will make known that He is the Lord, be the earth never so unquiet. Though the waves of the sea rage and swell ever so horribly in the madness of their power, still the Lord will remain King.

The fierce and active energy which kings will let loose upon kings, and nations upon nations, is well prefigured in the prophet Daniel by the formidable and cruel beast which is represented as the emblem of this Roman Empire.

The vision which the king Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream of the four great monarchies of the world was an image intended to foreshadow the moral character of the times. The wild beasts which were shown to the prophet were emblems of the same monarchies in the energy of their cruel power. The prophet was permitted to see four great beasts.

of gold (for Babylon) was presented to him as a lion; the silver breast and arms (for Persia) by a bear; the belly and thighs (for Greece) by a leopard; the two legs of iron, with their feet of clay and iron (the Roman Empire), by an indescribable monster, unlike any other, and more cruel than all. This is the emblem of the Roman Empire, not so much in the old days of its pagan existence as in the coming days of its restoration.

Formerly it was great and noble in its military power and conquests, breaking in pieces like iron. In future it is to be popular and democratical in its character—no longer iron only, but clay mixed with iron.

"After this I saw in the night visions, and behold, a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had

it devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it; and it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it; and it had ten horns" (Dan. 7 : 7). From this it would appear that all the power of the three previous monarchies, and all their cruelties, were centred in the fourth, or Roman, Empire.

The character of this empire is truly terrible, on account of the oppression and tyranny which shall come upon both the rulers and the ruled. So much for the governmental schemes of men who rebel against the government of the Lord God of the universe.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Commercial Agreement with Spain for Reciprocal privileges in the ports of Cuba is not, it appears, being fulfilled to the satisfaction of merchants or our government. The old tonnage duties are still being charged in many cases, and the stipulated privileges and exemptions are not allowed. The Washington government does not propose to revoke the treaty but intends to make a further effort to induce the Spanish Government to carry out its part of the agreement in good faith. The difficulty is known to be with the officers at the different ports, men who have long looked upon the fees exacted as their rightful dues, and who are disinclined to submit to the reduction of the tonnage taxes. The contention of Spain is that the agreement bound the officers of that country in Cuba to collect duties at a reduced rate on all goods of American manufacture imported in American vessels, and that the discrimination in favor of the United States did not extend to goods of foreign manufacture imported through the United States and shipped to Cuba in American vessels.

A New Reciprocity Treaty Between the United States and Canada is said to be under consideration. Last Thursday a draft of the proposed treaty was telegraphed to the New York journals. Both at Washington and Ottawa it was denied that any such treaty was in existence, but it is generally believed that the report was not without foundation. The summary of its provisions, as published by the New York Herald, shows that the treaty is not only designed to appease the fishery troubles, but to renew commercial reciprocity between Canada and our country on a scale rivaling that which was terminated in 1865. As to the fisheries, it proposes that our citizens shall enjoy free sea fishing on all the Canadian coasts, and the Canadians the same on our coast as far south as the thirty-sixth parallel of latitude. As to commercial reciprocity, the schedule of the articles to which it is designed to apply, follows closely that of the treaty concluded in 1854. The additions are those only of salt, boots or shoes, agricultural implements or farming tools, cotton or woolen goods of all kinds, when manufactured into clothing; wooden, china and earthenware, books, music and compositions, prints and sculpture. Such a treaty would not be likely to meet with approval here or in Canada. On both sides of the border there is too strong a feeling in favor of protection to permit the ratification of a treaty as broad as the Washington and London cabinets would desire.

The Pension List Increased Last Year as it has continued to do from year to year since the war. From the summary of the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, published last week by the New York Times, 40,857 new names were added to the roll during the year, and 22,098 names were dropped on account of death, remarriage and other causes. The average yearly value of pensions was increased from $110.35 to $122.88, and the aggregate annual value of all the pensions was increased from $38,010,985.93 to $44,708,027.44. Including accrued pensions and arrearages, the whole amount paid for pensions during the year was $63,797,831.61. Pensioners of the United States Government are found in all but 118 of the 2,647 counties of the country and in 35 foreign countries.

The Defalcation of the Cashier of the First National Bank of Portland, Me., discovered last week, caused a painful sensation in that city. The cashier, Mr. William E. Gould, who is the son-in-law of Neal Dow, enjoyed the respect of the whole community, and held several honorable and responsible offices in connection with financial institutions. He was also an active member of the Y. M. C. A., and took a prominent part in Church work. The amount of his defalcation is stated to be $137,000, a large part of which will be covered by the property he has surrendered and by his bond. His difficulties were the result of unsuccessful stock operations, which he attempted to retrieve by using more of the bank funds. It is stated that there are no false entries in the books, but his account is simply overdrawn by the amount of his shortage.

Considerable Distress was Caused Last Week by the appointment of a receiver for the Charter Oak Life Insurance Company. The action was the result of a defalcation by its President, George M. Bartholomew, who has absconded, and is believed to be in Canada. The amount of the defalcation is placed at $127,000, but the result of the investigation, not yet completed, indicates, as far as it has gone, that the loss will be still greater. Mr. Bartholomew has left unmarketable securities behind him, which if held for a time may lessen the loss. He was connected with other companies in Connecticut, some of which are also involved by his disappearance. It is believed that he was ruined by speculation, as his way of life was not extravagant.

The Nomination of Henry George, the Author of the famous work, "Progress and Poverty," as Mayor of New York, will give unusual interest to the fall election. Mr. George is the labor candidate, but he has received promises of support from store-keepers, clerks, and professional men. The meeting which nominated Mr. George, on Sept. 23, was composed of delegates from trades unions, and represented more than forty thousand workmen. Nearly all the delegates were instructed to vote for Mr. George. The campaign will be vigorously conducted and the efforts of the labor party concentrated on the mayoralty. Mr. George promises that if elected he will give the people an honest government, and do all that lies in his power as Mayor, to effect such reforms as were laid down in the declaration of rights made by the trade and labor organizations. Personally he may not have the power to accomplish much in this direction, but he will use all the influence of his position to have these reforms accomplished by those having the power.

The British Parliament was Prorogued on Saturday last. Unless an emergency arises it will probably not assemble again before February. The Queen's speech releasing the members referred very slightly to Ireland, simply announcing the issue of the Royal Commission to examine and report on the working of the Land Act. As there is no question about the prevalence of severe distress in Ireland, the omission of any allusion to it in the speech has called forth much criticism. Mr. Parnell's bill for the protection of tenants from eviction during the winter was defeated on Sept. 21, by a vote of 297 to 202. The estimate that the majority against it would be seventy was exceeded through the absence of many members who were expected to vote in its favor. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Chief Secretary for Ireland, replying to an interrogation by Mr. Parnell, said that since the 13th of last June, 1,000 families, comprising 5,311 persons, had been evicted in Ireland, and that of these 650 families, including 3,626 persons, had been readmitted to their premises as care-takers.

Arrangements for the Permanent Settlement of Egyptian affairs are being made. The aspect of matters in eastern Europe and in Afghanistan appears to have convinced the British government that a gigantic conflict with Russia is inevitable and may be near at hand, which will demand all the resources of Great Britain, and in which an open question will be embarrassing. The present arrangements in Egypt involve irritation to France, to Turkey and to the Egyptians themselves which it is desirable to remove. Accordingly, last week there were frequent consultations between representatives of the Powers concerned, at the London Foreign Office, at which various solutions of the problem were discussed. It is understood that the plan most favored was the organization of a native army with British officers, as in India.

A Messenger to Bulgaria from the Czar arrived in Sofia on Sunday last, bearing an ultimatum. He demands the release of the political prisoners prior to the election, on October 10. The men in prison are there on the charge of being traitors to their country. Some of them were concerned in the attack on Prince Alexander, and all of them are friends of Russia. The Czar naturally wanted their votes in the great Sobranje, at which Bulgaria will express her choice of a ruler. General Ignatieff, Prince Vladimir and other Russians are mentioned as candidates, but as the attempt to make a Russian ruler of Bulgaria would be likely to precipitate a war with Austria and England, the Czar may prefer the election of a German prince under bonds to Russia.

A Military Rising in Madrid caused general apprehension on September 20. The citizens feared it was the prelude to a revolution and anarchy. It commenced in the Gil Blas barracks, where three regiments were quartered. The men attacked the officers opposed to them, and leaving the barracks, marched through the streets of the city to the chief park, hurrahing for the Republic and uttering menacing cries against the queen and her ministers. The insurgents attempted to secure possession of the arsenals, docks and barracks, which they attacked with open fire, but all these places were well and successfully defended, and the rebels were repulsed. Finally, their reverses drawing them together, they attacked and got possession of the Southern Railway. The loyal troops were marched to the railway, and, after a short fight, they completely dislodged the revolutionists, who dispersed into the country, General Pavia pursuing. During the fighting in the city, one of the officers leading the insurgents was shot and killed. The rebels shot General Velarde for refusing to join them. They also mortally wounded Count Mirasol, and killed a colonel of artillery. Martial law was proclaimed throughout the city as soon as the condition of affairs was clearly perceived by the government.

Seven Recruits for Bishop Taylor's African Mission are to leave New York on October 2. Farewell services were held last Sunday, September 26, in New York and Brooklyn. The missionaries are W. H. Arringdale, of Baltimore, and his wife and son; Louisa H. Hartley, of Southampton, New Brunswick, Canada; Martha E. Kah, of Hastings, Iowa; Susie F. Harvey, of Des Moines, Iowa; Mary B. Lindsay, of Chicago, and L. Fanny Cummings, of Reading, Mass. They are to join Bishop Taylor, who, at the present time is doubtless at Leopoldville, Stanley station, planting a mission station.

A Scheme to Purchase Palestine has been Organized in Canada. It has been perfected by Henry Wentworth Monk, M. P., of Ottawa. He is at the head of a company recently formed for the purpose of buying the territory of Palestine, and establishing there the capital of the earth. The capital stock of the "New British Empire Company" is $10,000,000, and it is said that $1,500,000 has been subscribed already. Mr. Monk, as President, has issued a prospectus, and next month he will go to England to place the stock of his company. Mr. Monk describes his scheme of federation in his prospectus, and says, until other nations are prepared to join us, Palestine would be the most convenient central position for the capital of the proposed confederation of the British empire, or for the English-speaking communities everywhere, for the United States would doubtless immediately join us in such a confederation for the sake of insuring the general peace of the world at the earliest day.

Gen. Booth, the Chief of the Salvation Army, arrived in New York by the Aurania, of the Cunard line, on Sunday last. The daily journals describe him as wearing a flaming red and gold uniform, which was partially covered by a dark overcoat. He was welcomed by Commissioner Frank Smith, who was also clad in scarlet and gold. Mr. Booth spent the day in Brooklyn, leaving for Toronto on the following day. He said he was going to return to England on Dec. 11, and until then will travel and make speeches. It is his first visit to America, and he will inspect the finances of all the American branches of the Army during his travels. It may be hoped that he will also impress on his representatives here the importance of exercising increased care in the selection of officers. The appointment of unworthy men and women to positions of trust cannot but involve the army in discredit and injure the cause of Christ.

The Fulton Street Prayer Meeting Celebrated its twenty-ninth anniversary on Thursday last, Sept. 23. Nearly every denomination in the city was represented, and the venerable President and originator of the meeting, Mr. Lamphier, received many congratulations from his ministerial brethren. An extract from the first circular, printed in 1857, in connection with the Fulton Street prayer meetings, was given on the programme. It stated that the meeting was intended "to give merchants, mechanics, clerks, strangers, and business men generally an opportunity to stop and call upon God amid the daily perplexities incident to their respective vocations." It was also designed for those who might find it convenient to remain not more than five or ten minutes, as well as those who could spare an hour. Rev. John Hall, D. D., presided, and there was a very large attendance.

Opposition to the Prohibition Movement in Ohio has appeared in an unexpected quarter. A telegram to the New York Times from Youngstown, O., on September 25, states that a plan is being formulated by Francis Murphy and some of his most earnest and prominent supporters, to organize a State Temperance Association. "The movement is in direct opposition to political prohibition, and the object of its organization is to offset the results accomplished by the third party." Moral suasion, as opposed to legal prohibition, will be the foundation of the movement. The organization will be permanent, and it is expected that the association will shortly become one of the strongest reformatory and moral societies in the State. Whether that be so or not, the liquor dealers will surely welcome the news that some one has been found within the temperance party, willing to lead a division in the Prohibition ranks, which are becoming formidable.

A Child's Gift to the Charleston Sufferers, acknowledged in the Charleston News and Courier, has in it the elements which made the widow's two mites a gift of value (Luke 21: 2-4). Among the letters received by the treasurer of the fund was one enclosing five dollars from a little girl in St. Louis. She wrote: "I shall enclose $4, and you may send that because you know who needs it, and I know you will send it for me. Papa gave me $5, but until he sends me more I shall keep $1 because maybe I shall have to use it. No, now that I come to think of it, I will send all, because I needn't get anything unless it's important, and I can sacrifice little things for my pleasure when so many are suffering, and, of course, if it doesn't cause any denial of self it won't be very acceptable to God." The little woman seems to have a clear perception of the spirit which God desires to see in the heart of every giver to the cause of religion or charity (11 Sam. 24: 24).

A Mortifying Discovery was Made in a Jeweller's shop, in Stamford, N. Y., this summer by a wealthy lady from New York City. During her visit to the vicinity of Stamford she had occasion to have some trifling repairing done to the setting of her diamond earrings. They were very costly articles, the stones being of large size, so the lady took them herself to the local jeweller. Probably with the view of impressing him with the value of the gems intrusted to his care, she asked him what he considered they were worth. He examined them critically for a moment, and then said that they might have cost five dollars. "Five dollars!" said the lady. "Why, my husband gave twelve hundred dollars for them." "Then he was cheated," said the jeweller, laconically. "These are crystals, not diamonds." An investigation at the house in New York at which they were purchased confirmed the statement, and the firm discovered that the earrings had been sold by a dishonest clerk, who pocketed the difference between their value and the price paid. The firm, to save its reputation, replaced the crystals with genuine stones. The lady now wears her earrings with restored confidence, but probably with no greater pleasure than before. She was content with them so long as she believed them genuine. That is the case with many good people who pride themselves on their blameless character, regular church-going, and their works of charity. It is well for them when their disillusion comes this side the grave, when they can seek and gain "the pearl of great price" (Rev. 3: 17, 18).

The Marriage of Two Clerks in the Treasury Department was recorded by the Washington Republican last week, with some interesting details. It states that a young man of good family, formerly one of the most efficient and diligent clerks in the department, became dissipated and spent his evenings in drinking and gambling. The chief of his department expostulated with him, and warned him that he would be dismissed, but without avail. Recently a number of new clerks were appointed, one of whom was a lady so pretty and graceful that her friendship was eagerly sought by the young men, the dissipated clerk among the others. Very strangely, the young lady preferred him. One of the older ladies warned her against him, and assured her that he was a dissolute fellow not deserving her notice. "I think there is good in him," said the pretty clerk. "He might reform if he had encouragement." After this a wonderful change came over the young man. He stopped drinking, abjured gambling, attended to his work with a will, and was altogether a new man. A short time ago both the young people resigned, the young man to occupy a more lucrative position in a merchant's office and the lady to become his wife. The head of the department, who related the incident, received a visit last week from the newly-married couple and says there is no doubt about the permanent character of the young man's reformation. When hope and love enter the heart there is no limit to the effect that may follow on the life. It is when the miserable and depraved learn that Jesus loves them and desires to save them that they turn from their sin (11 Cor. 5: 14, 15.)

Two Gold Medals were Presented to American seamen last week. They were part of the collection sent to this country by the British government for distribution among the crew of the pilot-boat Phantom, who assisted in rescuing the passengers from the sinking steamship Oregon on March 14. They were presented by Collector Magone to Capt. Albert E. Mitchell and Capt. Charles L. Lawson. The medals are about the size of a fifty-cent piece, and bear the Queen's head on one side and on the other the inscription, "Presented by the British Government for saving the lives of British subjects." The gallant seamen may wear them with pride wherever they may go. A medal won in battle the winner often feels a delicacy in wearing when among his former enemies, but these medals will not remind any one of defeat or bereavement. It is so with the distinctions in the army of Christ—they are conferred for service in rescue work (Dan 12: 3).

A Prosecutor Offering Bail for a Prisoner was the singular spectacle witnessed in a Brooklyn court last Thursday. On the previous day a man was met in the street by a person in clerical attire, who asked him for a small loan. The borrower stated that he was a clergyman from a distance who knew no one in Brooklyn, and was without funds to pay the railroad fare to his home. The money was handed over, but some time afterward the lender came to the conclusion that he had been victimized by an impostor, and sought the supposed clergyman and had him arrested. By the time the case came on for hearing before Justice Kenna, the accuser had satisfied himself that he had made a mistake, and the clergyman was really the man he represented himself to be. He told the Justice so in court, and offered himself as the prisoner's bondsman. That was only a fair acknowledgment of the wrong he had unintentionally done to an innocent man. It is not so that the Christian is released from the penalty of his sins. He admits his guilt, but pleads the merits of his Surety (Heb. 9: 15).

A Violent Remedy for Obesity has Overthrown the reason of the man who tried it. The daily journals of New York report the arrival on board an English steamer of a man who was promptly taken to the insane asylum on Ward's Island. He was a circus performer until two years ago, when he became too fat to perform agile feats. Hearing that hard exercise in a high temperature would rid him of flesh, he decided to make the ocean passage as a fireman in a steamship. The fire-room on a steamer is a veritable roasting-place. It is away below the water-line, where ventilation is impossible, or at least unattempted. The temperature ranges from 135 to 175°, and in that atmosphere the men are required to shovel coal eight hours in every day—two stretches of unceasing and heavy work of four hours each in the twenty-four. He was advised that he could not stand the exhausting labor, but he was not to be dissuaded. Several times he fell fainting to the hot floor of the fire-room, but always insisted on resuming his duty. When within a day of this port, he rushed madly from the heat, climbed to the deck and leaped over the rail into the sea. He had become a maniac. Sailors rescued him, and he had to be kept under restraint during the rest of the trip. He believed that he had escaped from the bottomless pit, and that his captors meant to return him to the fiery torment. The man, being insane, was, of course, prone to illogical ideas. Otherwise, he would probably have been aware that it was not from the bottomless pit that he had escaped, because escape from that place is impossible (Luke, 16: 26).

GROUNDLESS DESPONDENCY.

"Yet now be strong, O Zerubbabel, saith the Lord; and be strong, O Joshua, son of Josedech, the high priest; and be strong, all ye people of the land, saith the Lord, and work: for I am with you, saith the Lord of hosts: according to the word that I covenanted with you when ye came out of Egypt, so My Spirit remaineth among you: fear ye not."—HAGGAI 2:4, 5.

SATAN is always doing his utmost to stay the work of God. He hindered these Jews from building the temple; and to-day he endeavors to hinder the people of God from spreading the Gospel. A spiritual temple is to be builded for the Most High, and if by any means the evil one can delay its uprising he will stick at nothing; if he can take us off from working with faith and courage for the glory of God he will be sure to do it. He is very cunning, and knows how to change his argument and yet keep to his design; little cares he how he works, so long as he can hurt the cause of God. In the case of the Jewish people on their return from captivity he sought to prevent the building of the temple by making them selfish and worldly, so that every man was eager to build his own house, and cared nothing for the house of the Lord. Like some in our day, they

God's turn was very long in coming; hence the prophet cried: "Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell in your cieled houses, and this house lie waste?"

By the mouth of his servant Haggai stern rebukes were uttered, and the whole people were aroused. All hands were put to the work; course after course of stone began to rise; and then another stumbling-block was thrown in the way of the workers. The older folks remarked that this was a very small affair compared with the temple of Solomon, of which their fathers had told them; in fact, their rising building was nothing at all, and not worthy to be called a temple. Being discouraged by the humiliating contrast, they began to be slack; and as they were quite willing to accept any excuse, and here was an excuse ready made for them, they would soon have been had not the prophet met the wiles of the arch-enemy with another word from the Lord. He did this by assuring them that He was with them. Twice the voice was heard: "I am with you, saith the Lord of hosts." Thus they were encouraged to put their shoulders to the work; the walls rose in due order, and God was glorified in the building up of His Zion.

The present times are, in many respects, similar to those of Haggai. History certainly repeats itself within the Church of God as well as outside of it; and therefore the messages of God need to be repeated also. The words of some almost-forgotten prophet may be re-delivered by the watchman of the Lord in these present days, and be a timely word for

THE PRESENT EMERGENCY.

We are not free from the worldliness which puts self first and God nowhere, else our various enterprises would be more abundantly supplied with the silver and the gold which are the Lord's, but which even professing Christians reserve for themselves. When this selfish greed is conquered, then comes in a timorous depression. Among those who have escaped from worldliness there is apt to be too much despondency, and men labor feebly as for a cause which is doomed to failure. This last evil must be cured. I pray that our text may this morning flame from the Lord's own mouth with all the fire which once blazed about it. May faint hearts be encouraged and drowsy spirits be aroused, as we hear the Lord say: "My Spirit remaineth among you: fear ye not."

I. To begin with, here is DISCOURAGEMENT FORBIDDEN.

Discouragement comes readily enough to us poor mortals who are occupied in the work of God, seeing it is a work of faith, a work of difficulty, a work above our capacity, and a work much opposed. Discouragement is very natural; it is a native of the soil of manhood. To believe is supernatural, faith is the work of the Spirit of God; to doubt is natural to fallen men; for we have within us an evil heart of unbelief. It is abominably wicked, I grant you; but still it is natural, because of the downward tendency of our depraved hearts.

Discouragement may come and does come to us, as it did to these people, from a consideration of the great things which God deserves at our hands, and the small things which we are able to render. When in Haggai's days the people thought of Jehovah, and of a temple for Him, and then looked upon the narrow space which had been inclosed, and the common stones which had been laid for foundations, they were ashamed. Have you not felt the depressing weight of what is so surely true? Brethren, all that we do is little for our God; far too little for Him that loved us and gave Himself for us. Thus have we been discouraged. The enemy can use humility for his purpose as well as pride. Whether he makes us think too much or too little of our work, it is all the same to him so long as he can get us off from it.

The tendency to depreciate the present because of the glories of the past is also injurious. The old people looked back to the days of the former temple, even as we are apt to look upon the times of the great preachers of the past. What work was done in those past days! What Sabbaths were enjoyed then! What converts were added to the Church! What days of refreshing were then vouchsafed! Everything has declined, decreased, degenerated! As for the former days, they beheld a race of giants, who are now succeeded by pigmies. We look at one of these great men, and cry:

"Why, man, he doth bestride the narrow world
Like a Colossus; and we petty men
Walk under his huge legs, and peep about
To find ourselves dishonorable graves."

But, brethren, we must not allow this sense of littleness to hamper us; for God can bless our littleness, and use it for His glory. I notice that the great men of the past thought of themselves even as we think of ourselves. Certainly they were not more self-confident than we are. I find in the story of the brave days of old the same confessions and the same lamentations which we utter now. It is true that in spiritual strength we are not what our fathers were; I fear that Puritanic holiness and truthfulness of doctrine are dying out, while adherence to principle is far from common; but our fathers had also faults and follies to mourn over, and they did mourn over them most sincerely. Instead of being discouraged because what we do is unworthy of God, and insignificant compared with what was done by others, let us gather up our strength to reform our errors, and reach to higher attainments.

Brethren, it is clear that discouragement can be produced by these reasons, and yet they are a mere sample of a host of arguments which work in the same direction; hence discouragement is VERY COMMON.

The multitude of the people are all apt to suffer from panic, and to flee at the sight of the enemy. How many are they who say: "The old truth cannot succeed; the cause of orthodoxy is desperate; we had better yield to the modern spirit"! The fearful and unbelieving have brought terrible disasters upon our camps. Discouragement is the national epidemic of our Israel.

Wherever discouragement comes in it is dreadfully weakening. Distrust, and thou wilt fail in everything; believe, and according to thy faith so shall it be unto thee. To lead a discouraged people to the Holy War is as difficult as for Xerxes' commanders to conduct the Persian troops to battle against the Greeks. The vassals of the great king were driven to the conflict by whips and sticks, for they were afraid to fight; do you wonder that they were defeated? A church that needs constant exhorting and compelling accomplishes nothing. The Greeks had no need of blows and threats, for each man was a lion, and courted the encounter, however great the odds against him. Each Spartan fought con amore; he was never more at home than when contending for the altars and the hearths of his country. We want Christian men of this same sort, who have faith in their principles, faith in the doctrines of grace, faith in God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost; and who therefore contend earnestly for the faith in these days when piety is mocked at from the pulpit, and the Gospel is sneered at by professional preachers.

Discouragement not only weakens men, but from the service of God. It is significant that the prophet said to them: "Be strong, all ye people of the land, saith the Lord, and work." They had ceased to build; they had begun to talk and argue, but they had laid down the trowel. It is always so when we are discouraged; we cease from the work of the Lord, and waste time in talk and nonsensical refinements. May the Lord take away discouragement from any of you who now suffer from it!

II. Secondly, here is the

which is the grand part of our text. "According to the word that I covenanted with you when ye came out of Egypt, so My Spirit remaineth among you: fear ye not." God remembers His covenant and stands to His ancient promises. The Holy Ghost descended upon the Church at Pentecost, and He has never gone back again; there is no record of the Spirit's return to heaven. He will abide with the true Church evermore. This is our hope for the present struggle. "The Spirit of God remaineth with us. To what end, my brethren, is this Spirit with us? Let us think of this, that we may be encouraged at this time. The Spirit of God remaineth among you to aid and assist the ministry which He has already given. Oh, that the prayers of God's people would always go up for God's ministers, that they may speak with a divine power and influence which none shall be able to gainsay! We look too much for clever men; we seek out fluent and we sigh for men cultured and trained in all the knowledge of the heathen; nay, but if we sought more for unction, for divine authority, and for that power which doth hedge about the man of God, how much wiser should we be! He who rested on those who have gone to their reward in heaven can rest this day upon our ministers and bless our evangelists, if we will but seek it of Him. Let us cease to grieve the Spirit of God, and look to Him for help to the faithful ministers who are yet spared to us.

This same Spirit who of old gave to His Church eminent teachers can raise up other and more useful men. The other day, a brother from Wales told me of the great men he remembered; he said that he had never heard such a one as Christmas Evans, who surpassed all men when he was in the hwyl. I asked him if he knew another Welsh minister who preached like Christmas Evans. "No," he said, "we have no such man in Wales in our days." So in England we have neither Wesley nor Whitefield, nor any of their order; yet, as with God is the residue of the Spirit, He can fetch out from some chimney-corner another Christmas Evans, or find in our Sunday-school another George Whitefield, who shall declare the Gospel with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven. Let us never fear for the future, or despair for the present, since the Spirit of God remaineth with us.

Nor is this all. The Holy Spirit being with us, He can move the whole Church to exercise its VARIED MINISTRIES.

This is one of the things we want very much—that every member of the Church should recognize that he is ordained to service. Every one in Christ, man or woman, hath some testimony to bear, some warning to give, some deed to do in the name of the holy child Jesus; and if the Spirit of God be poured out upon our young men and our maidens, each one will be aroused to energetic service. Both small and great will be in earnest, and the result upon the slumbering masses of our population will surprise us all. Sometimes we lament that the churches are so dull. There is an old proverb which says of So-and-so, that he was “as sound asleep as a church.” I suppose there is nothing that can sleep so soundly as a church. But yet the Spirit of God still remaineth, and therefore churches go to be awakened. If the Spirit be with us, there will come multitudinous conversions. We cannot get at “the lapsed masses,” as they are pedantically called. We cannot stir the crass infidelity of the present age; no, we cannot, but He can. All things are possible with God.

When once the Spirit of God putteth forth His might all things else will be in accord with Him. Great commotions will co-operate with the Holy Spirit. We may expect that God will work for His people in an extraordinary fashion if they will but be faithful to Him. Empires will collapse, and times will change, for the truth's sake.

EXPECT THE UNEXPECTED,

reckon upon the unlikely, if it be necessary for the growth of the kingdom. Of old the earth helped the woman when the dragon opened his mouth to drown her with the floods that he cast forth; unexpected help shall come to us when affairs are at their worst. Specially do I look for a shaking among the hosts of unbelief. When Cadmus slew the dragon with his javelin, he was bidden to sow its teeth in the earth. When he did so, according to the classic fable, he saw rising out of the ground nodding plumes, and crested helmets, and broad shoulders of armed men. Up from the earth there sprang a host of warriors; but Cadmus needed not to fly; for the moment they found their feet, these children of the dragon fell upon each other till scarcely one was left. Error, like Saturn, devours its own children. Those that fight against the Lord of hosts are not agreed among themselves; they shall sheathe their swords in each other's bosoms.

And next, the Lord in this chapter promises His people that they shall have all the supplies they need for His work. They feared that they could not build His house, because of their poverty; but, saith the Lord of hosts, “The silver and the gold are Mine.” When the Church of God believes in God, and goes forward bravely, she need not trouble as to supplies. Her for her. One of our English kings once threatened the great city of London that if its councillors talked so independently, he would—yes—he would, indeed he would—take his court away from the city. The Lord Mayor on that occasion replied, that if his majesty would graciously leave the river Thames behind him, the citizens would try to get on without his court. If any say, “If you hold to these old-fashioned doctrines you will lose the educated, the wealthy, the influential,” we answer: But if we do not lose the godly and the presence of the Holy Ghost we are not in the least alarmed.

The best comfort of all remained. “The desire of all nations shall come.” This was in a measure fulfilled when Jesus came into that latter house and caused all holy hearts to sing for gladness; but it was not wholly fulfilled in that way; for if you notice, in the ninth verse it is written, “The glory of this latter house shall be greater than of the former; and in this place will I give peace,” which the Lord did not fully do to the second temple, since that was destroyed by the Romans. But there is another advent, when “the desire of all nations shall come” in power and glory; and this is our highest hope. “Therefore, My beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord.”

III. I should have done if it had not been that this text seemed to me to overflow so much, that it might not only refresh God's people, but give drink to thirsty sinners who are seeking the Lord. For a moment or two I give myself to encouragement further applied.

It is at the beginning of every gracious purpose that men have most fear, even as these people had who had newly begun to build. When first the Holy Spirit begins to strive with a man and to lead him to Jesus, he is apt to say—“I cannot; I dare not; it is impossible. How can I believe and live?” Now I want to speak to some of you here who are willing to find Christ, and to encourage you by the truth that the Spirit lives to help you. I would even like to speak to those who are not anxious to be saved. I remember that an exceedingly earnest and useful man of God, once did a singular thing. He had been holding inquiry meetings with all sorts of people, and great numbers had been saved. At last, one Sunday he gave out that he should have a meeting on Monday night of those persons who did not desire to be saved; and, strange to say, some twenty persons came who did not wish to repent or believe. He spoke to them and said, “I am sure that if a little film, thin as the web of the gossamer, were let down by God from heaven to each one of you, you would not push it away from you. Although it were almost invisible, you would value even the slightest connection between you and heaven. Now, your coming to meet me to-night is a little link with God. I want it to increase in strength till you are joined to the Lord forever.” He spoke to them most tenderly, and God blessed those people who did not desire to be saved, so that before the meeting was over they were of another mind. The film had become a thicker thread, and it grew and grew until the Lord Christ held them by it forever.

Dear friends, the fact of your being in the Tabernacle this morning is like do not put it away. Here is your comfort, the Holy Spirit still works with the preaching of the Word. Do I hear you say, “I cannot feel my need of Christ as I want to feel it?” The Spirit remaineth among us. He can make you feel more deeply the guilt of sin and your need of pardon. “But I have heard so much about conviction and repentance; I do not seem to have either of them.” Yet the Spirit remaineth with us, and that Spirit is able to work in you the deepest conviction and the truest repentance.

“Ah, dear sir,” says one, “I want to conquer sin!” Who made you desire to conquer sin? Who, but the Spirit that remaineth with us? He will give you the sword of the Spirit and teach you how to use it, and He will give you both the will and the power to use it successfully. Through the Spirit's might you can overcome every sin, even that which has dragged you down and disgraced you. The Spirit of God is still waiting to help you. When I think of the power of the Spirit of God, I look hopefully upon every sinner here this morning. “Oh,” you say, “if I were to begin I should not keep on.” No; if you began perhaps you would not; but if He begins with you He will keep on. The final perseverance of saints is the result of the final perseverance of the Holy Spirit; He perseveres to bless, and we persevere in receiving the blessing. If He begins, you have begun with a divine power that fainteth not neither is weary.

I wish it might so happen that on this fifth day of the ninth month, not the prophet Haggai, but I, God's servant, may have spoken to you such a word as you shall never forget; and may the Lord add to the Word, by the witness of the Holy Ghost, “From this day will I bless you!” Go away with that promise resting upon you. I would like to give a shake of the hand to every stranger here this morning, and say, “Brother, in the name of the Lord I wish you from this day a blessing.” Amen and amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A LAND OF DARKNESS AND CRUELTY.*

IN Cortez's time Mexico was full of vast numbers of heathens, brownish colored people, something like the Red Indians, but a fairer, handsomer, stouter, heavier-bodied race; and much more civilized also. They had great cities and idol temples, aqueducts for water, and all sorts of noble buildings, all of most curiously carved stone; which is all the more wonderful and creditable to them when we remember that they had no iron—not a knife, not a nail of iron among them. But they had found out how to make bronze by mixing tin and copper, and with it could work the hardest stones as well as we can with iron. They had another stuff which was curious enough of which they made knives, razors, arrow-heads, and saw-edged swords as keen as razors; and that was glass. They did not make the glass, they found it about the burning mountains, of which Mexico is full; itztl they called it; we call it obsidian. It is tougher than our glass, and chips to a fine razor edge. I have seen arrows of it which I am certain would go clean through a man, and knives which would take his arm off, bone and all. Gunpowder of course they knew nothing of, nor of horses or cattle either. They had no beasts of draught; and all the stones and timber for their buildings were carried by hand.

But they were good farmers, and for handicraft work, such as pottery, weaving, and making all kinds of ornaments I can answer for it, for I have seen a good deal of their work—they had not then their equals in the world. They made the most beautiful dresses out of the feathers of birds, parrots, humming-birds, and such like which fill the forests in hot countries. And what was more, their country abounded in gold and jewels, and they knew how to work them just as well as we do. They could work gold into the likeness of flowers, of birds with every feather like life, and into a thousand trinkets. Their soil was most fruitful of all that man can want. There was enough of the best for all to eat; and altogether there never was a richer and need never have been a happier people, if they had but been good.

But that is just what they were not. A bad lot they were, cruel and bloodthirsty, continually at war with each other; and as for cruelty, just take this one story: At the opening of a great temple to one of their idols in 1486, about thirty years before the Spaniards came, they sacrificed to the idol seventy thousand human beings.

This offering in sacrifice of human beings to their idols was their regular practice. They got these poor creatures by conquering all the nations around and carrying back their prisoners to sacrifice; and if they failed they took poor people of their own, for blood they and their false gods must have. Men and sometimes women and children were murdered by them in their temples, often with the most horrible tortures, to the number, I am afraid there is no doubt of it, of many thousands every year; and their flesh, afterward cooked delicately, was eaten as a luxury by people who, as far as outward show went, were just as fine ladies and gentlemen as there are now.

When the Spaniards got into Mexico they found the walls of the temples crusted inches thick in blood, the altars of the idols heaped with smoking human hearts, and whole houses full of skulls. They counted in one house one hundred and thirty-six thousand skulls. It was high time to get rid of those Mexicans off the face of the earth, and in God's good time a man was found to rid the earth of them; and that man was Hernando Cortez.

And who was Cortez? He was a poor young Spanish gentleman, son of an infantry captain, who, in his youth, was sickly and weakly; and his father tried to make a lawyer of him, and would have done it, but young Cortez kicked over the traces, as we say, right and left, and turned out such a wild fellow that he would not stay at college; and after getting into plenty of scrapes, started as a soldier to the West Indies when he was only nineteen. Little did people think what stuff there was in that wild, sickly lad!

How he got on in the Spanish West Indies would be a long story. I will only tell you that he turned out a thoroughly good soldier, and a very dashing, smart fellow, a first-rate rider and fencer, a great dandy in his dress; but also—and if you go to hot climates keep this in mind—a particularly sober and temperate man, who drank nothing and could eat anything. And he had, it is said, the most extraordinary power of managing his men. He was always cool and determined; and what he said had to be done, and they knew it; but his way with them was so frank and kind, and he was so ready to be the foremost in daring and enduring, often living worse than his own men, while he was doing everything for their comfort, that there was nothing they would not do for him, as the event proved; for if those soldiers had not trusted him for life and death, I should not have this grand story to tell.

RECEPTION OF PRINCE ALEXANDER.

(See Illustration.)

If there had been any doubt about the true character of the Bulgarian revolution of August 21, when Prince Alexander was carried forcibly out of the country, it would have been removed by the popular ovation of September 3, when he returned to Sofia, and by the demonstrations of public regret when he again quitted it on September 8. The Bulgarians evidently wished to retain Prince Alexander as their ruler, and did not sympathize with the revolution nor with the policy that finally compelled his abdication.

The picture on this page shows the scene when the Prince entered the streets of his capital. The houses and public buildings had been decorated, and all the thoroughfares along the Prince's route were crowded with soldiers and citizens eager to show their loyalty. The priests were in front of the assembly at the entrance to the city, and as the representatives of his people read to him the address of welcome, the Prince replied to it in appropriate terms, and then went to the Cathedral, where a Te Deum was sung, as an expression of gratitude to God for the Prince's return. Everywhere there was joy and congratulation. On the morrow all was changed; the Czar of Russia had declared himself opposed to Prince Alexander, and hinted a threat of Russian occupation of Bulgaria, and the Prince, feeling sure that to retain his throne in the face of Russian hostility would involve the country in misfortunes, signed his abdication, and quitted Sofia.

That the Prince acted wisely there can be no doubt. He could have no hope in a struggle single handed with the gigantic power of Russia. His officers and soldiers declared their readiness to make any sacrifices in his interest, and with tears besought him to stand his ground. But the Prince had a clearer view than they of the situation. He had the sympathy of Austria, Germany and England, but apparently neither of the three would give him active support. Being thus left face to face with an enemy immeasurably his superior in power, he prudently declined a contest which could have but one issue.

The situation in Europe has not become less threatening by Prince Alexander's compliance with the Russian demand. In obeying the Czar he has placed a very difficult and serious problem in the hands of the governments of Europe. They have to decide whether it is safe for them that the Czar should thus arrogantly impose his will on a nation not under his dominion. As Prince Alexander was appointed ruler over Bulgaria by a European council, his expulsion is an insult which the Czar offers to the whole of Europe. It is a menace of a most humiliating character, which must be dealt with now or in the near future. The small boy of the school dare not resist the big bully who wrongs him, but sooner or later the bully himself has to be taught to behave himself, to act justly, and respect the rights of the weak. So it will be with Russia. Her arrogance, her contempt for the sanctity of treaties, her overbearing insolence, must eventually arouse the indignation of Europe, and bring upon her severe castigation. This may come speedily in the selection of a successor to Prince Alexander, or it may be delayed until, emboldened by this and other successes, the Czar ventures on some more impudent outrage on the public opinion of Europe.

It was a pretty scene, as I remember it half a century ago, in a quaint corner of an English county far removed from the turmoil and bustle of the large towns. A quiet country village on a Sunday morning, with the villagers in their old-fashioned clothes coming out of church.

One Sunday especially is very vivid in my memory. Godfrey Ellison with his wife and two comely daughters were just leaving the churchyard, when they were met by one of those comfortable old women, whom nature has sprinkled through every community to be a comfort to others. Mrs. Brown was always the one sent for in every case of sickness; to help the doctor administer the "drops" and apply the leeches. The sick-room seemed to be her natural element, and she felt at home in it. She was emphatically a good woman, kind and motherly in her ways; thinking nothing of leaving her own house and her own work to lend a hand to her neighbor in an emergency. Yet she was a trial to good Mrs. Ellison, who was a pious woman, and anxious about the spiritual welfare of her acquaintance. Many a talk she had with Mrs. Brown about her soul, and many a prayer had she offered for her. It seemed that if Mrs. Brown could be really converted, there were so many opportunities at her disposal for speaking a word in season to the sick and the dying whom she nursed. But it was of no use. Mrs. Brown had been baptized and confirmed; she had never wronged anyone, and she fully expected to be all right at the last.

On this Sunday morning in particular Mrs. Ellison had been "exercised" about her kindly neighbor, who seemed, in her ready helpfulness, not far from the kingdom of God. It seemed like a special providence, meeting her right at the church doors. Mrs. Brown, however, was full of news, which must be told before anything else could be said.

"Have you heered the news o' Joe Wilmott?" she asked.

"No," said Mrs. Ellison. "What's the matter with him? I expected he would get into some trouble with his drunken habits."

"He's fell down and broke his leg, and a mercy it warn't worse. He fell right against the brook when he was agoing home last night, and he might a-fell in and been drowned. My man found him lying there with his leg doubled up under him. Doctor's coming to set it now. I'm agoin' in to help."

"It is a pity you cannot do something to help Joe's soul, as you will his body, said Mrs. Ellison. He needs it badly."

"Oh, Parson 'll happen come and talk to him by-and-bye. He'll mind Parson more nor me," said Mrs. Brown, philosophically.

"Yes, maybe; but if you could get him to look to Christ to keep him from the liquor, and to save his soul, what a good thing it would be. It is sad to think how many people you nurse, and never say anything to help them to salvation. You do so much to help their bodies, that if you could help their souls too, you would be so useful."

"You are always a harping on that string, Mrs. Ellison; anybody to hear you 'ud think I was a heathen instead of a reg'lar church-goer."

"Well, are you not a heathen, or worse? What will you do when you meet God, and have to tell Him that, although He sent His Son to die for you, it was of no use; you would have nothing to do with Him?"

"Oh! it is not so bad as that, Mrs. Ellison; you know I'm very reg'lar at church."

"That makes it worse. If you had never heard about the Saviour I would not wonder; but going to church, you know all about it."

"There's the doctor," said Mrs. Brown, "I mustn't stay," and glad of the diversion, she hurried away, muttering, "Worse nor a heathen, it's come to summat now! I wonder what makes Mrs. Ellison so dead set on me!"

Mrs. Brown was very busy for the next two or three hours; but after the doctor had set Joe's leg, and she sat down to watch by him, her mind reverted to Mrs. Ellison's words. "Worse nor a heathen," she repeated again and again; "what 'll become o' me?"

The words clung to her, ringing in her ears like a trumpet-call. A day or two passed; and her anxiety increased. Finally, much against her inclination, she was driven by her fears to go and see Mrs. Ellison, that she might learn what she ought to do. The first visit was followed by many others, until at last her distress and terror, which had been increasing at each interview, gave place to the peace and joy of those who see in Christ the Way, the Truth and the Life. Mrs. Ellison's hopes were realized, and the good nurse was able to tell to others how they might meet death without dread of the judgment to come.

Mrs. Brown's News.

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

The Only Way.

LEROY could not see why Miss West should think that a great sorrow would change his views about Christianity. If it were true, it was just as much true in happiness as in distress.

He looked at her, but he could not understand, and he changed the subject.

"Have you ever read Voltaire?" he asked.

"To some extent."

"Why not extensively?"

"Because I have no confidence in him."

"Why not?"

"Because he is not entitled to it. A man who lived such a life as he did and was so deceitful in his dealings with men, could not write an honest book. Besides—but have you ever read Nelson's 'Cause and Cure of Infidelity'?"

"I have not."

"I would advise you to do so. Also the first volume of Horne's 'Introduction to the Study of the Bible.' These works are not specially philosophical, but plain and practical, and the argument is on the plane of most people's thinking. I have told you my father was a minister, and when he died he left me his library, or perhaps I never could have talked at all with you on these questions. These two books were in his library, and I have read them again and again. Nelson, in his invaluable work, points out several wilful misrepresentations of Voltaire, which I recall. He says that at one place Voltaire quotes Solomon as speaking of the wine sparkling in the glass. This, Voltaire says, could not have been written by Solomon, as there was no glass in his days. But Voltaire misquotes, for he has it, 'sa couleur brille dans le verre,' when the common French Bible says, 'sa couleur brille dans la coupe,' 'it giveth its color in the cup,' not 'in the glass.' And the Hebrew word, kis, means 'a common cup.' Solomon says nothing about glass! Is not that a palpable misrepresentation? It shows either ignorance or wilful deceit, and if either be true, he is not entitled to respect and confidence. But this is not all. Nelson goes on to show other misrepresentations equally wicked, and says there are many statements false, absolutely false, and calculated to lead the unlearned astray. Can you have any confidence in a man who will do such things?"

"How many Christians do the same?" replied Leroy, hotly. "Only the other day I was reading a debate between an infidel and a Christian, and the latter misrepresents and takes advantage of his opponent in the meanest way."

"And how quickly you lost confidence in him, too. Why not in Voltaire?"

"Why, because this man professed to be a Christian."

"And do you expect more honesty in Christians than in infidels? What a comment on infidelity!" she said, with a triumphant laugh.

"Fairly caught, I confess," said Leroy, joining heartily in the laugh against himself. "I am no match for you in the tactics of the field. That was a regular ambush; and you lured me on."

"No; I simply found you off your guard, and you involuntarily made an admission of what was in your mind before. Well, I agree with you that the creed of a Christian is higher than the man. That is as it should be, because his struggle to attain his ideal is a struggle upward. Your creed, if you have one, is below you, and it will drag you down to its level if you do not abandon it. Let me beg of you, for your own sake, to break through your prejudice, and open your mind to the truth."

"My mind is always open to the truth, Miss Carrie. The question between us is, what is truth? Convince me that this visitor you would introduce is the truth, and the lady shall be admitted immediately. I acknowledge that she is strongly introduced; your indorsement is a very influential one at the doors of my heart."

"Oh, no," said Carrie, blushing, as she saw the direction the conversation was taking; "I would have you admit her for her own sake."

"I am afraid you are deceived as to her character. My heart is not inhospitable to a worthy guest. It opened very readily to you."

"Now, I shall say good-night, Mr. Ransom; this is not fair fighting."

Leroy rose in obedience to her intimation, and said with a smile, "Oh, yes; it is quite fair, and I hope we shall both win."

Leroy walked homeward with some elation. He had succeeded in making his sentiments known to Carrie, and though she had promptly and decisively closed the interview without giving him any encouragement, she must now be perfectly well aware that he loved her. That was a clear step gained. It was an advantage worth having. So attractive a young lady must have admirers, and two in particular Leroy knew. Train had frankly admitted his own ambition on the night when he and Ransom first heard her speak. Then there was Sanderson, and there were, doubtless, more. Slight and indirect as was the declaration he had made, Leroy felt that it was sufficient with so acute a mind as Carrie's to indicate his position unequivocally. Now, if any of those fellows proposed to her she could not give a decision without knowing that he too was a competitor for her hand. In such a case Carrie would doubtless consider the proposal on its merits, and would honestly try to do so without regard to any one else; but a man's merits do rise or fall in the estimation of another according to his relation to those around him, though that other may not be conscious of it. So he felt as if he had written his name down on the list of competitors for a prize.

Meanwhile study went on vigorously. Leroy's love braced his mind to mental effort. He would distinguish himself if it were possible. She should not have cause to blush for him if she accepted him. He was not worthy of her, he admitted freely, but then, what man was worthy? The best he could hope for was to distance his rivals in the college, to stand above them in academical honors, and to compel her admiration if he could not win her love. So in his room, in the class rooms, and at the Franklin Society he worked hard to gain knowledge and to win a place in the very highest ranks of the college. The Franklin Society was his special delight. There he could win triumphs, and there was the best training ground for ready eloquence which is so helpful to the lawyer or legislator. In the prosperity of the Franklin Society, therefore, he took a deep interest, and exerted himself to promote its popularity in the college. He was delighted to see that it was prospering and gaining ground over the Philos, as the rival association called themselves.

One evening the members of the Franklin Society were in secret conference. There was a hot rivalry between the two societies of the college, and sometimes strategy was resorted to in order to gain a victory. On this particular evening the Franklins had met to consult as to the best means of gaining a telling and decisive victory over the Philos. Various ways were suggested, but none could be accepted on account of some flaw in the plot. At last one of the boys proposed a plan which was almost sure of success, but it was not strictly honest. Still the Franklins, in their enthusiasm to carry off the laurels, were on the point of passing a motion to adopt the scheme, when Leroy arose.

"Brother and sister Franklins," he began, "I see that this plan involves a dishonest principle. I object to it. You will say I am stickling for a hair-split point of casuistry, but I care not by what epithet you call it, I stand up for honor among the Franklins. There are many things I do not believe, but I do believe in the principles of honesty. What, the Franklin Society stoop to a trick! I am told that such a thing has never been known in her history, and shall we now smirch her fair name? I am as anxious as any of you to gain a victory, but if it cannot be done honorably, let them carry off the laurels. I am firmly opposed to this motion."

A storm of applause followed. Henry Burt, Francis Train, and others spoke to the same effect, and the motion was voted down, and another plan adopted which, if less sure, was more honorable.

Miss West was present when the subject was debated, and, like Leroy, had been opposed to the dishonorable trick. She hoped that some capable member would oppose it and prevent its adoption, and was pleased that Leroy should be that one. It was a surprise to her, for, assured as she was of his honor, she did not expect that one who was not influenced by religion would have taken the lead in a struggle for truth and high principle.

"How nobly he stands up for the right!" she said to herself as he spoke. "With all his faults and conceits he would not be guilty of an act of meanness." And then she thought, "If I know my own heart, I have never been so interested in any one else as I am in him. His principles are good, if they were only consecrated to a good cause. If something should separate us I should be very sad."

As they were walking home he said, "This is a wicked world; it needs reforming."

"And how do you propose to reform it?"

"By bringing the people to a higher state of culture. By teaching them the natural sciences—science of mind, poetry, literature, ethics, æsthetics—in short, to inform the mind and refine the taste. This would give them something to think about, so that they could not plan wickedness, and hence would not engage in it. Christians accuse us of wanting to tear down or burn down the churches, and put nothing in their stead. They do not know us. I would not tear down a single church; but instead of having them as places in which to preach old superstitions and Jewish mythologies, I would have them converted into temples of science—into laboratories, museums, lecture halls, in which the people should gather Sabbath after Sabbath to be instructed in the mental and physical sciences; to hear discourses on Homer, Virgil, Milton, Shakespeare, and our own glorious poets and philosophers. Thus people would become readers and thinkers, and of course would grow in moral power. They would be refined, scholarly, and true."

"A splendid theory," she replied, "but Utopian and impractical, I fear. We must take people as they are, not as they ought to be, if we want to bring about a reform. Now, if education is really such a powerful incentive to virtue, one would think there would be more of it among the so-called cultured classes. But where will you find more meanness and frivolity, and envy, too, than in many of our colleges—the very centres of culture? Politicians are generally pretty well informed, and many of them are mentally cultured, but how much substantial honor is there in politics? Read about the private lives of literary men, and some even of the writers we most admire, and how much envy and hatred we find! How invidiously some of them write and speak of one another! Read what is said by Carlyle—himself a conspicuous offender—about the unhappiness, faults, and follies of men of letters. He says, 'Look at the biography of authors! Except the Newgate Calendar, it is the most sickening chapter in the history of man.' What became of Otway, Collins and Chatterton? Hannah More says the more she saw of the 'honored, famed, and great,' the more she saw the littleness, the unsatisfactoriness of all created good. Southey calls literary society 'about the worst society in the world,' and denominates literary people cattle. Did culture make Byron and Poe and Gray good men? I think that more is needed than mere mental and literary culture."

"But these same objections might be brought against your much-vaunted religion. It has been a grand failure in keeping us an honorable people, and there are many so-called Christians who are no better than Byron or Poe were."

"The real value of institutions must be estimated by their effect," she answered. "The world is really better for the influence of Christianity—imperfectly as its principles are practised. When you point the finger of scorn at the fallen Christian, what do you imply? Is it not that he has not practised his belief? In other words, that if he had been true to his profession he would have been a good man. What is the logical inference? The man who is true to Christian principle is good. Now, what has infidelity ever done that shows real self-sacrifice for mankind? It has no colleges, no missions, no asylums for the poor and oppressed, no organizations for the education of the heathen. I know no real philanthropist who is a pronounced infidel. On the other hand, look at the institutions of the Church. How many colleges she has founded in our own land! Some say the Church does not foster science. Why, science is taught in every college belonging to her. All over the land are temples whose spires point men to heaven, and all of them are centres of moral force. In nearly every city religion has established missions for the support and elevation of the poor. Do infidels have such institutions? or do they, by any self-denying labor, help to support those that are established? No. Christians teach these down-trodden classes, and with their means support many of them. In pagan lands the Church is trying to educate as well as Christianize the people, and many are sacrificing their lives and leaving country, friends, and all that they love for this great object. Then nearly all the great philanthropists, as well as those who are unknown, are and have been Christians. Why, I believe I am safe in saying that Spurgeon, of London, has been instrumental in building up more institutions of mercy himself than all the infidels of the present day together."

"You speak as if infidels do not believe in doing good," he said, excitedly.

"I know many of them talk a great deal about it, and individually, doubtless, a few of them are charitable; but the question is, Are they as a rule engaged in works of mercy, and have they any organization for the special purpose of lifting the race to higher things? No; unbelief is essentially a tearing down process. It is destructive, not constructive or instructive. If infidelity were inaugurated everywhere, I fear all this mission work would cease."

"No, no, Carrie," he cried; "we believe in all the principles of virtue and truth; we would have all men noble; we only object to the superstitious tenets of the Church and the absurdities of the Bible."

"Ah! but you supply no equivalent substitute for those superstitions, as you term them; and where the human heart demands certainty you leave uncertainty. You cannot tell certainly whether there is a future state, whether sin will be punished, whether, when men repent, they will be forgiven, and to all the queries that the troubled heart utters you answer, 'We do not know.' You believe in virtue and goodness. So does the Church, and the Scriptures taught them centuries ago. So you could introduce nothing new in the realm of ethics, and would demolish everything in the realm of religion. You take away all its comforts and—"

"Stop right there, Carrie. I would tell every man that it cannot be ill with the good; that if a man is truly upright, he will attain to the very best thing in the universe."

"But that is too vague for the practical mind," she answered, "and we must take people as they are. We want a definite good, not some vague, undefined goal of happiness and holiness; we want a definite heaven to anticipate. What comfort could you give to the mother who has just buried her babe?"

"That the best thing is possible."

"Which is virtually telling the afflicted one that we know nothing about it. How different the positive assurances of religion."

"But those assurances may be positive without being true. Does not the Mohammedan find comfort in his religion? yet you have told me that the Church is trying to induce him to give it up. You are trying to rob him of his hope and consolation, actually doing for him what you complain that infidelity is trying to do for you."

"Ah! but observe, when we try to persuade the Mohammedan to give up his religion, we offer him something definite in its stead. We give him better doctrines and more comforting assurances than he had before. But this infidelity does not. Think of the Christians you have known—your father, your mother, any one. Would they have been happier or better if they had not known or had not believed Christianity and lived it?"

"Miss Carrie, I purpose to search this matter out by reason, and not through my emotional nature. You take an unfair advantage when you try to stir up my feelings, and you do not leave my reason clear."

"But are not the emotions," said Carrie, "a part of our mental constitution, and are they not, therefore, for some purpose? All mental philosophies assign an important place to the susceptibilities. You know that. You believe in emotion in other things. In teaching, you try to win the love of your pupils, in order that you may influence their intellects; and sometimes you try to arouse their fears to secure their obedience. Yet both love and fear belong to the emotions. Why have they no place in this great question?"

Leroy did not answer. He knew that in many things he could rely on his emotions more safely than on his reason. Just then, especially, he believed in the emotion of love. But he could not understand that religion was not a matter of mere intellect. He thought religion was only an affair of the head, whereas it is emphatically a matter of the heart as well as the head, and appeals to the strongest and holiest emotions of our being.

JESUS BEFORE PILATE.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 10, John 18 : 28-40.
Golden Text, ver. 38.

The Farcical Trial—The Verdict Settled Beforehand—Jesus' Death Necessary to the Priests' Reputation—His Life a Reproach to Them—A Capital Charge Needed—Blasphemy for the Jews Treason for the Romans—Pilate's Unanswered Question—Declares the Offence Ecclesiastical—Politics on the Bench—The Prisoner's Innocence Admitted—Pilate's Fear of Other Exposures—Another Unanswered Question—Pilate's Modern Followers.

JESUS, betrayed and denied by His own disciples, was now apparently given over to the hands of His enemies. Once again the chief priests and elders of the people took counsel against Him to put Him to death (Matt. 27 : 1). They must have a semblance of law on their side, but it was a miserable subterfuge for justice. Every man among them knew that Jesus was innocent; that His life was so pure as to be a reproach to their own; that He had a power which no man could deny, and that wherever He went He did works of mercy. They took counsel, but upon the verdict. All along the chief priests and Pharisees saw Jesus in the light of their own religious reputation. If the righteousness of Jesus was established, their unreality and unspirituality would be seen by all, and thus, at any cost, Jesus must die. And the question of questions, whether or not He was the Messiah, whether He was the Son of God, did not come into their counsels at all. It was more convenient every way to take for granted that He was an impostor, and to conjure up some accusation against Him which should bring Him to death, and so convince the multitude that, though He could raise the dead, He was not Himself proof against death, and so He could not be the Son of God. Miserable device! But it is just like all man's devices.

They who led Jesus into the judgment hall would not enter in themselves, "lest they should be defiled; but that they might eat the passover." Oh, how little they knew that the Fountain for sin and uncleanness (Zech. 13 : 1) was just about to be opened, and that the blood they were so eager to shed alone cleanseth from all sin! Peter's repentance, just in time; Judas' repentance, just too late, preceded the final condemnation of the Son of Man. Pilate was no party to the faction which sought to put Jesus to death. In his character of judge he asked, "What accusation bring ye against this man?" This is the first question with regard to one who is accused, yet this

QUESTION REMAINED UNANSWERED.

No man could be found to substantiate a charge against Jesus. All they had to say was, "If He were not a malefactor, we would not have delivered Him up unto thee." But justice demanded the proof of this assertion. Law deals, not with assertions, but with proofs of guilt, and these were not forthcoming. The chief priests accused Him of many things, but there was nothing even then that the law could lay hold of until they attempted to prove that He was guilty of high treason. They changed the ground of accusation. Before the high priests they sought to prove that He had incited the people to destroy the temple, wresting His own words; now they attempted to prove that He set Himself up to be King of the Jews. But, after all, the only thing which could give color to the accusation was His ride into Jerusalem mounted on an ass's colt, with little children crying: "Hosanna to the Son of David!" An unarmed mob, with such an One in their midst, did not threaten great danger to the government! Pilate saw through it. "He knew that the chief priests had delivered Him for envy" (Mark 15 : 10). Then Pilate said: "Take ye Him, and judge Him according to your law;" as much as to say: "There is nothing in this case of which the Roman law can take cognizance." It was, in fact, a declaration of the innocence of Jesus. But the ecclesiastical authorities were unwilling for this, and said: "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death." Poor deluded men! They believed themselves champions of the law of God, the very essence of which is love, and which in spirit as well as in letter they were transgressing in all their thoughts and words at this very time.

Jesus knew beforehand that He should be delivered over to the Gentiles (Matt. 20 : 19). But Pilate, like the chief priests, had

HIS OWN ENDS TO SERVE.

He would not willingly offend the Jews, and so he took up the only accusation which had a shadow of truth about it, and said unto Him: "Art Thou the King of the Jews?" Jesus answered him, Sayest thou this thing of thyself, or did others tell it thee of Me?" If Pilate saw through the Jews, Jesus saw through Pilate, and even at this moment the soul of the Roman governor was dear to his Saviour. He sought to arouse the conscience of this man, that so by some means he might be saved. Jesus knew that Pilate had no fear of political troubles on His account, and that he was tampering with his own conscience in this mock tribunal; yet Pilate wanted to justify himself. He said: "Am I a Jew? Thine own nation and the chief priests have delivered Thee unto me: what hast Thou done?" Jesus took him out of his depth in His answer: "My kingdom is not of this world: if My kingdom were of this world, then would My servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews: but now is My kingdom not from hence." This was unanswerable. Only one blow had ever been struck in defence of Jesus, when Peter cut off the ear of the high-priest's servant, and Jesus healed him.

Pilate would have released Jesus, but if he did it must be upon his own responsibility, and this he would not do. Pilate's wife "sent to him, saying, Have thou nothing to do with that just man: for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of Him." Oh, how we see the hand of God in all this, seeking to hold him back! For a few moments he wavered, and when the people chose Barabbas he said: "What shall I do then with Jesus which is called Christ?" The people answered: "Let Him be crucified." Pilate, for the moment, took up the cause of justice, and said: "Why, what evil hath He done?" Seeing that "he could prevail nothing"—i.e., nothing without a decided verdict of the innocence of Jesus, which, for fear of the Jews, he was unwilling to give—"he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just Person" (Matt. 27 : 19-24). Poor Pilate! "Though thou wash thee with nitre, and take thee much soap, yet thine iniquity is marked before Me, saith the Lord God" (Jer. 2 : 22).

He who overrules all things permitted everything possible to work together so that Pilate should have no shadow of excuse for condemning Jesus. It was the custom that one prisoner should be released at the feast. Pilate offered the people their choice whether Barabbas, the most notorious criminal of the day, or Jesus, should be released to them. The chief priests influenced the people, and the cry was for Barabbas. How He remained true to His own teaching: "I say unto you, That ye resist not evil" (Matt. 5 : 39). The accusation of the Jews had fallen to the ground by the very facts of the case, yet this non-resisting, wonderful, unearthly Man claimed a kingdom, and Pilate said: "Art Thou a king then?" Jesus answered, Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth My voice." It was like an appeal to this man: "Wilt not thou hear My voice?" Jesus was not seeking to plead His own cause, but to save Pilate's soul. Alas! alas! that misguided self-interest prevailed! Pilate thought his interests safer in his own hands than in those of Jesus, and though he went out to the Jews and said to them: "I find in Him no fault at all," yet it was this very Pilate who passed sentence that Jesus should be crucified.

Oh, how depraved is poor human nature! Pilate came so near being saved, but he left off with the question unanswered which every man should get answered at any cost—

"WHAT IS TRUTH?"

He asked it of Jesus, who is the Truth, but alas! he did not wait for the answer; and yet when he asked it he was in the very presence of Jesus. The dying thief and the centurion discovered what is truth, but Pilate thought he could not afford to sound it; he would lose his position, his wealth, his honor, if he were to take part with Jesus, and he has lost his soul by taking part against Jesus!

Every living man who has heard the Gospel is, day by day and hour by hour, passing sentence upon Jesus. Either we are going out to Him "without the camp bearing His reproach," and glorying that it is "enough for the disciple that he be as his Master, and the servant as his Lord," or we are against Jesus. If we will have a "kingdom of this world," if we will be something and somebody here, if we will justify ourselves and seek our own, if we will fight our own battles and exercise lordship over others, we side with Pilate and condemn Jesus. But if, on the contrary, we let Jesus reign over us and in us, if He is Lord over all we are and all we have, if He is to be honored, if He is to take the first place, if He is to fight our battles and we be simply at His disposal, as He was at His Father's disposal, then we are taking part with Him. There may be, there will be, suffering; but it is that which brings the greatest sweetness with it, the blessed, constant consciousness of His presence with us, the knowledge that He takes the responsibility of our life, and that He cannot but carry out His own purposes. God calls us "kings and priests," but not of this world. Our kingdom, like our Lord's, is "not from hence," our honor not the flattery of men, but the "honor that cometh from God only;" it is the honor of fitting into God and taking our relative position with regard to Him, serving His purpose who is our blessed, indwelling God.

THERE'S ONLY ONE.

"Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee."
PSALM lxxiii. 25.

There's only One on whose dear arm
We safely lay our thoughts to rest;
There's only One who knows the depth
Of sorrow in each stricken breast.

There's only One whose pity falls
Like dew upon the wounded heart;
There's only One who never stirs,
Though enemy and friend depart.

There's only One, when none are by,
To wipe away the falling tear;
There's only One to heal the wound,
And stay the weak one's timid fear.

There's only One who understands
And enters into all we feel;
There's only One who views each spring,
And each perplexing wheel in wheel.

There's only One who can support,
And who sufficient grace can give
To bear up under every grief,
And spotless in this world to live.

O blessed Jesus, Friend of friends!
Come, hide us 'neath Thy sheltering arm;
And while amid this evil world,
Keep us from all its guilt and harm.

Thou art the One, the only One,
For whom no love too warm can flow;
Thou art the One, the only One,
In whom there's perfect rest below.

"I MUST DIE TO WIN."

This is a common expression, one used perhaps more frequently in connection with Life Insurance as an objection to the ordinary plan. "It is an excellent form of provision for the family, but I must die to win."

YOU MAY LIVE AND WIN.

This refers to the Endowment plan, which meets the above objection. Take, for instance, a policy payable to yourself 10, 15 or 20 years hence. Say you die before the termination of the period—your family wins. You survive the period, the policy becomes at once a provision for your own advancing years. You have lived and won.

The "MANHATTAN'S" new plan meets the case. It retains the advantage of the Endowment feature, while it reduces the net cost of Life Insurance under the contract to almost nothing.

For an example of the operation of this plan address the Company, giving your nearest age, and a statement will be sent to you. Mention this paper.

Literary Leaders.

The greedy grasp of monopoly is broken. The short-sighted policy of seeking $1.00 profit from each of 1,000 readers gives place to the more liberal plan of asking a few cents profit from each of a million readers, ($1.00 multiplied by 1,000 equals $1,000 but 2 cents multiplied by 1,000,000 equals $20,000). Surely the most brilliant products of American literary genius are wanted by the millions. The expiration of copyright enables me now to publish beautiful editions of some of the most famous writings of EMERSON, IRVING, PRESCOTT, HAWTHORNE, and others. I here describe three volumes which I offer as representative of their authors, and as specimens of new styles in book-making which I have recently introduced.

Emerson says: In the highest civilization the book is still the highest delight. He who has once known its satisfactions is provided with a resource against calamity. Angels they are to us of entertainment, sympathy, and provocation, whose embalmed life is the highest feat of art.

Ideal Edition is the name I have adopted for the new form and style in which I issue many celebrated works. It is almost universally pronounced unique and beautiful, as neat and graceful as it is convenient, easy for the eye, perfect in form for hand-holding and equally well adapted for the library shelf. Description is inadequate. See it!

Nature and other Addresses is the volume I have chosen to represent Emerson. It is the work which most greatly contributed to his fame. It treats of: 1, NATURE; 2, COMMODITY; 3, BEAUTY; 4, LANGUAGE; 5, DISCIPLINE; 6, IDEALISM; 7, SPIRIT; 8, PROSPECTS; 9, THE METHOD OF NATURE; 10, LITERARY ETHICS. EXPRESSIONS of profound regret have been called forth from all denominations of Christians by the intelligence that Mr. Samuel Morley, the distinguished philanthropist, is dead. He was well known in America, having paid an extended visit to this country in 1881. He died on September 5th, and was buried amid signs of general mourning, in Abney Park Cemetery, London, on Sept. 10th.

Mr. Morley was noted chiefly for his munificent gifts to religious and philanthropic work, but he was also distinguished for active personal labor in the cause of Christ, and for his strenuous efforts in Parliament and out of it to promote legislation for the benefit of workingmen and the poor.

HIS PRIVATE MUNIFICENCE.

It was extraordinary. It was exercised with discrimination, but without limit. Many tradesmen who to-day are in comfortable circumstances, are largely indebted to Samuel Morley for their position and good name. He has been known in times of commercial pressure not only to forego his own claims upon a debtor, but to advance money without interest or security to enable him to tide over the crisis of his affairs. Once satisfied of the integrity of an unfortunate man, and convinced that to aid him would be an act of Christian charity, and Samuel Morley gave or lent with no grudging hand. Many a hoary-headed Christian whom the vicissitudes of trade have involved in difficulties, has been seen on his knees thanking God with a heart full of gratitude and eyes suffused with tears, that through Samuel Morley's aid he has been saved from bankruptcy, and the Church of Christ from reproach through his financial collapse. The extent of such benefactions is of course unknown; but a London accountant said recently that in the exercise of his profession he had found instances of Mr. Morley's private generosity which aggregated a sum incredible by persons who could not test its truth.

A FATHER TO THE ORPHAN.

Another form in which Mr. Morley was able to do a beneficent work was in the charity schools. Mr. Morley's face was well known in every institution where orphans and friendless children are congregated. He delighted in taking boys into his house of business, when their education was completed, and they were looking forward to a struggle in the world, unaided, with some apprehension. There they were carefully watched to see what kind of talent they developed, and some were placed in the factory, others in the warehouse in London, and others in the office, according as the bent of their minds suggested, and in each department a career honorable and prosperous was open to them. Thus, throughout Great Britain and the colonies may be found men engaged in commercial pursuits, respected and prosperous, who owe, under God's blessing, all they have and are to Samuel Morley's aid and wise Christian counsels given at the critical time when they were entering upon life orphaned and friendless. Such are some of the ways in which the princely income Mr. Morley derived from his business was made to work for the cause of Christ and the welfare of men.

HUGUENOT ANCESTRY.

Samuel Morley was descended from the Morlains, an ancient Huguenot family who, before the massacre of St. Bartholomew, being exiled from France, settled in England. There they engaged in a humble way in the manufacture of hosiery, and with frugality managed to earn a livelihood. They had gone to England because there they could enjoy religious liberty, not to make money. But the sterling honesty, the intelligence and skill of these French stocking-makers began to have an effect in the trade. Their productions were sought after because they were reliable, and very soon their prosperity was established. The occupation was continued by their descendants. About the close of the last century one of them, John Morley, was well known as a manufacturer of hosiery on a large scale. He, with his brother Richard, opened a warehouse on the third floor of a building in London under the style of J. and R. Morley, which title the firm still bears, though both John and Richard have long been dead. Small as was the beginning of the business, its growth was rapid, and it continues to increase. It has now transactions with every civilized nation on the face of the earth. In all the countries of Europe, in the cities of America, in India, Australia, and in South Africa, wherever a dry goods store is established, there may be seen, with more or less frequency, the famous initials J. & R. M. on boxes and bales, which indicate that the goods encased are the manufacture of the eminent firm of J. and R. Morley, of London.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

Samuel Morley was the youngest of John's three children. He was born at Hackney, a suburb of London, in the year 1809. He was, therefore, in his seventy-seventh year when he died. Both his parents were godly persons, but his mother was a woman of singularly pure and elevated spirit. Very recently, referring to some remarks that had been made about him, Samuel Morley said, "I am much what my mother made me, and I wish to continue so." He was educated at a private school, and his aptitude for learning and progress in his studies suggested to some of his friends that he would probably find his life-sphere in the ministry. It was not, however, so to be, and in early manhood he joined the business of his father and uncle in London, where he soon became the chief director and moving spirit; his elder brother undertaking the management of the factories that were established in Nottingham, which is the centre of the hosiery trade. The sagacity and enterprise of the principal partner, Mr. John Morley, aided by the efforts of his two sons, John and Samuel, enabled the firm to take advantage of the changed and more favorable conditions of commerce, and to climb to the highest place on the ladder of commercial success.

MARRIAGE AND BUSINESS.

In the year 1841 Mr. Morley married Miss Rebekah Maria Hope, daughter of Mr. Samuel Hope, banker, of Liverpool, and this marriage placed at his command additional capital, which permitted of the development of the business, and the erection of the imposing warehouse, which when first built was one of the sights of London. His interest in the young people employed by him was shown in the provision made in the building for their moral and religious well-being, and not a few Christian ministers gratefully remember the influences that gathered round their young life when they were in Mr. Morley's service.

The business was conducted by the two brothers, the sons of the original John Morley, until 1858, when the elder brother retired, and it has since been carried on by Samuel Morley alone, on a plan which showed his benevolent spirit. It was his habit to admit into a limited partnership, for a certain number of years, five men, who at the time were the heads of departments. They became partners, and the next in rank in each department was promoted to the head of the department, to be taken into partnership when the due time came. Thus every boy who entered the employ of Mr. Morley had before him the possibility of winning the magnificent prize of a partnership in the famous house. Being thus brought into close contact with young men, and taking so deep an interest in their welfare, it was natural that he should foster the growth of the Young Men's Christian Associations. They found in him a warm and liberal friend, on whose aid they could count in every emergency. Not many years ago, when the famous building known as Exeter Hall, and honored by many hallowed associations, was offered for sale, and efforts were made to use it as a theatre, Samuel Morley came to the rescue. He wrote his cheque for twenty-five thousand dollars, and gave it to the Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. to enable him to buy the building for the Association.

AID TO CHURCHES

came from him, too, with astonishing munificence. Any church desiring to erect a new building or to clear its present building of debt, might count on a gift from Mr. Morley. The low spiritual condition of London weighed heavily upon him, and he labored hard to arouse public interest in the subject. Eventually twenty-four places of worship of the Congregational denomination were built as the result of his effort, and to each of them he gave $2,500—a total of sixty thousand dollars in that one matter alone. He loved the Congregational denomination dearly, and it is deeply indebted to him. It showed its consciousness of its obligations last year, by electing him Chairman of the Congregational Union for 1887—the most distinguished mark of honor it could pay to any of its members. Toward the cost of its beautiful Memorial Hall in London, Mr. Morley gave $30,000; and shortly before his death he undertook to pay $25,000 more toward the cost of erecting ten similar halls, on a smaller scale in various parts of London, for poor brethren to meet in.

One of his earliest and most valuable public services was rendered to the cause of Christ in rural England, when he undertook to assist in the resuscitation of the Home Missionary Society. It was found that, either from lack of enterprise or lack of funds, the County associations were doing but little evangelistic work; and the aid rendered by the Home Missionary Society was not worthily responded to by the gifts of the churches. Mr. Morley, on becoming treasurer of the society, resolved to visit the counties of England, holding conferences wherever possible, and at least getting into personal contact with the wealthier members of the churches. In this work the of Mr. Morley's philanthropy found abundant illustration. He was willing himself to give in a generous fashion, but so that it might act as an example to others. He felt that giving was most effective when accompanied with personal service. And he made it a condition of his gift, that it should stimulate the liberality of others. The kind of work he did, and the power he exerted, may be illustrated by his experience at Worcester. At the Conference there he asked the pastor, if he thought that five gentlemen present could be induced to give $500 each for lay evangelical work. It does not seem that the Conference then responded, but Mr. Morley canvassed a few of the friends privately, and presently laid on the table a list of subscriptions amounting to $9,250 from nine persons. That list was almost entirely a response to his personal influence.

Mr. Morley was an earnest advocate of temperance, and some years ago prepared a paper, which was published, portraying in vivid colors the evils of the drinking habit among commercial men. The following sketch of

in a provincial hotel, taken from its pages, showed that Mr. Morley knew the temptations to which his employees were exposed: "It is four o'clock, or half-past; the soup and fish are on the table, dinner is announced, and eight or ten sit down to the repast. The oldest in the house occupies the head of the table, and is called President; the last comer doing the duties of the vice-chair. The President, after consulting 'Mr. Vice and gentlemen,' orders in two bottles of sherry, which, somehow or other, manage to disappear before the fish is removed; if game succeed the joints, port is considered a proper accompaniment.

"In the absence of game, port is brought in with the cheese, when Mr. President very kindly challenges his friends to a 'round robin'; and if the party be a jovial one, it not unfrequently happens that before the cloth is withdrawn the usual pint is consumed; and as commercial men are very loyal, and must toast the Queen, and as they have had a good dinner, some one (generally the President), feeling on good terms with himself and with all the world, proposes that they shall have an extra bottle, and this extra bottle is sometimes followed by one or two more. After 'the Queen,' such toasts as 'Absent Friends,' 'Wives and Sweethearts,' 'Success to Trade,' etc., are given. On Sunday it is not unusual to sit at the table from four till seven or eight o'clock.

"We have said enough, without commenting on the drinking, smoking, card and billiard playing, in the evening, to show the evil of such customs. We maintain that these habits of drinking, whatever may be urged to the contrary, unfit men for business, and that they are fearfully injurious to drinkers themselves, to their employers, to their families, and to others; and numerous instances attesting the truth of this could be collected."

Mr. Morley not only urged others to abstain, but himself set the example of total abstinence, and was President of the Band of Hope Union. In Parliament he was a strong advocate of the Permissive Bill, which is equivalent to the measure we call Local Option. His practical good sense also prompted him to attack a practice very common in England—that of paying workmen their wages in the nearest saloon. His first step after he entered Parliament was to bring in a bill making that practice illegal. His

did not take place until he was fifty-six years of age, though he had long taken a keen interest in socio-political questions. He was a consistent Liberal, but preferred slow reformatory to sudden and violent changes, and, therefore, but seldom felt able to stand in the front rank with the more forward school of politicians. As in philanthropy, so in politics, his supreme interest lay in the improvement of the condition of the people. With this in view he was always found on the side of any movement to give greater liberty to the people, to remove restrictions from them, and to protect the poor against the rapacity of unscrupulous employers. With his keen sense of justice and fair-play, he heartily supported Mr. Gladstone's effort to obtain for Ireland the right to govern herself by her own legislative assembly. In the House he sat as representative of the city of Bristol. (A picture of one of the principal streets of that busy place appears on the first page, with a picture of the Market Place at Nottingham, where the manufactories of the firm are situated.)

About two years ago Mr. Morley retired from Parliament, intending to devote his remaining years exclusively to religious and philanthropic work. Early last spring, however, he had a severe attack of pneumonia, and though he appeared to have recovered from it, his vigorous constitution was evidently impaired. He suffered from that time from a weakness of the heart, and was confined to his house much of his time. On Saturday, September 4, he had a fainting fit, from which he never rallied. He lingered in unconsciousness until the following day, when he peacefully breathed his last. He leaves five sons and two daughters. One of his sons is a director in the Bank of England, and another—Mr. Arnold Morley—is a member of Parliament, and one of Mr. Gladstone's aides-de-camp in the organization and direction of the Liberal Party.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Roman Priest's Conversion.—Mr. Lakin observed at a recent meeting: "Some time ago I was at Dublin, where we had splendid meetings, people getting saved every night, and not by twos and threes, but by hundreds, and among them many Roman Catholics; and I remember one meeting particularly, where a Roman Catholic Priest, and another young man just preparing for the priesthood, were both converted. The next night both of them were at the meeting, and the priest was not a bit backward in getting on the platform and professing his faith in Christ, his being born again and entering upon a new life."

A Variety Theatre Singer's Ingratitude.—An Evangelist observed: "A preacher and a music hall singer were staying at the same hotel, and one day, both being a little too late for the regular dinner, they sat down at a side table by themselves. The singer at once unceremoniously began to devour his dinner. The preacher waited for a moment or two, then said, 'I beg your pardon, but have you said grace?' 'No,' replied the man; 'I never say grace.' 'Oh,' replied the preacher; 'and how old are you?' 'Forty-five.' 'And you have lived on the Lord for forty-five years and have never thought it worth your while to thank Him for all He has given you.'"

Ruined by a Bad Mother.—Mr. Langley observed: "I remember some of us getting a good situation for a poor servant girl, whom we had met in the market. For some time she did well and pleased her mistress; but unfortunately she had a bad mother, and she constantly came to her tormenting her, and causing a disturbance, until at length her mistress was obliged to dismiss the young woman. From that time she took to evil ways, going from bad to worse. I saw her a few days ago, and said to her, 'Miss Harriet, are you not going to leave this bad life and come out again for Christ?' 'Oh,' she replied, 'I should have been happy had I remained in Christ's service, and would always have been there if it had not been for my mother; but when she lost me my place, she was entirely to blame, and I am but what my mother made me. She will have to answer before God for the ruin she has made of me.'"

A Vocal Soloist Saved.—A Devoted Worker for Christ remarked: "I was once at a meeting held by a few workingmen, that they might praise and thank the Lord for all His goodness to them and save their unconverted relatives and companions. A young man came occasionally to sing to them, he being blessed with a good voice. He was known to be most actively engaged in Christian work, and none of us ever doubted but that he was a Christian. But coming out of the meeting one night with a friend, he surprised me by saying, 'I don't think that young man that sings the solos is a Christian.' 'How?' I asked. 'Because,' he said, 'when he sings these hymns he does not put enough emphasis on the word Jesus.' Though I tried to convince him he was wrong, he persisted, and determined to ask the young man himself, and he really was not converted, but before my friend left him he joyfully accepted Christ, and now when he sings he puts all the emphasis on the incomparable name of the Saviour."

Through the Attic Trap-door.—Mr. Cole said: "Some time ago we had in our mission a little boy about ten years of age; when he became converted, though he was very young and very poor, he became a real missionary. He and I used to go through the district singing hymns, and he carrying a little bundle of tracts, and when he saw a man coming down the street, away he would run and give him one. Well, this little fellow got unwell, and his father, being long out of work, he was unable to get much food. I went to visit him; and what a house that was: At the head of a long court, up four or five flights, and then through a trap-door into the attic, and then I found the poor little fellow, and though he was unable to work in the streets as before, still he was working for Christ, even in that lonely attic, for he led his little sister Lily to trust in Jesus, and to look forward to meeting him in heaven. I said to him, 'Are you not sorry to go away to Jesus?' 'Oh, no,' he said, 'I am most happy to think of being with Him; but I said, 'Are you not sorry to leave your father and mother and little sister?' 'Yes,' replied he, 'I would like them to come with me. But I can trust them with the Lord. Just two days ago, that is Lily and mother and I, having no food in the house, prayed to God to send some bread and butter and other things; and before we were right off our knees, there was a man at the door with bread and butter, and coals, and everything that we needed. How can I fail to trust God, who gives us everything that we ask, and should I not be happy to be with Him?'"

Result of a Mother's Death.—Mr. Evans said: "The late Mr. J. B. Gough was very fond of his mother and sister, and when he for the first time had fallen a prey to drink, they both came to stay with him. He was a bookbinder, and had very small wages then, yet they lived happily together in their little home. One morning, on a very warm day, he left the house as usual; his mother was very feeble, but there was no immediate danger. He went to his work till time for closing; then, after going for a bath, he was returning home quite lightheartedly, bounding up the stairs two or three steps at a time and whistling joyously, when he was met at the top by his sister, who with white face and tear-swollen eyes was waiting to tell him the sad news. She simply said, 'John, mother's dead.' For a few moments he stood motionless; then, staggering forward, he seized his sister's hand, and laughing like a maniac, bounded up-stairs to his little attic, and stayed there all night. When that mother was buried, she was followed to the grave by only her son and daughter. One would have thought that such an affliction would have had the effect of drawing John nearer to Christ; but it had precisely the opposite effect, for he again took to drink, gave up his employment, and shortly afterwards we find him ridiculing the temperance movement in songs which he sang on the platform of a theatre. Sorrow and suffering have always some effect upon us, either softening or hardening our hearts, either drawing us nearer to or driving us farther away from Christ."

Maggie's Welcome Home.—Mr. Rd. Weaver narrates: "I heard of a young woman who came from the Highlands to the city of Glasgow, and there entered upon a life of sin. One night, passing a hall where an evangelistic meeting was going on, she heard them sing a hymn which she remembered to have heard her mother sing years before; it brought back all the old times; she thought she saw her mother sitting by the fireside in the evening when all the work was done, and praising God in those beautiful hymns. She went in to the meeting, and before it closed gave herself to God. At the end of the meeting she told one of the workers her story, how she had quarrelled with her mother and come to Glasgow to have her own way; but she said, 'This very night I shall start to go back to her.' After walking ninety miles, she came to her mother's door. She knocked, but there was no answer; she knocked again, no answer; again, and still no answer. Then she tried the latch; it lifted, the door opened, and she stood in her mother's house once again. Her mother she could see in another room kneeling on her knees in prayer. On hearing the noise, she turned round and said, 'Who's there?' 'Your poor, lost Maggie come home,' sobbed the girl. 'Oh, God be thanked,' cried the woman; 'I knew the Lord would bring you home, for I prayed Him to do so.' 'Mother,' said the daughter, 'how is it that I, coming home at one o'clock in the morning, find the door open?' The mother gave her a look of love, and said, 'For seven long years that door has never been shut. I knew you would come, and I could not think of your coming home at any time and finding the door shut.'"

SCATTERED ENEMIES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, October 3, 1886.

"Let God arise, let His enemies be scattered."—Ps. 68: 1.

A Battle-Hymn—Chanted by the Cameronians—By Cromwell's Ironsides—A Battle-Cry Needed Now—Lost Leaders—The Banners of the Sects—A Battle-Cry for all Christendom—The Time Come—Blasphemy Abroad—A Boaster Killed by Lightning—A Blasphemer's Challenge Accepted—The Evil of Drunkenness—The Uxoricide of the Century—Social Impurity—Worse than Sodom—The Confession of a Procuress—The Epochs of History—A New One at Hand.

A PROCESSION was formed to carry the Ark, or sacred box, which, though only three feet nine inches in length and four feet three inches in height and depth, was the symbol of God's presence. As the leaders of the procession lifted this ornamented and brilliant box by two golden poles run through four golden rings, and started for Mount Zion, all the people chanted the battle hymn of my text, "Let God arise, let His enemies be scattered."

of Scotland, outraged by James the First, who forced upon them religious forms that were offensive, and by the terrible persecution of Drummond, Dalziel and Turner, and by the oppressive laws of Charles the First and Charles the Second, were driven to proclaim war against tyrants, and went forth to fight for religious liberty; and the mountain heather became red with carnage, and at Bothwell Bridge and Aird's Moss and Drumclog the battle hymn and the battle shout of those glorious old Scotchmen was the text I have chosen: "Let God arise, let His enemies be scattered."

What a whirlwind of power was Oliver Cromwell, and how with his soldiers, named

he went from victory to victory! Opposing armies melted as he looked at them. He dismissed Parliament as easily as a schoolmaster a school. He pointed his finger at Berkeley Castle, and it was taken. He ordered Sir Ralph Hopton, the General, to dismount, and he dismounted. See Cromwell marching on with his army, and hear the battle-cry of "the Ironsides," loud as a storm and solemn as a death-knell, standards reeling before it, and cavalry horses going back on their haunches, and armies flying at Marston Moor, at Wincepy Field, at Naseby, at Bridgewater and Dartmouth—"Let God arise, let His enemies be scattered!"

So you see my text is not like a complimentary and tasselled sword that you sometimes see hung up in a parlor, a sword that was never in battle and only to be used on general training day, but more like some weapon carefully hung up in your home, telling its story of Chapultepec, Cerro Gordo, and Cherubusco, and Thatcher's Run, and Malvern Hill—for my text hangs in the Scripture armory, telling of the holy wars of three thousand years in which it has been carried, but as keen and mighty as when David first unsheathed it. It seems to me that in the Church of God, and in all styles of reformatory work, is a battle-cry. We raise our little standard, and put on it the name of some man who only a few years ago began to live and in a few years will cease to live. We go into contest against the armies of iniquity, depending too much on human agencies. We use for a battle-cry the name of some brave Christian reformer, but after a while that reformer dies, or gets old, or loses his courage, and then we take another battle-cry, and this time perhaps we put the name of some one who plays Arnold and sells out to the enemy. What we want for a battle-cry is the name of some leader who will never betray us, and will never surrender, and will never die.

All respect have I for brave men and women, but if we are to get the victory all along the line we must take the hint of the Gideonites, who wiped out the Bedouin Arabs, commonly called Midianites. These Gideonites had a glorious leader in Gideon, but what was the battle-cry with which they flung their enemies into the worst defeat into which any army was ever tumbled? It was

and of Gideon." Put God first, whoever you put second. If the army of the American Revolution are to free America, it must be "the sword of the Lord and of Washington." If the Germans want to win the day at Sedan, it must be "the sword of the Lord and of Von Moltke." Waterloo was won for the English, because not only the armed men at the front, but the worshippers in the cathedrals at the rear, were crying "the sword of the Lord and of Wellington."

The Methodists have gone in triumph across nation after nation with the cry, "The sword of the Lord and of Wesley." The Presbyterians have gone from victory to victory with the cry, "The sword of the Lord and of John Knox." The Baptists have conquered millions after millions for Christ with the cry, "The sword of the Lord and of Judson." The American Episcopalians have won their mighty way with the cry, "The sword of the Lord and of Bishop McIlvaine." The victory is to those who put God first. But as we want a battle-cry suited to all sects of religionists, and to all lands, I nominate as in the approaching Armageddon the words of my text, sounded before the ark as it was carried to Mount Zion: "Let God arise, let His enemies be scattered."

As far as our finite mind can judge, it seems about time for God to rise. Does it not seem to you that the abominations of this earth have gone far enough? Was there ever a time when sin was so defiant? Were there ever before so many fists lifted toward God, telling Him to come on if He dare? Look at the

BLASPHEMY ABROAD!

What towering profanity! Would it be possible for anyone to calculate the numbers of times that the name of the Almighty God and of Jesus Christ are every day taken irreverently on the lips? So common has blasphemy become, that the public mind and public ear have got used to it, and a blasphemer goes up and down this country in his lectures defying the plain law against blasphemy, and there is not a mayor in America that has backbone enough to interfere with him save one, and that, the Mayor of Toronto. Profane swearing is as much forbidden by the law as theft or arson or murder, yet who executes it? Profanity is worse than theft or arson or murder, for these crimes are attacks on humanity—that is, an attack on God.

This country is pre-eminent for blasphemy. A man travelling in Russia was supposed to be a clergyman. "Why do you take me to be a clergyman?" said the man. "Oh," said the Russian, "all other Americans swear." The crime is multiplying in intensity. God very often shows what He thinks of it, but for the most part the fatality is hushed up. A few summers ago, among the Adirondacks, I met the funeral procession of a man who, two days before, had fallen under a flash of lightning, while boasting, after a Sunday of work in the fields, that he had cheated God out of one day anyhow, and the man who worked with him on the same Sabbath is still living, but a helpless invalid, under the same flash.

On the road from Margate to Ramsgate, England, you may find a rough monument with the inscription "A boy was struck dead here, while in the act of swearing." Years ago, in a Pittsburgh prison, two men were talking about the Bible and Christianity, and one of them, Thompson by name, applied to Jesus Christ a very low and villainous epithet, and as he was uttering it, he fell. A physician was called, but no help could be given. After a day lying with distended pupils and palsied tongue, he passed out of this world. In a cemetery in Sullivan county, in this State, are in a line and all alike, and these are the facts: In 1861 diphtheria raged in the village, and a physician was remarkably successful in curing his patients. So confident did he become that he boasted that no case of diphtheria could stand before him, and finally defied Almighty God to produce a case of diphtheria that he could not cure. His youngest child soon after took the disease and died, and one child after another, until all the eight had died of diphtheria. The blasphemer challenged Almighty God, and

GOD ACCEPTED THE CHALLENGE.

But I come later down and give you a fact that is proved by scores of witnesses. This last August, of 1886, a man got provoked at the continued drought and the ruin of his crops, and in the presence of his neighbors he cursed God, saying that he would cut His heart out if he would come, calling Him a liar and a coward, and flashing a knife. And while he was speaking his lower jaw dropped, smoke issued from mouth and nostrils, and the heat of his body was so intense it drove back those who would come near. Scores of people visited the scene and saw the blasphemer in awful process of expiring.

Do not think that because God has been silent in your case, oh profane swearer! that He is dead. Is there nothing now in the peculiar feeling of your tongue, or nothing in the numbness of your brain, that indicates that to avenge your blasphemies, or is already avenging them? But these cases I have noticed, I believe, are only a few cases where there are hundreds. Families keep them still to avoid the horrible conspicuity. Physicians suppress them through professional confidence. It is a very, very long roll that contains the names of those who died with blasphemies on their lips.

Still the crime rolls on, up through parlors, up through chandeliers with lights all ablaze, and through the pictured corridors of club-rooms, etc., out through busy exchanges where oath meets oath, and down through all the haunts of sin, mingling with the rattling dice and cracking billiard-balls, and the laughter of her who hath forgotten the covenant of her God; and round the city, and round the continent, and round the earth a seething, boiling surge flings its hot spray into the face of a long-suffering God. And the ship-captain damns his crew, and the merchant damns his clerks, and the master-builder damns his men, and the hack-driver damns his horse; and the traveller damns the stone that bruises his foot, or the mud that soils his shoes, or the defective time-piece that gets him too late to the rail train. I arraign profane swearing and blasphemy, two names for the same thing, as being one of the gigantic crimes of this land, and for its extirpation it does seem as if it were about time for God to arise.

THE EVIL OF DRUNKENNESS.

Whether you live in Brooklyn or New York, or Chicago or Cincinnati, or Savannah or Boston, or in any of the cities of this land, count up the saloons on that street as compared with the saloons five years ago, and see they are growing far out of proportion to the increase of the population. You people who are so precise and particular lest there should be some imprudence or rashness in attacking the rum traffic, will have your son some night pitched into your front door dead drunk, or your daughter will come home with her children because her husband has, by strong drink, been turned into a demoniac. The rum fiend has despoiled whole streets of good homes in all our cities. Fathers, brothers, sons on the funeral pyre of strong drink! Fasten tighter the victims! Stir up the flames! Pile on the corpses! More men, women and children for the sacrifice! Let us have whole generations on fire of evil habit; and at the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery and dulcimer let all the people fall down and worship King Alcohol, or you shall be cast into the fiery furnace under some political platform!

I indict this evil as the regicide, the fratricide, the patricide, the matricide,

THE UXORICIDE OF THE CENTURY.

Yet under what innocent and delusive and mirthful names alcoholism deceives the people! It is a "cordial." It is "bitters." It is an "eye-opener." It is an "appetizer." It is a "digestive." It is an "invigorator." It is a "settler." It is a "night-cap." Why don't they put on the right labels—"Essence of Perdition," "Conscience Stupefier," "Five Drachms of Heart-ache," "Tears of Orphanage," "Blood of Souls," "Scabs of an Eternal Leprosy," "Venom of the Worm That Never Dies"? Only once in a while is there anything in the title of liquors to even hint their atrocity, as in the case of sour mash. That I see advertised all over. It is an honest name, and any one can understand it. Sour mash! That is, it makes a man's disposition sour, and his associations sour, and his prospects sour; and then it is good to mash his body, and mash his soul, and mash his business, and mash his family. Sour mash! One honest name at last for an intoxicant! But through lying labels of many of the apothecaries' shops, good people, who are only a little undertone in health, and wanting of some invigoration, have unwittingly got on their tongue the fangs of this cobra, that stings to death so large a ratio of the human race.

Others are ruined by the common and all-destructive habit of treating customers. And it is a treat on their coming to town, and a treat while the bargaining progresses, and a treat when the purchase is made, and a treat as he leaves town. Others, to drown their troubles, submerge themselves with this worse trouble. Oh, the world is battered and bruised and blasted with this growing evil. It is more and more entranced and fortified. They have millions of dollars subscribed to marshal and advance the alcoholic forces. They nominate and elect, and govern the vast majority of the office-holders of this country. On their side they have enlisted the mightiest political power of the centuries. And behind them stand all the myrmidons of the nether world, Satanic and Apollyonic and diabolic. It is beyond all human effort to overthrow this Bastille of decanters or capture this Gibraltar of rum jugs. And while I approve of all human agencies of reform, I would utterly despair if we had nothing else. But what cheers me is that our best troops are yet to come. Our chief artillery is in reserve. Our greatest commander has not yet fully taken the field. If all hell is on their side, all heaven is on our side. Now "Let God arise, and let His enemies be scattered."

Then look at the impurities of these great cities. Ever and anon there are in the newspapers that make the story of Sodom quite respectable; for such things, Christ says, were more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah than for the Chorazins and Bethsaldas of greater light. It is no unusual thing in our cities to see men in high position with two or three families, or refined ladies willing solemnly to marry the very swine of society, if they be wealthy. Brooklyn, whose streets fifteen years ago were almost free from all sign of the social evil now night by night rivalling upper Broadway in its flamboyant wickedness. The Bible all a-flame with denunciation against an impure life, but many of the American ministry uttering not one point-blank word against this iniquity lest some old libertine throw up his church pew. Machinery organized in all the cities of the United States and Canada by which to put yearly in the grinding mill of this iniquity thousands of the unsuspecting of the country farmhouses, one procuress confessing last week in the courts that she had supplied the infernal market with one hundred and fifty souls in six months. Oh! for five hundred Pall Mall Gazettes in America to swing open the door of this lazar-house of social corruption! Exposure must come before extirpation.

While the city van carries the scum of this sin from the prison to the police court morning by morning, it is full time, if we do not want high American life to become like that of the court of Louis XV., to put and the Pompadours of your brown stone palaces into a van of popular indignation, and drive them out of respectable associations. What prospect of social purification can there be, as long as at summer watering places it is usual to see a young woman of excellent rearing, stand and simper and giggle, and roll up her eyes sideways before one of those first-class satyrs of fashionable life, and on the ball-room floor join him in the square dance, the maternal chaperone meanwhile beaming from the wall on the scene? Matches are made in heaven, they say. Not such matches; for the brimstone indicates the opposite region.

The evil is overshadowing all our cities. By some these immoralities are called pécadilloes, gallantries, eccentricities, and are relegated to the realms of jocularly, and few efforts are being made against it.

GOD BLESS THE "WHITE CROSS"

movement, as it is called, the excellent and talented Miss Frances Willard, its ablest advocate on this side the sea—an organization making a mighty assault on this evil! God forward the tracts on this subject distributed by the religious tract societies of the land! God help parents in the great work they are doing, in trying to start their children with pure principles! God help all legislators in their attempt to inhibit this crime!

But, is this all? Then it is only a question of time when the last vestige of purity and home will vanish out of sight. Human arms, human pens, human voices, human talents are not sufficient. I begin to look up. I listen for artillery rumbling down the sapphire boulevards of heaven. I watch to see if in the morning light there be not the flash of descending scimitars. Oh, for God! Does it not seem time for His appearance? Is it not time for all lands to cry out: "Let God arise, and let His enemies be scattered!"

I got a letter a few days ago asking me if I did not think that the earthquake in Charleston was the Divine chastisement on that city for its sins. That letter I answer now, by saying that if all our American cities got all the punishment they deserve for their horrible impurities, the earth would long ago have cracked, opening crevices transcontinental, and taken down all our cities; and Brooklyn and New York would have gone so far under that the tip of our church spires would be five hundred feet below the surface. It is of the Lord's mercies that we have not been consumed.

Not only are the affairs of this world so a-twist, a-jangle and racked, that there seems a need of the Divine appearance, but there is another reason. Have you not noticed that in the history of this planet God turns a leaf about

EVERY TWO THOUSAND YEARS?

God turned a leaf, and this world was fitted for human residence. About two thousand more years passed along and God turned another leaf, and it was the Deluge. About two thousand more years passed on, and it was the appearance of Christ. Almost two thousand more years have passed by, and He will probably soon turn another leaf. What it shall be I cannot say. It may be the demolition of all these monstrosities of turpitude, and the establishment of righteousness in all the earth. He can do it, and He will do it. I am as confident as if it were already accomplished. How easily He can do it, my text suggests. It does not ask God to hurl a great thunderbolt of His power, but just to get up from the throne on which He sits. Only that will be necessary: "Let God arise!"

It will be no exertion of omnipotence. It will be no bending or bracing for a mighty lift. It will be no sending down the sky of the white horse cavalry of heaven or rumbling war chariots. He will only rise. Now He is sitting in the majesty and patience of His reign. He is from His throne watching the mustering of all the forces of blasphemy and drunkenness and impurity and fraud and Sabbath-breaking, and when they have done their worst, and are most securely organized, He will bestir himself and say: "My enemies have defied Me long enough, and their cup of iniquity is full. I have given them all opportunity for repentance. This dispensation of patience is ended, and the faith of the good shall be tried no longer." And now and what mountains give way under His right foot, I know not; but standing in the full height and radiance and grandeur of His nature, He looks this way and that, and how His enemies are scattered! Blasphemers, white and dumb, reel down to their doom; and those who have trafficked in that which destroys the bodies and souls of men and families, will fly with cut foot on the down grade of broken decanters; and the polluters of society, that did their bad work with large fortunes and high social sphere, will overtake in their descent the degraded rabble of underground city life, as they tumble over the eternal precipices; and the world shall be left clear and clean for the friends of humanity and the worshippers of Almighty God. The last thorn plucked off, the world will be left a blooming rose on the bosom of that Christ who came to gardenize it. This earth that stood snarling with its tigerish passion, thrusting out its raging claws, shall lie down a lamb at the feet of the Lamb of God, who took away the sins of the world.

And now the best thing I can wish for you, and the best thing I can wish for myself, is, that we may be found His warm and undisguised and enthusiastic friends in that hour when God shall rise and His enemies shall be scattered.

MANY interesting incidents of Indian history and characteristic traits are mentioned by Samuel Adams Drake, in his new work on the making of New England, recently published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons. Among them is that of the Burial of the Hatchet; or, the Ceremony of Making Peace, as depicted in the illustration.

"The Indian councils," says Drake, "were always conducted with the greatest gravity and deliberation. Only chiefs took part in important councils; when one rose to speak, he was listened to without interruption. Most Indians are natural orators. The language they sometimes employed to express their thoughts was very striking and appropriate, as will be seen by the following incident, which occurred at a council between two tribes, to bury the hatchet, after a long and bloody struggle. One of the chiefs proposed that a large oak which grew near by should be undermined and the hatchet buried beneath its roots, where it might remain forever.

"After he had concluded, another chief, who was greatly revered, spoke in his turn. Said he, 'Trees may be overthrown by storms, and in course of time will certainly decay, therefore, that the hatchet may forever be at rest, I advise that it be buried under the high mountain which rears its proud head behind yonder forest.'

"This proposal greatly pleased the whole assembly, till another chief, distinguished for his wisdom, gave his opinion, in the following remarkable words; 'If you would forever hide the hatchet from our sight, let it be cast into the great lake, where no man can find it, or bring it forth to raise enmity between us and our brethren.'

The Indian chief's idea of utter oblivion was the one which, unknown to him, had been used by the inspired prophet twenty centuries before, to express the completeness with which God pardons the sins of those who repent, and turn from their evil ways: "Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea" (Micah. 7: 19).

HAS THE RESTORATION OF ISRAEL COMMENCED?

HEAR the Word of the Lord by His holy prophets—"And it shall come to pass, that as ye were a curse among the heathen, O house of Judah, and house of Israel; so will I save you, and ye shall be a blessing; fear not, but let your hands be strong. For thus saith the Lord of hosts: as I thought to punish you, when your fathers provoked Me to wrath, saith the Lord of hosts, and I repented not. So again have I thought in these days to do well unto Jerusalem and to the house of Judah: fear ye not" (Zech. 3: 13-15).

"For I will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out of all countries, and will bring you unto your own land" (Ezek. 36: 24).

"And I will bring again the captivity of My people Israel, and they shall build the waste cities, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and drink the wine thereof; they shall also make gardens, and eat the fruit of them. And I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them, saith the LORD thy God" (Amos, 9: 14-15).

"And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob My servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt; and they shall dwell therein, even they, and their children, and their children's children FOREVER" (Ezek. 37: 25).

An American now resident in Jerusalem, in recent letters to this country, states: "There are wonderful improvements going on in this land and in this city. Splendid buildings are being erected and a general and increasing interest is manifested everywhere. I believe that no other city in the world has so much improved during the past five years. . . . I am told that thirty years ago there were not ten Jews in Jerusalem. The man who gave me this information said that his father was one of the first who came. It is only about nine years since Jews have been coming back in any considerable numbers. . . . There are twenty-one thousand Jews in Jerusalem alone, and one hundred thousand in all Palestine."

Never before, since the destruction of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the Jews by the Roman army under Titus, has there been such flow of the covenant people to their land "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled" (Luke 21: 24). SO SAID JESUS! Are we nearing the end? Think on these things!

THE BURDEN BEARER.

IN the Indian Witness, of Aug. 21, is an affectionate tribute to the memory of the late Rev. M. B. Kirk, from Dr. S. Dease, one of his sorrowful fellow-laborers. He relates the following, among other incidents characteristic of the man:

Last year I had a young woman as a patient, who had been dreadfully hacked about the head by a jealous husband. Her recovery depended on careful nursing. Mr. Kirk volunteered to look after her, and night after night slept on a bench in the verandah of the hospital, to be within call of that poor sufferer. His own health began to suffer, but he never shrank from his self-imposed duties till the wounds had healed and the life was saved. Leprosy being very prevalent in this portion of Kumaon, the Mission to Lepers opened an asylum here last year. Mr. Kirk offered to live at the asylum and do all he could to help the lepers, not receiving any recompense for his services. One of the first cases received was a man dreadfully diseased, and a most repulsive sight. One day he fell from weakness, and no one, not even his fellow-lepers, consenting to carry him back to his room. Mr. Kirk carried him back himself. A few days later the man died, and the others again absolutely refusing to carry him to his grave, he did it himself. He was seen one day going along the mall in Naini Tal, carrying a little native child, with the mother following. He explained to his friends that he had met the woman coming up the hill, and seeing that she was utterly exhausted from carrying her child, he took it from her and carried it for her. This was characteristic of the man: he was always ready to help other people carry their burdens.

THE CLAIMS OF SOUTH AMERICA.

A VISIT was paid to the office of this journal last week by Mr. F. G. Bingley, the well-known Jewish evangelist, whose labors in South America have been much blessed, and who is now seeking to arouse public opinion in this city to the responsibility of the Church for the evangelization of that wide land. He reminds his Christian brethren that the great continent at our southern door, rich in gold, silver, and minerals of all kinds, contains twenty-eight million persons, educated, intelligent and highly civilized, yet sunk in the darkness of Romanism. There was not a ray of gospel light in the spiritual darkness until about twenty years ago, and the people were as blindly faithful to the Romish Church as they were in the days of Pizarro, Cortez and Balboa. Latterly, however, a movement of a most hopeful character has been observed. Mr. Bingley says that he finds everywhere among the Spanish-Americans desires for purer and better teaching than the Romish priests furnish.

One characteristic of the people he noted particularly, which might be turned to good account. They are childlike in their unquestioning faith in the religious teacher they accept. An enlightened priest might lead them without difficulty to Christ. A missionary winning their confidence would have unlimited influence over them. There is none of the independent thought and scepticism there which are found in other lands. The name and the image of Christ are seen everywhere save in the hearts and lives of the people. Like the men of Athens, they need preachers to declare unto them Him whom they ignorantly worship (Acts 17: 23). To them He is an unknown God, but no people are better able than they to understand and reverence the simple majesty and glorious perfection of Him whom they know as the Son of Mary were the veil of tradition removed which now hides Him from their sight.

Mr. Bingley has had much experience among them, and he assures any who may be moved of the Holy Spirit to labor among them that an abundant harvest is waiting to reward the laborer. It is only necessary to preach Christ in all His fullness, proclaiming His power to save, to sanctify and to heal, and the people would accept Him with gladness.

RETALIATION ON A CLERGYMAN.

A CLERICAL hair-dresser resides in a small village in Maine, according to the Boston Record. There is no regular barber there, but the old minister, having been in the trade before he became a preacher, occasionally supplies the lack when one of the villagers is unable to travel to the nearest city. He is not an artist in the tonsorial line, but the villagers are not particular, and are generally satisfied with the minister's work. It is noticed that his failures have occurred when he was absorbed in thought about his next Sunday's sermon or in exhorting the person on whom he was operating. The worst of these failures occurred some two weeks ago, when he performed the operation in most phenomenally ragged and irregular style. In some places he sheared the hair down to the scalp, and in others left it almost untouched, so that when he had finished his absent-minded task his subject's head had a weird and unkempt look that was wonderful to behold. The compensation was to be given by the man mowing the minister's lawn. The next day the minister was away at a funeral, but when he returned the sight of his lawn astonished him. In some places it was not mown at all, and in others the grass had been dug up by the roots. He immediately went and complained to the mower, who, in reply, simply removed his hat and exhibited his chaotic locks. "Well, well, did I do that?"

said the minister. "Come up to the house and I'll cut it again." The visit was paid, and each man respectively touched up his work. It is probable that the old minister is more careful about his work in the pulpit than about his hair-cutting. There are cases, however, in which carelessness and a perfunctory manner are seen there. The result is too often as in this case; the hearers become as lifeless and indifferent as their pastor (Mal. 2: 6-9).

FROM THE CONGO.

THE following earnest request for prayer is made by Mr. J. T. Comber, in his latest letter from the Congo:

More things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of. Therefore, let your voices rise for us, and not alone for health, but for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the hearts of the people. Many at our oldest station of S. Salador are now well instructed in the Word of God, and understand the way of life. Some of them, indeed, seem to have their feet just outside the kingdom of God. One of the brethren there wrote me recently, "What we now need is just a baptism of the Holy Ghost;" and so it is. We want God to "give the increase" from the sowing of one and the watering of another. Let there be fervent prayer among the churches. The principal work here just now is among our eighteen schoolboys. Ngombe boys' hearts are, I truly believe, good soil. For many things we are much attached to these bright, intelligent, high-spirited, and fine-looking Ngombe boys, and we do earnestly want to bring them to Christ. As soon as we can build a good brick school-room and living-house (for they are all boarders), we shall try and get our number increased to fifty, or even a hundred.

Since my return I have not been into the towns, as I have been suffering from a painful boil. I hope we shall all three be able to continue at this station; at any rate, until our permanent buildings are finished. If we are to do good, thorough work—preaching, school, medical work, etc.—our station must be well manned. Mr. Grenfell is expected back at the Pool by midsummer.

TROPHIES OF OUT-DOOR SERVICES.

A CHRISTIAN worker, who preaches on street corners and in the parks, sends the following incidents of his work as an encouragement to others:

One Lord's Day evening a band of Christians were singing "Rock of Ages" at the street corner of a low neighborhood. A barber, who had been out the whole of the day waiting on customers, was returning home, and was attracted by the singing. Before he was aware, he had entered the chapel with his tools in his pocket. Under deep conviction he trembled and sought mercy. When asked during the week how he was getting on, he said, "Never better; it's such a change. The devil is a bad master. He got me drunk three months ago and broke my leg. I have had eleven weeks on my back. I've done with him."

While the same friends were singing in the streets in another place two young men thought they would annoy them by shouting "Amen" between each verse. They followed the preacher to the chapel and came in. Both of them that night professed to be converted to Christ. They were leaders of a band of young men who on previous Sundays had played cards in an old stable.

The next Lord's Day they gathered about thirty of their old companions and held a prayer-meeting in the stable. Several of the young men have been saved through these two. A fortnight later, holding a mission seven miles from the place, several of these young men walked out, although it was pouring rain, and then walked round the town with the preaching band. One said, "We don't mind the wet; it was through a mission band we got saved."

Another night, when singing the last hymn in front of the chapel, a young man was seen to linger, and presently came in to the service. He remained to the close, and was deeply affected, but could not be persuaded that God for Christ's sake would save him, and he gave us a little of his past life and sin, telling how, when attracted by the singing, he was on his way to a gambling den. He promised to come the next night. On entering the chapel we saw him in the same seat he occupied the night before. As soon as the invitation was given he came into the inquiry-room, and the prodigal gambling drunkard was saved. The next evening he was found with his arm around an old companion in sin, with tears imploring him to give his heart to God. His joy was unbounded when his companion accepted Christ as his Saviour.

AN INFECTIOUS LUNACY.

A LETTER from a missionary laboring in China under the auspices of the China Inland Mission, appears in the current number of Thy Healer. In the course of it he mentions the following incident of a man whom his neighbors accused of lunacy:

"Mr. Wei is the third elder of the church. He was introduced to us in this way: New Year's time in China is a very remarkable time. The shops are all closed. People put on their best clothes and go out to pay visits to their friends. One New Year's time, Mr. Wei said, 'Why, I will go and pay my respects to the foreigners.' One can go into any one's house in China; it is not at all rude. He walked in, made a very polite bow, and wished them a happy New Year. They asked him to sit down and take some refreshment, and then talked to him and introduced the gospel; and so the old man at New Year's time heard the gospel and believed it, and went home happy. It was the happiest New Year he had ever had. That was the way he was brought to Christ.

At that time he could not read a character, but he has most diligently applied himself, and has mastered sufficient to enable him to read the Gospel of Christ. He carries his Testament just inside his clothing. Wherever you meet with him—in the road, in the house, or at the stall—he always has his Testament by him. When our friend was converted, he went home to his village, six or seven miles south. His wife would not have the new religion, and his son left him, and has never seen him since; but the old man stood firm. He got his living by selling vegetables in the street. It is a large place, and the rumor soon went about that old Mr. Wei had gone mad. He said, 'Yes, praise the Lord;' and very soon a great many more went mad. His wife went mad, and several others went mad, and now there are about forty gone mad.

There is a good work going on in that place. If you and I could go next Sunday we should find a little mud chapel, which they themselves built, with very little help from others, and about forty met together in the name of the Lord. Very poor they are, being agriculturists and workingmen, but they are very sincere and hearty in their worship, and very hearty in their love of the Lord."

A PATIENT BECOMING AN EVANGELIST.

In an interesting communication, printed by Dr. Dowkontt, of New York, in his excellent publication, the Medical Mission Record, Dr. J. L. Maxwell, late of Formosa, narrates the following:

"In South Formosa I could point to four different congregations, which lie far removed from each other, and at considerable distances from the mission headquarters, each of which sprang from men who had received their first religious impressions in the mission hospital. One case strikingly illustrates my position:

"Eleven years ago I was visiting with my wife at a country station, some twenty-seven miles distant from our headquarters. At the close of a day spent in visiting in the neighborhood, I returned to the station. A party of men were wanting me—five, if I remember right—bigger and stronger-boned than I had been in the habit of meeting, up to that time, in Formosa. These men had travelled seven days to reach me. News of the mission hospital at Taiwanfoo, the capital, had penetrated as far over the mountains as the valley in which they lived, and they had come in search of the help it could afford as far as Taiwanfoo. Not finding me there, they followed me to the country station where I was then living. One especially wanted surgical help for a tumor from which he was suffering, and very shortly we returned to Taiwanfoo together. The chief patient remained with me two months. He was relieved of his malady, and ere he left he was very warmly interested in the Gospel message.

"Six months after his return home, we had an urgent invitation to come to that quarter. It was 150 miles distant by the road then used, and I could not be spared; but in due time the place was reached, and it was found that the faithful testimony of this man to his family and neighbors had been blessed, that not a few were interested in the truth. Springing from the visit of that man to the mission hospital, there now exist four congregations of Christians with a membership of three hundred and fifty souls, with double that number of adherents, and with flourishing schools. When, in the ordinary progress of mission work, we should have succeeded in crossing the mountains inhabited by cruel savages, and reaching the region, I should not dare to guess. It was settled for us in God's providence in the way I have described, and the whole story shows how powerfully Medical Mission work can operate in rapidly spreading to great distances a knowledge of the truth."

THE POLICY OF ANTICHRIST.

By Rev. W. Haslam.

Jewish Nationality Restored—Strong in Wealth—Rebuilding the Temple—Glorifying in Antiquity—Antichrist's Commercial Policy—Business to Supersede Religion—The Protesting Remnant.

WHILE the old Roman Empire is being resuscitated, the Jews, or "the dispersed of Judah," will return to their land in the plenitude of their wealth. The Prophet Isaiah speaks of them at this period thus: "They be replenished from the east, and are soothsayers like the Philistines, and they please themselves in the children of strangers. Their land also is full of silver and gold, neither is there any end of their treasures; their land is also full of horses, neither is there any end of their chariots; their land also is full of idols." (Isa. 2: 6-9).

With all this

and labor, it will command, we can understand how swiftly and thoroughly the land which is now desolate will be brought into cultivation, roads made, houses erected, and cities rebuilt. From the construction and growth of modern cities we may easily imagine that Jerusalem will be quickly restored, and that on a scale of splendor and greatness she never knew before. The Temple also will be rebuilt with lavish expenditure. Probably it will outvie in magnificence the Temple which Herod adorned so richly, and surpass every other religious edifice in the world.

The Jews, having returned to, and become settled in, their own land, will with great pomp and ceremonial speedily restore the daily sacrifice and

SERVICE OF THEIR TEMPLE.

While other nations are contending and disputing for mastery and pre-eminence over one another, they will be going on quietly with their work of national reconstruction, re-establishing their own nationality. Their gold and their silver (more honored in that time than noble birth) will command for them respect, and even homage! Already we see how the potency of wealth is in the ascendancy. Whether the possessor be noble or simple, educated or uneducated, money makes the man, if not the gentleman.

There is a career of worldly greatness before the Jews in their land which is yet to be developed, and one in which they will pride themselves exceedingly. In the consciousness that they are not Gentiles, but a covenant people of God, with a wonderful history behind them and a glorious destiny before them, they will be greatly exalted in their own minds. Perhaps also the world at large will accord to them, as a remarkable people, the high position which they claim. So high will their position become, that Antichrist will even covet to be their leader and Messiah. He will consider that a more exalted state than being king of the kings of the earth. In the

CHARACTER OF THE LITTLE HORN

Antichrist takes possession of the dominions which have been given to him, and exercises his power in a very different way from that in which the ten kings exercised theirs. He evidently has a fascinating influence, a mighty charm; for at his appearance upon the scene a marvelous change takes place. The contending kings and armies relinquish hostilities; and no doubt the people themselves are content to cease from war and all its dreadful accompaniments. The new ruler proposes peace instead of war, and money-making commerce instead of slaughter.

It would appear as if Satan had changed his tactics. He who has been stirring up kings and people to cruel fightings, thereby inducing famine and pestilence, is now about to combine them in league against God. Men's hearts and thoughts in future are to be given over to commerce and business, to eating and drinking, to marrying and giving in marriage. Now, instead of devastating the earth, they are going to make it a heaven for themselves. Aristocracies, and all castes and creeds of every kind, are to be set aside in the promotion of this worldly confraternity and equality. God and His Book, His day and His ordinances, are to be secondary to the urgency of business transactions.

As to the principle of

if principle it may be called, it will be one for setting commerce and secular advancement above every other consideration. It will simply supersede God's Word, and even ignore His existence. If God's Word and His providence are found to be convenient for furthering mercantile transactions, well and good; but if otherwise, they will be overlooked or set aside. The improvement of men in general, and the promotion of their prosperity and worldly advancement, will be the great object of legislation. So-called Christians will be combined together with Jews, Mohammedans and heathen of all kinds to promote universal success. In this amalgamation creeds will be merged; that is to say, Christianity will not be regarded more than other religious and professions of religious belief.

Already we see this rapidly coming to pass. Governments do not interfere with religion; they give free toleration, and profess to be equally favorable to all. The Bible is the same to them as the Koran or the sacred books of the heathen. This is the kind of infidelity, or which is coming upon the world increasingly. It is in such a godless confederation as this that the "Little Horn," the "King of Babylon," will bind together all nations. Commercial treaties will be far more important and cogent than creeds!

After war, pestilence, famine, and death, to glide into such a summer ocean of smiling success will be intoxicating in the extreme. There will be no bounds to the joy and merrymaking of men. They say, "How doth God know? Is there knowledge in the Most High?" (Ps. 73: 11.)

Notwithstanding this, there will be some who will sigh and cry over the abomination and spiritual desolation on every side. Though despised, kept down, and placed afar off, they will still go on with their testimony. Though it may be unheeded, they will continue the cry. "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Treasury Statement Issued Last Week Shows a further decrease in the public debt during September. The reduction for the month amounted to $10,627,013.17. In other words, it shows that in spite of increased expenditures the Treasury surplus continues to mount in a remarkable manner. The statement of receipts and expenditures for the month of September and for the last three months proves that the revenues are considerably larger than they were a year ago. Fifteen millions in bonds were called in last week, and another call will probably be made shortly. We are now rapidly reaching the limit of the bonds held at the option of the Government, when the subject will assume a new form. At present there appears to be no other use to which the money in the Treasury can be put. If members of Congress truly represented the people, or were in sympathy with the people, they would reduce their intolerable burden instead of accumulating a prodigious sum of money which cannot be profitably employed.

The President has Instructed our Minister to Spain to ascertain immediately if the Spanish government intended to honorably regard the provisions of the agreement of 1884, and whether the royal edict of last June, which our merchants regard as a confirmation of the treaty, has been annulled. If the reply comes that the agreement does not provide for the entry into Cuba of merchandise from foreign countries transhipped at American ports in American vessels, the President will at once revoke the proclamation of 1884. The clause of the treaty in dispute applies to "the products of and articles proceeding from the United States." These words appear to cover foreign goods in United States vessels, but the Captain-General of Cuba still insists that only goods produced or manufactured here are entitled to the new rates. Minister Curry's answer should at once set the matter at rest. At present it would appear that the Captain-General of Cuba is disobedient to his government.

The Report that Mr. Manning is About to Resume his duties at the Treasury has been received with much gratification. The Washington Star states that he has so far recovered that he will return in a few days, and, if his health permits, remain at his post to the end of President Cleveland's administration. The report of his intention is the more welcome because it is understood that his seizure was the result of overwork. It may be hoped that measures will be taken to avoid this in future, and that such assistance will be provided for him as will secure to the President during the remainder of his term the services of an officer so universally respected.

Geronimo and his Band of Hostile Apaches are still imprisoned at San Antonio, Tex., and the frequent conferences now taking place between the President, Mr. Endicott and the army officers give color to the rumor that the Government is not free to act in regard to the Apaches. One report has it that General Miles pledged himself to them that they should not be surrendered to the civil authorities of Arizona, and that their lives should be spared. If he did so, he acted contrary to his instructions, which bound him to offer no terms but unconditional surrender. It is, however, alleged that, if he had insisted on those terms the Apaches would have surrendered to Mexico, and would have been a source of danger, causing continual apprehension.

The Decision of the Mormons to Avoid New York in future, announced last week, is wise in view of recent events. The Castle Garden authorities, in examining the emigrants and hesitating whether they would not send the whole cargo back again to Europe, produced a natural feeling of alarm. In future the recruits for the Utah harems are to be landed at Philadelphia. Should the officials of that city follow the example of those in New York, as is probable, another change will become necessary. The managers of the Guion line of steamers, by which they cross the Atlantic, have also intimated that they will bring no more Mormons, as they may some time be required to carry a whole cargo back free. As the European governments do not protect their citizens from the Mormon emissaries, these difficulties placed in the way of disembarkation may be of some service in checking the degrading traffic.

The Sentence on William E. Gould, the Son-in-law of Neal Dow, who was charged with embezzling the funds of the Maine bank, was pronounced on September 30. Gould pleaded "guilty," so there was no trial. Judge Webb sentenced him to ten years' imprisonment in State Prison. There appears to be no doubt that Gould deserves the punishment, and it is only relatively that there is any injustice in it. It seems unfair that the man who confessed his guilt and surrendered his property, should suffer, while similar criminals who showed less compunction are living at their ease in Canada.

The Moral Sense of American Theatre-goers is being put to a test in New York, and the experiment will doubtless be tried in other American cities. An English actress, calling herself Violet Cameron, arrived here last week. She is accompanied by the Earl of Lonsdale, who states that he is her business manager. Both the parties are married, but the Earl's wife is in Europe, and the husband of the actress came over in a different ship, and has been put in prison, at the request of his wife, for annoying her. The proprietor of the hotel at which she stayed requested her to remove to some other hotel, which she did. So the matter stands. The daily journals of the city unite in regarding all the scandal as an advertising scheme, which is expected to draw the American public to the theatre at which the actress appears. It remains to be seen whether the public will be attracted or repelled by the scandal. It is said that the theatre-goer has no right to inquire into the private character of the artist who amuses him, but in this case there seems to be no need for inquiry; it is flaunted in his face, apparently under the impression that he will like it. The result of the test thus directly applied will be watched with interest. The success or failure of the enterprise will show the moral standpoint of the average theatre-goer. Our own opinion of theatres is too well known to our readers to need reiteration here.

A Royal Gift to France Was Made Last Week by the Duc D'Aumale. The magnificent estate of Chantilly, with its castle, forests and streams, was presented by the Duke to the French Institute in trust for the French nation. The estate is worth twelve million dollars, and the gift of it immediately after the giver's expulsion from France is an act of rare magnanimity. With the domain, the Duke gives all it contains, including trophies, books, pictures, archives and objects of art. He directs that, after defraying the expenses of keeping it up, the Institute will employ the excess of revenue from the estate, first, in acquiring objects of art; second, in pensions and pecuniary aid to literary men and artists; third, in establishing a fund to aid and encourage those who devote themselves to the career of letters, science or art.

A Warning to Russia was Administered by Austro-Hungary last week, which the Czar cannot affect to misunderstand. On September 30, Herr Tisza, the Prime Minister of Hungary, made a speech in the Hungarian Parliament which produced a profound sensation throughout Europe. He said that "Austro-Hungary intended to prevent any single Power from establishing a protectorate over Bulgaria. 'We want independence among the Balkan States,' he continued, 'without having any covetous designs toward any of them. No community of interests exists in the Balkans. The Austro-German alliance continues, guarding the mutual conditions of existence without endangering peace. Austro-Hungary will not allow any single Power to make armed interference in Bulgaria. Austro-Hungary earnestly intends following this policy during these critical times.'" There is a general impression that the Prime minister would not have uttered remarks so threatening had he not received assurances of the support of England in the event of war. Italy and Turkey are also said to be ready to take the same side. The declaration will probably bring the trouble to a crisis and prevent war. Demented as the Czar appears to be, he will scarcely dare to face so powerful a combination. It is significant that in England the Liberal newspapers which have heretofore fawned on Russia are now as bellicose in their tone as the Tory press.

An Important Speech Outlining the Policy of the British Cabinet, was made on Saturday last by Lord Randolph Churchill, who, being the leader of the House of Commons, spoke authoritatively. On the subject of Ireland he said: "There are resources in Ireland which may be scientifically developed by state credit. With the resulting prosperity there must be further land legislation, accelerating the change from double to single land ownership. No Ministry can afford to shirk local government for Ireland." He gave several reasons why he thought there were distinct signs of the foretold revival in trade which would tend to remove Irish troubles by removing hardships. He continued: "I am perfectly sure, unless met by a no-rent manifesto, the Irish landlords will not provoke the tenants. In my opinion, the unscrupulous plans of Messrs. Gladstone and Parnell to make the Queen's government impossible will fail. From the duty of maintaining order in Ireland no risk or danger will deter the government. We will no longer tolerate Ireland being a disgrace to England and the civilized world." Lord Randolph appears to think that Ireland would become loyal if she became wealthy; on this side the Atlantic very few persons coincide with that opinion.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying Colored ministers with the Christian Herald, have been received since our last acknowledgment, to the amount of $11.50. They are as follows: From Lipscomb, Va., $1; Warren, N. H., $5; New Haven, Conn., $1.50; Wisner, Neb., $1; Halifax, N. S., $2; a Friend, Orwigsburg, Pa., $1.

The Massacres in Africa of Christian Converts are explained in a communication to the New York Sun, as the result of jealousy on the part of the bad advisers who surround the young king of Uganda. A short time before King Mtesa's death about eighty converts were admitted to the English Church on one occasion. Old and young crowded the school to learn to read. But the King's counsellors always viewed these whites with suspicion. King Mtesa, on the whole, was friendly to the missionaries, and they and their work were safe while he lived. His young son, Mwanga, however, is the tool of his council.

The Persecution of the Jews is again Revived in Russia. The American Hebrew, of New York, has received intelligence that sixteen thousand Jews are to be driven into exile, by a decree recently promulgated. It says: Not long ago the cities of Rostow and Taganrog were annexed to a military district in which Jews were forbidden to dwell. As usual, a senatorial commission was appointed to consider the contingency, and this body has rendered its decision to the effect that the Jews should not, or could not, be permitted to remain in the newly created district, with the exception of merchants of the first guild and those who have secured real estate. This will enable some 4,000 wealthy Jews to remain in possession of their homes, while about 16,000 poor, helpless Jews will have to go forth upon the olden, well-worn road of exile.

Funds for the Restoration of the Churches of Charleston, S. C., are urgently needed by all denominations. The members are unable to defray the cost themselves, having suffered heavy losses of private property. Help must be rendered to them in this trying emergency by their brethren in other States, and there is general recognition of the fact. Each denomination should take care to make public the amount needed, and the name and address of the treasurer of its fund. The Presbyterians of Charleston have but one church that it is safe to use. That is the Westminster church, of which Rev. W. F. Junkin, D. D., is pastor. The amount required to repair the other Presbyterian churches is $61,000, as estimated by the contractors. Dr. Junkin has come North to collect funds. His address is 1334 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

The New York City Mission, in Closing the Sixtieth year of its work, issues an encouraging statement of its condition. It states that the year has been one of great prosperity in all branches of this indispensable work. In 3,000 gospel-meetings, and in 75,000 visits among the poor and sick and needy, and by 500,000 tracts and leaflets and books, the good news of salvation has been made known to 250,000 men, women and children of all classes and conditions. The churches for the people are growing in numbers and influence, the Sabbath-schools are only limited by their accommodations, and a new and enlarged building is needed for the Olivet church.

The Committee Appointed by the Convention of Christian workers, held at Chicago in April last, have issued a circular which deserves the attention of churches of all denominations. The committee offer to co-operate and correspond with churches and individuals, without regard to denomination, who may desire to obtain information about the most successful and capable workers throughout the country, and the various methods of Christian work, in reference to "evangelistic help;" "how to stimulate and increase individual activity on the part of church members;" "how to reach individuals and classes not hitherto reached by the ministrations of the Gospel;" "work for the young;" "reading-rooms for young men and boys," and other practical matters of church work. Communications should be sent with stamps enclosed for reply to Rev. John C. Collins, English Hall, New Haven, Conn.

A Cigar that Cost Two Lives was Smoked in Indiana on Oct. 1. A man residing at Bringhurst, Ind., went on Friday to the grocery store to purchase gunpowder. The grocer, who was smoking, poured the powder from a large can into the scales. In setting down the can he accidentally knocked the cigar from his mouth into the scale in which the powder was. Instantly there was a terrific explosion; the grocer was killed, his customer was so severely injured that he died shortly afterward; the front of the store was blown out, and several persons badly hurt. It is dreadful to think of the extent of the calamity caused by that one man's carelessness. Few realize how much evil may accrue to others through their own want of thought and care. It is so in religion: a thoughtless act or speech may involve the loss of some soul at that time in the crisis of its existence (Eccles. 5:1).

A Child's Song in a New York Hospital Startled the nurses and patients on Thursday last. On the night before, an ambulance was called from Gouverneur Hospital to a house in Hester Street for a burned child. She had been sent by her parents to the cellar for firewood, and in descending the steps she stumbled and dropped the lamp, which exploded and set her clothing on fire. The surgeon wrapped the poor, crisped, writhing form of the child in what is known as a "prepared sheet," and told the driver to get to the hospital quickly. There all was done for her that science could do, but it was impossible to save her life. A narcotic was given to her and she fell asleep. Waking after some hours, she asked for water. The nurse immediately called the doctor. In a minute he was beside the cot. He felt the pulse, ominously shook his head, gave some more instructions, and turned to go away. As he did so, the little creature turned half around. The dim light of a candle shone on the blackened face. The swollen lips pursed out, and, in a clear, sweet voice, the dying child began to sing the hymn, "Nearer, my God, to Thee." The doctor and nurse stood transfixed. The other patients in the silent, darkened ward leaned on their elbows and drank in the sweet melody. The first verse completed, her strength began to fail, and with it her voice, and only the humming-like distant music of the air of the hymn could be heard. That ceased, she heaved a sigh and all was over. Her tuneful aspiration was granted to her. She could not have sung in her agony had she not previously responded to Christ's invitation (Matt. 19:14).

The Mishaps of a Bridal Couple are Reported by a Maine journal. It states that after the wedding ceremony, which took place at Portland, the newly made husband and wife went to the Boston and Maine depot to take the train for Boston. The bridegroom went to look after the baggage, leaving the bride in the care of "the best man." The husband had not returned when the cry of "All aboard for Boston!" alarmed the "best man," and he hurried the bride into a car on the Western Division. When the husband returned and discovered that his wife was gone, he was naturally provoked, but was told that by taking the Eastern Division train he would meet her at North Berwick. He accordingly followed the bride on the next train. During the afternoon the bride appeared without the husband. She had boarded a way train and returned to Portland. She was told her best plan would be to stay where she was, and wait until her husband returned to her. She failed to take this advice, however, and started in pursuit of the bridegroom. But the latter was hunting for the bride, and the 5 o'clock train brought him back to Portland. He was told of his wife's journeying up and down the line, and made a fresh start for Boston on the six o'clock train. As neither returned, it may be presumed that this last expedition was successful. It was a vexatious way of spending a day which ought to have been without a cloud. In their future married life we may hope that they will have no more unhappiness from "playing at cross-purposes." In the union between Christ and His church, of which marriage is a type, separation is impossible, and those who seek Him always find Him (Rom. 8: 38, 39).

A Boy's Retort Caused Some Amusement in a car on the Michigan Central Railroad recently. It was Sunday, but the cars were full of excursionists, and among them a lady who was a Sunday-school teacher returning to her home from the country. A diminutive boy was endeavoring to please the passengers and get a few pennies by singing comic songs in the car. When he had finished and was passing along the aisle with outstretched palm, making his collections, the lady in question said to him, "Don't you know it's wicked to sing songs on Sunday?" The youngster looked at her for a second and, with a twinkle in his black eyes, replied, "Don't you think it's wicked to travel on Sunday?" The passengers roared and no more questions were asked. Clergymen, Sunday-school teachers, and Christian workers generally, may be sure that their warnings and appeals will fail if their own lives are inconsistent (Rom. 2: 20, 21).

A Sailor's Advice to a Quarrelsome Family is reported by the Youths' Companion. It states that a fisherman from Gloucester, Mass., recently went on a voyage as mate to Valparaiso. He left behind him, in his home, his wife and children and his mother and uncle. When he returned he found them all at enmity. They had so many complaints of each other to lay before him that they could scarcely welcome him. He listened in silence, and when they were through he invited them down to see his schooner. They went, and examined the vessel throughout. The women expressed their astonishment at the size of the cabin. "How ever do you manage to get eight men in this box without crowding?" they asked. "How do you get any peace living as close as this?" The man said: "I'll tell you; each man is willing that his neighbor should have his own sheer of room and keep it. Suppose you take that rule home with you 'n try it." It may be hoped they did, for it is a good rule that many Christian homes and churches might adopt with advantage. Christ's law is still more stringent. It requires the Christian not only to refrain from encroaching on a neighbor's rights, but to submit cheerfully when his own rights are withheld (Matt. 5:39, 40).

A Lady was Brought Back to Life in Chicago, a few days ago, after her husband and friends, who surrounded her bed, had given her up for dead. She had been ill for some time, and was getting well, when she was suddenly seized with acute pain, and utterly collapsed. She lost her pulse, her heart ceased to beat, and she stopped breathing. She was becoming rigid, in spite of everything the physician did to restore animation, and he, like her friends, was giving up hope. As the case was desperate, he determined to try a remedy he had never seen used before. He had with him a little bottle filled with nitroglycerine, which is sometimes given in cases of epilepsy, and he thought it might be beneficial in this case. The patient could not swallow, so the physician administered ten drops hypodermically. The effect was astonishing. Life gradually returned, the body relaxed, and in four minutes she was able to speak. She is now completely recovered. The physician relates the incident for the benefit of other medical men, as he thinks the drug was never used in that way before. The discovery is important, and in similar cases, in future, physicians will doubtless apply it before finally abandoning hope. It is very rare that anyone so near death is saved, but in spiritual matters the phenomenon frequently occurs. Many who were once spiritually dead, and were despaired of by all who knew them, have become alive unto God, when the Holy Spirit has quickened them (Col. 2: 13).

A VERY BOLD PROPHECY.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"I am sought of them that asked not for me; I am found of them that sought me not: I said, Behold me! Behold me! unto a nation that was not called by my name."—ISAIAH 65: 1.

Why it was Bold—Jewish Monopolists of Grace—The Doctrine Still Unpopular—An Assured Truth—I. The Personality of God in the Work—The Exclusion of God in Modern Philosophy—God Observant of All—Fills the Vision of Faith—Directs the Message—Testimonies from Tabernacle Hearers—II. God Glad to be Sought—The Pearl and Hidden Treasure—III. The Experience of Salvation Described—IV. The Use God Makes of it—A Bargain Never Concluded—The Encouragement in it.

THIS is the passage which was quoted by the apostle Paul in the tenth chapter of his Epistle to the Romans. At the twentieth verse of that chapter he says: "Esaias is very bold, and saith, I was found of them that sought me not; I was made manifest unto them that asked not after me. But to Israel he saith, All day long I have stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people." The apostle followed the Septuagint translation, but altered the position of the clauses.

We learn on inspired authority that this is a very bold passage; it required much courage to utter it at the first, and in Paul's day it needed still more to quote it and press it home upon the Jews around him. He who protests against a self-righteous people, and angers them by showing that others whom they despised are saved while they themselves are being lost, will have need of a dauntless spirit. The Israelitish people thought that of the grace of God, that the Lord who had chosen their fathers, and had indulged them with a divine revelation, would never deprive them of their advantages, nor advance others to like privileges. They dreamed that God was almost bound to bless them above all the nations that were upon the face of the earth. To meet this national conceit with plain rebuke, needed one who was very bold.

This text has the clear ring of free grace about it; and for this reason it may be called bold. He had need to be bold who in this day would preach fully and plainly the doctrine of the sovereign grace of God. This cultured age repudiates the doctrines of grace, which are the heart of evangelical teaching. Men are vexed when we declare that God is first in human salvation, and seeks men before they seek Him. Yet many who have heard the gospel from their childhood continue to hear it in vain; others who have never heard it before are brought by what are commonly called accidental circumstances to hear the quickening word, and at once they embrace it and live. My prayer has been that this morning our text may be again fulfilled. May the Lord be sought of those who hitherto have not enquired for Him!

I. The first point for your consideration is the personality of

of His grace. This is remarkably prominent in the words before us. Let me read them and lay the emphasis upon the personal pronouns which relate to God: "I am sought of them that asked not for me; I am found of them that sought me not; I said, Behold me, behold me, unto a nation that was not called by my name." Is not the Lord here, not only as speaker, but as the theme of His own speech?

The philosophy now in vogue labors to shut God out of his own creation. They inform us that by some means this world and all that is therein were evolved. Even this will not long content the men of progress; they care nothing for evolution in itself, but only so far as it may serve their purpose of escaping from the thought of God. If by some method or other vain men could scheme a world without a God, they would be delighted; and that philosopher who comes nearest to the invention of a subtle lie which will justify their forgetfulness of God is the prince of the hour, the favorite of his age. Yes, God must be obliterated somehow, for "the fool hath said in his heart, There is no God."

These wise men would have done with God also in providence: according to the universe is like a watch which goes because it has been wound up long ago. It is not even admitted that there was a God to wind it up; but anyhow, if there be such a great personal power, He has put the watch under His pillow, and has gone to sleep while the machine goes on ticking without Him. Certain fixed laws operate without any force at their back, and the world is so self-contained that it goes on by itself without God: this is the modern idea. They have no one to wind up this watch again when it runs down—no prospect of new heavens and a new earth, wherein righteousness shall dwell. Those who would get rid of God out of nature and providence, have tried their hands at making a religion without God, and a pretty religion it is!—it is too small a business to need consideration.

Notice that in the text the personality of God comes forth in that He Himself is observant of all that is done. Do any seek Him?—He saith, "I am sought." Do any find Him?—He saith, "I am found." Is there any preaching of the Gospel?—the Lord declares, "I said, Behold me, behold me." God taketh note of it all. Not a prayer is breathed, nor a sigh heaved, nor a note of praise uttered from the heart, but what the omniscient Lord has noted every thought. God Himself fills observe the words, "Behold me, behold me." We look to God in Christ, and find all that our soul needs. God is the sum of our necessities. God we seek as sinners; God we find as saints. I have sometimes put it thus to you: Here is a little child picked from the gutter; it is starved, unclothed, unwashed, and sickening to death. What does it want? Well, it would take me a long time to write out a list of all its wants. It needs washing, clothing, warming, feeding, nursing, loving—no, I will not attempt to complete the catalogue, but I will tell you all in a word: this little child wants its mother. If it finds a loving and capable mother, it has all that it needs at once. Every lost soul of man needs a thousand things; but no soul needs more than it will find in God.

The loving personality of God comes out in the work of grace, in that He Himself is by which men are saved. Here are the words: "I said, Behold me, behold me." The Lord Himself speaks the effectual word. Did not Isaiah proclaim the Gospel? Yes, he did, and this was the result of Isaiah's speech: "Who hath believed our report?" But when God's arm is revealed, so that God speaketh through His prophet, then a very different result follows; for God's word shall not return unto Him void, but it shall prosper in the thing whereto He sent it. Dear soul, if you have looked to Christ, it is because Christ has looked at you, and influenced you to look to Him. If there be any glancing of the eye even of the feeblest faith towards God, it is because He has said by His Spirit, "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else." Thou hast never heard a living word yet, my brother, a really living, quickening word from my lips alone: it may have come, perhaps, through my mouth as the vocal organ; but if it be a quickening word it must have come from God Himself. Man's words are mere breath, but the word of the Lord is spirit and life.

Moreover, God is seen in the work of grace, for He Himself is the director of the message. "I said, Behold me, behold me, unto a nation that was not called by my name." Not only does God speak the gospel, but He speaks it home to those whom He appoints to hear it. We who preach know not to whom the truth will be applied. Very marvellous it is how the Lord prepares the ground for the seed and the seed for the ground. Of late, Thursday night after Thursday night I have had singularly striking proofs of this. Letters have come again and again of this character: "I felt drawn to attend the tabernacle from a notice in the paper, but I shall never forget the words which I then heard, for they were evidently

Then the person goes on to detail certain circumstances of his life which have corresponded, with remarkable minuteness, to observations made in the sermon. How is this? The preacher knew nothing of the matter, and yet the word fitted like a glove to the hand. This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes. I call upon you, therefore, beloved, to rejoice that God cometh very near to us in the work of grace, as our God.

This surrounds the gospel with a strange solemnity: if the gospel blesses us it is not it, but God that blesses. God Himself has come unto us. Yet remember that this fact has another aspect to it, for: if the gospel be rejected, it is God that is rejected. It is true that the hands which were stretched out to you were human, and therefore you criticized the style of the invitation, and perhaps refused it with scorn; but at the back of the feeble ambassador stood the great King, and behind the simple invitation was the sublime mind of God. Oh, how differently would some of you hear if you did but remember that in the gospel God Himself in person comes to you!

II. But now, secondly, dear friends, in the text I see the delight which God takes in the work of grace. The text is the utterance of delight.

GOD IS GLAD TO BE SOUGHT

and found by those who once were negligent of him. It is evident that he rejoices in contrast to the complaint of the next verse. It is with joy that God says, "I am sought of them that asked not for me; I am found of them that sought me not;" for it is placed in opposition to the mournful notes in which the Lord saith, "I have spread out my hands all the day unto a rebellious people."

The Lord rejoices in each step of the process. There is a poor soul beginning to cry, "Oh, that I knew where I might find Him!" and lo, the Lord says, "I am sought." A man has only just begun to attend the House of Prayer; he has only lately commenced the earnest study of the Bible; the Lord sees it, and he says, "I am sought." It was but a poor little prayer you prayed last night; you started up from your knees astonished to find that you had actually been attempting to pray; but your heavenly Father saw you, and he said with pleasure, "I am sought." "When he was yet a great way off his father saw him." Behold the infinite compassion of the all-observing God!

The very next sentence is, "I am found." What a delight it must be to God's heart when at last the poor sinner cries, "Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief!" Then Jesus says, "I am found." Do not imagine that a soul ever found the great Father without the great Father's knowing it. God rejoices when He is sought and when He is found. Oh do not think that you seek an unwilling God. He comes to meet you; He falls upon your neck and kisses you.

The Lord also rejoices in the persons who seek Him. He says, "I am sought of them that ask not for me." God takes special joy in being sought by those who formerly did not seek Him. He will be glad for any heart to keep on seeking that has begun to seek; but he is best pleased when become seekers. You that were taught to pray at your mother's knee, God is glad to hear your sincere petitions; but if there is a man here who has never prayed before in his life, let him begin at once, and the Lord will rejoice to hear him.

"Alas!" said one, "I have never sought him." Yet you may find him, for the word of the Lord is, "I am found of them that sought me not." Our Saviour tells us of a merchant of earnest spirit who went out to seek goodly pearls. He traversed many lands inspecting that he might find one specially precious pearl, and at last he found it and bought it. They that seek the Lord shall find him. But there was another man whose mind sought after less ambitious matters; he was of the earth earthy. He yoked his bullocks one morning to the plough, and he was thinking only of his clods and of his fields, when, on a sudden, the plough made a baulk: there was something in the way. He stopped the oxen; he examined the ground; he digged in the earth. He came to an old crock, and in that crock he found a treasure of gold and of silver. He had found what he never looked for, and the moment he found it he decided to sell all that he had, and buy the field, that he might possess the treasure. I hope you have stumbled on full salvation at this moment. Happiness and heaven lie before you; will you not have them? The plough has struck on the hid treasure of the blessed Gospel, and if you will stoop down and look, here are riches such as you never dreamed of.

III. Now we have a third matter to consider, and that is—the description which God Himself gives of the work of grace. Time flies too quickly, wherefore let me give you only rough hints, instead of full instructions. This verse is a little Bible. Here you have described. The Lord tells us where He finds the object of His grace. He says, "They asked not for me; they sought me not; they were not called by my name." In the Book of Hosea, we read that they were not his people. These are the careless and senseless beings, whom the Lord called by His grace. He manifested great love to us when we were dead in trespasses and sins. When there is no good thought, nor wish, nor desire in us, then God comes to us in abounding love. What a mercy it is that He comes to us in our sin and misery, for assuredly we should not else come to Him.

Having told us where we were, he next describes that gospel which comes to them as the power of God. Here are his own words: "I said, Behold Me, Behold Me." If anybody were to ask me to state the gospel in a few words, I should answer—the Lord says, "Behold Me, behold Me." The way of salvation is, "Look unto Me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth." Christ on the cross cries to the guilty sinner, "Behold the Lamb of God." To encourage a trembling soul to behold Him with steadfast hope, the Lord says twice, "Behold Me, behold Me." Does any sinner exclaim, "But Lord, I am so filthy"? Do not look at yourself: "Behold Me, for I can cleanse you." Look to your bleeding Saviour, your forgiving God.

LOOK AND LIVE.

I think I may say of this description of the way of salvation, how simple it is! God seeks the sinner, the sinner seeks his God. The sinner finds his God because God has found the sinner, and it is all done. Intricacies and difficulties are at an end; believe and live in simplicity itself. "Oh, but," saith one, "there must be a deal of preparation before I who seek God can hope to find Him." There needs no preparation. He says, "Seek ye my face;" and if your heart says, "Thy face, Lord, will I seek," the Lord is nigh unto you at once. "But surely, sir, I shall have to feel, I shall have to learn, I shall have to do." Oh, yes, you shall have all that by-and-by; but as to salvation, you may have it at once, there is no need of an hour's delay! behold your God, and live.

Oh, I wish I knew how, this morning, to speak as I should speak about this plain way, this road which the wayfaring man may so readily follow, this method which is as gracious as the blessing to which it leads. Before I knew the Lord Jesus and His cross I used to fancy that there was some great mystery about faith; and, poor soul that I was, I feared that I should never be able to understand and enjoy it; but I heard a simple workingman say, "Look to Jesus, look and live," and I was not disobedient to the message. I trusted Jesus, and I lived. I gave up trying to understand: I believed, and I lived.

IV. I conclude with the fourth point, which is this—of all this. What a wonder it is that men and women who never had a thought about God, but an aversion to him, should, nevertheless, be turned into seekers! It is often so; there can be no doubt about it. Sudden conversions have not ceased. I knew a man, a singular person, but a sincere Christian, who, in his early days, never thought of going to any place of worship. One Sunday morning he set out to visit a comrade, intending to conclude a bargain which had been talked over the day before, about a pair of ducks. He stepped into the meeting-house, because it came on to rain, and there he found what he had never sought. He never bought that pair of ducks; he forgot them, as the woman of Samaria forgot her water-pot. The Lord met with him there and then, and he beheld his Saviour. Many such things have happened in this house, and some such will occur this morning.

Remember the famous Colonel Gardiner. He had made an appointment to commit a deed of wickedness, but reached the spot too soon, and while he waited he thought he saw the Saviour on the cross, and heard him say, "I have done all this for thee; what hast thou ever done for Me?" He fled the place, he sought his own chamber, he cried to God, and Colonel Gardiner, from being a wild soldier became a saint of God. Surely this is meant to make us reverently adore the Lord of grace. Oh, to see the like to-day!

Why does the Lord thus declare the conversion of those who were out of the way? I think it is to destroy pride and self-esteem. Some of you who are not converted are yet, in your own esteem, a cut above others. You have sittings in the Tabernacle, or else you attend at some thoroughly evangelical church, and you say to yourselves, "If anybody will get to heaven we shall, for we hear the pure word of God."

and put off the consideration of eternal things because you feel that you can secure salvation when it pleases you. What doth God do? Why, He sends His gospel to the abandoned and fallen, and brings outcasts to Himself. He saves those whom you thought He had given over to their sins; and you church-going and chapel-going people, who dream that you have a monopoly of privileges, are left to your own wilfulness. God will pay no regard to caste. He is no respecter of persons, but calleth whomsoever He wills, according to His royal word, "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy." Pride of birth and education He thus casts to the ground.

He does it, next, to encourage you who are seeking Him; for if those who do not seek Him often find Him, why, you that do seek Him are sure to find Him. If He is found of those who seek Him not, He will surely be found of those who are daily agonizing for Him. Do not believe that He will let you seek His face in vain. Come and believe on Him to-day, and He will then be found of you.

The Lord magnifies His grace, that He may convict those who do not come to Him of the greatness of their sin. Look, saith He; those who never heard of me before have found salvation, while you who have been instructed and invited and impressed have still held out, and resisted My Spirit. You have been persuaded, entreated, prayed over, and wept over, and yet you have not come to Me. Who is to blame for this but your own selves? Your own hard hearts have robbed you of mercy. Publicans and harlots enter the kingdom of heaven before you, because of your wilful unbelief. Take heed, my hearers! Take heed, lest you perish in sight of heaven. I pray you, for God's sake and your own soul's sake, awake to righteousness.

UNCLE ELIJAH'S REPENTANCE.

NOT far from the roadside, in one of the southern counties of Virginia, there stood a neat log cabin, inhabited by a worthy negro couple, known as Uncle Elijah and Aunt Maria. These two had belonged to a widow lady, who owned the estate of Cloverfields, about three miles away; but when the close of the Civil War had set them free, they, in common with nearly all the negroes in the county, thought it incumbent upon them, as an assertion of their independence, to leave their former owners and either work for themselves or go into service elsewhere. Thus there was a general shifting from plantation to plantation. Uncle Elijah and his wife, both past middle age, left the place where they had been born and raised, and hired this cabin on a neighboring plantation, where, by day's labor and odd jobs on the part of the husband, and washing and ironing and chicken-raising on the part of the wife, they managed to live in moderate comfort.

Elijah had been the family coachman, and he had found it a hard thing to resign the dignity of this position; but had he retained it he would virtually have admitted to all his brethren and sisters that freedom had done nothing for him. In order to show that he was now director of his own fortunes, it was necessary that he should drop the reins by which he had so skilfully directed and controlled the two black carriage horses, which had been his especial care since their early colthood.

But his love for his old mistress, and his sense of his former dignity never left him; and now, when from afar he saw approaching the familiar carriage, he would drop his work, or get up from his meal, and watch it until it had entirely disappeared from sight. Sometimes, if it were near enough, he would advance, hat in hand, to speak to his old mistress; but this he did not often do—people might think he wanted to go back.

One autumn evening, just about dusk, as Uncle Elijah came out of his cabin, he perceived, near the top of a long hill on the road, the Cloverfields' carriage and horses. Other eyes in the growing gloom might not have known what vehicle it was, but the eyes of Uncle Elijah could make no mistake. As he stood and gazed they sparkled with emotion.

"Whar Miss Jane gwine dis time o' night? an' wot's de matter wid dat kerridge?" he ejaculated. "I'll be dangdiddled ef de eberlastin' fool dat's drivin' hain't gwine and chain' up de hin' wheel as ef it was a hay wagin. An' who's de no' count idyot wot can't drike down Red Hill widout chainin' de wheel? Lor'! how he do bump de stones! and how dat mus' rile Mis Jane! but I reckon she mus' done got use' ter bein' riled, a pickin' up all sorts o' niggahs to drike her kerridge."

When the vehicle reached the bottom of the hill, not far from the cabin, it stopped, and the driver got down to unchain the wheel. Possessed by a sudden thought, Uncle Elijah rushed into the house, from which his wife was happily absent, clapped on his hat and seized his coat; keeping well away from the road, he ran towards the carriage, climbing the fence, and approached the vehicle in the rear, where he could not be seen by any of its occupants. When he reached the man, who had just unfastened the chain, the soul of Uncle Elijah was filled with righteous indignation at finding it was Montague Braxton, a negro shoemaker of the neighborhood. Without a word he seized the cobbler coachman by the collar, including a good part of one ear in his grasp, and led him away from the carriage, Montague, who knew who had clutched him, submitting without a word. When they had hurriedly gone a dozen steps, Elijah hissed in the other's ear:

"Is you comin' back ter-night?"

"Yaas," whispered the shoemaker, very much astonished at the manner of his interviewer.

"Well, den, jus' you go 'long up ter my house, split de wood fur aun' M'riar, fotch a bucket ob water from de spring, and stay hyar till I come back. I'se gwine ter drike dis kerridge myse'lf; ain't got no time to say no moh; now, git!"

Montague, who knew "Uncle 'Lijah" as a pillar of strength in the church, as well as a pillar of not very easily restrained strength in his own proper person, made no answer, but noiselessly slipped away. Elijah passed quickly around the carriage, keeping a little distance from it, to avoid being recognized by those within, although he scarcely need have feared this, in the dusky light, and mounted to the elevated seat in front, when, taking up the reins and whip, he started the horses and the equipage moved on. Now sat Uncle Elijah like a king behind Gamma and Delta, the two horses that he had driven so long, a little older, a little browner in their manes and tails, but still the same good horses, with plenty of strength and spirit left; here was the same old harness—he could recognize it even in the dark—badly kept, and badly put on, but still the same; here were the reins that once no hand but his had ever dared to touch; and here the whip, very old now and shabby, with a miserable new lash on it, but still the same whip he used to wield; and here was the high seat on which he alone had sat, from the time he became a man in years until the day when his freedom made him another man. * * *

The next morning, not very early, the cobbler approached the Cloverfields' stables, to attend to the horses, and to do the various oddments and bitments of work for which he had been temporarily hired. To his surprise, just as he turned a corner of the barn, he met Uncle Elijah, who was engaged in attaching a new lash to the carriage-whip.

"Didn't spec' to see you hyar, Uncle 'Lijah," stammered the cobbler.

"Reckin not," said the old man; but you dunno how to drive a hoss. P'raps you dunno who I is. I'se de drier ob de Cloverfields' kerridge and as long as I'se de use ob my jinst an' can see wid my eyes, nobody dries dat kerridge but me. An' now look hyar, you shoemaker, when me, and Miss Jane, and Miss Almira and Mahs Chawles gits ter de happy lan', don' you reckon you's gwine to come dar, too. De angel Gabriel, he pint his horn right at you, and he sing out, 'aint got no use for yaller cobbler angels hyar.'"

THE REV. GEORGE C. HADDOCK. The Martyred Prohibitionist.

MENTION has already been made in these columns of the dastardly murder at Sioux City, Iowa, on August 3, of the uncompromising foe of the liquor traffic, the Rev. George C. Haddock. We now give his portrait.

George C. Haddock was born at Watertown, N. Y., in the year 1831. He received a fair education at the Black River Institute of that place, where he was an industrious and exemplary student. After learning the printing business, he worked as a journeyman in various places for some years. He then settled down at Beaver Dam, Wis., where he published a paper. In 1863 he entered the Methodist ministry, at Port Washington, Wis. He subsequently filled several appointments in that State. In 1880 he was appointed to Burlington, Ia. After serving in that charge, and at Fort Dodge, in October, 1885, he removed to Sioux City.

Mr. Haddock was a man of powerful physique, able, when necessary, to defend himself against open attack. It is related of him that eight or nine years ago, while he was advocating temperance in Sheboygan Falls, Wis., he was waylaid by five or six men, who all attacked him at once with the intention of giving him a sound thrashing. Although surprised by the attack, Mr. Haddock quickly rallied, and placing himself against a fence, kept his assailants at bay with so much vigor, that they were glad to quit the field. At another time, while preaching on temperance in the interior of Wisconsin, Mr. Haddock made remarks which aroused the ire of the village blacksmith to such an extent that after the meeting he waited for the preacher, to give him a severe beating. He, too, found himself overmatched and was ignominiously defeated. The blacksmith was also morally overcome, for he is now one of the most energetic Prohibitionists in his district.

ALL Elmsmere attended Charles Longmore's funeral. He was the last representative of a grand old family who, before the war, had held the first position in the State. It had furnished a Governor in its day, and more than one Senator, and had been potent in all political and social affairs. It was twenty years since Charles had left Elmsmere to repair his fortune. He had prospered, but he had not returned until he was brought back thus silently to sleep with his fathers in the family vault of Elmsmere church. Scarcely anything was known of his life in the interval.

After the funeral Dr. Marsh, the rector of the church, sat and talked of the dead and gone Longmores with his daughter Ursula, a bright girl of sixteen years, who had been born after Charles, the last representative of the family, quitted Elmsmere. She was a girl of singular purity of character and deep religious feeling, and to her the story of this extinct family was deeply interesting.

Nearly two years after that funeral a lady came to stay in the village. She occupied the best rooms in the hotel, and was evidently a person of some distinction. Every day, when the weather permitted, she went for a walk, and it was noticed by the curious villagers that she never returned to the hotel without passing through the graveyard around the old church.

"Who can that lady be?" said Ursula Marsh one day to her father, as she stood at the parsonage window which overlooked the graveyard. "She must be some connection of the Longmores, I fancy. She stopped before the Longmore vault ever so long, and when she went away she was crying. Had Mr. Longmore a sister, papa?"

"No, my dear," said Mr. Marsh. "Old Mr. Longmore had no daughters."

"Oh, dear," said Ursula, "the storm has come, and the poor lady will be wet through before she can get to the hotel. May I ask her to come in and shelter?"

The rector nodded his consent, and soon Ursula brought the lady into the parsonage, where Mr. Marsh received her with dignified politeness; neither he nor Ursula showing any disposition to pry into her affairs, the widow relaxed the hauteur which usually characterized her, and talked freely, though not cheerfully, on general subjects. When the storm cleared it had become dark, and she accepted Mr. Marsh's escort to the hotel.

"If I can be of any service to you during your stay," he said, at parting, "I shall be pleased."

"I have thought," she said, "when I heard you preach, that if I could confide in anyone, it would be in you. But," she added with a sigh, "it would be useless."

"There is no sorrow, madam," said the rector solemnly, "that the gospel cannot alleviate, no broken heart it cannot heal."

"You are very kind," said the lady. "Mine is an exceptional case, and I am sure it is incurable."

After this introduction Ursula Marsh often spoke to the mourner, and in her simple, artless manner dwelt on the peace religion brings to the despairing, the weary, and the heavy laden. Ursula saw from the lady's remarks that she was a stranger to that peace, but she indicated no desire to seek it.

One day, Ursula, passing the window of the parsonage, saw the mysterious lady taking her usual walk through the graveyard. She looked more melancholy than ever, and Ursula, regarding her closely, saw that she was weeping. When she reached the entrance to the Longmore vault she stopped, apparently unable to go farther, and, seating herself on a tombstone and leaning her head against the wall, she put her handkerchief to her face and gave way to her emotion. It was not in Ursula's nature to witness distress without trying to administer comfort. She put on her hat, and ran around to the graveyard. Seating herself beside the mourner, she silently and gently laid her hand on hers. The lady looked up, but, seeing who it was, covered her face again and wept bitterly.

"I am the resurrection and the life," said Ursula softly.

"Oh no, no, not for me," said the mourner. "There is no hope for me. Too late! Too late! No pardon for me now."

"The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth from all sin," Ursula quoted. "It is so indeed, dear lady."

"Not from mine; I am excluded."

"Oh, no; none are excluded."

"You do not know my case. Perhaps your father—but no, it is useless."

"My father? Oh, yes, he would tell you that you are not shut out. Do let him assure you of it. Come to him now."

"No, it would avail nothing; I should trouble him needlessly."

"It would be no trouble; I am sure he would convince you. Do come," and Ursula took the mourner's hand in both her own in the earnestness of her appeal.

Reluctantly the lady rose and followed her young friend to the clergyman's library. There, encouraged by his gentle tact, she told her sad story. Charles Longmore was her husband. In a moment of fierce temptation she had been unfaithful to him. When, overwhelmed with sorrow and remorse, she went to beseech his forgiveness, he was dead. She had come to Elmsmere to weep at his grave, intending to end her life there.

From the Book that has a balm for every case Mr. Marsh read to her the story of Mary Magdalen, and of the woman to whom the Saviour said, "Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more." The eagerness with which the poor creature clutched the hope held out was painful to witness. It was like the throes by which those who have nearly passed over the border, sometimes come back to life. Again and again during the days that followed she relapsed into despair; but at last, after long battling with the adversary, who had so long held her soul in darkness, victory was given her. She took her place among those who love much, because they have been forgiven much (Luke 7: 47).

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

Farewells.

EXPERIENCE certainly added her testimony to Carrie's argument. In one matter at least, and that the most engrossing at the time, reason was not supreme in Leroy's nature. Carrie divined the conflict going on in his mind, and deemed it a good time to press the matter to a higher stage. She said:

"Mr. Ransom, your difficulty is, you are trying to fathom these spiritual things with your intellect. No man ever did that yet. They require the exercise of a different faculty of the soul. A certain old Book says, 'Spiritual things are spiritually discerned,' and it speaks very wisely. These things are apprehended by the spiritual faculties."

"Yes, that is the old talk again."

Ursula Entreats the Mourner to go to Her Father.

"But it is the old talk that is the true talk, after all, and its age is a proof that it has stood the test of time."

He did not vouchsafe a reply.

"You have read Dr. Holland's 'Kathrina,' of course," she said, when he did not answer.

"Yes, indeed, and I admire it as a poem. Some of the descriptions are exceedingly graphic, and at times the real spirit of song is manifest. I do not know where there is anything more vivid than the last part. But as an argument I think 'Kathrina' is a failure. While I was reading it I supposed that those awful difficulties which Paul encountered, and which have met me so often in my life, would be solved and satisfactorily explained; but the poem closes with the death-scene and Paul's praying. Now, the pressure brought to bear upon him compelled him to pray, and then he simply gave up his doubts; and that is not argument. The awful questions he raises in the former parts of the book are left unsolved, unanswered. The author cuts the knot;

he does not untie it.

"The poem raises the doubts of reason, carries on the argument by reason, until at last it pretends to dash away all the doubts and rebellion, on the ground of emotion—in the presence of a dying wife, his heart's idol, who pleads with him to fall upon his knees. I must confess that when I had finished the book the doubts that Paul had suggested were much more vivid—much more convincing—to my mind than Paul's conversion. For weeks the awful event of his mother's death, and his subsequent doubts, were like a nightmare on my mind. They are there yet. He did not answer those questions—he simply gave up their solution. The simple matter of prayer was no answer to his previous doubts and arguments. I love Holland, but I must say that, as an argument, this poem is too light in the closing part."

"But did not Paul gain peace?" Carrie asked.

"He says at the last,

'Rebellion slept,
I grieved, and still I grieve; but with a heart
At peace with God, and soft with sympathy Toward all my sorrowing, struggling, sinful race.'

"Yes," replied our tenacious sceptic; "but that was simply because he gave up trying to answer the questions he had raised; but, you see, I can't give up the questions. I propose to solve them if possible. I cannot take things on trust. I must have reason for them. Besides, I cannot shut my mind to the thought that 'Kathrina,' though a noble poem, is only a fiction of Holland's mind, and was written to carry out his favorite views on this subject."

As they parted that evening she looked into his eyes with more than wonted tenderness, and said, putting her very soul into the words, "If you ever gain peace of mind, it will be in the way that Paul, in Dr. Holland's 'Kathrina,' gained it. You must pray!"

Her voice rang in his ears through the wakeful hours of the night, and during the unoccupied moments of the following day. It was like the voice of an oracle. There was no argument, no advice, no appeal. It was like the voice of the Pythoness, whose vision was clearer and far outreached the vision of ordinary humanity. "You must pray." Who was this teacher who thus dictated to him with authority? A student like himself, knowing little if anything more than he did. Yet she spoke as some sage professor might speak to a school-boy; as a physician might speak to a patient. Yet he did not resent the implied superiority. Was it that love had made him humble? Or was it that the traveller over the desert had found the water of life, and was telling him of the only track by which it could be found?

The college term was passing away all too swiftly. This friendship seemed to make the hours fly. The brightest hours of the term were those which Leroy had spent in Carrie's society. They were not wasted hours, as sometimes happens when two young people become engrossed in each other. Generally they were characterized by intense mental activity, and their influence had been stimulating and healthful. There were times when literature, pure and simple, was the subject of conversation, and then the exquisite purity of Carrie's taste and her acute penetration surprised her friend. Carefully as he had read the books which they discussed, he found that she had detected beauties and defects which had escaped his notice. But it was in religion that her knowledge and skillful argument most amazed him. More than once he had been ignominiously defeated, and even when, as he thought, victory was with him Carrie had sailed out of the conflict with colors flying, admitting her inability to fight longer, but calmly confident that she was right. Thus they were drawn nearer together as the weeks passed, and each grew more interested in the other as their interviews became more frequent.

They sat together in the dear old Hall on Commencement night, enjoying with the others the good fellowship and exhilaration that seemed to fill the very atmosphere of the room, yet with a touch of sadness too, that the pleasant intercourse of the past months must be interrupted for a time. Both, however, expected to return, and that prospect was consoling. With some, of course, it was the last night within the old walls, and from them hearty ringing words of farewell came almost sadly. Among these was Francis Train.

"Good-by, old friends," he cried, extending his arms as if he meant to shake hands with every one. "How often these walls have echoed to your voices, as they now echo to our farewells. Shall they ever hear you again? O hallowed memories, that in future days will come back to you and to us like the tender reminiscences of childhood! You leave these classic halls to engage in the great battle of life, perhaps never to come back again. Those blessed days are over and gone, like the innocent days when we played in the yard around the old house. We part; good-by! good-by! Acquit yourselves like men. We soon shall follow you into the whirling scenes of life. And now, though we shall be separated here in life, on the fair spring morning of the resurrection, amid the floral decorations of the great Commencement Day, we shall meet in the hall whose floor is gold, whose walls are jasper and whose doors are pearl."

Speeches over, they surrendered themselves to unconstrained social enjoyment. This last evening must be without a cloud, one never to be forgotten through all the years of life. Carrie and Leroy strolled off by themselves. To both of them, this parting was more than the parting with all their fellow-students. Short as their friendship had been, it was very precious, and now that separation was impending, its value seemed to increase.

The moon hung grand, full and round in the east. A few stars looked out modestly, as if half afraid to appear in the presence of her majesty. The two walked along the street and talked. Leroy could not conceal his regret at the prospect of parting. He thought, if it only were not premature, he would ask her to-night to be his own—his own forever. But it was too soon. How her hand upon his arm thrilled him! He was both happy and sad. His great love filled his soul with sanctity. It made him a better man. He could almost have worshipped God under the hallowed influence of that love. Did the moon guess his secret, that she looked down so brightly? Did the stars sympathize with his emotions, that they looked down in such glad glee? But the happiest and most eventful hour must have a close, and this came for the two friends, and for many others at the college, all too soon.

The next morning there was a busy scene at the depot. The platform was full of students awaiting the train on which they were to depart for their homes. Dr. Lester was there, shaking hands with every student, and saying good-bye. Dear, old simple-hearted savant! He loved his students, and they returned his affection heartily. Prof. Rich was there, and he hadn't left his smile at home. The fact is, it was a constant companion of all his movements. As he shook hands with Leroy, he said, his eye a-twinkle. "Let them fight. Let them fight it out, until Truth shall be enthroned on, etc." And then he laughed heartily, and said, "Heaven bless you!"

Carrie was there with her friends. She and Leroy were going together for some distance, as they both went the same direction. Leroy lived further east than she. The whistle of the locomotive was heard in the distance, and as the train came up to the depot the students crowded in until all the coaches were full. Good-byes were shouted, handkerchiefs were waved, tears were wiped away. The last thing Leroy saw was Prof. Rich shaking his handkerchief.

One matter Leroy had left for these final minutes. With some shrewdness, he had calculated on the softening influence which parting produces on every friend. They were nearing the station at which Carrie was to leave that train, while Leroy was to journey in it some hours longer. Then Leroy spoke:

"Carrie, may I write you sometimes during the vacation? You have been very helpful to me, and we have had some pleasant hours together; may we not have some communication, though we shall be separated? Say you will let me write, and you will answer."

"Why, certainly," said Carrie, frankly. "I shall be very pleased."

And so, almost before he knew it, Leroy's boon was granted, and this thing on which he had set his heart, and for which he expected to have to contend and entreat, was given him unhesitatingly. A few minutes more, and he was leaning from the car-window, anxious to catch the last glimpse of the lithe, graceful figure on the platform, with the waving handkerchief and glistening eyes.

It was a home darkened by calamity that Leroy entered that night. His mother had been anxious that he should not be worried, and therefore had not written him of her trouble. She had known of it for some weeks, but with the self-sacrifice for which the mother of many a family is noted, she had borne her burden silently. Besides, she had hoped that in some way it would be averted, and then her boy need never know. But now it could not be; her last hope was gone. One loss had followed another, until her little possessions were swept away, and it seemed impossible to save even the old homestead. That night she opened her heart to her boys, and they heard of her heroic struggle and her heart-breaking sorrow, with sad sympathy. They talked together after the mother had retired, and discussed every plan they could think of for saving at least the home which, to leave, would bring their mother's gray hairs in sorrow to the grave. Leroy took but one night to consider his duty, and before morning he had reached a decision. The following letter to his friend Carrie will explain his plans:

"Miss Carrie West: My mother has met with a financial loss. If she does not have help she will be compelled to give up her little home, and be without a place to rest her head. We cannot see this. She shall not be homeless, let the sacrifice be what it may. So I have given her my money, which will save her little place. But this prevents my going to college next year. It is a bitter disappointment—the most bitter of my life. Sometimes I think it is not just. I must go back to teaching again. My uncle in the West has secured me a good position as teacher in a town, and I must go to that place in a few weeks to commence work. On my way West (you know I have a great partiality for the West), I shall pass at but a short distance from your place, and should be happy to visit you, if agreeable to yourself. Please answer at once. Your letters are always looked for impatiently, and read with delight.

"Ever yours,"

In a few days an answer came back, of which this was a small part:

"All my people and myself will be happy to have you visit us on your way to the West from the West, if that is not too much of a pun."

"Allan," said Leroy, one day, "on my way West I intend to stop and visit Miss West, and I shall ask her to be my wife. Of course, I have only known her for six months, but we seem to be well acquainted, and I never thought so much of a girl before. Besides, I am going far away from her, for a year at least, and I can't think of leaving her without a promise of some kind, and I want to hear her say 'yes.'"

"Well, brother mine, you will please yourself, and at your age you must be supposed to know better than anyone else what is the best thing for you. No one can tell what will promote your happiness so well as you can. You are not a child now, to cry for a cartridge to play with. As you have concluded that the lady's companionship through life will make life better for you, I wish you success with all my heart. So far as I am concerned, too, I shall be glad to have you win a good wife. It will be very pleasant to have a sister at last. I wish your principles would let you pray about it. 'In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths.' It is a serious step, my boy—one that will make or mar your life; in my case, I should not neglect the offer of divine guidance."

Leroy made a gesture of impatience. "I am sick of such nonsense," he said. "A few centuries ago I should have been urged to consult an oracle, or be guided by the entrails of some animal slaughtered by a priest, or by the conjunction of the planets. It is all superstition. There are plenty of pious men who pray about everything, and yet blunder egregiously. I rely on my own judgment, and I am sure I am right in this."

"Well, I infer, from your account of Miss West, that she will not give her answer until she has prayed about it, so God will be asked about the union, and if it is not His will, it will not be achieved. That you may be very sure of."

"I shall do my best to achieve it, nevertheless. I am not sanguine, however. I know I am not worthy of her, and I know that she will hesitate about marrying a man who is not a Christian; but I believe that in her heart she loves me, though she has never uttered the most distant hint of such a thing. The difficulties will be great, but I shall do my best to overcome them."

"And I hope you will succeed. Forgive me just this once reminding you how much you miss, in this and all other efforts, by your persistent rejection of God. 'He will fulfill the desire of them that fear Him.' Ah! my brother, with all your learning you are not wise."

"I am glad to have your good wishes, my boy, and I know your advice is well meant, though I cannot take it," said Leroy. "But now I must be preparing to go. I will write you the result. In a day or two my troubles will either vanish in happiness or be doubled. Carrie has the alternative in her hands."

So, good-byes were said, and Leroy started on the first stage of his journey to his new sphere of labor. He took with him the blessing of a good mother, whose heart was full of pride in and love for a son capable of sacrificing the delight of his heart that she might be saved from sorrow in her old age. She knew how much the sacrifice must have cost her son, and appreciated it accordingly. "God bless thee, my boy," she said, at parting. "May thy days be long in the land," according to His promise to those who are good to their parents, and may He bring thee, in His own good time, into the light of His countenance." The old lady's voice was broken by tears, and Leroy felt that, whatever came of his loss of the college term, he was going into the world with his mother's blessing. That thought was a consolation to him as he was whirled rapidly away toward the little city in which Carrie lived.

JESUS DELIVERED TO BE CRUCIFIED.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 17, John 19: 1-16. Golden Text, Romans, 4: 25.

Unconvicted by Three Tribunals—A Decision Imperative—Neutrality Impossible—Christ Crowned by Sinners—Thorns the Fruit of Sin—Kingship in Sorrow—Pilate's Reiterated Decision—The Representative Man—Those who Looked at Him—Pilate's Dread—Self's Contracted Vision—Pilate's Loyalty Impeached—Sentence Pronounced—Crucified Again.

THEN Pilate, therefore, took Jesus and scourged him. He knew, and declared Him innocent, yet treated him as guilty! He had sent Him to Herod in the hope of finding some accusation against Him, but no shadow of excuse for his condemnation of Jesus came from that quarter. Pilate had gained something, the friendship of the wicked Herod, but he found no such justification of his crime in condemning Jesus as he had longed for. He called together the chief priests and the rulers, and the people, and said unto these, "Ye have brought this Man unto me, as one that perverteth the people; and behold, I, having examined him before you, have found no fault in this Man, touching those things whereof ye accuse Him; no, nor yet Herod; for I sent you to him; and lo, nothing worthy of death hath been done by Him. (R.V.) I will therefore chastise Him and release Him." (Luke 23: 13-16). But the united voices of the multitude prevailed. Pilate did chastise Him, but did not release him.

BEFORE THREE TRIBUNALS,

the ecclesiastical and the Jewish and Roman civil tribunals no crime had been proved against Jesus. in the heart of hearts of every living man who has heard of Christ, Jesus is found guiltless. Every man must have to do with Jesus, must acknowledge His claims as his Lord and Saviour, or he must, some time or other, know that he is guilty in not doing so. Every unsaved man must, some time or other, come to the knowledge of his own lost state, and then he must decide whether it is he or whether it is Jesus who is responsible for it. Every saved soul who is under the dominion of besetting sins, must settle the question whether Jesus is at fault, whether His salvation has broken down, or whether he himself is the guilty party. O reader, if you have come to the conclusion "that there is no fault in this man," no fault in Jesus, then make haste to tell Him that you are the one in fault, and yield yourself up to be dealt with at the bar, not of judgment, but of His redeeming grace. Thank God, He waits to be gracious and longs for the hour when you will let Him serve you. Some may think that if they do not believe in Jesus to the saving of their souls, they are at any rate not against Him; they take

A NEUTRAL POSITION.

Neutral! when life and death are at stake! neutral! when it took the death of the Son of God to save you; and instead of falling down at His feet in deepest gratitude, that He stands between you and eternal ruin, you continue in the sin which has wounded and brought Him to the cross! Pilate sought to take a neutral position; do you hold him guiltless of the death of Jesus? Every hour of our lives that we live without Jesus we are saying to the world that we find some fault in Him, or we are committing Pilate's sin of joining the world against Him. The Jews preferred Barabas, Pilate preferred Herod; what are we preferring to Jesus?

The soldiers plaited a crown of thorns, and put it on His head, Pilate doing nothing to hinder them; and they put on Him a purple robe, and mockingly said, "Hail, King of the Jews!" and they smote Him with their hands. O how little they understood what they were doing! Thorns and thistles, equally with sickness and death, came on earth as the result of sin. Not only was Jesus anointed by a sinner for His burial, but He was crowned by sinners with the thorns which were the consequences of their sin. And Jesus accepted such a kingship, a superiority of sorrow and suffering above every other human being! O the unspeakable love which adopted as its own, for our sakes, the sin of man and all its terrible consequences, that it might be true—"Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us," and that He might set us free from all which He bore for us!

Once again Pilate's heart smote him, poor, vacillating, unmanly man! He said, "Behold, I bring Him forth to you, that ye may know that I find no fault in Him." Again and again he spoke the words, but his deeds belied them: he is a weak man who says one thing and does another! Then came Jesus forth, wearing the crown of thorns and the purple robe, and Pilate said unto them,

"BEHOLD THE MAN."

What made him say it, we know not. "Son of man" was the title Jesus ordinarily took; it was His choice; He came on earth in the character of the Son of man. When God first created Adam He could have said, Behold the man; for Adam was the embodied thought of God, made in His image, and "very good." Nothing foreign to God was found in him; he was the perfect expression of God's highest thought in creation. But Jesus, the second Adam, the Man in whom the Father dwelt, the Man who came down from heaven, not to do His own will, but the will of the Father; the Man who was the expression of God's thought in redemption; the Man on whom God could look on fallen man again—yes, more, dwelt in fallen man again—behold Him! O beloved, do we behold Him? Let us never take our eyes off Him again; we never sin, we never grieve, we never fail in anything, so long as we are beholding Jesus.

Pilate looked at Him, but he looked also at what it would cost him to acknowledge Jesus; he would lose his worldly position and become a nobody! He would gain glory and honor and immortality and eternal life (Rom. 2: 7) and a quiet conscience. The chief priests also beheld the Man; they also looked away, and saw Pilate wavering. Personal interests absorbed every other thought with these men. If Jesus lived, and continued to teach and work His miracles, they too would become nobodies, and this they could not, would not brook. They were the leaders of the people; had they not a claim to be heard and revered beyond any who were not, as they were, of the tribe of Levi? So, with bitter, malignant rage, they cried out, "Crucify Him! crucify Him!"

The war with his own conscience was still raging in Pilate's heart, and he said, "Take ye Him and crucify Him: for I find no fault in Him." The Jews answered him, "We have a law, and by our law He ought to die, because He made Himself the Son of God." When Pilate, therefore, heard that saying he was

THE MORE AFRAID.

Afraid of what? Lest in very deed he was crucifying the Son of God. The words of Christ had made an impression on Pilate, if not upon the Jews; he had marked the wondrous unlikeness of Jesus to any other criminal; he had seen Jesus so unwilling to speak and take up His own cause, and in his heart he said, 'The claim is true; He is the Son of God.' Strange that the Jews could not see what Pilate saw, strange that these miracles, this teaching the wonderful spirit of non-resistance, should have no power over them! But nothing is so blind as self; self in them was wounded by all which Jesus did and all He said; it pricked them to the heart, took all the lustre out of their piety, showed up all their unreality; in fact, it took off the veil which hid them from themselves and from others, and left the guile and wickedness of their hearts exposed. They must either give in and own themselves the hypocrites they were, or they must persuade themselves that He was an impostor. This they had no difficulty in doing, although they had not one single proof of it. But their will was on that side. And we have the same hearts: where self is allowed a rein, no reason or argument will convince; to see. We are conscious of this in others, but just as far as self has power over us, this tendency to be biassed, and to have a colored view of things, obtains with each one of us.

Pilate again and again tried to extricate himself; he entered into the palace, or Prætorium, again, and saith unto Jesus, "Whence art Thou?" But Jesus gave him no answer. Pilate therefore saith unto Him, "Speakest Thou not unto me? knowest Thou not that I have power (authority) to release Thee, and have power to crucify Thee?" Jesus answered him, "Thou wouldst have no power (authority) against Me, except it were given thee from above: therefore, he that delivered Me unto thee hath the greater sin," (R. V.) What was this? A prisoner, whose own fate hung upon the words which he should speak, calmly and deliberately pronouncing on the jurisdiction of His judge! But the words carried weight. Pilate felt that the connection of Jesus with that "above" of which He spoke was real, and the Roman governor could not get away from it. Upon this Pilate sought to release Him, but the Jews cried out, saying, "If thou release this man, thou art not Cæsar's friend; everyone that maketh himself a King, speaketh against (opposeth) Cæsar." It was Pilate's weak point. He knew that Cæsar's kingdom had nothing to fear from Jesus, yet the dread of being represented in Rome as joining an insurrection against the Emperor, overcame him.

Again he brought Jesus out, and sat down on the judgment seat at a place called the Pavement, but in the Hebrew, Golgotha. Now, it was the preparation of the Passover; it was about the sixth hour; and he saith unto the Jews:

BEHOLD YOUR KING!

They therefore cried out: "Away with Him! Away with Him! Crucify Him!" Pilate saith unto them, "Shall I crucify your king?" They say unto him, "We have no king but Cæsar." (R. V.) But their loyalty to Cæsar varied with the occasion. Once they asked, "Shall we give tribute to Cæsar or not?" Now they seem to abjure their very nationality in their hatred of Jesus. The decision must come. Pilate had delayed, in every way possible, the giving sentence against Jesus, but, do what he would, use what subtleties he might, he must give sentence, and, contrary to the dictates of his conscience, in violation of what he knew to be right, the unhappy man "delivered Jesus unto them to be crucified." God permitted it. Before the creation of the world Jesus was, in His purpose and that of His Father, "the lamb slain." But this does not in any way lessen the guilt of Pilate or of the chief priests. There is such a sin as crucifying to ourselves the Son of God afresh and putting Him to an open shame (Heb. 6: 6), it is the sin of falling away. The same loving God, who bore our sins in his own body on the tree, is our only, but our perfect security against backsliding. So we "behold the Man," enlisted by His own love and grace in our behalf to keep us as well as save us to His eternal glory, we see in Him all our salvation.

THE OTHER SIDE.

We dwell this side of Jordan's stream,
Yet off there comes a shining beam
Across from yonder shore;
While visions of a holy throng,
And sound of harp, and seraph song,
Seem gently wafted o'er.

The other side! Ah, there's the place
Where saints in joy past times retract,
And think of trials gone;
The veil withdrawn, they clearly see
That all the earth had need to be,
That they might safely home.

The other side! No sin is there
To stain the robes that blessed ones wear
Made white in Jesus' blood;
No cry of grief, no voice of woe,
To mar the peace their spirits know—
Their constant peace with God.

The other side! Its shore so bright
Is radiant with the golden light
Of Zion's city fair!
And many dear ones gone before
Already tread the happy shore:
I seem to see them there.

The other side! The other side!
Who would not brave the swelling tide
Of earthly toil and care;
To wake one day, when life is past,
Over the stream, at home at last,
With all the blessed ones there!

MR. H. W. BROWN.
The Eminent Evangelist.

Birth in Canada in 1836—Education—Failure of Health—Falls Down a Hatchway—An Incurable Injury to the Spine—Conversion in 1852—A Solemn Covenant—Ordained—Work with the Christian Commission—Pastor of a Church in Michigan—Call to Evangelistic Labor—An Unmistakable Sign—A Significant Telegram—Incidents of his Labors.

THE well-known Evangelist, whose portrait appears this week on the first page, was born in Glengarry County, Ontario, Canada, in the year 1836. He is now, therefore, in his fiftieth year. His parentage was Scotch, and his family emigrated to Canada in the year 1833. After receiving a fair education in his native country he entered Madison University, New York. His health failed before the completion of his college course, and it was necessary for him to return home.

A FALL THROUGH A HATCHWAY of a steamer had caused an injury to his spine, and produced a curvature, which, while extremely painful at first, threatened to cause increasing suffering as years went by. The young man consulted skilled physicians in Canada, Buffalo, New York and other places, but without relief. They concurred in the opinion that his case was hopeless. He must be a cripple for life. It was a most distressing situation for an active, intelligent young man to find himself placed in, and it may be well imagined that he must have almost wished for death rather than a life of continued suffering.

In the year 1852, Robert Boyd was holding evangelistic services in London, Ontario, and one night when the service was being held in a barn, Hugh Brown was among the hearers. He was deeply moved under the preaching, and that night he prayed nearly all night long, that God would save his soul. He was converted, and immediately there arose in his heart an intense desire to live and work for God. He thought much and studied earnestly, sincerely endeavoring to discover the will of the Lord regarding him. During the following months, that was the predominant subject before him. He was exercised with it all day and during the waking hours of the night. He came at length to see that was the only life worth living, and that for himself it was the one blessing to be sought. The idea grew stronger within him, and his resolve was taken. Rising from his bed in the middle of the night, he knelt down by its side, and there, with no witness but God Himself, in the solemn silence of the midnight hour, he solemnly pledged his life to the service of Christ, and registered a vow that if the Lord healed him, giving him strength to work, that the strength should be spent in the Lord's service, and should not be used for his own advantage, or in the service of the world or of Satan. It was a most solemn, binding obligation, a covenant made in the strength of the Lord, to be faithfully observed until death. God heard the prayer and the vow, and the young man rose from his knees a new creature—Christ's bondsman henceforth, rejoicing that he was no longer his own. From that time a change was observed in him; new life and vigor were manifested, and, what was more remarkable, his spine grew gradually straighter, until after a few months the curvature wholly disappeared, and young Brown stood straight as other men. He at once proceeded to carry out his part of the covenant, and prepared to enter the Christian ministry. In 1860 he was pastor of a Baptist church in western New York. In common with other young men at that time, he found quiet, ordinary work of any kind soon become impossible. The terrific struggle going on in the field, called for every man with youth and strength to take his part in it. Mr. Brown quitted his church, and traveled South. He was employed by to labor among the men in the field. During that winter he was constantly at work, and personally labored with not less than fifty thousand men. His post was with the army of Virginia, then at Petersburg, and he shared with the men in their privations. With his blanket and hard tack he got through the winter, and had the gratification of knowing that his labors, privations and hardships had not been without fruit. One of the most blessed results was a revival, which occurred among the sixth corps, at a place called Yellow Tavern, which was General Wright's headquarters.

At the close of the war Mr. Brown accepted the invitation of another church in Western New York, and subsequently labored for some months of 1866 as pastor of a church in Michigan. He was happy and successful in his work, when came to him. It seemed to him that God was calling him to that field, and his brother ministers in a remarkable way, independently of each other, urged him to devote himself to the service. The call, as Mr. Brown admits, was most unwelcome. He was reluctant to leave pastoral occupation in which God was blessing him; he had a comfortable home and was thoroughly happy in the society of wife and children, from whom it was very hard to separate. Like Jonah when he felt it his duty to go to Nineveh, Mr. Brown turned a deaf ear to the voice of conscience and sought for some time to evade the manifest duty. For several months the struggle went on, and he lived during that time in a state of spiritual darkness. It culminated in a conflict of intense earnestness, which continued three days. Finally, after a period of prayer, Mr. Brown's spirit yielded. "Do with me Lord according to Thy will," he said, and then waited for an indication of that will. He went further. He asked the Lord that, if it really was His will that he should devote his life to Evangelistic labor, the undertaking being serious and involving his family and church in some difficulty, he might be favored by

AN UNMISTAKABLE SIGN.

He would like to commence the work at the church of the minister under whose preaching he had been converted—Mr. Boyd. If, without any intimation to any one of his wish, an invitation came from Mr. Boyd to him to hold services in his church, he would accept the sign as a clear indication of God's will in the matter, and would thenceforth devote himself entirely to the work of an evangelist. The next day Mr. Brown received a telegram from Mr. Boyd, begging him to come to his help in conducting revival meetings in his church. Mr. Brown felt deeply solemnized. He felt that God had dealt with him in a very direct manner, and he dare no longer hesitate. He has kept that telegram as a sacred thing—a call to his apostleship.

Setting out immediately, Mr. Brown stayed for a week with Mr. Moorhead in Chicago, where he received a fresh spiritual baptism. He then proceeded to the sphere of his first evangelistic effort. There, meetings were held for five weeks, and over a hundred persons were converted. That was in 1868. During the following year Mr. Brown was appointed by the Baptist Home Missionary Society an evangelist for the State of Wisconsin, and spent twelve months among the smaller churches of that State. In the eighteen years which have elapsed since he entered the field, giving up pastoral privileges, a settled home and an assured income, Mr. Brown has been in constant service. He has labored in the Eastern, Middle and Southern States, in the Territories and on the Pacific slope, and wherever he has gone the Lord has given him tokens of His blessing.

Mr. Brown has experienced another operation of divine healing since the one already described. His

some time ago in answer to prayer. He was suffering from a large abscess which had formed on his head. For a long time his life was despaired of. After consulting many physicians, he was removed to the Eye and Ear Infirmary, in Chicago, where he lay for seven weeks, suffering agony. Strong opiates were administered to enable him to get sleep, but for six weeks of the seven he was unable to obtain one hour's sleep in the twenty-four. Mrs. Brown watched over him and waited upon him with unremitting devotion, but he gradually grew worse. One day Miss Dryer called to see him, and urged him to commit his case to the Lord, and she and her Christian friends would pray for him. She called a meeting for prayer in her own room in Farwell Hall. That night the abscess broke and relief was instantaneous. The case, from the surgical point of view, is recorded on the books of the Chicago Eye and Ear Infirmary.

The trouble was not entirely removed when the abscess broke. The surgeons had made an incision in the bone, with the object of facilitating the discharge, but the abscess discharged in the middle ear and ruptured the drum of the ear. Mr. Brown found, on his recovery, that he was completely deaf on that side. He was assured that he would have to submit to that inconvenience, as no case was on record of a burst drum of the ear being restored. Some time afterward, however, while conducting services at the Bedford Avenue Church, Brooklyn, Miss Hutchings, the daughter of the pastor, was marvelously healed (as already described in these columns) in answer to prayer, and her case encouraged Mr. Brown to hope for the recovery of his hearing. He prayed himself, and asked the prayers of the people. God heard the prayer, and one morning Mr. Brown made the glad discovery that he could hear as distinctly on one side as the other. Since that time, although he does not make Divine healing the subject of preaching, he has always responded when called upon by sick persons to pray for their recovery, and has testified publicly of his own healing.

A THRASHING THREATENED.

In the course of his work Mr. Brown has frequently been threatened with personal violence. On one occasion, while conducting services at Bloomington, Ill., he aroused the animosity of some lawless men by exposing the vicious condition of the city. One of them made a bet of fifty dollars, that he would administer to the preacher the worst thrashing a man ever had. The next night he came to the service, accompanied by the stakeholder and several witnesses delegated to see that the operation was properly performed. During the service the man was visibly affected, and before the sermon was over he was trembling from head to foot. At the close of the service Mr. Brown spoke to the man, and found him under deep conviction. He confessed the wicked object that had brought him to the meeting, and added with grim pathos, "But the Lord has thrashed me instead." That man is now a consistent member of the church.

TAR AND FEATHERS

were threatened in a city of Iowa. There was an infidel club in that city, and a sermon Mr. Brown preached exasperated the members. He received a warning to quit the place within twenty-four hours, under penalty of receiving a coat of tar and feathers, and being carried on a rail to the State line. The deacon of the church where the services were being held, who knew the desperate character of the men, came to Mr. Brown and assured him that they would surely execute their threat, and he offered to drive him to the depot. Mr. Brown smilingly told him he would be as willing to go to Heaven on a rail as by any other way, and he should not quit the ground. That night one of the leaders of the infidel club, a physician, attended the service and took a seat near the front, evidently intending to keep track of the preacher's utterances. During the progress of the service he was seen to fall headlong from his seat, as if from some crushing blow, and was picked up and carried out unconscious. When he recovered, some hours later, he began crying to God for mercy, and Mr. Brown was summoned. He was converted that night, and accompanied the preacher to the next three cities on his route, giving him most earnest aid in his work.

A PERSONAL REVELATION

was witnessed by Mr. Brown while assisting Mr. Moody in Chicago. One of the Christian workers came to him after the conclusion of the general meeting, and said that a man was present who declared himself willing to become a Christian if any one could convince him of the existence of God. "Go to Mr. Moody," said Mr. Brown, "that is a case for him." But Mr. Moody was already engaged, and could not leave. Another application was made to Mr. Brown, who then went to the unbeliever. Asking Divine guidance, Mr. Brown began to speak to the man. "You cannot prove it," he said, "I defy you to prove to me that there is a God." "No, perhaps not," said Mr. Brown, "but kneel down, and I will ask God to reveal Himself to you." Both knelt, and Mr. Brown prayed earnestly to God that the man might have such a revelation of God's existence as would convince him. When he ceased praying the man fell forward on his face, and, in a tone of deep distress, cried aloud for mercy. He too was saved, and became an earnest Christian.

A SUICIDE PREVENTED.

When Mr. Brown quitted his home to engage in evangelistic work, his wife naturally dreaded the loneliness that would come into her life. "What shall I do?" she asked him. "There is abundance of work," he said, "visit the sick and the sorrowing. Do not mind the rich; they will get along without you. But the poor and miserable and depraved need help. Look after them." Mrs. Brown took up that work, and soon became known as a sympathizing friend to all who were "out of the way." She was especially sought by the fallen women of the city, who frequently appealed to her when deserted by their companions, and left to die neglected and alone. In paying a visit one night to one of these unhappy women, who lived in a quarter infested by disreputable resorts, she noticed one of them acting strangely. Going near to her, she saw that she had a pistol in her hand, with which she was just about to terminate her miserable existence. She spoke kindly to the wretched creature, and took the pistol out of her hand. Her words were the first words of kindness a pure woman had addressed to her for years, and the poor woman melted under them. Mrs. Brown took her to her home, talked with her, prayed with her, and had the happiness of seeing her converted, and restored to her family.

The White Cross Movement is Vigorously Advocated by Miss Frances E. Willard in a brief letter to the Witness. In it she explains why it is so clearly and closely affiliated to the temperance work. Every disreputable house, she says, is practically a saloon. "This rendered the movement no departure from our line of work. We have started after drink, and the sale of drink, and we follow it just wherever it leads us, and it leads us into these places. So we are trying in this way to promote social purity. It is a most difficult undertaking, and it will be years before we can bring that part of our work to the development to which we have brought our total abstinence efforts.

"We are not so blind as to limit our efforts to those who are gone very far in the ways of sin; our great effort is to educate and prevent. One object of the White Cross movement in England is to have children in very early days taught at home by their mothers about the dangers of their lives, and we think if the mothers of this Union would rise up to this thought they would consider it a virtue to say to their children what they now regard as a sin. We think that to be forewarned is to be forearmed, and that virtue founded on knowledge is better than innocence founded on ignorance."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Secret of a Dying Man's Peace.—The Rev. H. Hall related at a recent meeting: "Many years ago, when I was quite a boy, I remember being in the house of an elder one night when he came in and his wife asked, 'What has detained you to so late an hour?' 'I was called to see a man who is dying,' he rejoined. 'And has he had a peaceful deathbed?' inquired his wife. 'Yes, he is in a very happy frame of mind,' was the reply. 'When I asked him if he were at rest, he said, 'Oh, yes, sir, I know there is room in the Father's love, there is room in the Spirit's graces, there is room in Jesus's blood for me and many more.' Oh, how true were the words of that dying man. There is room—room for all who will come unto the Father through Jesus the Son."

A Necklet that Cost $75,000.—Mr. Larkin observes: "When I was in London lately I heard of a lady who had bought a necklet at the price of $75,000; she bought it on the occasion of her presentation at the Court of Queen Victoria. I was sorry to hear of such a great price being paid for a mere ornament; surely she could have found a more advantageous way to dispose of her money. But had any of us been offered that necklet, do you think we should have refused it? I don't think so; and yet here is the precious blood of Christ, that is infinitely more precious than all the jewels on earth, and which will adorn your spirit both for time and eternity; here is this precious blood being offered freely to every one of you, and yet how many there are who refuse it."

Why a Monument was Wrecked.—Mr. Garriot observes: "One day I was driving with a friend, and we passed a monument. The monument was large, massive, well built, and with a good foundation, yet it was a complete wreck. When first built it had been very strong, and had withstood the storms of wind and rain for many years; but a night came on when there was a terrific thunderstorm, and just because it had no lightning conductor, all that great and noble structure was rent from top to bottom. In like manner, some Christless ones seem to be good, honest and respectable Christians, but that is when things are going well with them; but some time or other the lightning of God's wrath will break over them, and what will become of them?"

"The Young Man in the Next Bed."—Mrs. Cole relates: "I had a little stable boy who used to look after the horses, clean the boots, and little things of that sort. Now, I wanted to know if that little boy was a little Christian or a little sinner, and I found that he knew very little about Jesus, but that he was anxious to know more; so I used to talk with him while he was cleaning the knives and forks. He had a bad father, and had never been at school until he went to a night school when with us. He left us, and I did not see him for some years, as he went to learn a trade. At last I heard he was in the hospital, dying of consumption. He sent for me, and when I came he said, 'I could not die without letting you know that the Lord Jesus has saved me, and has kept me and watched over my ways ever since I was in your house; but oh! there is a young man in the next bed who says there is no God, and I am so sorry for him; if you would please speak to him about his soul,' and that poor stable boy died; but for him to die was happiness. He had known no other happiness in this world except in the Lord Jesus, and now he has gone to be with Him forever."

A Woman's Inconsistency.—Rev. Mr. Wilson remarks: "A woman came into my vestry recently, and said: 'I want to be a Christian; I want to be converted; and last night I went down on my knees and prayed God to save me, but it seemed as if the heavens were made of brass, for I got no answer.' 'Well,' I said, 'the first thing is, did you expect to be saved? Just look here. Here is my Bible; if I say to you, take this Bible, what would you do?' 'I should just take it, and say thank you, sir.' 'But if, instead of your taking it, you said: 'Oh! Mr. Wilson, give me that Bible; please give me that Bible,' and continued pleading for it while I was offering it to you, what would you be doing?' 'Making a fool of you, sir,' she answered. 'And is that not what you are doing to God? God has been offering you the gift of salvation, and each time you have put it aside and continued to cry for it; when, in fact, you had but to accept that which He so generously proffered you.' 'Is that all?' she exclaimed; 'why, that is so simple.' 'I have heard people say, when shown the way of salvation, 'That is far too cheap a way.' If it is too cheap for you, it was dear enough for Christ. It cost Him His life, that it might be free for us."

A Bankrupt Brewer's Wife.—A converted brewer, who is now an evangelist, remarks: "I was speaking to my wife one day of a brewer, and, knowing that I had been in that line of business, we naturally began to speak about the brewery, and from that to her husband. 'Yes,' she said, 'I have been very unfortunate. First of all, my husband lost $150,000, then he lost his business, and after that, when he died, I am afraid he lost his soul. After his death I began to read the Bible, and I got much comfort, but these are two words which I cannot fully understand—justify and justification.' I took up my Bible and read, 'Be it known unto you, men and brethren, that through this man Christ Jesus is preached unto you forgiveness of sin!' She said, 'Now tell me how that it is?' I said, 'The law could not justify any one, but on the other hand condemned him, but Christ Jesus came and fulfilled the law, and by believing in Him, and that he was punished for us, we become justified through Him; but in Luke 18: 10, we hear of two men who went up to the temple to pray, the one a Pharisee and the other a Publican.' I narrated the whole story and continued: 'A person is not only justified by believing in Christ, but he is counted as righteous as if he had never committed a sin in his life; and it is not by works, but by faith—by believing in Christ—that one is justified—is "saved." That dear woman cried, 'I never thought that believing was so easy before, and that it did so much, and I am so happy now I have got it explained to me, and I find I have nothing to do but believe in Christ, and that He has done all the rest.'"

Slaves of the Gambling Mania.—Mr. Oatts says: "One of the greatest sins among the young men of this city is gambling. Only last week I had the door of one of these betting places watched, and within one hour, the dinner hour, there passed out and in four hundred and ninety young men. They came from their various places of business, went to that den, put on their bets, which occupied only about five minutes, and then had plenty of time to take their lunch and be back to business at the usual time. I know where many of the young men got the money they thus used. It did not come from their wages. It is not theirs by right. No. It comes from their employers; it is taken from the till, or the petty cash drawer, and by-and-bye, when they have taken too much to hush it up, they will run away, leaving business, friends, character, and everything near and dear to them because they yielded to the sin of gaming. I had an example of this a day or two ago. A poor widow had two sons, whom she had brought up and educated at great personal hardship to herself, comforting herself with the thought that they, in their turn, would become her support. But her eldest son took to evil ways, and especially to betting, using not his own money, but his master's, always expecting to make a grand coup, and be able to repay all he owed; but that coup never came, and during the last few days he had to leave England, being found out embezzling. The younger son is following in the footsteps of his brother, and instead of benefitting their poor widowed mother, they bid fair to bring her grey head in sorrow to the grave."

THE STOLEN GRINDSTONES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday morning, October 10, 1886.

"Now there was no smith found throughout all the land of Israel, for the Philistines said, Lest the Hebrews make them swords or spears. But all the Israelites went down to the Philistines, to sharpen every man his share, and his coulter, and his axe, and his mattock. Yet they had a file for the mattock, and for the coulters, and for the forks, and for the axes, and to sharpen the goads" 1. Samuel, 13: 19-21.

Pitiable Plight of the Israelites—Practically Disarmed—The Deliverance—I. Dangerous for the Church when its Enemies have its Weapons—Scientific Christians Wanted—II. The Undeveloped Resources of the Church—Too Large a Reserve Corps—The Call to the Front—Laymen to be Enlisted—Ministers Not Suffering From Hard Study—A Lecture to Pay Marriage Expenses—III. The World's Grindstones to be Used—Paul's Example—Chalmers and Jonathan Edwards—IV. Sin Puts Men on a Small Allowance—Voltaire's Death—V. The Church Losing its Metal—Men Powerful on their Knees.

WHAT a galling subjugation for the Israelites! The Philistines had carried off all the blacksmiths, and torn down all the blacksmiths' shops, and abolished the blacksmiths' trade in the land of Israel. The Philistines would not even allow these parties to work their valuable mines of brass and iron, nor might they make any swords or spears. There were only two swords left in all the land. Yea, these Philistines went on until they had taken all the grindstones from the land of Israel, so that if an Israelitish farmer wanted to sharpen his plough or his axe, he had to go over to the garrison of the Philistines to get it done. There was only one sharpening instrument left in the land, and that was a file; the farmers and the mechanics having nothing to whet up the coulter, and the goad, and the pick-axe, save a simple file.

INDUSTRY WAS HINDERED and work practically disgraced. The great idea of these Philistines was to keep the Israelites disarmed. They might get iron out of the hills to make swords of, but they would not have any blacksmiths to weld this iron. If they got the iron welded, they would have no grindstones on which to bring the instruments of agriculture or the military weapons up to an edge. Oh, you poor, weaponless Israelites, reduced to a file, how I pity you! But these Philistines were not for ever to keep their heel on the neck of God's children. Jonathan, on his hands and knees, climbs up a great rock, beyond which were the Philistines; and his armor-bearer, on his hands and knees, climbs up the same rock, and these two men, with their two swords, hew to pieces the Philistines, the Lord throwing a great terror upon them. So it was then; so it is now. Two men of God on their knees, mightier than a Philistine host on their feet!

I. I learn, first, from this subject, that it is DANGEROUS FOR THE CHURCH of God to allow its weapons to stay in the hands of its enemies. These Israelites might again and again have obtained a supply of swords and weapons, as for instance, when they took the spoils of the Ammonites; but these Israelites seemed content to have no swords, no spears, no blacksmiths, no grindstones, no active iron mines, until it was too late for them to make any resistance. I see the farmers tugging along with their pickaxes and plough, and I say, "Where are you going with those things?" They say, "Oh, we are going over to the garrison of the Philistines, to get these things sharpened." I say, "You foolish men, why don't you sharpen them at home?" "Oh," they say, "the blacksmiths' shops are all torn down, and we have nothing left us but a file."

So it is in the church of Jesus Christ to-day. We are too willing to give up our weapons to the enemy. The world boasts that it has gobbled up the schools, and the colleges, and the arts, and the sciences, and the literature, and the printing press. Infidelity is making a mighty attempt to get all our weapons in its hand, and then to keep them. You know it is making this boast all the time, and after a while, when the great battle between Sin and Righteousness has opened, if we do not look out we will be as badly off as these Israelites, without any swords to fight with and without any sharpening instruments. I call upon the superintendents of literary institutions to see to it that the men who go into the class rooms to stand beside the Leyden jars, and the electric batteries, and the microscopes, and telescopes, be children of God, not Philistines.

The Carlylean, Emersonian and Tyndalleian thinkers of this day are trying to get all the intellectual weapons in their own grasp.

WE WANT SCIENTIFIC CHRISTIANS to capture the science, and scholastic Christians to capture the scholarship, and philosophic Christians to capture the philosophy, and lecturing Christians to take back the lecturing platform. We want to send out against Schenkel and Strauss and Renan, a Theodore Christlieb, of Bonn, and against the infidel scientists of the day, a God-worshipping Silliman and Hitchcock and Agassiz. We want to capture all the philosophical apparatus, and swing around the telescopes on the swivel, until through them we can see the morning star of the Redeemer, and with mineralogical hammer discover the Rock of Ages, and amid the flora of all realms find the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley.

We want a clergy learned enough to discourse of the human eye, showing it to be a microscope and telescope in one instrument, with eight wonderful contrivances, and lids closing thirty thousand or forty thousand times a day; all its muscles and nerves and bones showing the infinite skill of an infinite God, and then winding up with the peroration, "He that formed the eye, shall He not see?" And then we want to discourse about the human ear, its wonderful integuments, membranes and vibration, and closing with the question, "He that planted the ear, shall He not hear?" And we want some one able to expound the first chapter of Genesis, bring to it the geology and the astronomy of the world, until, as Job suggested, "The stones of the field shall be in league" with the truth, and the stars in their course shall fight against Sisera. Oh, Church of God, go out and recapture these weapons!

Let men of God go out and take possession of the platform. Let any printing presses that have been captured by the enemy be recaptured for God; and the reporters, and the type-setters, and the editors, and the publishers swear allegiance to the Lord God of truth. Ah, my friend, that day must come, and if the great body of Christian men have not the faith, or the courage, or the consecration to do it, then let some Jonathan on his busy hands and on his praying knees, climb up on the Rock of Hindrance, and in the name of the Lord God of Israel slash to pieces those literary Philistines. If these men will not be converted to God, then they must be overthrown.

II. Again: I learn from this subject what a large amount of

THE CHURCH'S RESOURCES is actually hidden, and buried, and undeveloped. The Bible intimates that that was a very rich land, this land of Israel. It says, "The stones are iron, and out of the hills thou shalt dig brass;" and yet hundreds and thousands of dollars' worth of this metal was kept under the hills. Well, that is the difficulty with the Church of God at this day. Its talent is not developed. If one half of its energy could be brought out, it might take the public iniquities of the day by the throat, and make them bite the dust. If human eloquence were consecrated to the Lord Jesus Christ, it would in a few years persuade this whole earth to surrender to God. There is enough undeveloped energy in this one church to bring all Brooklyn to Christ—enough undeveloped Christian energy in the city of Brooklyn to bring all the United States to Christ—enough of undeveloped Christian energy in the United States to bring the whole world to Christ; but it is buried under strata of indifference, and under whole mountains of sloth. Now, is it not time for the mini to begin, and the pickaxes to plunge, and this buried metal to be brought out and into the furnaces, and be turned into howitz and carbines for the Lord's host?

The vast majority of Christians in this d are useless. The most of the Lord's battali belong to the reserve corps. The most of t crew are asleep in the hammocks. The most the metal is under the hills. Oh, is it not ti for the Church of God to rouse up and unde stand that we want all the energies, all the t ent and all the wealth enlisted for Christ's sake I like the nickname that the English soldie gave to Blucher, the commander. They calle him "Old Forwards." We have had enough r treats in the Church of Christ; let us have glorious advance. And I say to you as th general said when his troops were affrighte —rising up in his stirrups, his hair flying i the wind, he lifted up his voice until twent thousand troops heard him crying out "Fo ward, the whole line!"

WE WANT ALL THE LAYMEN enlisted. Ministers are numerically too smal They do the best they can. They are the mos overworked class on earth. Many of them di of dyspepsia because they cannot get the righ kind of food to eat, or, getting the right kind are so worried that they take it down in chunk They die from consumption, coming from earl and late exposure. If a novelist or a historia publishes one book a year, he is considered industrious. But every faithful pastor must orig inate enough thought for three or four volume a year. Ministers receive enough calls in year from men who have maps and medicine and lightning-rods and pictures to sell, to exhaust their vitality. They are bored with agent of all sorts. They are set in draughts at funer als, and poisoned by the unventilated rooms of invalids, and waited upon by committees who want addresses made, until life becomes a burden to bear.

It is not hard study that makes ministers loo pale. It is the infinity of interruptions and botherations to which they are subjected. If die before my time, it will be at the hand of committees that want an address or a lecture. A man called on me to give him a lecture by which he might pay the expenses of his wedding trip. If there were fifty hours in each day of the year, and I worked forty of them, I could not do the work of this one parish; and I am not behind most clergymen in disposition to toil. Numerically too small! It is no more the work of the pulpit to convert and save the world than it is the work of the pew. If men go to ruin, there will be as much blood on your skirts as on mine.

Let us quit this grand farce of trying to save the world by a few clergymen, and let all hands lay hold of the work. Give us, in all our churches, two or three aroused and qualified men and women to help. In most churches to-day five or ten men are compelled to do all the work. A vast majority of churches are at their wits' end how to carry on a prayer-meeting if the minister is not there, when there ought to be enough pent-up energy and religious force to make a meeting go on with such power that the minister would never be missed. The Church stands working the pumps of a few ministerial cisterns until

THE BUCKETS ARE DRY and choked, while there are thousands of fountains from which might be dipped up the waters of eternal life. Before you and I have the sod pressing our eyelids we will, under God, decide whether our children shall grow up amid the accursed surroundings of vice and shame, or come to an inheritance of righteousness. Long, loud, bitter, will be the curse that scorches our grave if, holding within the Church to-day enough men and women to save the city, we act the coward or the drone. I wish I could put enough moral explosives under the convenonalities and majestic stupidities of the day to blow them to atoms, and that then, with fifty thousand men and women from all the churches, knowing nothing but Christ and a desire to bring all the world to Him, we might move upon the enemy's works. For a little while heaven would not have trumpets enough to celebrate the victories.

III. Again: I learn from this subject that we sometimes do well to take advantage of.

THE WORLD'S GRINDSTONES.

These Israelites were reduced to a file, and so they went over to the garrison of the Philistines to get their axes, and their goads, and their ploughs sharpened. The Bible distinctly states it—the text which I read at the beginning of the service—that they had no other instruments now with which to do this work, and the Israelites did right when they went over to the Philistines to use their grindstones. My friends, is it not right for us to employ the world's grindstones? If there be art, if there be logic, if there be business faculty on the other side, let us go over and employ it, for Christ's sake. The fact is, we fight with too dull weapons, and we work with too dull implements. We hack and we maul, when we ought to make a clean stroke. Let us go over among sharp business men, and among sharp literary men, and find out what their tact is, and then transfer it to the cause of Christ. If they have science and art, it will do us good to rub against it.

In other words, let us employ the world's grindstones. We will listen to their music, and we will watch their acumen, and we will

and will borrow their philosophical apparatus to make our experiments, and we will borrow their printing presses to publish our Bibles, and we will borrow their rail-trains to carry our Christian literature, and we will borrow their ships to transport our missionaries. That was what made Paul such a master in his day. He not only got all the learning he could get of Doctor Gamaliel, but afterward, standing on Mars Hill, and in crowded thoroughfare, quoted their poetry, and grasped their logic, and wielded their eloquence, and employed their mythology, until Dionysius the Areopagite, learned in the schools of Athens and Heliopolis, went down under his tremendous powers.

That was what gave Thomas Chalmers his power in his day. He conquered the world's astronomy and compelled it to ring out the wisdom and greatness of the Lord, until, for the second time, the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy. That was what gave to Jonathan Edwards his influence in his day. He conquered the world's metaphysics and forced it into the service of God, until not only the old meeting-house at Northampton, Massachusetts, but all Christendom, felt thrilled by his Christian power. Well, now, my friends, we all have

TOOLS OF CHRISTIAN POWER.

Do not let them lose their edges. We want no rusty blades in this fight. We want no coulter that cannot rip up the glebe. We want no axe that cannot fell the trees. We want no goad that cannot start the lazy team. Let us get the very best grindstones we can find, though they be in possession of the Philistines, compelling them to turn the crank while we bear down with all our might on the swift revolving wheel, until all our energies and faculties shall be brought up to a bright, keen, sharp, glittering edge.

IV. Again: my subject teaches us on what a small allowance Philistine iniquity puts a man. Yes, these Philistines shut up the mines, and then they took the spears and the swords; then they took the blacksmiths, then they took the grindstones, and they took everything but a file. Oh, that is it grabs everything! It begins with robbery, and ends with robbery. It despoils this faculty and that faculty, and keeps on until the whole nature is gone. Was the man eloquent before, it generally thickens his tongue. Was he fine in personal appearance, it mars his visage. Was he affluent, it sends the sheriff to sell him out. Was he influential, it destroys his popularity. Was he placid and genial and loving, it makes him splenetic and cross; and so utterly is he changed that you can see he is sarcastic and rasping, and that the Philistines have left him nothing but a file.

Oh, "the way of the transgressor is hard!" His cup is bitter. His night is dark. His pangs are deep. His end is terrific. Philistine iniquity says to that man: "Now, surrender to me and I will give you all you want—music for the dance, swift steeds for the race, imperial couch to slumber on, and you shall be refreshed with the rarest fruits, in baskets of golden filagree." He lies. The music turns out to be a groan. The fruits burst the rind with rank poison. The filagree is made up of twisted reptiles. The couch is a grave. Small allowance of rest, small allowance of peace, small allowance of comfort. Cold, hard, rough—nothing but a file. So it was with the most applauded man of his day.

"The Scripture was his jest-book, whence he drew Bon mots to gall the Christian and the Jew.

An infidel when well, but what when sick?

Oh, then a text would touch him to the quick!"

Seized with hemorrhage of the lungs in Paris, where he had gone to be crowned as the idol of all France, he sends a messenger to get a priest, that he may be reconciled to the Church before he dies. A great terror falls upon him. He makes the place all round about him so dismal that the nurse declared that she would not for all the wealth of Europe see another infidel die. Philistine iniquity had promised him all the world's garlands, but in the last hour of his life, when he needed a solacing, sent tearing across his conscience and his nerves a file, a file. So it was with Lord Byron: his uncleanness in England only surpassed by his uncleanness in Venice, then going on to end his brilliant misery at Missolonghi, fretting at his nurse Fletcher, fretting at himself, fretting at the world, fretting at God; and he who gave the world "Childe Harold," and "Sardanapalus," and "The Prisoner of Chillon," and "The Siege of Corinth," reduced to nothing but a file. Oh, sin has a great facility for making promises; but it has just as great facility for breaking them!

A Christian life is

while a life of wicked surrender is remorse, ruin, and death. Its painted glee is sepulchral ghastliness. In the brightest days of the Mexican Empire, Montezuma said he felt gnawing at his heart something like a canker. Sin, like a monster wild beast of the forest, sometimes licks all over its victim in order that the victim may be more easily swallowed; but generally sin rasps, and galls, and tears, and upbraids, and files. Is it not so, Herod? Is it not so, Hildebrand? Is it not so, Robespierre? Aye; aye! It is so, it is so. "The way of the wicked He turneth upside down."

History tells us that when Rome was founded, on that day there were twelve vultures flying through the air; but when a transgressor dies the sky is black with whole flocks of them. Vultures! vultures! vultures! When I see sin robbing so many of my hearers, and I see them going down day by day and week by week, I must give a plain warning. I dare not keep it back, lest I risk the salvation of my own soul. Rover, the pirate, pulled down the warning bell on Inchcape Rock, thinking that he would have a chance to despoil vessels that were crushed on the rocks; but one night his own ship crashed down on this very rock, and he went down with all his cargo. God declares: "When I say to the wicked thou shalt surely die, and thou givest him not warning, that same man shall die in his iniquity, but his blood will I require at thy hands."

V. I learn from this subject what a sad thing it is when the Church of God loses its metal! These Philistines saw that if they could only get all the metallic weapons out of the hands of the Israelites, all would be well, and therefore they took the swords and the spears. They did not want them to have a single metallic weapon. When the metal of the Israelites was gone, their strength was gone. This is the trouble with the Church of God to-day. It is surrendering its courage. It has

NOT ENOUGH METAL.

How seldom it is that you see a man taking his position in pew or in pulpit or in a religious society, and holding that position against all oppression, and all trial, and all persecution, and all criticism. The Church of God to-day wants more backbone, more defiance, more consecrated bravery, more metal. How often you see a man start out in some good enterprise, and at the first blast of opposition he has collapsed, and all his courage gone, forgetting the fact that if a man be right, all the opposition of the earth pounding away at him, cannot do him any permanent damage. It is only when a man is wrong that he can be damaged. Why, God is going to vindicate His truth, and He is going to stand by you, my friends, in every effort you make for Christ's cause and the salvation of men.

Go forth in the service of Christ, and do your whole duty. You have one sphere. I have another sphere. "The Lord of Hosts is with us, and the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah." We want more of the determination of Jonathan. I do not suppose he was a very wonderful man, but he got on his knees and clambered up the rock, and with the help of his armor-bearer he hewed down the Philistines; and a man of very ordinary intellectual attainments on his knees can storm anything for God, and for the truth. We want something of the determination of the general who went into the war, and as he entered his first battle his knees knocked together, his physical courage not quite up to his moral courage; and he looked down at his knees, and said: "Ah, if you knew where I was going to take you, you would shake worse than that!"

There is only one question for you to ask, and for me to ask, me to do? Where is the field? Where is the work? Where is the anvil? Where is the prayer-meeting? Where is the pulpit? And, finding out what God wants us to do, go ahead and do it—all the energies of our body, mind and soul enlisted in the undertaking. O my brethren, we have but little time in which to fight for God! You will be dead soon. Put in the Christian cause every energy that God gives you. "What thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might; for there is neither wisdom nor device in the grave" whither we are all hastening. Opportunities of usefulness gone forever; souls that might have been benefited three months ago never again coming under our Christian influence. Oh, is it not high time that we awake out of sleep?

WHAT DOES GOD WANT

Church of God, lift up your head at the coming victory! The Philistines will go down and the Israelites will go up. We are

ON THE WINNING SIDE.

I think just now the king's horses are being hooked up to the chariot, and when He does ride down the sky there will be such a hosanna among His friends and such a wailing among His enemies, as will make the earth tremble, and the heavens sing. I see now the plumes of the Lord's cavalry men tossing in the air. The archangel before the throne has already burnished his trumpet, and then he will put its golden lips to his own, and he will blow the long, loud blast that will make all the nations free. Clap your hands, all ye people! Hark! I hear the falling thrones, and the dashing down of demolished iniquities. "Hallelujah, the Lord God omnipotent reigneth! Hallelujah, the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord Jesus Christ."

CONVERSION OF A SPIRITUALIST.

VERY successful services are being held at Manchester, N. H., by the Rev. E. W. Oakes, who is assisted by Mr. Peter Bilhorn, a singer of remarkable power, formerly engaged with Dr. Geo. F. Pentecost, in Brooklyn, and later very much blessed in Western work. Among many interesting cases at the Manchester meetings are the following:

On Sept. 27 a young man rose and said: "I came to this city a poor, miserable fraud. My business was to gull the innocent and credulous. I was a pretended spiritualist medium. I was corrupt to the depths of my being, though successful in my devilishness. I wandered into these meetings a few nights ago, heard the sweet, tender story of Jesus and His wondrous love to me. Friends, it broke my heart, hard and sinful as it was. I came to Jesus all full of sin and deceit and corruption, and His blood washed me white as snow. Now I am living true to God and earning an honest living, praise the Lord. Oh, young people, beware of frauds and cheats such as I was."

A young lady said: "I tried to do right before I came to these meetings, but I could not believe that 'Jesus' was the Son of God and the Saviour of the world. I was miserable, for I found I could not overcome my temper and many other things. I came to these meetings rather to have a little fun, caring nothing about Jesus. I listened, and laughed at the idea of yielding to Jesus' claims upon me; wanted to stay away, but could not. At last I heard convincing truth as to Jesus' claims on me, and my extreme helplessness and need of him. Convicted of my sin and rebellion against my best Friend, I bowed at His feet, and now my precious Jesus is the 'One altogether lovely, and the fairest among ten thousand.' Since then my mother, who was a pronounced Unitarian, has also bowed her head and worshipped the Dear One whom she for years denied. She is now washed in His precious blood and serving my precious Jesus. We two walk together."

Mr. Oakes is now engaged exclusively in evangelistic work. Any church wishing to secure his services may address him at the office of this journal, and we will forward the letters to him.

A LADY'S WORK IN TURKEY.

AN important work is being carried on in Asiatic Turkey by Miss West, whose report appears in the current issue of the Missionary Herald. She says:

"No less than fifty Armenian houses were visited during my stay in Trebizond, mostly strangers to our Protestant community—some of them many times, and none without personal spiritual conversation, often with reading of the Word and prayer. Six Gospels in Arabo-Turkish were left at Turkish houses where the women could read. In my rambles about the town I came upon three schools for Moslem children, boys and girls, taught by Turkish women—sometimes a mother with her babe in her arms. In each case I left a Gospel with the teacher, which was gratefully received.

"It has been a surprise that so many Moslem women can read, and that the Turks are so ready to receive and read the Gospels. I have sold not a few copies to men—six on one day in the open street. In passing a by-way one afternoon with a friend, having my basket on my arm, a young Turk of perhaps twenty-five years stopped to say: 'I wish the story of the life of Jesus Christ.' In one or two Turkish houses a number of Moslem women collected and listened attentively, afterward sending for us again to 'come and preach to them.' One of the women read aloud to the others with fluency.

"Word has come since from another Turkish house that the women had read the Gospel I left and were much pleased with it; they wished the teacher to come and visit them. Stopping to speak with some pleasant-looking Turkish women one day, one of them read aloud from the Arabo-Turkish Gospel to the others. I left it with them, and a scribe came to the door as I went on my way. I feared he might oppose their reading; but on my return, an hour later, they were watching for me with others who had joined them, and begged me for a good visit in their houses.

A SOMNOLENT TOLL-TAKER.

IN his Sermon Notes, recently published, Mr. C. H. Spurgeon says: "There was an old turnpike man, on a quiet country road, whose habit was to shut his gate at night, and take his nap. One dark, wet midnight I knocked at his door, calling 'Gate, gate!' 'Coming,' said the voice of the old man. Then I knocked again, and once more, the voice replied, 'Coming.' This went on for some time, till at length I grew quite angry, and jumping off my horse, opened the door, and demanded why he cried 'Coming,' for twenty minutes, and never came. 'Who is there?' said the old man, in a quiet, sleepy voice, rubbing his eyes. 'What d'ye want, sir?' Then awakening, 'Bless yer, sir, and ax yer pardon, I was asleep; I gets so used to hearing 'em knock, that I answer, 'Coming,' in my sleep, and take no more notice about it."

Thus, may the ministry accomplish nothing, because the habitual hearer remains in a deep sleep, out of which the Spirit of God alone can awaken him. When the secret influence from heaven ceases to speak to the heart, the best speaking to the ear avails but little.

WORK AMONG TURKISH CHILDREN.

IN his report of missionary work in Smyrna, published in the Missionary Herald, Mr. Bartlett says:

"The children are enthusiastic in their love of the school and of their teacher, and their parents are delighted with their progress. The change in their conduct has often been exceedingly gratifying. From wilful, disobedient, quarrelsome children, some have become gentle, obedient, and loving. The case of one little boy demands a brief notice. He was almost the personification of ugliness; was profane and quarrelsome, and so bad that the teacher of the Boys' School was unwilling to retain him. But now he has become a model of gentleness and obedience, apparently loving all that is lovable and hating all that is bad, and his teacher has strong hope that the grace of God is implanted in his heart. His influence, also, over his intemperate father, has been very marked. Repeating his Bible-lessons at home, his father at length became interested in the precious words and began the daily reading of the long-neglected Book. The gratitude of his parents is unbounded, and though they are poor, his tuition in full is promptly paid."

CURIOUS GAMBLING IN INDIA.

IT is matter of notoriety, says the Advocate of India, that merely on the simple question "Will it rain?" hundreds of bets, representing a large sum in the aggregate, are made in this season in Bombay during eighteen hours of the day. Under a rude shed in Mombadavie the rain speculators, assembled from all quarters, ply their simple calling. There is no lack of company, the district being the heart of the native town. The building has no doors; it is open to all. Within, the scene is of the wildest confusion. It is not easy for the novice to take in in a moment its significance. The shed is perhaps eighty feet long, with a width of twenty feet. It is roughly constructed, largely of timber, and covered with corrugated iron. Not a seat is provided, and every inch of ground seems to be occupied by a heterogeneous mob, composed of most of the varied nationalities of Bombay. Hindus, Mahomedans, Parsees, Goanese—men of every shade of respectability and ruffianism—are present, with occasionally a few women of the lower class.

A little observation shows that along the sides small platforms have been raised to accommodate the bankers with whom bets are made. They are accompanied by clerks who register all operations and receive money. The mode of conducting business is simplicity itself. If you desire to stake on the probability of rain, you signify your wish to one of the clerks. The ruling "odds" are made known to you. If the weather at the time be fine, they are, of course, attractive—perhaps 10 to 1 against a heavy shower, and 3 to 1 against a drizzle. You may take your choice of either contingency happening within three hours; and having paid your money, the transaction is registered in your name. You may now either go about your business, or await the result on the spot.

On the other side of the building, farthest from the entrances, is a quadrangle. In the centre is a small erection, not unlike a watch-tower, about twenty feet in height. It has a terraced roof, constructed to retain rain-water, with a spout at one side. When moisture trickles out of this spout within the given time, those who have bet in favor of a drizzle are declared to have won. Another pipe, laid over a portion of the main building, is anxiously watched for indications of a shower. Should any dispute arise regarding the nature of the fall—whether it is a drizzle or a downpour—or the exact time at which it occurred, a permanent umpire, retained by the bankers, is at hand to pronounce on the merits of the case; and his decision must be considered final. The bankers are said to pay their losses with scrupulous exactness at nine o'clock every night, at which time all who are winners present themselves.

Within the past week cases have come before the Police of men who have sacrificed their lives as the result of this form of gambling, and it is matter of gossip that young natives of respectable family are being daily ruined by the fascination. Efforts are being now made to have the place closed as a public nuisance.

THE PRODIGAL'S RETURN.

THE Rev. Marcus Rainford related the following incident at the recent Northfield Convention: "I was called to visit a dying young man on a stormy winter's night. He had burst a blood-vessel, and was just gasping for life. 'I thought you would never come,' he said to me. 'I am dying, and there is no hope for me. I have neglected God all my life, and there is no hope whatever.'

"I quoted the promise, 'Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out;' that means you. 'Oh, yes, but I must come with repentance.' 'Christ says, 'I will in no wise cast out.' 'If there is one thing fixed in my mind more than another, it is that God will not receive me without repentance.' 'My dear friend, you are putting repentance where God never put it.' 'Well, I believe I must repent before I can come to Christ.'

"Said I, 'Did you ever hear the story of the prodigal son?' 'I cannot say that I have; I have heard my poor old father talk about a prodigal, but I thought it might be myself he meant.' 'It is a beautiful story in God's Word,' and I told him the story. When we came to the place where it says, he came to himself, I said, 'Now tell me, what brought him to himself?' Said he, after a pause, 'Well, I suppose it was because he had nothing but husks to eat.' 'Poor fellow,' said I, 'you had nothing but husks to eat for a long while, but that never brought you home. Now, what brought him to himself?' 'Well, I suppose he found out he was a bad boy.' 'No, you have not got it yet.' I shall never forget the poor fellow's agony as each time I told him he was wrong.

"I repeated the story one more, and when I came to the words, 'he came to himself,' I saw a beautiful light shine over his face. 'I have it!' he exclaimed. The tears began to roll down his hollow, pale cheeks, and he said: 'He remembered that his father loved him, and had a heart big enough to take him back.' Then he began to pray: 'Oh, my God and Father, may a poor prodigal like me return to Thee?" So he came back.

"While the Lord spared him I used to go and see him, and joyful times we had. I happened to be beside him when he died. A friend of his who had been an ungodly man came to see him, but when he noticed me he withdrew. I said, 'Come in and speak to your friend.' I wanted him to get something that would do him good. He came in and said to the dying man, 'Poor fellow! I am sorry we are so soon to lose you.' His voice was almost gone, and he could not reply. I said, 'Ask him where he is going.' He said, 'Do you know where you are going?' The poor thin finger went up, and he whispered, 'To the Father; to the Father.' I said, 'Ask him how he knows.' 'How do you know?' said his friend. Again he whispered, 'The Father tells no lies.' And that was the last thing he said."

FIRST FRUITS IN COREA.

GLAD news of a baptism comes from Corea, the hermit nation only recently opened to the missionaries. The Rev. H. G. Underwood, writing to the Foreign Missionary from Seoul under date of July 29th, thus describes the first convert:

He is a Corean, who first heard about Christianity from its enemies by reading what a Chinese book had said against Christians and the religion of Christ, and he was led to try and look further into it. He simply knew of it as the foreign religion, and thought that the simplest way to find out about it would be to make the acquaintance of some foreigner. This, however, was not an easy matter, as he did not know any one that knew the foreigners, so he came up near our houses to see what could be done.

By a little work he soon made the acquaintance of Dr. Heron's teacher, and, professing to want to learn English, was brought to me. He tells me now that his only object was to see whether he could find any books or see anything that would give him light upon the subject of the foreign religion. As those who were studying did not come into my study at all, but had a room to themselves, he did not see what he was after, and soon left Seoul for the country, where his family live, and I saw nothing of him again till early this spring, when he came to me with copies of Mark and Luke in Chinese.

He had returned from the country the day before, and not having given up his searching had called upon Dr. Heron's teacher, who was at this time with Dr. Allen's interpreter, and had seen on Dr. Allen's desk these two books, which he quietly took home and sat up all night to read them, and came round to see me the next morning to tell me what good things he found there, and to ask me to teach him more about what those books spoke of.

I supplied him with copies of all the Gospels in Chinese, and when he had read them loaned him one or two Chinese commentaries, and also some tracts in Chinese, as the "Temple Keeper," "Salvation of the Soul," and a small book called "Easy Christian Doctrine." He attended many of our English services, and then had to go to the country again. But on Saturday last he called and asked whether he could come to the meeting on Sunday. I of course said that he could, and as the next day was our regular communion Sabbath I advised him to read the institution of the Supper, as given in Matthew, and also what the commentary said about it. He did so, and after the service was over told me that although he could not understand what was said, yet after reading from Matthew and seeing what was done he had been able to understand it. He then told me that he would like to be baptized. I had never said anything to him on this point, so his proposition was purely voluntary.

We are greatly rejoiced over this, the first fruits of our work here, and feel that we cannot sufficiently praise our Master for having, at this time, when we are as yet only able to use a few Corean words, and before we have anything in the language of the people, given to us this encouragement in our work.

THE IMPENDING NATIONAL CONVULSIONS.

From a Recent Lecture by L. Liesching, Esq., of Ceylon.

Great Changes Impending—The Great Aim of Russia—Current Elements of Social Disorganization—What the World is Waiting For—The Lesson of the French Revolution—Future of the Holy Land.

WHEN the war cloud which last year overshadowed Bulgaria, appeared to many to be dispelled, the writer ventured to foretell that it was but the lull that preceded the storm; this opinion was based on the study of prophecy.

THE EVENTS IN BULGARIA

which are taking place at the present time will probably culminate in a war of unprecedented magnitude, after which, in all probability, we shall see the beginning of what is to happen in the latter days. We need to be prepared for great social, religious and geographical changes; and such those who are waiting for their Lord expect and confidently anticipate.

The great aim of Russia is, and has been since the time of Peter the Great, to obtain possession of Constantinople, the former capital of the Eastern Roman Empire, and the site of the church of St. Sophia, which is now a Mohammedan mosque. All Russia's movements in the East are part of a scheme for the accomplishment of this purpose. It is not so much her object to possess herself of the British possessions in India, as to present a barrier on the northern frontier against interference with her designs on Persia and Turkey. He must indeed be sanguine who believes that the peace of Europe is likely to remain undisturbed much longer. We are probably on the eve of that has ever yet been known, and at its conclusion the present map of Europe, and of a great part of Asia, will have to be reconstructed. History repeats itself. Out of that war it is not improbable that the dismemberment of the Turkish Empire will eventuate, the Greek Church will be re-established at Constantinople, and the great aim of Russia be accomplished in the possession of the capital of the Byzantine Empire. The Cross will take the place of the Crescent on St. Sophia.

But besides the probability of warlike disturbances, other elements of discord have to be considered. The foundations of our social organization are being shaken. Influences are at work which cause the rulers of the earth to tremble for the future. Nihilism, socialism, communism, dynamism, assassination, conspiracies, boycotting, are all real and terrible factors which have to be dealt with. The subversion of constituted authority, the reign of anarchy, the spirit of lawlessness, all these are looming on the dark horizon.

Were the question to be asked, What at this moment is the world waiting for? the answer would be: A Man. Never did it seem more in need of a RULING SPIRIT.

Why does Bismarck command so much influence? Simply because he can see a little farther than most men. How is it that but a few weeks ago Mr. Gladstone brought England within measurable distance of the disruption of the Empire? Simply by the glamour of his name. Let a man arise a head and shoulders above his contemporaries, and the world will follow after him. For men are looking, on this side and on that, for some one to stem the tide of anarchy that threatens to overwhelm the world, and to show them what is to be done. Such an one is coming. Satan himself will energize and direct him. He will be the very incarnation of selfishness, pride, daring, ability, statecraft, subtlety and power, and before him mankind will bow down and worship. Let me recall for a moment the events of the French Revolution. After untold horrors—such as, if predicted, would have been regarded as the ravings of a lunatic—a young lieutenant is raised to the Imperial throne, subjugates empires, aims at universal dominion, not over Europe only, but over Jerusalem and the East, subdues the Pope and brings him to his capital, buries his hitherto invincible forces beneath the snows of Russia, and is finally destroyed at Waterloo.

When we contemplate the history of Napoleon and the many points in which he seemed to fulfil prophecy—when we look at Antiochus Epiphanes, and in how many respects he, too, seemed to do so—does it not appear as if, from time to time suited to his purpose; has carried out a part of the programme, and has then been hindered from its full accomplishment? Be it as it may, none has yet come who fulfils all the conditions; but the partial accomplishment under the first Napoleon has led some to look for a second of the same name who is to do so, and who will come out of France.

Let us suppose the old Roman Empire reconstructed on even a wider basis, the Eastern Empire re-established, Constantinople the chief seat of government, the temporal power of Rome restored, and all this accompanied by the agency of a master-mind. Marvellous changes, though rapid, will have taken place—changes that we can only imagine—but under these changes both the Roman and Greek ecclesiastical systems will have received their death blow, and a new cult will have enthralled the minds of most men, for Satan will have been busy at work, knowing he has but little time.

Let us, then, imagine that after a series of political convulsions the first beast becomes predominant in Rome; the second in the eastern division of the great empire—in fact, the Latin and Greek divisions restored as before. These two heads—the one subordinate to the other in temporal power—intimately united in one common bond, and working for one common purpose. A great commercial federation is established—a union in which men of all or of no creed find common ground for meeting, and from which all are excluded who do not receive the mysterious sign which will then, and not till then, be recognized by the understanding ones as

"THE MARK OF THE BEAST."

But when the social fabric has been rent asunder by conflicting influences, and when war has devastated the earth till men are weary of the strife, whoever then gives hope and promise of being able to calm the storm and bring about a reign of peace, will be hailed as a deliverer. As already said, we have a parallel in the rise of the First Napoleon. The "coming one" will be all that he was, and a great deal more.

The Holy Land will, of course, form part of this new Empire. Trade and traffic have for the last fifty years been so directed towards the East, that once let the ports of Asia be re-opened to commerce, and they will teem with the navies of the world, and the sons of Jacob will fly, as the doves to their windows, rebuild the old wastes and re-establish their old form of worship.

THE SCENE OF THE EVENTS

in which the world is now most interested will be the Holy Land. How, and by what means the false prophet and the beast will enthrall the world is only dimly foreshadowed, and can but be conjectured. Probably the false prophet will be subordinate to the beast, and will excel him in craft; he may succeed in persuading the Moslems that he is their prophet; he may represent him to the Jews as their Messiah; and to the Buddhists as the Buddha whom they expect. The spiritualists, who may be numbered by millions, will regard him as the greatest of adepts. "The mystery of iniquity" is already at work to such an extent as would scarcely be credited. Let Satan once have his will, and an image may be made to speak without people being much surprised at its so doing.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Utah Commission Filed its Report last week. It surveys the operations of the past year, but, despite the many successful prosecutions, the commission is doubtful whether polygamous marriages are decreasing. It states that the total number of Mormons throughout the world is over two hundred thousand, a large majority of whom reside in Utah. While of these a great majority of the adults are not living in polygamy, yet every orthodox member of that church professes to believe in it as a divine revelation. The people have been taught this dogma in their temples, tabernacles, meeting-houses and Sunday-schools for a third of a century. Their church organization and ecclesiastical polity are marvels of skill and ability. Their leaders are fertile in resources, while the mass of the people are fanatical and superstitious to a degree that has seldom been witnessed in modern times. These facts render the work of the commission one of extraordinary difficulty. That it is far from being accomplished was proved by the utterances at the conference of the Mormon Church, held at Coalville, U. T., on Oct. 6. John Taylor, the President, is in hiding, and did not appear, but sent a letter breathing defiance against the government.

Sentence of Death Was Pronounced on Saturday on the seven Chicago Anarchists, who were concerned in the dynamite outrage of May 4th. Judge Gary, having listened to long addresses from the prisoners, one of which, by the prisoner Parsons, occupied over five hours, sentenced all the seven prisoners to be hanged on December 3d. He said that he should not speak to them in reproach nor exhortation, but for the sake of the men whom they had duped, he would utter words of solemn warning. In the course of his remarks, the Judge so plainly defined the liberty extended to the individual under our institutions, that even the Poles and desperate foreigners of other nationalities may understand it. He said: "The existing order of society can be changed only by the will of the majority. Each man has the right to entertain and advocate, by speech and print, such opinions as suit themselves, and the great body of the people will usually care little what he says. But if he proposes murder as a means of enforcing, he puts his own life at stake. And no clamor about free speech or the evils to be cured or the wrongs to be redressed, will shield him from the consequences of his crime." This sentence is the first of the kind ever passed in this country. It was not proved that any one of the prisoners threw the bomb which did the mischief, but that, having incited to murder by their teaching, they were guilty of murder.

A Serious Strike Commenced in Chicago on Oct. 7. It involves the idleness of twelve thousand men. In May last the trouble between the pork-packing houses and their employees was settled by the men working eight hours as a full day's work, the firm continuing to pay them the same wages as for the day of ten hours. The Chicago houses have been complaining for some time that they are now unable to compete with packers in other cities, and have been threatening a return to the former arrangement. Last week the threat was executed. Notices were posted on the principal houses that after Monday, Oct. 11, the men would be expected to work ten hours a day without increase of pay. A consultation of the men was held, and it was decided to go on strike. Accordingly, on Friday twelve thousand men left their employment. The struggle, it is feared, will be an obstinate one, involving much suffering.

A Distressing Steamboat Disaster on the Mississippi, occurred on October 5th. The steamer La Mascotte, one of the swiftest boats plying between St. Louis and Cape Girardeau, Mo., was proceeding on her regular trip, when about noon, just as she was near Neely's Landing, her boilers exploded and scattered the engine fire about the ship. Several of the crew were scalded, but none of the passengers were hurt by the explosion. In a few minutes, however, the boat took fire in several places, and there was a rush for the side. The pilot headed for the shore but was driven from his post by the flames before the gang-plank was lowered. The bow of the steamer swung out into the river again, and it was some time before the gang-plank could be taken to the stern. When it was finally lowered the crush was so great that many were crowded off and drowned. Just then, to add to the horror of the scene, the smokestack fell right across the plank, crushing many beneath it and causing others to jump into the stream. Nearly all those not killed by the falling stack were drowned. It is believed that at least thirty-five lives were lost, but the exact number has not been ascertained, owing to the books and papers of the steamer having perished in the fire.

An Experiment in the Suppression of Dives was made last week, in New York, with success. Other large cities infested with these nuisances may profit by the example. Of late years the disreputable resorts have increased in number and in effrontery. The plan of arresting the bar-tenders and imposing fines which the proprietors could well afford to pay, proved useless. Another engine of the law has now been put in operation. An injunction was served on the proprietors of two places, restraining them from having the disgusting performances in their resorts and from selling liquor. To disobey would have been "contempt of court," and the penalties for that offence are too heavy to be lightly incurred. The proprietors therefore closed the dives.

The Arrest of a Woman in Montreal last week will, it is hoped, furnish clues which will lead to the extinction of the infamous traffic in innocent girls so long flourishing between this country and Canada. The woman when arrested had two Canadian girls in her charge, whom she was bringing South. She had promised them good wages as domestic servants in the States. Her residence is in Portland, Me., where the police give her a bad character. It is believed that many persons are engaged in enticing young French girls from Canada, and then sending them to Portland, Boston and New York, to vile dens, where their ruin is quickly accomplished. It is stated that this has become an organized business.

An Anarchist Plot to Destroy the City of Vienna has been disclosed to the Austrian police. An Anarchist, of Prague, betrayed his companions, and the police watched the plot develop until the verge of its execution, when they arrested seventeen conspirators. The facts given to the press by the police show that the plot surpassed in extent and ingenuity any exploit yet devised by the Anarchists. It was planned and directed from America and England. It was thoroughly organized. The conspirators were divided into several groups, one of which was detailed to set fire to the town, another to take charge of the dynamite operation, and another to forge the necessary official documents and to coin money for expenses.

Rumors of Concessions to Ireland were Prevalent last week. The London Daily News, a journal usually well informed, asserted that the Government had prepared a scheme for the self-government of Ireland which differed materially from that of Mr. Gladstone only in trusting the government to provincial councils instead of to one Parliament sitting in Dublin. It is well known that Mr. Chamberlain approves, if he did not originate, that solution of the Irish difficulty, and it is therefore probable that if the Conservatives introduce such a measure it will have the support of the Liberal seceders. The publication of the rumor has evoked strongly-worded protests from Conservatives through the country. Some refuse to believe it possible, while others declare that if the Conservative Cabinet introduce such a measure they will quit political life in disgust. The really important significance of the scheme is that its logical outcome is the application of the same principle to Great Britain as well as Ireland. Therein lies the improbability of it originating with the party now dominant. It is so close an approximation to the American system of State Legislatures and a Federal Congress, that every Tory would recognize in it the thing he dreads most on earth, "an attempt to Americanize British institutions."

The Bulgarian Problem Remains Unsolved. The elections to the Sobranje, or constitutional convention, on Sunday last, appear to have been, so far as is yet ascertained, overwhelmingly ante-Russian. If the dread of Russia were less potent than it is, the Sobranje would probably re-elect Prince Alexander by acclamation. In the present situation, no one ventures to predict the man on whom the doubtful dignity will be conferred. The suggestion is made that Queen Victoria's second son, the Duke of Edinburgh, whose wife is the sister of the Czar, would be a candidate acceptable alike to England, Austria, and Russia. It would appear so on the surface, but the Czar appears desirous that the new Prince should be a puppet of his own, and he must have seen sufficient of the Duke of Edinburgh to know that he is not promising material to be made into a puppet. In the meantime, the Czar's envoy, General Kaulbars, is provoking the Bulgarian people by a display of arrogance.

The Antipathy of France to England, which has existed since the British occupation of Egypt, is perceptibly increasing. The reported alliance of England with Germany and Austria against Russia in the Bulgarian difficulty has further embittered public opinion in France against England. The press indulges in fierce tirades and open boasts of the superiority of the French over the English army and navy. Should a war break out in the near future the French government would be irresistibly forced to take a hand in it.

The Rev. M. Baxter arrived in New York, on Monday last, by the Servia, of the Cunard line. He will make a tour of the United States and Canada, lecturing in the principal cities on Coming Great Earthquakes, Wars, Revolutions, future rise and career of the great Democratic Antichrist, Second Advent of Christ, Resurrection and Translation of Christians, Subsequent Millennium of 1,000 years. These lectures have been lately given to large audiences in Belfast, Dublin, Cork, Edinburgh, Aberdeen, London, etc. Mr. Baxter makes no charge for his lectures and defrays his own travelling expenses. He holds with Matthew Henry, the great commentator, that the end of this age and beginning of the Millennium will probably be about the end of this century, according to Daniel's and St. John's dates. His lectures are illustrated with twenty large diagrams and prophetic paintings. His visit affords an opportunity to churches interested in the momentous subject of unfulfilled prophecy to obtain the latest information of the results of the study of the most learned and prayerful prophetic students. Letters addressed to him at the office of this journal will be forwarded to him.

The Annual Convention on Holiness and Divine Healing was held under the presidency of the Rev. A. B. Simpson, in the church recently acquired by the congregation of the Gospel Tabernacle, at 45th Street and Madison Avenue, last week. Dr. Wilson, of St. George's, Dr. John Cookman, Major Cole, of Chicago, and other well-known speakers took part in the proceedings. An interesting feature of the Convention this year was the dedication on Thursday of an Orphanage, a Training College, and the new Berachah Home, at 102 East 61st Street. On Friday numerous testimonies were given spontaneously by persons present who had experienced Divine Healing, a few of which we hope to publish at a future time. A full report of the proceedings of the Convention will be issued by Mr. Simpson as speedily as possible. The pamphlet will be sold for twenty-five cents.

The Bible and Prophetic Conference, to be held in Chicago, next month, is exciting general interest on both sides the Atlantic. Letters of inquiry respecting the arrangements are daily received by the Secretary, Mr. George C. Needham, from all the States, from Canada, and from England. Eminent men of all denominations are looking forward to it with intense interest. Since the last Conference in 1878, many able and learned clergymen have been led by the Holy Spirit to examine the prophecies for themselves, and have been convinced that the coming of the Lord is to precede the Millennium and is now near at hand. Such a gathering of students of prophecy may be expected in Chicago as has never been witnessed in any land, and some distinguished European clergymen, who cannot attend, have prepared papers to be read there. The cost of hiring halls, printing, correspondence, etc., will be considerable, but the importance of the meeting being realized, there is no doubt of it being fully met. Contributions to the fund, however small, will be gladly received by the Secretary, the Rev. George C. Needham, Manchester-by-the-Sea, Mass.

The Churches of Charleston, S. C., Have now issued their appeals for help to rebuild the edifices wrecked by the earthquakes. Their need is so urgent and their cause so deserving, that no words of ours are necessary to recommend their claim. The response should be prompt and liberal. Each denomination should see to it that their Charleston brethren are supplied with the funds they need. Their private losses preclude them from defraying the cost themselves. The following are the names of persons respectively representing the various denominations, to whom contributions may be sent: Presbyterian, Rev. W. T. Thompson; Huguenot French Protestant, Rev. Dr. C. S. Vedder; Methodist, Rev. J. A. Wilson; Baptist, Rev. A. S. J. Thomas; Protestant Episco-

A Lame Railroad Conductor, Beginning a long walk recently, explained his reasons to a friend for making the journey on foot. Eight weeks ago he was severely injured in a railroad accident. He was recovering, but was obliged to go around on crutches. He was in the train on the Boston and Lowell Railroad two weeks ago when the collision occurred near North Chelmsford. He occupied a saloon car at the rear end of the freight train, and was looking out of the window when the collision was impending. He saw the locomotive of the cattle train in time to leap from the car and save his life. Both crutches were broken by the operation, but his lame leg was not hurt. He was seen, a short time afterward, hobbling toward Lowell, supporting himself with sticks which he had picked up. A friend remonstrated, and told him to wait for a train. "Not much," was the reply. "This is the second accident I have been in inside of two months, and I shall foot it hereafter if I have to go a thousand miles." The conductor will probably reconsider his determination when he gets well, and will trust himself on the railroad again. That is the case with those who fall in the spiritual life. Few of those whose sinful ways bring them sorrow and pain, and make resolutions of reformation, keep them when they recover (Prov. 23: 35).

A Man was Rescued from a Quicksand at Norristown, Pa., on Oct. 4. On the previous day he went to assist a neighbor in deepening a well. After digging down a little distance he struck a deposit of fire clay, which oozed into the well faster than he could shovel it into the bucket attached to the windlass. First one foot and then the other became fast in the quagmire. He felt himself sinking deeper and deeper and had to work with all his might to keep himself from being drawn completely under. All the time he was shouting for help, which came at last. A rope was fastened under his arms to drag him out by means of the windlass, but the sinking and almost exhausted man shouted to those at the top that they were tearing him limb from limb. A cradle was then lowered and put under him, but the suction of the sand around his limbs could not be overcome. Other experiments were tried without success, and the man remained all night firmly held at the bottom of the well, the difficulty increasing every hour. At length some huge hooks were procured and forced through the sand and under his feet. These were attached to the windlass, and the man was drawn out after being held in the quicksand over seventeen hours. It is thus with the man caught and held by his sin. His own efforts cannot release him. Deliverance must come from above (Ps. 40: 2).

The Use of a Bishop's House as a Mortuary was advocated by a mob in Detroit, Mich., on Friday last. On October 5th, a woman died in that city, who was in bad odor with the priest of the Roman Catholic Church, to which she belonged. There has been trouble in the church, and the priest of it was deposed recently, and another priest appointed. The woman, in common with many members of the church, was friendly to the deposed priest and believed he had been unjustly treated. So decided was her partiality that the new priest refused to administer the rites of the church to her in her last moments. After her death permission to bury her in the local cemetery was refused. The gates of the cemetery were closed against the funeral procession, and when it went to another cemetery, the gates were closed there also. An excited crowd collected, and for a time rioting was feared. Some shouted one thing, some another. One proposed to lay the coffin on the priest's door-step and leave it there, but as the Bishop had signified his approval of the priest's course, it was decided to take the body to his house and let him dispose of it as he chose. While the dispute was going on, the undertaker drove away to a Protestant cemetery and the corpse was interred there. The bereaved family were much distressed by the trouble. One can but wish that their experience of priestly tyranny might lead them to seek more knowledge. They would then learn that to the saved soul the disposal of the body after death is of no consequence (Matt. 10: 28).

A Household Politically Divided Exists in Washington Ter. A Tacoma journal announces that the political campaign in Lincoln county this fall has an amusing characteristic. One of the gentlemen who are running on the Republican ticket for the legislature is the husband of the lady who is the Democratic candidate for School Superintendent. The journal ventures the safe prediction that in the speeches of the Republican aspirant for the Legislature, the demerits of the Democratic candidate for School Superintendent will not be very severely handled, and that if he indulges in the habit common among politicians, of throwing mud on the personal character of his opponents, he will be careful not to do it indiscriminately. The prediction will doubtless be fulfilled, and if men realized Christ's ideal of universal brotherhood, the absence of acrimony, which will render this contest almost unique, would characterize not only other elections, but all the relations of life (Eph. 4: 31, 32).

A Needless Exile is being Suffered by an Insurance broker of New York. Last week an application was made to the Supreme Court in the case of a prominent business man who has quitted the country and is in hiding. He has been engaged in transactions of an enormous character, involving prodigious amounts of money, and it is thought that his mind must have been unsettled by them. He was very much distressed a few weeks ago by losing a lawsuit which involved the loss of fifty thousand dollars. He said to several of his friends that he should never be able to pay the amount, but they laughed at him, knowing well that his property was worth more than ten times that sum. The man, however, evidently believed himself ruined, and collecting a small amount of available cash, he absconded, and has not been traced. There is no doubt of his solvency, and there is no reason in his moral character for his flight. He is clearly under the delusion that he is bankrupt, and is flying from creditors who will be fully satisfied from his estate. Being partially demented, such a man is entitled to pity, but there are numbers of sane men who are acting in the same way in spiritual matters. They are distressed about their sins, and fail to realize that by the death of Christ the record against them has been satisfied (Cor. 2: 13, 14).

A Distressing Separation in Court Occurred in Newark, N. J., on Friday last. Judge Van Fleet, of the Court of Chancery, had before him the application of a mother for the custody of her daughter, a child ten years old. In 1877, being deserted by her husband, she advertised her child for adoption. The advertisement was answered, and a legal agreement was drawn up by which the mother made an absolute surrender of the babe. Since then she has prospered, and being now in good circumstances desired to regain possession of the girl. The foster parents have become much attached to their adopted daughter, whom they have educated and treated with great kindness. She reciprocates their love, and when brought into court clung to them, convulsively weeping, and begging that she be allowed to remain with them. She did not even know the woman who wanted possession of her. The Judge said the law allowed him no discretion in the matter. The child must go to her mother. "Don't let them take me!" sobbed the girl, with her arms around the neck of her foster-father, who was melted to tears and cried like a child. But the law had to be obeyed, and there were few dry eyes in court when at last the separation was effected. Those who are born again, and have become children of God by adoption, have no such separation to dread. None can take them out of His hand (John 10: 29).

CLEANSING

"Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean; from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you." Ezekiel 36: 25.

Sin a Plague and Pest—I. God Deals with His People while they are in Sin—Could not Cleanse Themselves—Their Special Filthiness—The Devil's Runaways Welcomed—A Ragged School—II. God Provides for the Cleansing—In a Righteous Way—A Simple Way—III. Himself Applies It—IV. Effectually Cleanses His People—The Idols Rachel Protects.

THIS is one of the opening words of the glorious covenant of grace. Ezekiel's copy of the covenant is full and clear, and deserves to be written in letters of gold and hung up in the best chamber of every believer's dwelling. This is the Magna Charta of saints: the title-deed of the land of our inheritance. Glorious covenant of grace, our heart delights in every line of promise wherewith thou art enriched!

You perceive that this promise deals with sin; and it deals with sin because sin broke the first covenant, and thus ruined us all. Sin must be removed before covenant relationship can be re-established. Sin must be purged from the conscience before covenant communion can be enjoyed. Sin must be abhorred ere covenant union can be consummated. Blessed be God, sin shall be washed away, for thus it is written.

Sin is the great plague and

now that we are awakened to discern between good and evil, and now that the new heart and the right spirit have been put within us: is it not well that this cause of misery should be destroyed? O curse of curses, fountain of hell, and father of the devil, thou unutterably horrible monster, sin! Shall we not be doubly blest when we are rid of thee? We certainly should never fear death if we had no sin; neither need we even fear the devil himself; for, if there were no traitor within the city, Mansoul might laugh to scorn all the attacks of her enemies without.

Sin, to the awakened sinner, is his burden, his misery, his horror. It is a nightmare which haunts him; he can never escape from it. Like David, he cries, "My sin is ever before me." Even when sin is forgiven, the memory of it often makes a man go softly all his days. It is therefore a very blessed thought on the part of our God to make the covenant to bear so much upon our sin and our sinfulness, and especially to make it open with this unconditional promise of infinite love. "Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you."

I. Our first remark at this time shall be that God begins to deal with His people while they are yet in sin. The text evidently implies this. He does not wait until they are clean before He bestows his love and pity upon them. He does not wait till they have saved themselves, and then come to them with a nominal salvation. He does not make promises of purification to them upon condition that they cleanse themselves; but He comes to them according to the riches of his grace, even when they are dead in trespasses and sins. He finds them in all their defilement, rebellion, and iniquity, and He deals with them just as they are.

JESUS SAVES SINNERS.

God's love comes to those who in no degree merit it. His grace stoops to the ruin of the fall and lifts us up from it. These are very simple words, you say, but there are those here to whom these plain sentences will sound like the ringing of the silver trumpets of jubilee. I know them, for I once was one of them—they are a people sighing because of their defilement, which they mourn over, but cannot remove.

I may be speaking to one who is ready to cry out, "I am not fit to be in the house of God to-night. I am not worthy to lift mine eyes to the place where His honor dwelleth." That is where He finds you, just there; and it is to you in this sad position that the covenant of grace refers. Our Redeemer comes to us in our very worst estate. As I was speaking to an aged brother in Christ, who is, probably, very near home, he said, "I feel what a blessed thing it is still to come to Christ with the cry, 'God be merciful to me a sinner.' I do not rest upon past experience, nor upon anything else, but I constantly begin at the beginning. I come to Jesus even as I did at the first, only more humbly, and with a more intense sincerity than I ever knew before." I am sure there is wisdom in this course, and in no other.

If the covenant of grace did not deal with sinners as sinners, I should be to Christ; but because it opens its mouth wide to me while I am yet unclean and polluted by sin, I feel that it meets my case. The free-grace of the covenant does not come half the way, and say to me when I am nearly dead, "Get up and take what I give you, and I will deliver you." But it comes, like the good Samaritan, where I am. It sees me to be unconscious, and it arouses me. When it sees me conscious of my wounds it pours in the oil and the wine. When it sees my weakness to be so great that I cannot stir a step, it sets me on its own beast, and takes me to the inn. When it marks my utter poverty, so that I am not worth so much as two pence, it does not ask me to pay my own shot, but discharges everything for me, and leaves its promise that whatever more is needed shall be freely given.

You may notice in the text, or gather it therefrom by clear inference—that these people with whom God dealt were not only unclean, but they COULD NOT CLEANSE THEMSELVES.

It is a rule with miracles, as well miracles of the Spirit as miracles of the body, that God never does what others can do. As long as there is strength left in the natural laws God does not go beyond them; but our extremity is God's opportunity. Now, inasmuch as the text brings in God, saying, "Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean," it is clear that this evil could not be cleansed without the divine interposition. There was no other way for the purging of the chosen ones but by the direct interposition of the Lord.

Oh, but divines have fine notions nowadays! It appears, according to the latest information, that children are not now born in sin as they used to be. They say that certain highly favored children commence life in a most extraordinary way: they are born gracious at the very first. They do not want any regeneration or conversion, for the stock is so superior that the branches naturally bring forth good fruit. I have never read of such people in the Scriptures, but I am often told that there are such nowadays; at least, their parents and their parsons say so. Of old it used to be, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh," and only "that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." That, of course, is very

OLD-FASHIONED DOCTRINE.

Well, when we have a new-fashioned God, I dare say we shall have new-fashioned truth; but at present truth seems to me to be as immutable as God himself. If it be true to-day, it was true yesterday, and will be true even to the end, even as God himself changeth not.

As for myself, I know that I was born in sin, and I know that in me, that is, in my flesh, there dwelleth no good thing. I know also that I once tried to purge and cleanse my own heart, and labored at it, I believe, as honestly as any person that lived. I went about to seek a righteousness of my own, and I endeavored to get quit of sin; but my failure was complete. I do not advise any other person to try self-healing. It brought me to despair; it drove me almost to the loss of reason. Therefore speak I of my own experience; and, taught by my own failure, I cannot urge any man to seek cleansing by his own doings or efforts, but I urge him to accept that cleansing which God has promised in the covenant of grace.

More than that, when God begins to deal with his people, many of them have a

"From all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you." When he begins with them they are given up to their idols. Other lords have dominion over them, and these lords lead them into filthiness. Some upon whom God has looked with everlasting love have become, before their conversion, openly, manifestly, loathesomely filthy; and yet he begins in his grace with them. The harlot—she strays into the house of God, and feels that she has no right to be there; and yet the day comes when she stands behind the Master, washing his feet with her tears, and wiping them with the hairs of her head, because she has had much forgiven. The man who has been guilty of foul vices, of which we say but little, but which he would fain weep over with tears of blood at their remembrance—when the Lord of love comes to such a horrible offender in a way of mercy. He says to him, even to him, "I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions, and, as a cloud, thy sins."

The heathen of old once reported that ours was the religion of the most abandoned. There is much truth in the statement: it is a very good figure, though meant to be a slander. The Lord does receive

THE DEVIL'S RUNAWAYS.

If there is one here that is servant to that black master, I would recommend him to run to Christ to-night, and not give his master five minutes' notice. Quit the tyrant's employment and run for it at once. But then look at this: the Lord receives sinners to cleanse them. He does not receive them that they may remain as they were. The Lord Jesus receives sinners just as teachers receive children into a ragged-school. It is their glory that it is a ragged-school. The more ragged and the more dirty, the more welcome the child. But why do they receive the ragged child? Why, to wash him, to teach him, to clothe him, to instruct him. We do not receive ragged children for the love of their rags, nor to keep them in their rags; but that they may be taught, cleansed and elevated. Such is my Master's house of mercy. It is a hospital: sick folk are always welcome. It is not a place for spreading disease, nor for treating it lightly: it is the place where disease is discovered, set apart, and made to appear in all its horror, in order that it may be conquered and destroyed. Nobody speaks so sternly against sin as Jesus, and those who believe his gospel; but yet it forever stands true, "This man receiveth sinners."

II. The second is this—that God

of those to whom He comes in sovereign grace. "I will sprinkle clean water upon you." Pure water is the best of purifiers, and the Lord has provided that which is the most sure purification from sin. When, under the old Mosaic law, they took water and scarlet wood and hyssop, and sprinkled the unclean therewith, he was cleansed ceremonially; and now, under the gospel, God has provided a wondrous way by which, being himself perfectly pure, he can put away the impurities of our nature, and the iniquities of our lives.

It is a righteous way. You do not need that I explain to you the way in which God puts away our filthiness? Whether you need it or not, there are many who do need it, and, therefore, we must have the gospel over again. You put bread and salt on your table at every meal, and even so every sermon should have the gospel in it. God must be just; even if He would forgive sin, He must still be just. Sin must not go unpunished. Therefore, the Lord took sin and laid it on his Son, that his Son might bear what was due for our transgressions. This the Lord Jesus did as our substitute and Saviour, "He His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree." He made a full atonement and expiation for the guilt of men, so that "whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

In addition to that, God has given the Holy Ghost as a gift of Christ on His ascension; and that Holy Spirit is here to renew men in their hearts, to take away from them the love of sin, to give them a new life, to create in them a new heart and a right spirit, and so to change their inward longings and desires that their outward conduct shall become altogether different from what it was before. Here are two cleansings—the blood of Christ and the work of the Holy Ghost; and these are as clean water. God can justly forgive you, my fellow sinner, and God can totally change you and make you to be as though you had been new-born to-night, and were now to begin afresh. You see it is a clean way which God has devised; there is nothing in it which favors wrong or injustice. And what it is, as well as clean. "I will sprinkle clean water upon you." The application of the blood of Jesus Christ to the conscience, and the coming of the Holy Spirit to the heart, are as simple as the sprinkling of water. The wisdom of God made the rite by which the leper was cleansed under the law very simple; but even more simple is the act by which God applies the merit of His dear Son to us. Oh, that we might have the blood of Jesus sprinkled on our hearts at once by faith.

It is a way of unfailing efficacy, for He says, "From all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you." He does not only attempt the cleansing, but He accomplishes it. You may have a thousand sins, but this clean water can put the thousand sins away. Your heart may be a very pandemonium of idols, but the power of the Holy Spirit can break them all to pieces, and can do it for you at once. What, though your heart be like the Augean stable, the labors of Hercules shall be outdone by the wonders of Jesus. He shall cast your sins into the depths of the sea. Your hardness of heart, your pride, your lust, your unbelief, your enmity, your fickleness, shall all go down at a stroke, as when Dagon fell before the incoming of the ark of God into the holy place.

III. Thirdly, God Himself

of cleansing. See how He puts it: "Then will I sprinkle"—"I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean; from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you." Ah, dear sirs! if God had only provided the medicine, but had never brought it to us, we could not have found it, reached it, or applied it. If He had made the plaster and had left it by the side of the wounded man, the poor wretch would have died, for he never could have laid it to his own wound. The same grace which "first devised a way to save rebellious man," carries out all the plan from the beginning to the end. Who can sprinkle clean water on the foul sinner? "I will do it," saith the Lord.

I am sure that I speak to many brothers and sisters here whose experience will bear out what I am going to say: it was the Lord who made us first to feel that we were filthy, and that we loved idols. We were very fine people once—were we not? Our own righteousness was quite as good as that of anybody else, and a little better. If we had sinned, we had a great many excuses for our failings; and, besides, we always meant to be so good by-and-by; therefore, we felt that we ought not to be condemned, but rather to be commended. The Lord fetched us down from the tree, and made us lie at the bottom of it and cry for mercy. We should still have refused to taste of His mercy, and we should have perished in our sin if divine grace had not convinced us of our folly. Oh, yes, the clean water is provided, but the clean water must be sprinkled by another hand than ours, if we are to be cleansed. Are we not witnesses of this? Do we not acknowledge that when at last we were made clean through the precious blood of Christ the closing act of faith was wrought in us by the Holy Ghost?

And all the way through the rest of life it is just the same. "All things are of God." If he that has brought me so far toward heaven does not help me throughout the rest of my journey, I must die, even within sight of the promised land. When we get to heaven, it will be, "Glory be to God for ever and ever and ever." We shall not hum even a single note to ourselves for our own glory, or on account of any part of the work for which we deserved credit; but we shall ascribe the whole of our salvation to infinite love and undeserved favor, and to the unceasing faithfulness and power of our gracious covenant God.

IV. I close with this last remark: The Lord effectually

CLEANSES ALL HIS PEOPLE.

First, He cleanses them from all their filthiness. I do want to dwell on that for a minute. "From all your filthiness will I cleanse you." All of it. Oh, what a vast "all" that is! "All your filthiness." All the filthiness of your birth-sin; all the filthiness of your natural temperament and constitution and disposition. "From all your filthiness will I cleanse you." All the filthiness that came out of you in your childhood, that was developed in you in your youth, that still has vexed your manhood, and, perhaps, even now, dishonors your old age. From all your actual filthiness, as well as from all your original filthiness, will I cleanse you. From all your secret filthiness, and from all your public filthiness; from everything that was wrong in the family; from everything that was wrong in the business; from everything that was wrong in your own heart—"From all your filthiness will I cleanse you." From all your pride. What a filthy thing that is! From all your unbelief. What an abominable thing that is! From all your tainted imaginations; from all your lustings; from all your wrong words; from all your covetousness; from all your murmuring; from all your anger; from all your malice; from all your envy; from all your distrust—"From all your filthiness will I cleanse you."

And then it is added that we shall be cleansed "from all

OUR IDOLS."

We are, all of us, idolaters by nature and by practice. The unregenerate man has always an idol. He will worship anything rather than his God; yea, he will sooner worship himself than his Saviour. Even the Christian may find, to his own surprise, that his dear Rachel, whom he loves so much, has managed to hide the idols away under the camel's furniture, and she is even now sitting on them and concealing them. I do not know an idol that is more apt to escape being broken than the idol that some beloved Rachel protects. But it must not be: "The idols he shall utterly abolish." God's way is, "From all your idols will I cleanse you."

If there is anything, beloved, that has our love more than God, it is an idol, and we must be purged from it. This is not a threatening, but a promise: it is a great blessing to have our images of jealousy put away. If you make an idol of a child, either that child will die, or something else will happen which will make your idol to be your burden. If you want to kill your husband, idolize him. If you desire ill to a beloved one, set him up in Christ's place. We can, alas! make idols of baser things than these: we can love gold, or dress, or honor, or rank, or even a forbidden thing. We are so dull and carnal that our affections are soon captured by earthly objects. Whatever it is that we idolize, God says, "I will cleanse you from it." And I think that we can say in response, "Lord, be it so."

Now, poor sinner! do you see what the Lord can do with you? He can break you loose from your temptations. He can set you free from every sin that holds you in captivity. Pardon and purity Jesus gives most freely. Trust Him to cleanse you, and the work shall be surely done. Trust to Him that did hang upon the tree to redeem His people, and you are delivered. Trust Him to sanctify you wholly by His Spirit, and He will purify you till every spot and wrinkle is gone. It is His work to save His people from their sins; believe in Him, and you shall triumph in His salvation. May the Lord add His blessing, for Jesus' sake!

The variety of services to which electricity may be applied by an ingenious person may be realized by a visit to the priory in the village of St. Gervais, the residence of M. Houdin. The main entrance to the priory is a carriage-way closed by a gate. Upon the left of this is a door for the admission of visitors on foot; on the right is placed a letter-box. The mansion is situated a quarter of a mile distant, and is approached by a broad and winding road, well shaded with trees.

The visitor presenting himself before the door on the left sees a gilt plate bearing the name of Robert Houdin, below which is a small gilt knocker. He raises this according to his fancy; but, no matter how feeble the blow, a delicately tuned chime of bells sounding throughout the mansion announces his presence. When the attendant touches a button placed in the hall the chime ceases, the bolt at the entrance is thrown back, the name of Robert Houdin disappears from the door, and in its place appears the word "Enter" in white enamel. The visitor pushes open the door and enters; it closes with a spring behind him, and he cannot depart without permission.

A resident of the place is readily distinguished, for, knowing in advance what is to occur, he knocks, and at the instant that the bolt slips back he enters. The equi-distant strokes follow immediately the pressing of the button. But a new visitor, surprised at the appearance of the word "Enter," hesitates a second or two, then presses open the door gradually, and enters slowly. The four strokes, now separated by a short interval, succeed the pressure of the button by an appreciable time, and the host makes ready to receive a stranger. The traveling beggar, fearful of committing some indiscretion, raises the knocker timidly; he hesitates to enter, and when he does so it is with great slowness and caution. This the chimes unerringly announce. It seems to persons at the house as if they actually saw the poor mendicant pass the entrance, and in going to meet him they are never mistaken.

When a carriage arrives at the Priory, the driver descends from his box, enters the door by the method just described, and is directed to the key of the gate by a suitable inscription. He unlocks the gate and swings open its two parts; the movement is announced at the house, and on a table in the hall, bearing the words: "The gate is—" appears the word "open" or "closed," according to the fact.

The letter-box, too, has an electric communication with the house. The carrier, previously instructed, drops in first all the printed matter together; then he adds the letters one by one. Each addition sounds the chimes; and the owner even if he has not yet risen, is apprised of the character of his mail. To avoid sending letters to the village, they are written in the evening and a communicator is so arranged, that when the carrier drops the mail into the box the next morning, the electricity, in place of sounding the chimes in the house, sounds one over his head. Thus warned, he comes up to the house to leave what he has brought and take away the letters for mailing.

M. Houdin possesses a mare for which he has a great affection. A former hostler had contracted the habit of changing the oats of his master into five-franc pieces. To prevent this peculation, the house, distant from the stable seven or eight rods, is connected with it by electricity, so that by means of a clock fixed in the study, the necessary quantity of food is supplied to the horse at a fixed hour three times a day. The distributing apparatus is very simple, consisting of a square box, funnel shaped, which discharges the oats in the proportion previously regulated. Since the oats are allowed to fall only when the stable-door is locked, the hostler cannot remove them after they are supplied nor can he shut himself in the stable and thus get the oats, as the door locks only upon the outside. Moreover, he cannot re-enter and abstract them, because an alarm is sounded in the house, if the door be opened before the oats are consumed.

PHILIPPOPOLIS.

PRINCE Alexander of Bulgaria had no place in his dominions more loyal to him than the city, a picture of which appears on this page. It has been under his rule a little less than a year, but it gave him an enthusiastic reception when he returned after his first abdication, and it showed sincere sympathy and regret when he finally quitted his throne.

The city is built on an island formed by the river Maritza, which there becomes navigable. It is about ninety-one miles to the northwest of Adrianople. It is on elevated ground, the island on which it stands being considerably above the plain, which extends beyond Adrianople. It is a conspicuous object for a long distance—"a city set on a hill, which cannot be hid." It stands on the site of the ancient Roman city Trimontium, and some parts of it are of great age. Considerable trade is done there with Austria and the East. Its population has increased during the past half century from 45,000 to 60,000.

THE COLLEGE MISSIONARIES IN CHINA.

PORTRAITS of two graduates of the English University of Cambridge appeared in this journal on April 9, 1885. They were two young men who formed part of a contingent, who, under the influence of Mr. D. L. Moody, abandoned wealth and a distinguished career to go out as missionaries to China. The picture on this page is made from a photograph of the party, taken in China after they had assumed the Chinese costume.

The experience of Mr. Hudson Taylor and other missionaries who have gone to labor among the Chinese, proves that it is much less difficult to get access to the homes of the people when the Chinese dress is adopted, and there is besides less probability of their being mobbed in the streets. To our eyes the dress gives them an extraordinary appearance, and to the missionaries themselves it was doubtless something of a trial to disfigure themselves in that way. That, however, would be a trivial matter, and they have the gratification of knowing that in thus adopting the dress and customs of the people to whom they preach, they are following the example of the great pioneer missionary of the cross (1 Cor. 9: 19-22).

"THERE is Lucilla, talking to old Betty Gardiner; let us hurry, Herbert, I want to ask if she has been invited to the ball?"

Colonel and Mrs. Seymour quickened their steps and met Mrs. Seymour's cousin, Lucilla, as she turned from the Gardiners' cottage to visit another of her humble friends. As the ladies met she extended her hand, but Colonel Seymour playfully interposed. "I don't think it is safe to let Clara shake hands with you, Mrs. Pelham, until you have been disinfected. How many fever germs have you brought away with you from the Gardiner place?"

"Don't be absurd, Colonel Seymour," said Lucilla, "I have not been inside the cottage. I simply went to the door to inquire after the old man, and to leave a little basket of good things for him. He is very sick; I am afraid he will never recover."

"Well, he can be spared; when persons of that class are old and poor and miserable, they are a burden to themselves and all about them."

"Ah! that is very cold philosophy. The survival of the fittest suits the fittest, but it is hard on those who are not so fit. I am very sorry for the poor old man; I wish I could make his life brighter for him."

"I suppose you do," said the Colonel, "but it is a very thankless task, and involves some risk as well. Here have you been to that house which is reeking with infection, taking your little daughter, too. And for what? Just to give delicacies to a man who has not the slightest claim on you."

"Pardon me, Colonel, he has a very strong claim. He is one of the Lord's representatives on earth. Jesus specially appointed such men as he to receive the kindness which we would show to him."

"You have a very literal and practical way of acting on Christian precepts," Mrs. Pelham. The next thing we shall hear of will be your selling all your possessions and giving to the poor. I believe there is an injunction of that kind, is there not?"

"Let Lucilla alone, Herbert," interposed Mrs. Seymour. "You and she will never settle these questions. I am sure it is very good and kind of her to visit these poor creatures. Very few ladies would take the trouble. I for one would not like to undertake it. But, Lucilla, I am dying to know if you have an invitation to the ball. I am going, and I want you to come up to the house and let us arrange."

"Yes," said Mrs. Pelham, "I have been invited, but I shall not go. I decided last winter that I would never go to such places again."

"Oh, I am so sorry!" said Mrs. Seymour. "I do so wish you would go, Lucilla; it will not be half so pleasant for me without you. Just imagine that I am one of your poor people, and that it is your duty to make me happy."

"Cannot imagine it at all," said Mrs. Pelham, laughing. "You are much too gay and sprightly to impress me with a sense of your dependence upon me."

"Well, it is of no use to argue with you, Lucilla, so I shall not attempt it. Having appealed to your principle of self-sacrifice without avail, I know there is no other point on which you are vulnerable."

The Seymours continued their walk, and Mrs. Pelham and her little daughter went on their way visiting the Lord's poor and ministering to the sorrowing.

Two years afterward Mrs. Pelham was spending a few weeks at a summer resort with her cousin, Mrs. Seymour, and the Colonel. The two ladies were sitting together in their room in the hotel, overlooking the sea, when Colonel Seymour strolled in.

"I met a friend of yours in the lobby just now, Lucilla," he said.

"Indeed; I did not think I had any friends here. Who could it be?"

"Well, it is one of the waiters here. I suppose you will like to invite him up, but I did not give the invitation on my own responsibility. He is a son of that wretched old Gardiner you used to visit. He is grown a big, stalwart fellow. Not bad looking, either."

"Oh, Will Gardiner," said Mrs. Pelham. "I am so glad he got the place; his mother said he was trying to get employment in a hotel. I must go and speak to him."

"Would you not like him to call. If Clara and I would spoil the interview, we can go for a walk."

"Do not be ridiculous, Colonel. He is a very deserving fellow, and I hope he will always regard me as a friend."

"You have a queer notion of friendship, Lucilla; the worst of it is, that all the obligations are on one side."

"I don't mind that at all, if I can help them. Poor creatures! many of them need the little I can do, very badly." So saying, Mrs. Pelham tripped lightly down stairs to see the young man and cheer him in his efforts to earn a livelihood. It did him good to have so bright and kind a lady put aside her dignity to speak to him in the presence of the hotel-keeper and the guests, and the fact of his being so acknowledged was not overlooked by his employer.

That night there was a scene of terror in the hotel. It was a frail frame structure, very much painted and decorated, but as lightly built as summer hotels generally are. When, therefore, the midnight silence was broken by a cry of "Fire!" everyone knew that the hotel was doomed. There was no hope of saving it, and but little hope of saving the guests. The stairs were blazing, and the elevator shaft was full of flame, before Col. Seymour learned his danger. He aroused his wife and Lucilla, and bidding them dress and remain still until he could procure a ladder, he jumped from the window to the lawn. He alighted on a large boulder, and rolled over, helpless, with a broken leg. He lost consciousness, for a moment, with the pain, but recovering, shouted loudly for a ladder. Men were hurrying about, each intent on some special effort, and no one took any notice of him. At last a man answered his cry.

"Bless you, sir," he said, "there ain't a ladder on the place as would reach them windows. They are lost, sir, whoever they are."

"Think, my man; is there no way of getting at them? I would give you a thousand dollars if you could save those ladies."

"No use, sir; dollars ain't o' no use to a dead man, and that's what it would come to. There's only one way, and that's at the back, and there's fire and smoke all the way. Why, bless me, if it ain't Col. Seymour! You don't mean as Mrs. Pelham is up there?"

"I do, Gardiner, and Mrs. Seymour, too. 'I'll give you—'"

But Gardiner was gone before he heard any more.

Making his way through the stifling corridors, almost suffocated with smoke and scorched by the flames curling up the staircases, Gardiner found the room. Half leading, half carrying, the two ladies, he hurried back over the perilous road through those interminable corridors until at last he had them safe in the open air.

Col. Seymour is Afraid of Fever Germs.

It was a narrow escape, and the Colonel shed tears of joy as he thanked him. The young man would take none of his money. "No, sir," he said, simply, "it warn't done for money. You couldn't ha' got me to run that risk for no sum you could name. But I'd a died for Mrs. Pelham, wot's been my friend, and good to the old folks at home."

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

Leroy Proposes.

It was no trivial errand on which Leroy was bound. As he sat looking from the car window at the country through which he was rapidly whirled, he realized that the color of all his future life would be fixed indelibly in the next few hours. Would Carrie accept the offer he was about to make? If she did his arm would be nerved for the struggle. His months of drudgery would pass as those years passed with Jacob when he served for Rachel.

But if she refused? He could not entertain the thought. Why should she reject him? She had showed a personal preference for him. They had congenial tastes. They had seen enough of each other to know that they would be mutually helpful. There was no reason for apprehension, save the one difficulty of religion. Surely Carrie was too sensible a lady to make an obstacle of that. True, she felt strongly on the subject, but he would guarantee her perfect liberty. They could be happy without agreeing on that point. Their discussions would give a piquancy to married life, and would prevent it becoming insipid. So by the time Leroy stepped from the train at the little station he had settled it with himself that success was assured.

Carrie's welcome confirmed him in the impression. It was the welcome of a dear and intimate friend. In introducing him to her family she spoke warmly of his kindness and flatteringly of his reputation at the college, and they received him accordingly for Carrie's sake. They were anxious that he should enjoy his visit, and sent for a carriage, that he might drive around the little city, to see the beauties of the neighborhood. During the drive, Leroy gave his companion the whole history of the disaster which had necessitated his spending the winter in teaching instead of in college. Her words of approval were music to his ears. It was no stinted praise that she bestowed on the self-sacrifice which impelled him to save a parent from sorrow at the cost of his cherished projects. He saw that his act raised him in her esteem, and was rewarded.

Nevertheless, there was a constraint perceptible in Carrie's manner. He could not define it, could scarcely realize it; but there was something wrong. She must be suffering mentally, he thought. Possibly, and the thought thrilled him, she was grieving that the next term would be lonely for her. She would miss him, surely, and perhaps that thought was oppressing her. Well, the declaration of his love, which he resolved to make before he went to rest, would restore her gaiety and animation.

The opportunity came that evening, as they were seated in the trim little parlor in which Carrie's little library of books and her other treasures were carefully arranged. They had been looking them through together, and chatting about their favorite authors, as in the college days, which now seemed so long ago.

"Carrie," Leroy said, "those were very pleasant days at Clayville."

"They were," Carrie assented. "The old college will not be near so pleasant next term. I shall miss you sorely."

"You will think of me sometimes, I hope. My thoughts will constantly hover about you. I could not have believed a year ago, before I knew you, how potent an influence could be exerted over me. You hold the half of my life, Carrie, and without you I am a but poor, riven creature. I need you to complete my existence. I never knew how necessary you were to me until the vacation. Even at college I did not know it. Carrie, I love you very dearly; will you not promise to be my wife?"

She did not look at him. Her eyes drooped, and her heart beat high. Her face was pale. He loved her—ah, how passionately! He drew his chair close to hers and took her hand.

"Carrie, Carrie, I am going away in a few days, and I cannot leave without an understanding. I must know whether I dare hope for you. Oh, Carrie, my love, may I not call you mine forever?"

Her face was death-like in its pallor, her lips were almost as white as snow when she raised her eyes. He thought her heart must have ceased to beat. She spoke with a tremulous voice.

"Leroy, I love you, but I cannot be your wife."

He rose slowly to his feet, unable for a moment to understand, and his heart sank within him. It seemed that an awful gulf was opening beneath him, and he was sinking, sinking. He still held her hand tightly between both of his.

"You love me, but cannot be my wife!" he repeated slowly. "What do you mean by that? Why—why not? tell me, my own Carrie!"

She arose, and with both her hands she returned the pressure of his grasp as she said:

"I cannot tell you, Leroy. It is best I do not tell you—best for you and best for me. Believe me, trust me in this."

He tore loose from her grasp and paced the floor with a heavy tread.

"Love me, but cannot be my wife!" he said over again and again. At last he stopped before her and said, almost fiercely:

"Why, then, did you not tell me before?"

"Because I loved you, Leroy, and I could not reject you before you had asked for my hand. I have wronged you, Leroy; but believe me, I did not intend to deceive you. I did so hope the obstacles would be removed before it came to this."

"What are the obstacles? tell me," he said, with the earnestness of desperation.

"Leroy, I cannot, I must not tell you; and yet, how I long that you should know!" and at last she sank into her chair and wept.

"How can I believe in a God!" he exclaimed. "There cannot be a God, or He would not permit such terrible woe among His creatures. This world is a mishap, and existence is a misery. The German skeptics are right. The earth is only a desert. Even the beauty of nature is designed to mock our sorrow. Curse it! curse it!"

He said, vehemently and with a solemnity that made Carrie shudder. "Curse earth, Heaven, love and all! Curses on my own heart! Curse—no, no, I will not curse you, Carrie. I love you, I love you; and yet now I wish I could hate you."

Thus he raved. It was terrible to hear him curse so. At last he almost leaped to her side, and seizing her arm, he exclaimed:

"Are you bound to another? If you are, I will ask no more. I would not press you to break a promise. Is it so?"

"Oh, Leroy; do not ask me further, I plead. Go to your room and rest."

"Rest! rest! Why don't you tell me go to the Christian's hell to rest? I can never rest again. I shall become demented. I know not what I say. Carrie, is there no hope? Tell me that this is not final, and I will obey you; I will leave you now and wait, if it is for half a lifetime. Can you give me not a shred of hope to save me from lunacy?"

"Listen," said Carrie, summoning up all the calmness she could. "Listen: I cannot explain this now; I have told you so. I am suffering as you suffer. It has cost me great agony to reach this decision. I do not speak lightly, but under solemn conviction. There are obstacles to our union existing now. I pray God they may be removed; I will pray day and night for that. If ever they are removed, I will accept you, my dear Leroy, with a glad and grateful heart. I can say no more. You must leave me now."

Leroy looked at her in a dazed, wondering manner, like a man in a dream, and still in the same distracted way he turned and left the room, staggered to his chamber and flung himself on the bed in an agony of grief.

Carrie, too, sought her room, pale and trembling with agitation, and fell on her knees to seek strength where she had never failed to find it—the Refuge of the troubled and sorrowing in all ages.

That was not the first time that those walls had witnessed her conflict and victory. The very struggle of to-night was but a sequel to a fiercer struggle that had occurred there but a few days before. It was there that she had come to the decision that she had announced to Leroy to-night, and she had reached it before she wrote the letter that Leroy had accepted as a sign of success. He had no idea of the struggle that had been fought before that letter was penned.

When she read the letter in which he told her of his disappointment, and asked permission to visit her, she divined, with the intuition the female mind possesses, what his object was. Had he been returning to college next term, he would probably have been content to wait without seeking an interview. As it was, she was sure that he dreaded to run the risk of her forming new friendships among the students while he was absent, and possibly a friendship which might develop into an engagement. There was no hint of it in his letter, but she realized that, so sure as she allowed him to visit her, he would endeavor to win her consent to an engagement. Being thus prepared, and fully comprehending what his visit involved, she set herself to study the situation before replying to his letter.

One question must be answered to her satisfaction before a decision could be reached. Ought she to promise herself to him in marriage when he asked her? Her logical mind winnowed the whole subject down to that question; and that she earnestly set herself to consider. Before taking it up she spent some time in earnest prayer. The prediction which Leroy had heard from his brother, had actually been fulfilled before it was uttered. She prayed earnestly for guidance, and that God would enable her to find a right way to come to a right conclusion. Then she sat down to examine the questions thoroughly. She believed that God had endowed her with reason, to be used in difficulties, and that she had no right to look for more help than the guidance she had asked for. She must reason it out.

The first step was easily taken. If Leroy Ransom had been a Christian, Carrie admitted to herself that she would have consented to marry him had he asked her. She loved him; there was no doubt of that. Her heart was throbbing even now, as she thought of him, in a way that set at rest all questions about her love. But it must not influence her judgment.

The objection to him, the sole obstacle to their union, was his scepticism. Point by point she went over his character, as she knew it, and arrived at the same conclusion, "If he were not a sceptic," she said, "I would accept him." Was the obstacle of scepticism insuperable? Now, she had reached the marrow of the subject, and the inward battle waxed fierce and strong.

"Why should I not marry a sceptic, if we love each other? He might hold his views and I might retain mine, and, as the saying is, we might agree to disagree."

For a time the suggestion seemed practicable. It was too welcome to the desire of her heart to be lightly cast aside; but soon her better judgment asserted itself, and she saw the fallacy of the idea.

"Agree to disagree on such a vital matter! That would be impossible. I dare not play fast and loose with the eternal truths of religion. No; in the intimate associations of married life, our interests and aspirations would continually come into conflict, making our home a scene of contention, instead of quiet domestic happiness. There would be no community of feeling on those questions of faith, which I regard as of paramount importance.

"And yet," she cried, "How can I give up all my dreams of happiness!" Then her face brightened as a new thought entered her mind. "If we were married I might be God's instrument in bringing about a change in his convictions."

But neither of these suggestions could her judgment approve. "I have not succeeded at all thus far," she had to admit, "in winning him to my faith, and why should I then. I have known instances—yes, more than one—when the wife lost her hold on her husband's intellect after marriage. The fact is, Leroy has been going deeper into unbelief ever since my acquaintance with him began. Even in this letter he implies that he has suffered injustice at the hand of God, and I fear he has sunk into complete atheism. No man can believe that God is unjust; he must believe that there is no God. And so I cannot be certain that I should be able to produce a change in his character. The change might be just the reverse—in me instead of in him. I might begin to doubt, too, or, if not that, I might cease to grow in grace amid uncongenial surroundings.

Then she fell into a reverie for a time, from which no definite train of reasoning could be produced. She scarcely marked the flight of time, as the evening shadows gathered; she only knew that a dull, leaden pain was in her heart. By and by she roused herself from her incoherent musings.

"Besides, there is another consideration—that of congruity of taste. True, we are congenial in our literary aspirations, but oh! how far from congenial on that matter of highest and deepest concern. The antipodes of the earth are not farther apart. How can two persons who have no spiritual affinity be happy together!"

The more she reflected upon the subject, the more she was convinced that a union with Leroy, in his present state of mind, would entail unhappiness on them both. For the present, at least, she felt it her duty to tell him frankly, if he should make her a proposal of marriage, that such a consummation as their union would be impossible. So it could remain for a time. If ever he should experience a change of conviction, then—. If he never did become a Christian, why—then—she would leave it all in God's hands.

Another question that passed her was, should she tell Leroy the reason she could not accept him? Here she wavered for a time between conflicting doubts. If she did not give the reasons of her conduct, he might leave her in wrath, never to return; and how could she endure such a calamity, for there still was a gleam of hope in her heart. On the other hand, if she stated her reasons, he might, such was the strength of his passionate nature, make an attempt to abandon his infidelity by a mere mental effort—not for truth's sake, but for her sake.

She could not make herself responsible for such an endeavor on his part. Such a change would not be radical, and, consequently, it would only be temporary. The infidelity would still be in his heart. She well knew that no man could coerce himself into a belief of the Scriptures, especially when his doubts had been so deeply rooted as Leroy's. No; if Leroy experienced a change, it must be real, it must be for religion's sake and not for the sake of a merely human passion, however pure that might be. The revolution must be one of character—of the reason, the understanding, the emotions, the will; in short, of the whole current of his being. He must be "born again."

Her decision involved a case of conscience that might have embarrassed the acutest casuist, but Carrie determined to follow the dictates of duty, and not the impulses of passion.

"We might continue to correspond," she thought. "Certainly I need not deny myself that pleasure." But a little more thought changed her conclusion in this respect also. "No, he may never change his views, and in that case I should be holding out inducements to him only to disappoint him at last. Besides, he might meet some other girl—" Her heart almost stopped beating at the thought. "If he should—should meet some other—other—girl, our correspondence would only be an obstacle in his way. Though I hope God will spare me this, I will make the sacrifice, for Leroy's sake." That was the decision she had come to, and having conquered herself, she had found it less difficult to maintain her composure when she communicated it to Leroy. She had suffered terribly during the ordeal, but there had been no traitor in her own heart to embarrass her, and now, having done the right, she was at peace.

JESUS CRUCIFIED.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson, for October 24. John 19: 17-30. Golden Text: Ver. 30.

Jesus Led Away—Not Occupied with Himself—His Followers—The Mystery of the Cross—Ignominy and Suffering—Truth in Mocking Words—Pilate's Writing—The Words of the Thieves—The Seamless Vesture—Prayer for the Murderers—Provision for His Mother—Not Self-Absorbed—Creation Mourning—The Spiritual Eclipse.

"AND they took Jesus and led Him away." They had gained their point. It was only because God permitted it; but every one of those bitter enemies of Jesus must, some time or other, look on Him whom they have pierced. It was the common custom for a criminal who was condemned to be crucified, that he should bear his cross to the place of execution. And Jesus bore His, but not alone. Simon, the Cyrenian, was compelled by the enemies of Jesus to bear it after Him (Luke xxiii., 26). He had nearly died in Gethsemane, and their bitter, cruel vengeance would not be satisfied if He should be exhausted before He came to the cross. But He was NOT OCCUPIED WITH HIMSELF, even in such an hour. A great company of people followed Him, and of women, "which also bewailed and lamented Him" (Luke 23: 27). Having so little understood His teaching, their hopes of temporal deliverance through Him were at an end. They loved Him, they could not bear that He should suffer, but they were altogether uncomprehending and astonished that this Man of mighty deeds should be at the mercy of men whom they saw to be so inferior to Him; had He lost His power, was He, after all, not the Messiah? Oh, had they taken to heart His own repeated teachings, they would have understood His wondrous redemption work; they would have adored while they wept; they would have seen salvation accomplished in the one great Sin offering; they would have beheld in Him "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world!" Jesus turned to them, and said, "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for Me, but weep for yourselves and for your children." The heart of Jesus was sad for the coming destruction of the city which was now in the very act of rejecting Him and slaying Him.

They crucified Him, and He, "for the joy that was set before Him, endured the cross, despising the shame" (Heb. 13: 2). Yet none can ever know what it was to Jesus to bear upon Him sin and sin's consequences, sickness and death. How it could be that He who knew no sin could yet bear our sins, and be made sin for us. How He, in His perfection as a man, could take our infirmities and bear our sicknesses. How He, who is the Resurrection and the Life, could die, is beyond human knowledge and human language. But so it was. He met man's due in every form. Not only did He die for sin as a whole, but on Him every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward, otherwise He would have been unrighteous to justify, unholy to forgive. Our hearts fail us when we think of His suffering, spiritual, mental, physical, all accumulated upon Him at that terrible time. And He did it willingly. He made a freewill offering of Himself to God on our behalf, and He makes a freewill offering of His propitiation to you and to me. Precious, wondrous Jesus!

To add to His humiliation, they crucified two thieves, one on either hand, as though to prove to the assembled crowd that He was one such as they! But the only robbery Jesus was guilty of was to rob Satan of his prey, and death of his sting! This He continued to do on the cross. These very thieves took up the insolent cries of the priests who, in their fancied victory and exultation, manifested the spirit they were of, and mockingly cried, "He saved others; Himself He cannot save. Let Christ, the King of Israel, descend now from the cross, that we may see and believe" (Mark 15: 31-32). It was the vulgar irony of a brutal mind, which might become a murderer, but how did it fit the lips of chief priests? It was but the outcome of hearts full of all uncleanness! Yet, they spoke the truth. He saved others, He saves others still, but no thought of sparing Himself found place in the heart of Jesus. He was in every sense a sacrifice, and a complete one. "Himself He cannot save," because His wondrous love demands that He shall die! His arm was not shortened. He was the same Mighty One, but He was giving the death stroke to death by dying, the death stroke to sin and sickness, by bearing both, that so, he that believeth should not bear that which He has borne for him.

When our beloved Lord was placed upon the cross, Pilate wrote a title and put it on the cross, and the writing was,

JESUS OF NAZARETH, THE KING OF THE JEWS. Pilate ordered that it should be written in Hebrew and Greek and Latin. Naturally, the passers-by looked up and read it. The chief priests saw the danger that, if Pilate announced Jesus to be the King of the Jews, the people might believe on Him. So they corrected Pilate, and said, "Write not, The King of the Jews, but that He said, I am the King of the Jews." Pilate answered, "What I have written, I have written." Was it, perhaps, a salve to his own conscience, and a silent protest to the Jews? We know not; but all who could read in that company read, Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews. One man who was present—one of the thieves who was crucified with Him—accosted Him as a king. The other thief was pouring out maledictions on Jesus with his dying lips, perhaps with the hope that he should be taken down and his life spared—perhaps with that unaccountable madness of rage in which Satan sometimes worries some of his victims to their end. But this one rebuked him, saying, "Dost thou not fear God, seeing we are in the same condemnation? And we indeed, justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds: but this man hath done nothing amiss." And he said, "Lord, remember me, when Thou comest into Thy kingdom." Yes, he believed Jesus was king—king of a kingdom which it should be possible for him to enter after death. To him, Jesus was King of the Jews, and his king, too. And that man's soul was saved there, upon the cross, and the King of Kings said to him, "To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise" (Luke 23: 39-43).

The clothing of one who should be crucified was the perquisite of the executioners, and thus the soldiers parted among them the garments of Jesus. But a passage of Scripture had to be fulfilled in order that no single proof of the identity of the Messiah should be wanting! "Now, the coat was without seam, woven from top throughout, no doubt the work of Mary, His mother, or of the other women who ministered unto Him of their substance." They said, therefore, among themselves, let us not rend it, but cast lots for it, whose it shall be, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, which saith, They parted My raiment among them, and for My vesture they did cast lots." Every prophecy regarding Jesus as the suffering Saviour was fulfilled in every detail, so that the Jews could have no excuse for failing to recognize Him.

All through this time of unspeakable agony and torture, Jesus was at leisure with Himself as much as when He walked from place to place in Galilee. When He was nailed upon the cross could remember the souls of his murderers, and prayed,

"FATHER FORGIVE THEM,

for they know not what they do." While bearing His cross He had a heart for the daughters of Jerusalem. In Gethsemane He could make an excuse for the disciples. We have just seen how He was at leisure for salvation of the thief. And now we see Him caring for those who had been the nearest to Him on earth. "Now there stood by the cross of Jesus His mother, and His mother's sister, Mary, wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene." These women, whose lives had been so different, yet united in Jesus, one at the cross! "When Jesus, therefore, saw His mother and the disciple standing by, whom He loved, He saith unto His mother, Woman, behold thy son! Then saith He to the disciple, Behold thy mother! And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home." Jesus did not forget family ties at the cross! How is it that suffering, whether physical or mental, so absorbs us. We see Jesus under it, yet so free as to be at the disposal of others, far less sufferers than He. It is only self-pity and self-consideration that makes suffering so absorb us. Truly, there are natures less highly wrought than others, and to them the exquisite torture which others suffer is unknown; but then, their joys are less keen, and so there is always compensation. But Jesus was capable of suffering in the most acute degree, or He would not have been the Man of Sorrows. He could not have taken our infirmities and borne our sicknesses. There are details of our lives that we have not fully let Jesus into, or His life would be in us, according to our circumstances, all that it was in Him.

After this, Jesus, knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst. Now there was set a vessel full of vinegar; and they filled a sponge with vinegar and put it upon hyssop and put it to His mouth." Thus was fulfilled the word of the Psalmist, "They gave Me also gall for My meat, and in My thirst they gave Me vinegar to drink" (Ps. 69: 21). It was at this time that over the whole land from the sixth to the ninth hour. Jesus, in His death, was not dependent on human mourners: the whole creation put on black. The sun had come into being at His word, and now veiled his face and shrouded the earth so that no human eye should see the moment when death triumphed over Jesus. But one witnessed that sight: it was the Father. There came a moment when another scripture was fulfilled in the one bitter cry of Jesus on the cross, "My God! My God! why hast thou forsaken Me?" Up to that moment, while bearing the awful weight of what was laid on Him, Jesus had yet the joy set before Him, and the unbroken consciousness that He pleased God. That in order to take our place to the full, He must know what it was to be cut off from His Father. The darkness around was nothing to the horror of great of Jesus when that cloud which He was joyfully bearing, as the scape-goat of men, came between and eclipsed the Father's countenance, and for the time He did not know that He pleased Him. It was enough; this was the last pang. To Him light had come, and He could say, "It is finished; Father, unto Thy hands I commend My spirit." "And when He had said this He gave up the ghost." After all, death did not conquer Jesus. He gave up the spirit as a king would surrender his sword. In Jesus, sinless as He was, there was no element of death or decay, it could only be by His own will that He could die, just as by His own will He rose again. But O, what has He done for us? In that cross we see, to him that believeth Satan's power gone, to him that is crucified with Christ, death a mere harmless accident, incapable of touching the eternal life within; we see every question settled, but how shall we say, how shall our lives say, all we owe to Jesus?

WAITING.

I am waiting for the coming of my dear Redeemer Lord,
I am resting in His promise, in His precious, priceless word;
And, although He seems to tarry, yet I know He'll surely come,
And take His own, His ransomed, to His bright and blissful home.

When I waken in the morning, ere the dawning of the day,
I lift my soul to His dear side, and watch and praise and pray,
For it may be in the morning I shall hear His blessed voice,
Triumphant o'er the waves of time, bid all His own rejoice.

Then in the noon-tide splendor of the sun's meridian light,
When the busy world's surroundings need our armor should be bright,
'Tis sweet to turn aside our thoughts from the
carking cares of life,
And think perhaps 't is now He'll come 'mid the battle and the strife.

Then when the shadowy wing of night spreads darkness on the land,
Ere soft slumbers close my senses, I yield all into His hand;
My body, soul and spirit—self—all I ask Him safe to keep,
And thinking on His precious blood, I fain would fall asleep;

For it may be while I'm sleeping the Archangel's
trump will sound,
Then, oh, what a glorious waking, to be all in Jesus found!
Yes! but whether in the morning or the noontide or the night,
It reck's little to the Christian soul whose light is in His Light.

For no matter when He cometh—oh, what praise for truth like this!
When He comes, we shall be like Him, "we shall see Him as He is."

The Late DR. W. FLEMING STEVENSON, of Dublin—LORD and LADY LONDONDERRY—the Lord Lieutenant's State Entry into Dublin.

THE LATE DR. WILLIAM FLEMING STEVENSON.

Born in 1832—Family Training, and Ministerial Appointments—His Call to Dublin in 1859—His Devotion to Mission Work—A Voyage Round the World—Chaplain to the Lord-Lieutenant—His busy Philanthropic Life.

THE Irish Presbyterian Church has met with a serious loss in the sudden death of Dr. William Fleming Stevenson, of Dublin, whose portrait is given on our front page. He passed away on Thursday night, September 16, at his residence, Rathgar, of heart disease, from the effects of which he had a long time been a sufferer. He was only 54 years of age, having been born at Strabane, in 1832. Dr. Stevenson labored up to the last, preaching in Liverpool on the Sunday before his death, conducting his own prayer-meeting in Rathgar, on Wednesday evening, and conducting family worship in his own house on Thursday evening. He was caught away before midnight into his eternal rest. It was a remarkable coincidence that he gave out and joined in the singing of the hymn, "Let me be with Thee where Thou art," just twenty minutes before the hymn fulfilled itself in his experience.

Dr. Stevenson belonged to the sturdy stock of Ulster Presbyterians. He studied and graduated in Glasgow University. His theological training was carried on partly in Scotland, partly in Germany. In 1856 he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Strabane, and immediately afterwards accepted an appointment on the Belfast Town Mission. Even at this early stage, his public addresses in the churches and school-houses, in which he delivered them, began to draw around him many of the most intelligent and refined. But Dublin, not Belfast, was to be the sphere of his life work. There the congregation of Rathgar flourished beneath his fostering care. The little nucleus met, in 1859, in one of those school-houses with which he had already become well acquainted in his Belfast work. It leaped into sudden vitality under his earnest ministrations, was erected into a settled charge in 1860, called Dr. Stevenson to be its minister, built for itself a church in one of the beautiful, leafy suburbs of South Dublin, and steadily grew into

ONE OF THE FOREMOST CONGREGATIONS of the Presbyterian Church. Shortly after his ministry began, a leading member of his congregation was taken away, and it was his lot to conduct the funeral service in the very chapel in which his own was conducted on Tuesday, September 21, amidst groups of mourners from all parts of the land. In the middle of his address he paused, his head sank down upon his hands, and he burst into a flood of tears. Such was the tie by which minister and people were bound to one another. It is true that the multiplying public engagements of more recent years took him away frequently from home, but his people were prepared to make any concession, so that only they could count on his coming back to them again.

The work with which Dr. Stevenson's memory will be mainly associated, however, was the management of the Presbyterian Assembly's Foreign Mission. To Dr. Morgan, the first Convener, was due the inauguration of the Mission, but to Dr. Stevenson was due its great expansion and development. In 1877, at the request of the Assembly, he made

A VOYAGE ROUND THE WORLD, as Dr. Norman McLeod had done, for the purpose of visiting the various mission-fields in India, China and Japan. The tour involved a year's absence from his church and country; but the amount of valuable information he amassed during the journey, and the stimulus he communicated to the church on his return, amply compensated for the inconvenience of his absence. He was probably the greatest living authority on the subject of Christian missions during the interval between Dr. McLeod's death and his own.

During the twelve years of his Convener'ship he was burning the candle at both ends. He was gradually sucked into that whirlpool of dizzying work to which the most capable men are exposed, and though well aware of his danger, he was too gallant and devoted to save himself by a prudent husbanding of his powers. A sick lad, a member of his congregation, used to lie awake at a window in the Rathgar Road, opposite the letter-box, and he used to tell how his minister came down through the dim dawning of the early day to post his correspondence before snatching the hour or two of sleep that should prepare him for the labors of the day. And yet, though his nights as well as days were so full of labor, the sense of hurry was never to be noticed in him. He was too full of courtesy and genuine goodwill, to seem impatient at the presence of any; and many were tempted by his grace of manner to lay too heavy a tax upon time which was so precious to its possessor.

Dr. Stevenson was a member of the Senate of the Royal Irish University. When the General Assembly met in Dublin, in 1881, he was elected Moderator by its unanimous vote. Under the Vice-regency of the Earl of Aberdeen, he was appointed CHAPLAIN TO THE LORD-LIEUTENANT, a unique appointment in the history of Irish Presbyterianism. He was a man, however, who did not seek but shrank from honors. His modest and unobtrusive nature withheld him from taking part in any but the most important of the General Assembly's debates. But he never stood up to speak without being breathlessly listened to, and his words were always weighty, luminous and convincing.

He was a man who was fitted to shine in various walks of life, and he had a rare literary faculty. He served, under Dr. McLeod, on the staff of Good Words in the earliest days of that periodical, and wrote a number of articles, principally on the various phases of Christian work, which, afterwards, in 1861, formed the basis of the one complete book his overburdened life permitted him to prepare for the press, a book the title of which may be taken as the motto of the man, "Praying and Working." He was an advocate of every good work. Sunday-schools, temperance organizations, orphanages, hospitals, all who were in need, found in him an unfailing friend. In his own support of them he led the way with open-handed generosity. His memory will be cherished with ardent affection, and his example long act as a stimulus to a Christ-like life.

THE MARQUIS AND MARCHIONESS OF LONDONDERRY.

IN appointing the Marquis of Londonderry to the vice-royalty of Ireland the British Premier displayed less sagacity than generally distinguishes him. The Irish are a susceptible people, to whom the very name the Marquis bears is an offence. Personally he may be a wise and capable ruler, but it seemed folly to appoint him to rule a people who would be predisposed to dislike him. He is the nephew of that Lord Castlereagh who was the Benedict Arnold of Ireland. It was by his exertions and by the bribes he lavishly distributed among Irish members of Parliament in 1800 that that Parliament voted its own extinction. He found men there open to corruption, and he bought them and with them the legislative independence of Ireland. The Irish have never forgotten this nor forgiven it, and now that his nephew is sent to govern them they are not unlikely to visit upon him the odium earned by his uncle. A prominent journalist, not an Irishman, writing in an influential London journal, recently said: "This young Marquis of Londonderry of course owes his position to the fact that his second title is Viscount Castlereagh; he needs some compensation for the hard necessity of having to bear a title of such evil repute. Perhaps he does not object to it; for my part I would almost as soon be called Caligula or Judas Iscariot."

Patrick, was born in July, 1852. He is therefore now thirty-four years of age. To Londoners he is best known as a coal merchant. Having extensive coal mines, he does not, as other colliery-owners do, supply coal merchants by wholesale, but deals directly with consumers, thus saving the profit of the middle-man. Any London house-holder, therefore, may purchase a ton of coal from the noble Marquis, and thus bring himself into business relations, at least, with the peerage. Besides the mines which are in Durham, he possesses a considerable estate in Downshire, Ireland. His principal seat in the north is Wynward Park, near Stockton-on-Tees. He also possesses a residence in Seaham Hall, which is close to Seaham Harbor, a busy little port about six miles from Sunderland. Lord Londonderry is best known in the north of England as the Colonel-Commandant of the Seaham Artillery Brigade, composed largely of his own workmen, and perhaps the finest volunteer artillery brigade in the country. His lordship, being an Irish peer, was not entitled to a seat in the British House of Lords in his younger days. He therefore endeavored to secure a seat in the House of Commons. He unsuccessfully contested South Durham in 1874, and Montgomery District in 1877. In 1878, however, he was elected by County Down, and held the seat until 1884, when he succeeded to the title of Marquis, and took his seat in the House of Lords. He was educated at Eton and at Christ Church, Oxford. In 1875 he married the eldest daughter of the Earl of Shrewsbury. Her portrait accompanies that of her husband on the first page.

STATE ENTRY OF THE LORD LIEUT. OF IRELAND INTO DUBLIN.

The Scene in Dublin Streets—Arrival of the Viceroy at Holyhead—The Reception at Kingstown—Congratulatory Address and Reply—The Procession from the Railway Station to the Castle.

THE Marquis of Londonderry made his public entry into Dublin on Saturday, September 18, to assume the office of Lord Lieutenant. The ceremonial was a military pageant more imposing than usual. The knowledge of his unpopularity and the probability of an outbreak being foreseen, a strong military force was provided which made a brilliant display. The Lord Lieutenant received from the citizens of the Protestant creed, the office holders and the English residents a hearty and cordial welcome, somewhat boisterous and fatiguing to them, as they had to shout for those of their fellow citizens who were in no mood for shouting, and also to overpower the groans and execrations freely uttered by the crowd. It was none the less cordial on this occasion because Lord Londonderry is an Irishman, the first who has for many years filled the office. The loyal side of the city of Dublin was seen to advantage in the magnificent weather. Flags and banners were suspended over banks, clubs, and commercial houses in the principal streets, and the Union Jack and Royal Standard occupied the place of honor. The buildings belonging to members of the patriotic party were, of course, bare of decoration.

Before he entered Dublin, a deputation from the Kingstown Town Commissioners arrived to present

AN ADDRESS OF CONGRATULATION to his Excellency, who stood on the deck to receive it. The address stated that they welcomed Lord Londonderry with the greatest pleasure because he was an Irishman. Many Viceroy's had come with the best intentions to study the requirements of the country, but before they were in a position to advocate a successful remedy for what appeared to be manifest grievances, they were either misled by interested advocates or removed by a change of Government. They trusted that the wants of Ireland would have his Excellency's personal study, that under his viceroyalty an impetus might be given to trade and commerce, that home industries would be fostered, Irish manufactures encouraged, and that all measures brought before Parliament for the benefit of the land might be such as to warrant the unanimous advocacy of their representatives.

THE LORD-LIEUTENANT REPLIED:

"I thank you for your loyal address and the kindly welcome you have accorded to me as the representative of our beloved Sovereign. I am very much gratified by the expression of your satisfaction that Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to confer the high office of Viceroy upon an Irishman, and I assure you that in undertaking its responsible duties I am animated by an earnest desire to promote by all means in my power the social and the national prosperity of our own native land. It will ever be my constant care to encourage and stimulate to the best of my ability the efforts of Irish enterprise in developing the latent resources of our sea and our soil, and I heartily trust that in endeavoring to secure this much-desired result I shall have the cordial co-operation and support of all classes of my countrymen." Immediately after the deputation retired, their Excellencies went on shore, amid hearty cheers and salutations from the assembly on the pier. The band played "God Save the Queen," and the battery at the East Pier thundered a Royal salute.

As the Viceregal procession passed by Trinity College and the Bank of Ireland, it was received with mingled demonstrations. Nationalists had taken up a position there, but the vast majority of the spectators were friendly, and the murmurs of hostility only stimulated their ardor. An interchange of hostile cries had taken place before the arrival of the Viceregal party, between the students and the Parnellites, the former cheering for "Castlereagh" and the latter for "Home Rule." But the encounter went no further than words, and was good-humoredly carried on. The cavalcade, brought into view in Dame Street, had a very impressive effect, the massive splendor of the Dragoon Guards and Staff being relieved by the gay and vivid pennants of the Lancers, who formed the escort, and the solid files of infantry closing in brilliantly in the rear. Their Excellencies at one o'clock, while the band played the National Anthem and the guard of honor presented arms, and, after luncheon, they drove out to the Viceregal Lodge, in Phoenix Park.

A Man with Ten Million Servants is Described in a despatch to the New York Times from Cobleskill, N. Y. A reporter of that journal states that while in Schoharie County he found that the farmers were receiving rent from a great bee-keeper for pasture for bees. He made inquiries, and learned that the bee-keeper had twenty-five hundred swarms, comprising in all fully ten million of these industrious brown-winged servants busily engaged in collecting honey for him. His California competitors have the advantage of him in the climate and endless variety of honey-yielding flowers, and, as he has not enough clover, buckwheat, etc. of his own to supply his bees, he pays a rent to every farmer in the vicinity for the privilege of his bees working on their premises. He won't have his bees running loose on his neighbors any more than he would have his cows, and so he hires pastures for them, and they go on and pile up so much honey for him that some years he gets no less than $25,000 for it. He has succeeded in getting it on the English market, and an agent there, not long ago, sent at one time orders for half a million pounds of it. There must be a sense of extensive dominion in this man, in having so many servants at work for him, though they are but bees. When the Christian is tempted to entertain fear for himself or Christ's cause, he might recover confidence did he reflect that God has at his disposal the services of not only ten million intelligences, but of every living creature in the universe (Ps. 119: 91).

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Blind Sheep Over the Precipice.—At a recent meeting Mr. Clark said: "Once when I was in New Jersey, in America, I saw a sheep go to the edge of a precipice and fall over. I soon learned the cause of it. It had been perfectly blind, and, straying from the flock, had wandered, not knowing whither it went, when it was suddenly dashed to pieces on the rocks below because it was blind, and could not see the danger. How many are there like this blind sheep?"

Run Over by an Express Train.—Mr. Maughan said: "A young friend of mine, with a companion, was crossing a railway line, when a train which they had not observed was but a few yards from them. They ran to escape from the danger, when an express train came rushing up in the opposite direction, killing my friend on the spot, his companion having escaped in safety to the other side. There he lay, a mangled, bleeding body, only twenty yards from his father's home; his young, happy life crushed out without a moment's warning. Oh, friends, how needful it is that we should be ready for death, come how or when it may. Happily, in his case, sudden death was sudden glory. 'All men think all men mortal but themselves.'"

An Exchange of Priests.—Mrs. Cole said at a recent evangelistic service for children: "Once when I was speaking at a children's meeting, and showing them Jesus as their keeper as well as their Saviour from sin, at the close of the service I asked the children to tell their mothers I should be glad to see them at the mothers' meeting on the following evening. Two little girls went home and said to their mothers, 'There was a lady speaking to us girls to-day, and she wants to speak to you to-morrow, and I do wish you would go.' Both these mothers went, and both were won for Christ; and one of them, who was a Roman Catholic, went away saying she had gone to the priest long enough, but that now she was going to the Great High Priest, the Lord Jesus Himself. So these two mothers were won to Christ by their little daughters simply carrying a message, and I am sure every little girl here could do that."

A Timid Husband and Wife.—"When I gave myself to Christ it was a long time before I had courage to confess Him to my wife. I could stand on a platform and tell others what the Lord had done for me, but still I was ashamed of Him at home. So, finally, one day I resolved to tell my wife. I went home, and took my supper in silence. I was very uncomfortable, and I could see my wife was the same. I turned from the table and lifted the book, thinking as I did so how I could break a subject on which we had never spoken before. Here my courage failed me; I could not do it. I rose and went to my study, and in a few minutes I returned, and just looking into the room, I said, 'I am going out; but shall not be late.' I closed the door, but immediately I opened it again, and said, 'By the way, I wanted to tell you that I have made up my mind to be a Christian.' It was all I could say; I closed the door. When I returned home a short time afterwards, I found my wife on her knees; and it turned out that she, too, for three months, had been longing to confess Christ to me, but had not the courage. This, I think, seems to be one of the most difficult things that a young Christian has to do, to confess Christ to his friends.

Christ Given Up for a Ball.—"I recall a sad incident regarding a young lady friend of mine who gave up Christ for a ball. A gentleman, to whom she was engaged, had yielded himself to the Lord, and after his own conversion he tried to lead this young girl to the Saviour's feet. But she was fond of the world and its pleasures, and would not yield; so the engagement between them was broken off. The balls of the season had just begun, and she could not give them up. But taking her diary she wrote therein, 'I will surrender my heart to God on the fifteenth day of May.' When that date arrived she was just as unwilling to become a Christian as ever. Again she took her diary and wrote: 'I will give up the world for Christ on the twenty-ninth of June.' There was to be a ball on the twenty-seventh of that month. 'Ah,' she thought, 'I must be present at this ball, for it is the last I shall ever attend. On the night of the ball she wrote a note asking the young man to whom she had been engaged, to call on her the next day, for she was going to give herself to the Lord. But that night in the ball room she caught cold from an open window, and all through that night the beautiful and much admired young girl was tossing on a bed of fever. She grew worse towards morning, and at half-past eleven she passed away in a most miserable and wretched state of mind. She had gone unprepared to meet her God. The blinds were lowered and a sad stillness reigned in the house. At twelve o'clock the young man rang the bell to obey her summons, little knowing she was no more. When he was informed by a sorrowing servant at the door, he turned away, knowing that the fair young girl whom he loved had been weighed in the balance and found wanting.'"

Religion with a Vengeance.—Mr. Downie said: "I know an old lady and her niece, who live in Stirling. The former went regularly to church for years, and it would have been thought a very strange occurrence indeed, had she been missing from her usual seat at either service. The prayer-meeting she never neglected, and every religious ordinance in connection with the church she attended, and allowed nothing to interfere with family worship. She warned her niece against theatres and all kinds of gaieties; and, altogether, she was looked upon as a very religious woman. One night her niece went to a gospel meeting, and she, having the same idea as her aunt, was much surprised to hear that a change of heart was needful. She listened to profit, and went home saved through the blood of Christ. She surprised her aunt by continually singing the hymns she had just heard. 'This is religion, with a vengeance,' thought the old lady; 'I never saw it in this fashion before.' Her peace of mind was disturbed, and she went to the meeting, in which her niece now took so much pleasure. She stayed to an after-meeting, when she was personally dealt with. 'And must all those thirty years of my religious life go for nothing?' she asked. 'All for nothing,' was the reply. 'Only in Jesus can salvation be found.' Her formal religion is all gone, it is a reality with her now, for she has found Jesus Christ."

"That Old Pawnbroker, the Devil."—A Christian worker remarks: "Three ladies were in a difficulty about the meaning of the word redemption. I said, 'I think I can explain that to you by a very common illustration.' I said, 'As I came up the street I saw a shop with three golden balls above it; it was a pawnbroker's shop. When I was a little fellow in Manchester I used to see many people go to such shops, especially on Monday mornings, when they would go in with bundles of clothes and come out without them, but with a little money in their pocket; and on Friday or Saturday night you may see these same people coming with part of their week's wages to get back their clothes. Now do you know what they call this money with which they buy back their clothes?' 'No,' said the lady. 'Well, they call it redemption money. If they do not before a certain time pay this money, then the pledged goods are sold, and lost to them forever.' But here the lady interrupted me by crying out, 'But you don't mean to say we are in pawn?' I answered, 'God says so; but He has paid the redemption money and we were redeemed, not with silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ. You and I, and every one on this earth, have sold ourselves to that great old pawnbroker the devil, but Christ in His wondrous love redeemed us by His precious blood. These three ladies got down on their knees and thanked God for their salvation through the precious blood of Jesus Christ.'"

THE REGENERATED CITIES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday Morning October 17, 1886.

"And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof." Zech. 8:5

A Glimpse of a Redeemed City—Cities as they now are—The Citizen Proud of his Native City—Why some men dislike some Cities—Disgusted by a Free Ride in the Black Maria—The Present and Future of New York—Perpetual Influence of the Founders of a City—Predictions of a Glorious Future—Coming Financial Prosperity—The Great Foe to Business—A New Party to be Formed—More Churches to be Built—Better Music—An Englishman's Utopian Scheme—The Gospel the True Regenerator—The Parted Sea.

GLIMPSE of our cities redeemed! Now, boys and girls who play in the streets run such risks that multitudes of them end in ruin. But, in the coming time spoken of, our cities will be so moral that lads and lassies shall be as safe in the public thoroughfare as in the nursery.

For purpose of rousing the people to the work to be done, I have preached some sermons about the

DARK SHADOWS OF THE CITY.

Pulpit and printing-press for the most part in our day are busy in discussing the condition of the cities at this time; but would it not be healthfully encouraging to all Christian workers, and to all who are toiling to make the world better, if we should this morning, for a little while, look forward to the time when our cities be revolutionized by the Gospel of the Son of God, and all the darkness of sin and trouble and crime and suffering shall be gone from the sky.

Every man has pride in the city of his nativity or residence, if it be a city distinguished for any dignity or prowess. Cæsar boasted of his native Rome, Virgil of Mantua, Lycurgus of Sparta, Demosthenes of Athens, Archimedes of Syracuse, and Paul of Tarsus. I should have suspicion of base-heartedness in a man who had no especial interest in the city of his birth or residence—no exhilaration at the evidence of its prosperity, or its artistic embellishments, or its scientific advancement.

I have noticed that a man never likes a city where he has not behaved well! Swartout did not like New York, nor did Parkman like Boston, and people who have a free ride in the prison van never like that city that furnishes the vehicle. When I find Argos, and Rhodes, and Smyrna trying to prove themselves the birthplace of Homer, I conclude right away that Homer behaved well. He liked them and they liked him. We must not war on or, with the idea of building ourselves up, at any time try to pull others down. Boston must continue to point to its Faneuil Hall and to its Common, and to its superior educational advantages. Philadelphia must continue to point to its Independence Hall, and its Mint, and its Girard College. If I should find a man coming from any city, having no pride in that city, that city having been the place of his nativity, or now being the place of his residence, I would feel like asking him right away: "What mean thing have you been doing there? What outrageous thing have you been guilty of that you do not like the place?"

is a goodly city. It is on both sides the river, the East River only the main artery of its great throbbing life. We, or our children, will live to see two or three bridges spanning that river, and more and more, as the years go by, we will be one; so when I say in my sermon New York, I mean well on two millions population, and everything from Spuyten Duyvil Creek to Gowanus. That which helps one city, will help the other; that which blasts one city, will blast the other. Sin is a giant, and when it comes to the Hudson or the East River, it steps across it as easily as you step across a figure in a carpet. God's angel of blessing has two wings, and one wing hovers over that city and the other wing hovers over this city.

In infancy our metropolis was put down by the banks of the Hudson. It was as feeble as Moses in the ark of bullrushes by the Nile, and like Miriam, there our fathers stood and watched it. The royal spirit of American commerce came down to bathe. She took it up in her arms and it waxed strong, and foreign ships brought silver and gold to its feet, and it has stretched itself up into a great metropolis, looking up to the mountains and off upon the sea, the mightiest energy in American civilization.

THE FOUNDERS' INFLUENCE.

Every city is influenced by the character of the men who founded it. Romulus impressed his life upon Rome. The Pilgrim Fathers will never relax their grasp from New England. William Penn left a legacy of fair dealing and integrity to Philadelphia, and you can now, any day, on the streets of that city, see his customs, his manners, his morals, his hat, his wife's bonnet, and his meeting-house. So the Hollanders, founding New York, left their impression on all the following generations.

What Southern thoroughfare was ever smitten by pestilence, and our physicians did not throw themselves on the sacrifice? What foreign nation was ever struck with famine, and our ships did not put out, laden with breadstuffs? What national struggle, and our citizens did not pour their blood into the trenches? What street of Damascus, or Beyrout, or Madras, has not resounded with the step of our missionaries? What gallery of art, and our painters have not hung in it their pictures? What department of science or literature, and our scholars have not made to it contributions?

I need not talk to you of our public schools, where the children of the cordwainer and the mechanic and the glassblower sit side by side with the favored sons of millionaires and merchant princes. Nor need I tell you of the asylums for the insane on these islands, where those who cut themselves among the tombs come forth clothed in their right mind. Nor need I tell you of the asylums for the blind, the deaf, and the dumb, and the orphans, the widows, the out-cast.

I thank God for the place of our residence, and, while there are a thousand things that ought to be corrected, and many wrongs that ought to be overthrown, while I thank God for the past, I look forward this morning to

A GLORIOUS FUTURE.

I think we ought—and I take it for granted you are all interested in this great work of evangelizing the cities and saving the world—we ought to toil with the sunlight in our faces. We are not fighting in a miserable Bull Run of defeat. We are on our way to final victory. We are not following the rider on the black horse, leading us down to death and darkness and doom, but the rider on the white horse, with the moon under his feet and the stars of heaven for his tiara. Hail, conqueror, hail!

I know there are sorrows, and there are sins, and there are sufferings all around about us; but as in some bitter, cold winter day, when we are threshing our arms around us to keep our thumbs from freezing, we think of the warm spring day that will after a while come; or in the dark winter night we look up and see the northern lights, the windows of heaven illuminated by some great victory—just so we look up from the night of suffering, and sorrow, and wretchedness in our cities, and we see a light streaming through from the other side, and we know we are on the way to morning—more than that, on the way to "a morning without clouds."

I want you to understand, all you who are toiling for Christ, that the castles of sin are all going to be captured. The victory for Christ in these great towns is going to be so complete that not a man on earth, or an angel in heaven, or a devil in hell will dispute it. How do I know? I know just as certainly as God lives and that this is holy truth. The old Bible is full of it. If the nation is to be saved, of course, all the cities are to be saved. It makes a great difference with you and with me whether we are toiling on toward a defeat, or toiling on toward a victory.

Now, in this municipal elevation of which I speak, I have to remark there will be

than our cities have ever seen. Some people seem to have a morbid idea of the millenium, and they think when the better time comes to our cities and the world, people will give their time up to psalm-singing and the relating of their religious experience, and, as all social life will be purified, there will be no hilarity, and, as all business will be purified, there will be no enterprise. There is no ground for such an absurd anticipation. In the time of which I speak, where now one fortune is made, there will be a hundred fortunes made. We all know business prosperity depends upon confidence between man and man. Now when that time comes of which I speak, and when all double dealing, all dishonesty, and all fraud are gone out of commercial circles, thorough confidence will be established, and there will be better business done, and larger fortunes gathered, and mightier successes achieved.

The great business disasters of this country have come from the work of godless speculators and infamous stock gamblers.

THE GREAT FOE TO BUSINESS

in New York and Brooklyn is crime. When the right shall have hurled back the wrong, and shall have purified the commercial code, and shall have thundered down fraudulent establishments, and shall have put into the hands of honest men the keys of business, blessed time for the bargain-makers. I am not talking an abstraction, I am not making a guess. I am telling you God's eternal truth.

In that day of which I speak taxes will be a mere nothing. Now, our business men are taxed for everything. City taxes, county taxes, State taxes, United States taxes, stamp taxes, license taxes, manufacturing taxes—taxes, taxes, taxes! Our business men have to make a small fortune every year to pay their taxes. What fastens on our great industries this awful load? Crime, individual and official. We have to pay the board of the villains who are incarcerated in our prisons. We have to take care of the orphans of those who plunged into their graves through beastly indulgence. We have to support the municipal governments, which are vast and expensive just in proportion as the criminal proclivities are vast and tremendous. Who supports the almshouses and police stations, and all the machinery of municipal government? The taxpayers.

And I tell you Republicans and you Democrats, that if you do not let down the taxes and let the people up, anti-excessive taxation, anti-rum, anti-monopoly, anti-abomination, and you who have been fattening on the public spoils, and reckless of the public virtue, shall not have so much as the wages of a street-sweeper.

WE WILL FORM A NEW PARTY,

But in the glorious time of which I speak, grievous taxation will all have ceased. There will be no need of supporting criminals; there will be no criminals. Virtue will have taken the place of vice. There will be no orphan asylums, for parents will be able to leave a competency to their children. There will be no voting of large sums of moneys for some municipal improvement, which moneys, before they get to the improvement, drop into the pockets of those who voted them. No Oyer and Terminer kept up at vast expense to the people. No empanelling of juries to try theft and arson and murder and slander and blackmail. Better factories. Grand architecture. Fine equipage. Larger fortunes. Richer opulence. Better churches.

In that better time, also, coming to those cities, Christ's

CHURCHES WILL BE MORE NUMEROUS,

and they will be larger, and they will be more devoted to the churches of Jesus Christ, and they will accomplish greater influences for good. Now, it is often the case that churches are envious of each other, and denominations collide with each other, and even ministers of Christ sometimes forget the bond of brotherhood. But in the time of which I speak, while there will be just as many differences of opinion as there are now, there will be no ascerbity, no hypercriticism, no exclusiveness.

In our great cities the churches are not to-day large enough to hold more than a fourth of the population. The churches that are built—comparatively few of them are fully occupied. The average attendance in the churches of the United States to-day, is not four hundred. Now, in the glorious time of which I speak, there are going to be vast churches, and they are going to be all thronged with worshippers. O what rousing songs they will sing! O, what earnest sermons they will preach! O, what fervent prayers they will offer! Now, in our time, what is called a fashionable church is a place where a few people, having attended very carefully to their toilet, come and sit down—they do not want to be crowded, they like a whole seat to themselves—and then, if they have any time left from thinking of their store, and from examining the style of the hat in front of them, they sit and listen to a sermon warranted to hit no man's sins, and listen to music which is rendered by a choir warranted to sing tunes that nobody knows! And then after an hour and a half of indolent yawning they go home refreshed. Every man feels better after he has had a sleep!

In many of the churches of Christ in our day, the music is simply a mockery. I have not a cultivated ear, nor a cultivated voice, yet no man can do my singing for me. I have nothing to say against

ARTISTIC MUSIC.

The two or five dollars I pay to hear any of the great queens of song, is a good investment. But when the people assemble in religious convocation, and the hymn is read, and the angels of God step from their throne to catch the music on their wings, do not let us drive them away by our indifference. I have preached in churches where vast sums of money were employed to keep up the music, and it was as exquisite as any heard on earth, but I thought at the same time, for all matters practical, I would prefer the hearty, outbreathing song of a backwoods Methodist camp-meeting.

Let one of these starveling fancy songs sung in church get up before the throne of God, how would it look standing amid the great doxologies of the redeemed? Let the finest operatic air that ever went up from the Church of Christ get many hours the start, it will be caught and passed by the hosanna of the Sabbath-school children. I know a church where the choir did all the singing, save one Christian man, who, through perseverance of the saints, went right on, and, afterward, a committee was appointed to wait on him and ask him if he would not please stop singing, as he bothered the choir.

"Let those refuse to sing,
Who never knew our God;
But children of the Heavenly King
Should speak their joys abroad."

"Praise ye the Lord: let everything with breath praise the Lord." In the glorious time coming in our cities, and in the world, hosanna will meet hosanna, and hallelujah, hallelujah.

In that time, also, of which I speak, all and crime, and squalor, will be cleansed and will be illuminated. How is it to be done? You say, perhaps, by one influence. Perhaps I say by another. I will tell you what is my idea, and I know I am right in it: The Gospel of the Son of God is the only agency that will ever accomplish this.

Mr. Ecsler, of England, had a theory that if the natural forces of wind and tide and sunshine and wave were rightly applied, and rightly developed, it would make this whole earth a paradise. In a book of great genius, and which rushed from edition to edition, he said: "Fellow men—I promise to show the means of creating a paradise within ten years, where everything desirable for human life may be had by every man in superabundance without labor and without pay—where the whole face of nature shall be changed into the most beautiful farms, and man may live in the most magnificent palaces, in all imaginable refinements of luxury, and in the most delightful gardens—where he may accomplish without labor in one year more than hitherto could be done in thousands of years.

UTOPIA.

"From the houses to be built will be afforded the most cultured views to be fancied. From the galleries, from the roof, and from the turrets, may be seen gardens as far as the eye can see, full of fruits and flowers, arranged in the most beautiful order, with walks, colonnades, aqueducts, canals, ponds, plains, amphitheatres, terraces, fountains, sculptured works, pavilions, gondolas, places of popular amusement to tire the eye and fancy. All this to be done by urging the water, the wind, and the sunshine to their full development."

He goes on and gives plates of the machinery by which this work is to be done, and he says he only needs at the start a company in which the shares shall be twenty dollars each, and a hundred or two hundred thousand shall be raised just to make a specimen community, and then, this being formed, the world will see its practicability, and very soon two or three million dollars can be obtained, and in ten years the whole earth will be emparadised. The plan is not so preposterous as some I have heard of. But I will take no stock in that company! I do not believe that it will ever be done in that way, by any mechanical force, or by any machinery that the human mind can put into play. It is of the Son of God—the omnipotent machinery of love and grace and pardon and salvation. That is to emparadise the nations. Archimedes destroyed a fleet of ships coming up the harbor. You know how he did it? He lifted a great sun-glass, history tells us, and when the fleet of ships came up the harbor of Syracuse, he brought to bear this sun-glass, and he focussed the sun's rays upon those ships. Now the sails are wings of fire, the masts fall, the vessels sink. O! my friends, by the sun-glass of the Gospel converging the rays of the Sun of Righteousness upon the sins, the wickedness of the world, we will make them blaze and expire.

In that day of which I speak, do you believe there will be any midnight carousal? Will there be any kicking off from the marble steps of shivering mendicants? Will there be any unwashed, unfed, uncombed children? Will there be any blasphemies in the streets? Will there be any inebriates staggering past? No. No wine stores. No lager beer saloons. No distilleries, where they make the three X's. No bloodshot eye. No bloated cheek. No instruments of ruin and destruction. No fist-pounded forehead. The grandchildren of that woman who goes down the street with a curse, stoned by the boys that follow her, will be the reformers and philanthropists and the Christian men and the honest merchants of New York and Brooklyn.

REFORMED MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT.

Then, what municipal governments, too, we will have in all the cities! Some cities are worse than others, but in many of our cities you just walk down by the city halls and look in at some of the rooms occupied by politicians, and see to what a sensual, loathsome, ignorant, besotted crew city politics is often abandoned. Or they stand around the City Hall picking their teeth, waiting for some emoluments of crumbs to fall to their feet, waiting all day long, and waiting all night long.

Who are those wretched women taken up for drunkenness, and carried up to the courts, and put in prison, of course? What will you do with the grogshops that made them drink? Nothing. Who are those prisoners in jail? One of them stole a pair of shoes. That boy stole a dollar. This girl snatched a purse. All of them crimes damaging society less than twenty or thirty dollars. But what will you do with the gambler who last night robbed the young man of a thousand dollars? Nothing. What shall be done with that one who breaks through and destroys the purity of a Christian home, and with an adroitness and perfidy that beats the strategy of hell, flings a shrinking, shrieking soul into a bottomless perdition? Nothing. What will you do with those who fleeced that young man, getting him to purloin large sums of money from his employer—the young man who came to an officer of my church and told the story and frantically asked what he might do? Nothing.

Ah! we do well to punish small crimes, but I have sometimes thought it would be better in some of our cities if the officials would only turn out from the jails the petty criminals, the little offenders, ten-dollar desperadoes, and put in their places some of the monsters of iniquity who drive their roan span through the streets so swiftly that honest men have to leap to get out of the way of being run over. Oh, the damnable schemes that professed Christian men will sometimes engage in until God puts the finger of His retribution into the collar of their robe of hypocrisy and rips it clear to the bottom! But all these

WRONGS WILL BE RIGHTED.

I expect to live to see the day. I think I hear in the distance the rumbling of the King's chariot. Not always in the minority is the church of God going to be, or are good men going to be. The streets are going to be filled with regenerated populations. Three hundred and sixty bells rang in Moscow when one prince was married; but, when righteousness and peace kiss each other in all the earth, ten thousand times ten thousand bells shall strike the jubilee. Poverty enriched. Hunger fed. Crime purified. Ignorance enlightened. All the cities saved. Is not this a cause worth working in?

Oh, you think sometimes it does not amount to much! You toil on in your different spheres, sometimes with great discouragement. People have no faith, and say: "It does not amount to anything; you might as well quit that." Why, when Moses stretched his hand over the Red Sea it did not seem to mean anything especially. People came out, I suppose, and said: "Aha!" Some of them found out what he wanted to do. He wanted

THE SEA PARTED.

It did not amount to anything, this stretching out of his hand over the sea. But, after awhile, the wind blew all night from the east, and the waters were gathered into a glittering palisade on either side, and the billows reared as God pulled back on their crystal bits! Wheel into line; O, Israel! march! march! Pearls crashed under feet. Flying spray gathers into rainbow arch of victory for the conquerors to march under. Shout of hosts on the beach answering the shout of hosts amid sea. And when the last line of the Israelites reach the beach, the cymbals clap, and the shields clang, and the waters rush over the pursuers, and the swift-fingered winds on the white keys of the foam play the grand march of Israel delivered, and the awful dirge of Egyptian overthrow.

So you and I go forth, and all the people of God go forth, and they stretch forth their hand over the sea, the boiling sea of crime, and sin, and wretchedness. "It don't amount to anything," people say. Don't it? God's winds of help will, after awhile, begin to blow. A path will be cleared for the army of Christian philanthropists. The path will be lined with the treasures of Christian beneficence, and we will be greeted to the other beach by the clapping of all heaven's cymbals, while those who pursued us, and derided us, and tried to destroy us, will go down under the sea, and all that will be left of them will be cast high and dry upon the beach, the splintered wheel of a chariot, or thrust out from the foam, the breathless nostril of a riderless charger.

THE SALVATION ARMY'S MUTILATED BIBLE.

AN English vicar writes to the London Record: "More than a year ago attention was drawn in a religious contemporary to a book issued at the headquarters of the Salvation Army. It is entitled the "Salvation Soldier's Guide," but is more truly described as a "Mutilated Bible." Thousands of copies (it costs only 6d.) must have circulated, chiefly, no doubt, among members of the Salvation Army and their friends. It seems, therefore, a painful necessity to lay before your readers a few of the omissions in such important Scriptures as the Epistle to the Romans, the Pastoral Epistles and the General Epistles of St. John. I feel that the integrity of God's Holy Word, and the edification of all believers, is more important than the credit of any sect.

I affirm that the omissions are neither few, insignificant, nor unsystematic; and I ask all who take the trouble to verify them, what sort of Christianity we may expect from those who make this defective Bible their text-book? Let none think this an impossible contingency, in spite of the wary general order, 'This book is not intended as a substitute for the Bible.' The other day, when a very genial and large-hearted clergyman said to a young man in his parish, who had adopted the Salvation Army views on sin, 'Suppose, dear young friend, we consult the Bible together,' he received the vehement reply, 'I don't read your Bible, Sir; I prefer General Booth's.'"

The following are some of the passages omitted in the "Salvation Soldier's Guide:"

A CHINESE RUTH.

In an encouraging letter from Hong Kong published in the Missionary Herald, Mr. Hager writes:

"Let me relate an incident of the recent persecution of one of our members. He bore much for Christ before baptism, and since then it has been a period of trial and suffering persecution for the Master's sake. Some time since he married, and his wife almost immediately took the part of her husband and was willing to believe him as to the great value of the Christian religion. When he was shut up by his mother and not allowed to go out of the house, she was the companion of his suffering and sorrow and sympathized with him, and her reply to him had a little of the spirit, if not the words, of Ruth to Naomi. 'You know,' she said, 'which is the true God; and, if you are unwilling to serve the idols, I will also worship them no longer. If you are persecuted, I will bear the persecution with you. It may be that after a while we shall be cut off from our kindred and relatives and be turned into the street houseless and homeless; that will be hard to bear, and perhaps we shall have no rice to eat and must die of starvation; but you know about these things better than I, and I am willing to believe as you do. If you say that your God will protect us, why, then, we will serve Him.' It is true that not all the Chinese women are so minded, but I believe that, if their husbands are Christians, and exert the right influence over them during the first stages of their married life, they will usually turn to Christ. Very often, however, the relatives oppose them so much that they do not declare themselves so outspokenly for the truth."

THE WHITE CROSS ARMY.

THE eloquent benediction on the White Cross movement, uttered by Dr. Talmage in his sermon published in this journal of Sept. 30, has caused many persons who know nothing of the Army to seek information about it. The object of the White Cross Society is to enlist young men in an effort to stem the tide of vice which threatens to engulf the great cities of our land. The Army now numbers over one thousand members, and has branches at Philadelphia, Baltimore, Kansas City, Utica, Rome, Auburn, Watertown, Cornell University, and Hamilton College, and from those places have been received testimonies from many young men who had received physical, moral or spiritual benefit through their connection with the White Cross work. Every member is required to agree to the following pledge:

"I promise by the help of God:—

"1. To treat all women with respect, and endeavor to protect them from wrong and degradation.

"2. To endeavor to put down all indecent language and coarse jests.

"3. To maintain the law of purity as equally binding upon men and women.

"4. To use every possible means to fulfill the command, 'Keep THYSELF pure.'

"5. To endeavor to spread these principles among my companions, and to try and help my younger brothers."

Persons interested in the movement, and young men willing to join, can obtain full particulars by letter or personal application at the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, corner 23d Street and Fourth Avenue, New York.

MISSIONARIES ON THE BATTLE-FIELD.

FROM the Livingstonia Mission, in Africa, founded by the Free Church of Scotland, in memory of Dr. Livingstone, comes the following narrative of peril and bloodshed in which the missionaries behaved as followers of the Prince of Peace. They ministered to both sides, and, after three days of slaughter, peace was secured through their exertions. Dr. Kerr Cross states that the war arose out of an old quarrel of seventeen years' standing, and culminated in a terrific battle of three days' duration. One of the chiefs was seriously wounded in the arm, and sent to the missionaries for aid. Dr. Kerr Cross gives an account of the coming of thirty-two armed men asking help:

"After carefully considering the matter, we both agreed to go and see the wounded chief. It was to some extent a risk, as the way led right through the battlefield. We went, however, believing it to be a call from God. The bush on every hand seemed to us crowded with men. Every tree and shrub hid a black armed warrior. We found the chief lying in a grass hut, surrounded by his men, who supported the disabled limb. After examining the arm, we explained the serious nature of the case, and showed that there might be life or there might be death in the case; and that, should the case go to the worst, they must never blame us. We further assured him that if he intrusted himself to our care, we would do our best. The circumstances, their belief in witchcraft, and a dozen other things, occasioned this precaution on our part. This settled, we dressed the limb and bound it up with splints. The bullet had struck the left arm, just above the elbow, and shattering the bone, had directed its course toward the elbow. Before we left we offered him the mid-room of the cottage, now empty, where he might reside with a few of his men, and so be constantly under our care.

"On the way back a messenger called us to the opposite camp, and of course we had to go. All the wounded were brought forward that we might give directions as to what each should do. What a sight they presented! arms and legs broken, great ugly gashes, and assegai wounds. It was the most ghastly sight I ever saw. We were then surrounded by three or four hundred armed men, and had a conference with them for upward of an hour. At last we got them to agree to peace, and immediately sent a messenger to the opposite camp. I am glad to say that in God's good providence we were the means of staying the bloody affair. The wounded chief came to the station in the evening, and has ever since been under our care. His case has caused us great anxiety, but, after a fortnight, we are beginning to be hopeful. In saving his life we might almost say we have saved the lives of upward of one hundred people. A chief never dies alone: for with him in the grave are put six or eight wives, some dead and some alive, and upward of one hundred of his men, etc. Otherwise, according to the native mind, what would he do in the spirit world?"

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD IN A CRIMINAL'S CELL.

A PRAYER for a murderer was the subject of a paragraph which appeared in this journal on May 20 (page 310). It contained a private letter, which we were permitted to copy, that had been sent to Mr. George Coe, of Englewood, N. J., to a friend in New York. In the letter, Mr. Coe, who was then lying in hospital with his life despaired of, begged his friend to ask for prayers at the Fulton Street prayer-meeting, that the Spirit might be poured on the man who had tried to murder him, and that he might be brought to see the error of his ways and obtain salvation through Christ.

In some way the would-be murderer saw the copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD containing the letter, and on September 28, when he was brought up for trial, he produced the paper and questioned Mr. Coe about it. A local journal says: The prisoner rose, and looking at the judge, said:

"I haf someding here dot I would like to show de jury."

"Well, that will come later on," replied Judge Skinner, in a voice that admitted of no parleying.

"All rhied, your Honor," responded the burglar suavely, in broken English, "youst as you say."

Then followed one of the most extraordinary scenes ever enacted in a court of justice. The victim of a would-be murder sat in a witness chair to be cross-examined by his assailant, a burglar. Both looked at each other for a full minute. Finally the burglar broke the silence by handing Mr. Coe a cutting from the CHRISTIAN HERALD, of New York.

"Mr. Coe," said he, in a pleasant voice, "please read dis paper and tell me if you told dot man to wride vat ish dere?"

Young Coe took it and read aloud a copy of a letter dictated by him to a friend whom he frequently met at the Fulton Street prayer-meetings in New York. It asked for his prayers for both himself and the burglar. It prayed forgiveness for the hardened, erring man.

"Yes, I wrote it," responded Coe, after finishing the clipping, "at the time I was in bed and thought I would die."

The burglar's eyes glistened; his voice became low and melodious.

"Was dot your feeling at dot time?" he inquired, almost tremulously.

"It was," responded Coe.

The court-room was still as death. The victim's statement of his forgiveness of his enemy, when face to face with him, drew tears from many eyes. The burglar stood like a statue, and appeared to be moved. Everybody eyed him expectantly, evidently thinking his emotions would convert him on the spot. Not so. Hugg shrugged his shoulders, waved his hand at the jury, and said, triumphantly:

"Shendlemens, I only wanted to show de jury dot a man sick abed and a man excided and fighting for life was two different things."

In spite of his obduracy, however, the man must have been touched by his victim's magnanimity, and we can but hope that the prayers offered for his conversion will yet be answered.

THE CONVENTION ON HOLINESS AND DIVINE HEALING.

THE third annual convention in connection with the work under the care of the Rev. A. B. Simpson, New York, was held in the Gospel Tabernacle, corner of Madison Avenue and 45th Street, beginning on Monday evening, October 4th, and closing Monday evening, October 11th.

The convention had for its object the promotion of Christian Life, Work, and Hope, and Divine Healing. The meetings were well attended, and the presence of the Holy Spirit was felt in great power, stilling the hearts of the people, and breathing upon them His divine life and energy. Many burdened hearts were brought out into the liberty of the gospel, and there were few who came into the meetings that did not receive conviction or help there from contact with the Lord.

A preparatory meeting was held on Monday afternoon in Berachah Home, and all hearts were bowed under a sense of God's love and blessing, and the outlook of faith upon the meetings to follow was clear and refreshing. The dear Lord did not disappoint His trusting children, and the banquet they sat down to during the succeeding days was satisfying to every hungry heart.

The meeting opened on Monday evening in the large Tabernacle at 45th Street and Madison Avenue. Members of the church had decorated the platform with evergreens and flowers; but far more beautiful was the atmosphere of love that pervaded the gathering.

The general theme given for the meeting was "The seven spirits which are before His Throne," or, the fulness of the Holy Ghost. Each day was devoted to a consideration of a special manifestation of that seven-fold spirit. On Tuesday the theme was: "The Holy Spirit revealing Christ as All in All." On Wednesday: "The Holy Ghost as the Spirit of Holiness." On Thursday: "The Holy Ghost as the Spirit of Life and Healing." On Friday: "The Holy Ghost as the Spirit of Prayer and Faith." On Saturday: "The Holy Ghost as the Spirit of Prophecy." The Sabbath was given up to: "The Holy Ghost as the Spirit of Praise and Fellowship." On Monday the convention closed; the theme that day was: "The Holy Ghost as the Spirit of Service," with special reference to the claims of Home and Foreign Missions. This order was not rigidly followed out, but a few changes were introduced as the Holy Spirit seemed to direct.

The meetings were presided over by Rev. A. B. Simpson, the pastor of the church. Among the friends who were seated on the platform with him were, Rev. Jno. E. Cookman, of New York; Rev. Mr. McBride, of Brooklyn; Rev. Dr. Wilson, of New York; Rev. A. Pierson, of Philadelphia; Rev. Mr. Luce, of Old Orchard, Maine; Rev. Mr. Salmon, of Toronto; Rev. Mr. Walker, of Vermont; Rev. Mr. Blynn, of New Hampshire; Rev. Mr. Rider; Rev. A. Funk, assistant pastor of the church; and many other pastors and evangelists. The music was under the care of Rev. Walter Gardiner, one of the assistant pastors, and was full of sweetness and life.

The addresses and exhortations given were stirring. The meeting closed with a precious testimony meeting on Monday evening, and the feeling in all hearts as they went away, was, "The Lord hath visited and redeemed His people."

ANTICHRIST'S ECCLESIASTICAL POLICY.

By Rev. W. Haslam.

Religion Necessary to Antichrist's Influence—His Offer of Patronage—Will be Gratefully Accepted—Treading in Napoleon's Steps—Carrying the Church—Assumes Responsibility—Encourages Persecution—Constantine's Example—The Miseries of the Faithful.

WHEN Antichrist is established in greatness and power, and poses as the joy and idol of nations, the magnificent benefactor of the whole human race, he will direct his thoughts to another stage or platform of influence. He will propose to give a positive form of religion to the world. Hitherto it has had no place in his political and governmental economy. Now, to add an imposing magnificence to his dignity, he will take to

PATRONIZING RELIGION.

Like Constantine the Great, he will become a nursing father to the Church. The poor deluded Church will think once more, as she did then, that her millennium is come. Willingly and thankfully she will avail herself of the offer of this arm of flesh for her advancement. He will as willingly avail himself of her prestige to make his reign profoundly effective in the minds of the people.

We know that ecclesiastical pomp and religious ceremonials have a great effect upon the human heart, and even upon hardened and worldly men. No doubt, as in the case of Charlemagne and the Napoleons, there will be a grand pageant of a coronation. Whether this potentate will place the greatest of Imperial crowns upon his own head, or utilize the Pope for his purpose, remains to be seen; but we can well imagine what it will be. What Te Deums will be sung, and grand masses celebrated by the Churches! What universal rejoicings will fill the world upon this occasion!

Antichrist will desire to have it known that he recommends and uphold the Church, and that he himself is steeped in religiousness. He is represented in the vision as draped in scarlet colour! "I saw," says the Apostle John, "a woman sitting upon a scarlet-coloured beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls; having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication: and upon her forehead was a name written, Mystery, Babylon the Great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth" (Rev. 17: 3-5).

This vision tells in a few words the story of Antichrist's pretensions, and the arrogant and proud position of the Church under his patronage. He actually on himself, as if he had placed himself and his power at her feet. He carries her as if all her burden and responsibility were his; and she vaunts herself as being Babylon the Great, "that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth" (Rev. 17: 18). Antichrist's countenance and support will advance her influence throughout the whole world; so much so, as to absorb into herself and her corrupt Christianity other religions. In this way the Romish Church under royal patronage has been paramount before, over kings and peoples. But this time she will prevail with such perfection of authority and success, that her influence will be felt in a way it has never been before.

If "catholic" means universal in the sense of assent and consent to the Church, irrespective of Scripture and in spite of Scripture, then she will be the "Catholic Church" with a vengeance! She will give no quarter to heretics, and will be more "drunk" than ever "with the blood of saints and martyrs." All and any who arise to oppose her will feel the weight of that arm mightily strengthened by the patronage of the king. This is the harlot which is said to sit on many waters. The waters are the peoples, multitudes, nations and tongues. (See Rev. 17: 15.) This by itself implies the vast influence the Church will have throughout the world. Besides this, she, as the Great City that rules over the kings of the earth is

ARRAYED IN IMPERIAL PURPLE.

Arrayed in purple and scarlet, decked with the treasures of the earth, gold, precious stones, and pearls, she holds in her hands the golden cup with which she intoxicates her votaries. Such is the enchanting sorcery with which she bewitches multitudes who submit to her. This was her work in time past when she was in absolute power; and it will be again in time to come. Her arrogance, her pride and boasting, will surpass anything she has ever shown before. She will brook no dissent from, and no opposition to, her infallible decrees! Her splendour and dazzling pomp will be wondered at with great admiration.

On all sides, even now, we see how Romanism is increasing, if not in outward temporal power, yet inwardly in influence. We are told that the Gospel of God needs all these extrinsic and meretricious adjuncts in order to draw people to hear it! Any one may observe, if he will, how the public mind is being influenced; and any one may discern why it is. As the secular mind is being drawn into insubordination and democracy, so the religious mind is being led to sacerdotalism and to sensuous ceremonial. Obviously all this is in preparation for the times that are coming, and which, it may be, are close at hand. So much for the woman!

Now as to the Beast which carried her. We read that this Beast had "seven heads and ten horns" (Rev. 17: 3), which identifies it as the representative of the fourth or Roman monarchy, which is denoted by these same marks. (See Dan. 7; Rev. 13: 1.) The seven heads refer to which were possessed by the Gentile monarchs. One for Babylon, one for Persia, four for Greece, and one for Rome. This also shows how the gold, the silver, the brass, and the iron, as also the clay and iron, are all united in this Beast, the Antichrist. The ten horns indicate the powers of the ten kings, which are given to this one.

In addition to these marks there is another feature added here. It is said, "The Beast that thou sawest was, and is not; and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and go into perdition; and they that dwell on the earth shall wonder (whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world), when they behold the Beast that was, and is not, and yet is" (Rev. 17: 8). This evidently refers to the Roman dominion or monarchy, which was, as in the days of Constantine, in connection with the Church; it "was not," or ceased; and it is to be universal under a similar combination, with greater power of Church and monarch than before.

This Antichrist will exercise his power not only in the world at large, but through ecclesiastical agencies in the hearts and consciences of the people. His sway will be universal, and his power dreaded by many who are under it; but how much more so by those who protest against it! Such as these, that is, persons who have been converted to God under the preaching of the Gospel of the Kingdom, no doubt will have a hard time of it. Like the early Christians in the time of the early Roman Emperors they will worship by stealth in catacombs and caves of the earth. But in vain will the combined powers of State and Church strive to extirpate them or silence their testimony for Jesus their King.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Proclamation Issued by the President on October 13 revokes the privileges enjoyed by traders from Cuba and Porto Rico. The step is a painful one, and was taken with evident reluctance. Efforts were made through our Minister at Madrid to induce the Spanish government to enforce observance of the treaty as our government understood it. The Spanish Foreign Office accepted the interpretation put upon the disputed clauses by Mr. Bayard, and in June last issued a royal decree confirmatory of it. But the customs officers at Cuba and Porto Rico continued to exact the old schedule of duties on foreign goods carried in American ships. Another protest was made by Minister Curry, and then it was learned that the Spanish government had recalled its former decree, and adopted the colonial view of the matter. Our merchants found it impossible to do business on this one-sided arrangement, and the result has been the issue of the President's proclamation of retaliatory measures. The proclamation does not formally cancel the treaty, and whenever Spain concedes the advantages demanded by our Government it will be easy to revert to the arrangement contemplated by the treaty.

The Return of the Secretary of the Treasury to Washington took place on Oct. 12. The Washington press correspondents speak hopefully of his health. They say that as he walked from the train to his carriage, with Mrs. Manning leaning on his arm, as erect and straight as ever, and without any visible indications of the long illness from which he has so recently recovered, it was remarked by many of those who saw him for the first time since he was stricken down that he looked as little like a man whose life was despaired of only a few weeks ago as it was possible to conceive. He appeared less fatigued from the journey than did either of his colleagues in the Cabinet who accompanied him. He looked bright, seemed to be in good spirits, conversed cheerfully with his companions, and pleasantly greeted those who assembled to meet him.

The Failure of the House to Deal with the Indian question at the last session of Congress was the subject of severe animadversion at the Indian Conference, which met at Lake Mohonk, N. Y., on Oct. 13. Gen. Clinton B. Fisk, President of the Board of Indian Commissioners, occupied the chair. He said that the bills recommended by the Conference of last year had all passed the Senate. In the House, however, little or nothing was done, the cause of the Indian, after having been assigned a day, being sacrificed to the interests of oleomargarine. Mr. Herbert Welsh, secretary of the Indian Rights Association, declared that there could now be no further question whether the Indian could be civilized. What was needed now was good legislation and good administration. He believed that the Dawes bill passed by the Senate and still pending in the House, would furnish all the legislation needed for the present. The next thing needed was a business-like, non-partisan administration of the Indian Bureau. He thought it almost impossible to secure this until the civil service rules were extended to take in the Indian Department, including Inspectors, Agents, chief clerks, and farmers.

An Appalling Disaster, Costing over Two hundred lives, has fallen on the villages around the Gulf. On Tuesday, Oct. 12, a violent hurricane struck Johnson's Bayou, La., carrying the waters through the village, overturning houses and killing eighty-five persons out of twelve hundred. The same storm did worse damage at Sabine Pass, at the mouth of the Sabine River, about sixty miles from Galveston, Tex. The waters of the Gulf inundated the town with unprecedented rapidity. The people had no time to escape. They took to the attics of their houses, and from there were driven to the roofs. In less than two hours from the influx of water the smaller houses began to succumb. Some were swept away bodily; others were thrown on their sides, and several were turned completely upside down. Soon the larger houses gave way, until it seemed that the whole town would be wiped out of existence. All night long the storm raged, and the morning broke on a scene of desolation rarely witnessed. One hundred and twenty-seven persons and six thousand head of cattle perished, and nearly every one in the desolated village is financially ruined. Help was promptly sent from Orange and Beaumont to the wounded and destitute survivors, but little could be done to afford relief save distributing food and clothing. Shelter is needed for the homeless, and some well-organized system has, doubtless, by this time, been organized to succor the poor sufferers.

Unusual Interest is Excited by the Struggle for the Mayoralty of New York City, now fully opened. It is a triangular contest, the various sections of the Democracy having combined to nominate Abram S. Hewitt, at present representing the Tenth District in Congress; the Republicans have nominated Theodore Roosevelt, who has done signal service for the city at Albany; and the workingmen of all political sections have nominated Henry George, the well-known author of "Progress and Poverty," and other works on social questions. It is certain that, if all the workingmen vote for Mr. George, he will be elected; but, as many of them have affiliations with one or other of the old parties, which they will naturally be reluctant to sever, Mr. George's election is by no means assured. Besides this, many workingmen, while endorsing Mr. George's theories on the nationalization of land and the relations of capital and labor, will fail to see in what way his election to the Mayoralty can afford him opportunities to put his theories in practice. The excellence of the other two candidates is also a factor in the questions. Altogether, the prospect for New York in the election is a hopeful one. Whoever may be elected, the city will feel confident that there will be no stealing that the Mayor can prevent, and though, if Mr. George is elected, many will regret that a man of his principles should attain prominence, they may console themselves by reflecting that, as Mayor of New York, he can do nothing to advance Socialism, while he must inevitably lose much of his popularity.

The Acceptance of Lord Randolph Churchill's programme by the British conservatives appears to be assured. It was predicted that the older members of the party would repudiate the plan proposed by their young and somewhat erratic leader. The London correspondent of the New York Sun cables, however, that Mr. Chaplin, the spokesman of the "high and dry old Tories," has publicly announced his adoption of Lord Randolph's programme with one trivial exception, inserted doubtless to prove the independence of the party. The proposals accepted include the scheme of freehold allotments for laborers, the transfer of tithes from farmers to landlords, the sale of the glebe lands, the reform of the method of land transfers, the equalization of railway rates, the extension of local government, including the power to deal locally with liquor licenses, and the further reform of the Irish land laws. That such measures would ever form part of the programme of a Conservative administration, no one would have believed fifty years ago. Radicals scarcely dared to advocate them then, lest they should be denounced as revolutionary.

The Bulgarian Difficulty Attained an Acute stage last week. The elections to the Sobranje, or Constitutional Assembly, have gone wholly against Russian influence. There are five hundred and twenty-one members, and of these only forty-one are opposed to the present government. Russian newspapers speak of the result as a gross affront to the Czar, and urge him to speak the decisive word commanding an occupation of Bulgaria. Meanwhile, the financial barometer of the Exchanges persistently foretells storms. Russian securities, which are largely held in Germany, suffered a further severe decline on the Berlin Bourse, as if the capitalists regarded war as inevitable. The rumors in circulation, also, are of a bellicose tone. One which originates in Vienna, has it that France and Russia, acting in concert, have endeavored, though without success, to effect an alliance with Turkey. The bribe offered to the Sultan was the restoration of his lost provinces—Bosnia and Herzegovina—and an arrangement by which Russia was to occupy Bulgaria, Egypt to be occupied by a mixed French and Turkish garrison, under the supreme command of a French general, and Greece to be given back her lost territory. The proposals also referred to a Russian campaign against India. France strongly supported Russia, and offered financial assistance to Turkey. The general indications are that the war is at hand which students of prophecy believe will precede the closing years of this dispensation.

The Ravages of Cholera in Corea are Stated to be unparalleled in modern times. A despatch received at San Francisco last week says: "No idea can be formed of the extent of the scourge. It has decimated the capital, where, out of a population of 200,000, the death rate rules at the frightful rate of 1,000 per day. About as many Coreans as there are people in the State of California have been swept away already, and it is hard to say where the plague will stop. Corea is described as an 'appalling pest spot.' Never was there a more frightful record of the ravages of disease on mankind. The story of the plague of London is beggared by what is now going on in Seoul.

Earnest Christian Men and Women, who can raise hymn tunes and give short gospel exhortations, are wanted to be permanently stationed as evangelists at mission stations of the Gospel Union; salary ranging from five to ten dollars a week. Address Rev. M. Baxter, President Gospel Union, 63 Bible House, New York.

A Witness of the Murder of the Rev. George C. Haddock was arrested in Chicago, on Thursday Oct. 7. He admits that he was with the party that gathered to punish Mr. Haddock, and claims that he knows the actual murderer. He made a sworn statement before a notary, in which he said that there were nine men beside himself in the party, two of them being Dutchmen, who had previously been hired to commit another outrage. It was decided in consultation to give Mr. Haddock a beating, not of a severe character, but the men were to be careful that he had a black eye. When they met Mr. Haddock, John Aernsdorf, the foreman of the Franz Brewing Co., who was one of the party, went on in advance and threw up his hand in Mr. Haddock's face. Mr. Haddock struck at him, and then Aernsdorf shot him. H. L. Leavitt, the witness in question, swears that he saw him do it, and wishes to be admitted as State's evidence. Aernsdorf has been arrested, and warrants have been issued for the other members of the gang. It may be hoped, for the credit of the State, that justice will be done.

The Rev. W. F. Re Qua Purposes Leaving Aurora, Ill., for the Indian Territory, early next month. The appeal made to our subscribers has resulted in the receipt of one hundred and fifty-five dollars and ten cents. Thus encouraged, he is leaving his church and his home to labor among the Indians, in full reliance on the promise that God will supply all his need. In a letter received from him last week, Mr. Re Qua promises to send us the photographs of himself and Mrs. Re Qua. These we hope to publish in an early issue. He also promises to send us regularly, for publication, after his arrival in the Territory, a letter, describing the progress of his work. Until the close of the first week in November, Mr. Re Qua's address is 135 North 4th Street, Aurora, Ill.

Successful Gospel Temperance Meetings are being held by Messrs. Mabee and English in North Carolina. Their tour commenced at Elizabeth City, where they remained ten days. Nearly seven hundred persons, many of them young men, signed the pledge and a thriving Reform Club has been formed. On Sunday, September 26, a large open air service was held in Creecy Park. Over fifteen hundred persons were present and a large number signed the pledge. A colored Reform Club also has been organized there which has one hundred and thirty members. Messrs. Mabee and English found the ground prepared for their work. A vigorous Women's Christian Temperance Union, the secretary of which is a lady well-known in journalism, was organized there some time ago, and has done earnest work in arousing public opinion to the evils of the Liquor Traffic. Meetings were held at first in the Methodist Church, and afterward, in Zimmerman's Union Chapel, a Band of Hope was formed and temperance literature circulated. The results of the visit of Messrs. Mabee and English will therefore be appreciated and carefully fostered by these devoted ladies.

The General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in session at Chicago voted last week on an important resolution. It was introduced on October 7, by Mr. S. Corning Judd, of Chicago, and was couched in these words: "Whereas, The name 'Protestant Episcopal' is too narrow and exclusive as a designation of a branch (as ours is) of the 'One, Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church' of Christ, in which we express our belief in solemn creed; and Whereas, Such designation is not only thus incomprehensive in its significance, but misleading to the uninformed, and to that extent pernicious and harmful; therefore, Resolved, As the sense of this house, that such name should be expunged from the present designation of this Church in her laws and formularies, and that proper legislative action should be taken to that end. The motion was reached on Saturday, and the balloting commenced amid absolute silence. The Southern delegates generally voted in favor of the resolution, and the Eastern dioceses against it, but nearly every diocese was divided on the question. The vote was as follows: Yeas 112, nays 185. The comparatively strong vote in favor of the proposition was a surprise to the convention.

The Stars and Stripes Torn Down from an American ship was a report that caused some excitement last week. It appears that the American schooner, Marion Grimes, was detained at Shelburne, N. S., for failing to report, and, on Oct. 11, while she was still under detention, the captain ran up the American flag to the masthead. The British cruiser "Terror" was watching the ship, and her captain sent an order to the Marion Grimes to take that flag down. The order was obeyed, but soon afterward the offensive colors again floated from the schooner's masthead. The British captain sent a second order, but the American captain this time refused to lower his colors. The British captain then boarded the schooner with an armed party, and himself hauled down the flag. The Canadian authorities have explained the incident, and the State department is said to have accepted the explanation as satisfactory. The American captain also admits that he had no right to raise his flag while under detention, but says that he was celebrating his birthday, and wished to do so under the Stars and Stripes. It is much to be wished that the American captain's persistent desire to show his colors, even when technically under disgrace, were shared by Christian people in seasons of unpopularity. Too often in times of danger or when in worldly society in which religion is despised the Christian is careful not to show his colors (2 Timothy, 4: 16).

A Clergyman's Calmness in an Earthquake is described in the Charleston News and Courier. It states that the shocks of earthquake which have been felt since the great convulsion of August 31 have tried the nerves of the citizens in many cases more than did that appalling night, and at the first indication of an approaching tremor they have thrown down whatever they held and run from their houses. A barber named Nesbitt, however, claims that he refrained from doing so on one occasion. He was shaving a well-known clergyman of Charleston when a shock came. Nesbitt felt a peculiar sensation come over him. He paused a moment and looked down into the eye of his customer, who also looked up at him. Not a word was exchanged. Nesbitt says he would have given anything to be able to put down his razor and get out into the street, but the unflinching look of his customer chained him to the spot, and he thought, anyhow, he was as safe alongside of a minister as he would have been anywhere else. So, after catching his breath and trying to deafen his ears against the sound of the horrible rumbling that he could hear away down in the bowels of the earth, he braced himself up and went on and finished the job. After he had brushed off his customer, the latter congratulated him on his nerve, and gave him a gold dollar in place of the regular fee of fifteen cents. The composure of the clergyman must have been very decided to so influence the panic-stricken man, but it may well have been unshaken, being based on God's promise (Isa. 26: 3).

A Mountain of Glass Half a Mile Long, and two hundred feet high in its highest parts, is to be seen in the famous Yellowstone Park. A paper by Prof. Joseph P. Iddings, fully describing it, will be appended to the next report of the Geological Survey. The Professor says: "The cliff presents a partial section of a surface flow of obsidian which poured down an ancient slope from the plateau lying east. The dense glass, which now forms its lower portion, is from seventy-five to one hundred feet thick, while the upper portion shows signs of glacial action. A remarkable feature of the cliff is the development of prismatic columns, which form its southern extremity. These are of shining black obsidian, rising to sixty feet in height, with diameters varying from two to four feet. The color of the material of this cliff is for the most part jet black, but much of it is mottled and streaked with bright brownish red, the contrast of which with the black is very striking. In places the glass in the process of cooling has been broken into small angular pieces, which have been again cemented by the later flow, producing many-colored and beautiful breccia, the effect of which is still further to vary the appearance and beauty of the rock and make it the most conspicuous and characteristic variety of volcanic lava known." Anything more brilliant than this glass mountain, illuminated by the rays of the rising sun, cannot be imagined. The time will come, however, when a far more resplendent object will be seen by the whole world. That will be when the city John saw descends out of heaven (Rev. 21: 10, 11).

A Curious Fee to a Physician was Paid in Nashville, Tenn., some time ago. The Medical Record says, that during the cholera epidemic in that city, the late Dr. Bowling attended an old blind negro, who eked out an existence by playing the flute at the street corners. He recovered, and with a heart overflowing with gratitude he took his flute and sat under the doctor's bedroom window and played it the whole night long. Of all the large fees he ever received the doctor said this was the largest. It brought him no accession of fortune, but the doctor was well off and did not mind that. In estimating the value of the fee, the physician took account of the spirit that prompted his patient's act. Christians who have little of money, talent, or time to consecrate to the Lord's service may take comfort from the fact that, like the grateful colored patient, they may show their love and gratitude in services that will not be measured by their intrinsic value, but by their motive (Mark 14: 8).

A Marriage Engagement was Cancelled Recently in York County, Maine, because of the untruthfulness of the prospective bridegroom. The engagement was announced in the newspapers and the wedding day fixed, but a whisper reached the young lady's mother that the suitor had misrepresented his position and circumstances, and would not be able to provide for her daughter so well as he had promised. A trusted friend was quietly sent to the distant town in which he lived, to make inquiries, and it was his report that quashed the marriage arrangements. It appears that the young man was given to the common habit of boasting, and had represented himself as the owner of a three thousand dollar house and a handsome library, and claimed to have a large law-practice and an income from the press. Finally, the habit growing upon him, he had announced that he was elected to the legislature. The investigation showed that he had no real estate, his library consisted of a few volumes of law reports, and he had not been elected, nor thought of, for the legislature. It is stated that his poverty would not have been an insuperable obstacle to the marriage, but his misrepresentation and untruthfulness would not be forgiven. Happily the facts were discovered before the union was consummated, and the young lady was saved from being allied to the unprincipled man. How many young people there are who are being still more woefully deceived! Satan promises them a life of pleasure and all pleasant things, and they rely upon his lying assurances until it is too late (John 8: 44).

The Rev. M. Baxter Gave Five Prophetic discourses on "The Coming Great Events and the Second Coming of Christ before the year 1900," in Odd-fellow's Hall, North Clinton Street, Rochester, N. Y., last Saturday, Sunday and Monday. Three of the discourses were delivered on Sunday. He found the population of Rochester increased from 50,000 people when he last lectured there, about the year 1862, to 120,000 now. Odd-fellow's Hall seats 500 persons, and is the only Hall of that size available, except Washington Hall, which is hired at $50 an evening. 120,000 handbills, 200 large posters and advertisements in the newspapers fully announced the particulars of his lectures to the Rochester people.

CONCERNING DEATH.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living."—Job 30:23.

The Sick Man Turning his Thoughts to Eternity—His Mistake—I. Personal Knowledge—The Universality of Death—Two Exceptions—The Exception at the Lord's Coming—II. Holy Intelligence—Perception that Death is of the Lord—His Guidance to the End—The Sure Resurrection—III. Quiet Expectation—The Mooring-Ropes Cut—Wesley's Anticipation—IV. Sacred Instruction—How to Prepare for Death—An Ancient Coronation Custom.

Job suffered from a terrible sickness, which filled him with pain both day and night. It is supposed that, in addition to his grievous eruptions upon the skin, he endured great difficulty in breathing. He says in the eighteenth verse, "By the great force of my disease is my garment changed: it bindeth me about as the collar of my coat." His clothes were sodden, and clung to him: his skin was blackened, and seemed to be tightened. He was like a man whose tunic strangles him; the collar of his garment seemed to be fast bound about his throat. Those who have suffered from it know what distress is occasioned by this complaint, especially when they are also compelled to cry, "My bones are pierced in me in the night season: and my sinews take no rest."

At such a time Job thought of death, and surely if at any period in our lives

WE SHOULD CONSIDER OUR LATTER END, it is when the frail tent of our body begins to tremble, because the cords are loosened and the curtain is rent. It is the general custom with sick people to talk about "getting well;" and those who visit them, even when they are gracious people, will see the tokens of death upon them, and yet will speak as if they were hopeful of their recovery. I remember a father asking me when I prayed with a consumptive girl to be sure not to mention death. In such cases it would be far more sensible for the sick man to turn his thoughts towards eternity, and stand prepared for the great change. When our God by our affliction calls upon us to number our days, let us not refuse to do so. I admire the wisdom of Job, that he does not shirk the subject of death, but dwells upon it as an appropriate topic, saying, "I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living."

Yet Job made a mistake in the hasty conclusion which he drew from his grievous affliction. Under depression of spirit he felt sure that he must very soon die; he feared that God would not relax the blows of his hand until his body became a ruin, and then he would have rest. But he did not die at that time. He was fully recovered, and God gave him twice as much as he had before. A life of usefulness, and happiness, and honor lay before him; and yet he had SET UP HIS OWN TOMBSTONE, and reckoned himself a dead man. It is a pity to pretend to predict the future, for we certainly cannot see an inch before us. As it is idle with day-dreams to fascinate the heart into a groundless expectation, so is it equally foolish to increase the evil of the day by forebodings of to-morrow.

It is the part of a brave man, and especially of a believing man, neither to dread death nor to sigh for it; neither to fear it nor to court it. In patience possessing his soul, he should not despair of life when hardly pressed; and he should be always more eager to run his race well than to reach its end. It is no work of men of faith to predict their own deaths. These things are with God.

Job made a mistake as to the date of his death, but he made no mistake as to the fact itself. He spake truly when he said: "I know that thou wilt bring me to death." Some day or other the Lord will call us from our home above ground to the house appointed for all living. I invite you this morning to consider this unquestioned truth.

I. First, then, very solemnly under the teaching of God's Spirit, I call your attention to a piece of

PERSONAL KNOWLEDGE:

"I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living." A general truth here receives a personal application. Job knew that he should be brought to the grave, because he perceived the universality of that fact in reference to others. He lived on the verge of an age when life was longer than now; and yet the patriarch had never known a person who had not, after a certain age, quitted this earthly stage. Cast your eye over every land, glance from the pole to the equator, and along to the other pole, and see if this be not the universal law, that man must be dissolved in death. "It is appointed unto men once to die." Two men alone entered the next world without seeing death, but those two exceptions prove the rule. Another great exception is yet to come, which I would never overlook. Peradventure the Lord Jesus

CHRIST MAY PERSONALLY COME

before we see death, and when He cometh, we that are alive and remain shall not fall asleep; but even then "we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." This is the great exception to the rule, and we cheerfully allow it to dwell upon our minds; but if the Master tarry, we ourselves shall not be exempt from the common rule. Job knew that he himself should be brought to death, because all others had been brought there.

Once more, Job arrived at this personal knowledge through his own bodily feebleness. Perhaps he had not always said, "I know that thou wilt bring me to death;" but now, as he sits upon the dunghill, and scrapes himself with the potsherd, and writhes in anguish, and is depressed in spirit, he realizes his own mortality. That poet was half inspired who said, "All men count all men mortal but themselves." Is it not so with us? We do not really expect to die. Those who die daily will die easily. I would to God we had learned this lesson. Let us live as dying men among dying men, and then we shall truly live. This will not make us unhappy; for surely no heir of heaven will fret because he is not doomed to live here for ever. It were a sad sentence if we were bound over to dwell in this poor world for ever. Who among us would wish to realize in his own person the fabled life of the Wandering Jew, or even of Prester John? Who desires to go up and down among the sons of men for twice a thousand years? If the Supreme should say, "Live here for ever," it were a malediction rather than a benediction. To grow ripe and to be carried home like shocks of corn in their season, is not this a fit and fair thing? To labor through a blessed day, and then at nightfall to go home and to receive the wages of grace—is there anything dark and dismal about that? God forgive you that you ever thought so!

II. Having thus discoursed upon a piece of personal knowledge, I now beg you to see in my text the shining of

HOLY INTELLIGENCE.

Job, even in his anguish, does not for a moment forget his God. He speaks of Him here: "I know that Thou wilt bring me to death." He perceives that he will not die apart from God. He does not say his sore boils or his strangulation will bring him to death; but "THOU wilt bring me to death." He does not trace his approaching death to chance, or to fate, or to second causes; no, he sees only the hand of the Lord. To him belong both life and death. I love that old-fashioned verse—

"Plagues and deaths around me fly,
Till he bids I cannot die;
Not a single shaft can hit
Till the God of Love thinks fit."

In the midst of malaria and pest we are safe with God. We are immortal till our work is done. Be ye therefore quiet in the day of evil; rest you peaceful in the day of destruction: all things are ordered by wisdom, and precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints. No forces in the world are outside of His control. God suffers no foes to trespass on the domain of Providence. All things are ordained by God, and especially are our deaths under the peculiar oversight of our exalted Lord and Saviour. Let us rejoice that in life and death we are in the Lord's hands,

The text seems to me to cover another sweet and comforting thought, namely, that God will be with us in death. "I know that thou wilt bring me to death." He will bring us on our journey till he brings us to the journey's end; himself our convoy and our leader. We shall have the Lord's company even to our dying hour: "Thou wilt bring me to death." The child has to go to bed, but it does not cry if mother is going upstairs with it. It is quite dark; but what of that? The mother's eyes are lamps to the child. It is very lonely and still. Not so; the mother's arms are the child's company, and her voice is its music. O Lord, when the hour comes for me to go to bed, I know that thou wilt take me there, and speak lovingly into my ear; therefore I cannot fear, but will even look forward to that hour of thy manifested love. You had not thought of that, had you?

It may not be in the text, but it naturally follows from it, that if God brings us to death,

HE WILL BRING US UP AGAIN.

Job, in another passage, declared that he was sure that God would vindicate his cause—"I know," saith he, "that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God." Certain wise men who would expunge the very idea of a resurrection out of the Old Testament have tried to make out that Job expected to be restored and vindicated in this life; but he evidently did not expect any such thing, for, according to the text, it is clear that he feared he should die at once. We gather from this verse, by a negative process of reasoning, that the living Redeemer, and the vindication which was to be brought to him by that living Redeemer, were matters of hope in another life after death. O beloved, you and I know this truth from many declarations of our Lord in His divine book. Though we die in one sense, yet in another we shall not die, but live. We shall come forth from the land of the enemy in fulness of joy. Wherefore we ought to take great comfort from the words of our text, and be of good courage.

III. I pass on to notice the

which breathes in this text. It is my prayer that we may enjoy the same restfulness. My dear brothers and sisters, the text is full of a calm stillness of hope. Job speaks of his death, as a certainty, but speaks of it without regret; nay, more, if you read the connection, it is with a smile of desire, with a flush of expectancy—"I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living." Many men are unable to regard death with composure; they are disturbed and alarmed by the very hint of it. I want to reason with those disciples of our Lord Jesus who are in bondage from fear of death.

What are the times when men are able to speak of death quietly and happily? Sometimes they do so in periods of great bodily suffering. I have on several occasions felt everything like fear of dying taken from me simply by the process of weariness; for I could not wish to live any longer in such pain as I then endured; and I have no doubt that such an experience is common among sufferers from acute disorders. It is well that pain and anguish should cut the ropes which moor us to these earthly shores, that we may spread our sails for a voyage to the Better Land. Oh, what a place heaven must be to those whose bones have worn through their skin through long lying upon the bed of anguish! What a change from the workhouse or the infirmary to the New Jerusalem! The bitter suffering of the body helps the believer to look upon translation as

A THING TO BE DESIRED.

The growing infirmities of age work in the same way. Yonder venerable sister has at length become quite deaf. Her great delight was to attend the house of God, and she comes now; but the service is dumb show to her; she cannot hear her pastor's voice, which was once so sweet in her ear. Her eyes, after being helped with more powerful glasses, are at length unable to read that dear old Bible, which remained her sole solace when she could not hear. Her existence now is but half life: she cannot walk far; even in crossing the room her limbs tremble. She is already half gone. Do you not think that she will now feel happy to quit life, even as a ripe apple easily leaves the tree?

Beloved, without either falling into sickness, or ageing into infirmity, we can reach this state of mind in another way—by being filled with an entire submission to the will of God. When the decree of God is our delight, we feel no abhorrence to anything which he appoints either in life or in death. Next, I believe that great holiness sets us free from the love of this world, and makes us ready to depart. By great holiness I mean great horror of sin and great longing after perfect purity. When a man feels sin within him he hates it, and from it. Have you ever been cast in the midst of blasphemers? I am sure you have then sighed to be in heaven. If you have been sickened by the drunkenness and debauchery of this city, you have cried, "Oh, that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away, and be at rest." Did you not wish as much last year when the lid was being lifted from the reeking caldron of London's unnatural lust? I am sure I did. I sighed for a lodge in some vast wilderness, where rumor of such villainy might never reach me more. In the midst of human sin if the trumpet were sounded "up and away," you would be glad to hear it, that you might speed to the fair land, where sin and sorrow will never assail you again.

Another thing that will make us look at death with complacency is when we have a full assurance that we are in Christ, and that, come what may, nothing can separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. What reason can you have for alarm? A Christian man should go to his bed at night without an anxious care as to whether he shall wake up in this world or in the next. He should so live that nothing would need to be altered if his last hour should strike. Let us imitate John of his end. A lady asked Mr. Wesley, "Suppose that you knew you were to die at twelve o'clock to-morrow night, how would you spend the intervening time?" "How, madam?" he replied, "why, just as I intend to spend it now. I should preach this evening at Gloucester, and again at five to-morrow morning; after that I should ride to Tewkesbury, preach in the afternoon, and meet the society in the evening. I should then repair to friend Martin's house, who expects to entertain me; converse and pray with the family as usual; retire to my room at ten o'clock; commend myself to my heavenly Father, lie down to rest, and wake up in glory."

Live in such a way that any day would make a suitable topstone for life. Live so that you need not change your mode of living, even if your sudden departure were immediately predicted to you. When you so live you will look upon death without fear. We usually fear because we have cause for fear; when all is right we shall bid farewell to terror.

Brethren, we shall soon be on the wing. Then will we rise and sing, and sing as we rise. We will ascend yon azure sky, and within the jewelled portal we will spend eternity in praise. I hope some of you are getting up a bit out of your notion that to think of death is gloomy work. I trust you will begin to view it with hope and confidence.

IV. I conclude by saying that this subject affords us

SACRED INSTRUCTION.

"I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living." Brethren and sisters, I shall not always have the privilege of coming here upon the Sabbath to speak with you. Perhaps ere long another voice will invite your attention, and I shall be silent in the grave. Neither will you mingle in this throng which so happily gathers here; not much longer will you sit among those who frequent these lower courts. What then?

Let us prepare for death. Let us cleave to the Lord Jesus, who is our all. Make your calling and election sure. Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and believe intensely. Repent of sin and fly from it earnestly and with your whole heart. Live diligently. Live while you live. Let every moment be spent as you will wish to have spent it when you survey life from your last pillow. Drop no stitches. Do all your work at your best. Do a day's work in a day, and have no balance of debt to carry over to to-morrow's account. Soon shall you and I stand before the judgment-seat of Christ, to give an account of the things done in the body; therefore let us live as in the light of that day of days, doing work which may bear that fierce light which beats about the great white throne.

Next to that, let us learn from the general assembly in the house appointed for all living to walk very humbly.

must accommodate us all in the end; wherefore let us despise all pride of birth, rank, or wealth. Therefore speak no more so exceedingly proudly. It is madness for dying men to boast. When Saladin lay a-dying he bade them take his winding-sheet and carry it upon a lance through the camp, with the proclamation, "This is all that remains of the mighty Saladin, the conqueror of nations."

Be prompt, for life is brief. If your children are to be trained up in God's fear, begin with them to-day; if you are to win souls, continue at the holy labour without pause. You will soon be gone from all opportunity of doing good; therefore, whatsoever your hand finds to do, do it with your might. When the Eastern emperors were crowned at Constantinople, it is said to have been a custom for the royal mason to set before his majesty a certain number of marble slabs, one of which he was to choose to be his tombstone. It was well for him to remember his funeral at his coronation. I bring before you now the unwritten marbles of life: which will you have, holiness or sin, Christ or self? When you have chosen, you will begin to write the inscription upon it; for your life's works will be your memorial. God help us to be diligent in his business, for it is not long that we can be at it!

Men and women, project yourselves into eternity; get away from time, for you must soon be driven away from it. Oh, sirs, some of you will one of these days wake up as from an awful dream. Oh that you could foresee the scene which awaits you! Those were strong words, but they were the words of Jesus—"And in hell he lift up his eyes, being in torments." These words reveal none of that pretty nonsense which some prattle about—"a larger hope"; yet Jesus spake them, and His hope was of the largest. He that loved you better than these philosophers love you, also said, "Beside all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed; so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us, that would come from hence." Our Lord put it very strongly. If you mean to dare the infernal terrors, I can do no less than ask you to know what you are at.

But if you have chosen Christ, mercy, and eternal life, and if by faith these are yours, begin to enjoy them now. Rehearse the music of the skies. Taste the delights of fellowship with God—even here! Rejoice in the victory which now overcometh the world, even our faith. You will be in the glory land ere long, and some of you much sooner than you think. So, as the sermon ends, under a sense of my own frailty I bid you a sincere adieu. Until the day break and the shadows flee away—fare you well.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

An Application from a Japanese Banker.*

A PROMINENT counsellor imported from England by the government, said that all Japan needed was civilization and beefsteak. The gentleman furnishing this advice was an infidel, and evidently did not realize the fact that whatever was good in the civilization of Europe and America was based on Christian principles. The religion and the civilization of a country go hand in hand. Show me the Druidical mysteries, the fetiches of the African savages, and I will show you a degraded civilization. Show me the nonentities of Shintoism and of Buddhism, and I will show you a civilization characterized by social and intellectual stagnation and by spiritual and political degradation. Show me the sensuous creed of the Turks, and I will show you the vilest civilization of to-day. Show me the comic mythology of the Greeks and Romans, based on the vagaries of childish imagination, and I will show you a civilization presenting many excellent qualities, but uninfluenced by any deep moral under-currents, and characterized by selfishness and cruelty. In short, give me the general features of any religion, and I can show you with reasonable certainty the nature of the civilization prevailing among its votaries. These terms denote correlative conditions of society. Religion is the cause, civilization is the effect.

The Japanese who have been so assiduously introducing our civilization, are now startled by the discovery that they have been but pioneers for the Christian missionaries. They now see that the intellectual qualities, the animal passions, and the selfish desires of nations under Christian influence are curbed and controlled by some moral power that they had not noticed. And they also see that but for the checking force of these moral principles, the tremendous faculties of Europe and America would be dangerous to the world. While they have assiduously cultivated the intellectual powers of their youth, are intensifying their appetites and passions by nourishing and stimulating food, they have put no guide on the road, have put no brake on the wheels, have introduced no power to restrain the undue exercise of these mental and physical powers. They find Shintoism and Buddhism quite powerless to do so. Nor can the copious and bitter draughts of infidelity, already freely imbibed, accomplish this end. Nothing under the sun but the Gospel of Christ can do it.

This fact was most whimsically acknowledged by the Japanese, when the Mitsui Bank was started in Tokio. This is a National Bank and is backed up by the money of the government. Young Japanese had been specially educated abroad to carry on the banking system on approved foreign principles. They were intelligent, capable and shrewd. They made excellent cashiers, tellers, book-keepers and clerks, so far as the mere executive qualities were concerned. They possessed every intellectual requirement necessary for carrying on a bank. But they were too intelligent—they were so thoroughly acquainted with financing, that they understood many little methods of deflecting cash from the treasury into their own pockets. And there was no power except fear which could prevent their doing so; and fear had but little effect, as there was hardly any danger that the capitalists, composed of effete Daimios and of government officers unfamiliar with banking, could detect how the cash disappeared.

A Battalion of Ghoorka Soldiers en route for Burmah, Offering Sacrifices to Drive Away Cholera.

In this predicament, one of the bank officers, with great candor and solicitude, came and explained the situation to one of the missionaries. He frankly admitted that he did not believe in any religion whatsoever. He claimed that the Japanese intellect was of too philosophical a nature to accept the Jewish myth called Christianity. "But," said he, "your religion does something that our religions cannot do—it makes men honest. Now, we wish our employees at the bank to be carefully instructed in these principles, so that they may learn to discharge their duties with scrupulous integrity." This story is thoroughly characteristic. At one time the government insisted that Christianity should not be taught in their schools in any shape whatsoever. They even went so far as to insert in some of their contracts a clause to the effect that no instruction should be given on this subject. Latterly, however, a great part of my teaching in the government schools of Japan has been pure missionary work. It was necessarily so.

GHOORKAS OFFERING SACRIFICE.

(See Illustration.)

A SINGULAR scene to occur under the protection of the flag of a Christian government was witnessed during the march of the British force recently sent to suppress the rising in Burmah. Part of the force was a regiment of Ghoorka troops from Nepaul, one of the minor states of India. The Ghoorkas, who are the fighting men of Nepaul, as distinguished from the Newars, or civilians of the State, make useful soldiers when commanded by British officers, being fierce, reckless and physically powerful. They are, however, remarkably superstitious.

On the way to Burmah a few cases of cholera broke out among them. Col. E. Stedman, the officer in command, promptly isolated the cases, and made improvements in the sanitary arrangements for the regiment, to prevent the disease spreading. The Ghoorkas, however, had little faith in such measures. They believed that the cholera was sent as a punishment upon them by their goddess, Kali, and that the best way to save the regiment was to propitiate her. The Oriental mind knows only one way to propitiate an offended deity, and that is by sacrifices. Accordingly, when the regiment halted, the six hundred and twenty-four men of which it is composed, assembled to perform the rite. They collected the assortment of victims ordered by their sacred books—a buffalo, a number of sheep and goats, a monkey, and a pigeon—which they decapitated with their famous "kooke'es," or fighting knives, with appropriate prayers and tokens of homage to the offended deity.

There were no more cases of cholera, and both officers and men rejoiced in that fact. Colonel Stedman thinks that his sanitary reforms were the cause of its disappearance, while the men insist that the deliverance resulted from the wrath of Kali being appeased by the sacrifices. Probably both Colonel Stedman's measures and the sacrifices were beneficial. The latter would inspire the men with confidence, as they had faith in them, and that is a very potent factor in the cure of diseases, not in India only.

The religion of the Ghoorkas is a sect of Hindooism, but they differ from Hindoos in paying special devotions to Kali, just as Roman Catholics pay special honor to the Virgin Mary. According to their doctrines, Kali is content with the sacrifice of animals ordinarily, but once in a thousand years it is necessary to offer to her a human sacrifice. There are many stipulations about this rite, reminding us of the stipulations about the sacrifices of the Levitical law. The victim must not be a woman, nor a child, nor an aged man, nor a sick, maimed or blind person, nor one who is desperately wicked. Nor may a prince, or a Brahmin, or one of the military caste who has conquered in battle, be slain for a sacrifice, according to the "Kalika Purana," which minutely describes the ceremonial rites of slaughter.

It may be hoped that, by God's blessing on the labors of the Christian missionaries, these people may soon learn that "it is not possible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sin" (Heb. 10:4) and, what is still more important from a humane standpoint, we may hope that God will show them, as He showed Abraham on the mount, that He does not require a human sacrifice (Gen. 22:12); the blood of "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" (Rev. 13:8) having sufficed for the salvation of all who believe on Him.

It was a surprise to all Mrs. Bentham's friends that she should confide her case to so young a man as Dr. Vincy. True, there were cases in which he was called in by other families, but they were generally little ailments of the children or some slight trouble easily cured. Mrs. Bentham, however, was a chronic invalid, and all Gordonsville believed her to be so near the grave that only a physician of long experience was able to keep her above ground. But Mrs. Bentham was satisfied, and continued to rely implicitly on the young man whom she had first known in his student days as the intimate friend of her only son.

Dr. Vincy laughed when he heard that two or three of Mrs. Bentham's friends had expostulated with her, and urged her to consult Dr. Harris, his chief rival in Gordonsville. He talked freely about it with his patient, and asked her if she would like to see Dr. Harris. He was a bright, stalwart young fellow, under thirty years of age, with good natural abilities and a profound love of his profession. He had studied hard at college, done his share in the boating and base ball clubs, and was regarded by his tutors and fellow-students as certain to make his mark in the world. Progress, however, was very slow at Gordonsville. It was a healthy neighborhood, and the people who were sick generally preferred to consult Dr. Harris. His predecessor in the practice was an elderly man, whose patients Dr. Vincy had been unable to retain, nor had he been able to secure many new ones. It seemed to him, at times, that he would never be able to build up a practice that would maintain him, before his black curly hair turned white.

Another objection besides that of his youth was made by the Gordonsville people. Dr. Vincy never went to church. Dr. Harris attended as frequently as his practice would allow, but "Dr. Vincy has never darkened the church doors since here he has been," said his critics. "Comes of a pious family, too, by all accounts," they said, "and it is not his patients that keep him away, for he has scarcely any. He's no better than an infidel." Mrs. Bentham spoke to him of this frequently. Not so much about the mere attendance on church, which would have satisfied the others, but of his personal need of a Saviour, which his absence from church proved that he did not realize. Dora, also, Mrs. Bentham's daughter, took a deep interest in his spiritual welfare, and though usually a shy, timid girl, had ventured on one occasion to give him a copy of the tract so much blessed of God, "How to become a Christian."

Dr. Vincy, however, was unmoved, and neither Mrs. Bentham's appeals nor Dora's tract did him any good. "I am not cut out for a religious man, Mrs. Bentham," he said once; "truth to tell, Christianity does not satisfy me; I saw much of it at home, and I was not enamored with it. If I do my best and live a good life I think God will not send me to the orthodox hell at the last."

"If I were to give attention to my diet, take exercise and live a carefully arranged life, Dr. Vincy," Mrs. Bentham answered, "should I live long?"

"No, madam, your system is wrong. If we could eradicate the disease or give you new lungs, a well regulated life might keep you in moderate health, but the disease must be eliminated first."

"Did it never occur to you to make the same diagnosis of your own spiritual condition? While you have a sinful nature, well-doing can never make you acceptable to God. He offers you a new heart and a right spirit and forgiveness through Christ for all your past sins. If you reject that offer, how can you be saved?"

Mrs. Bentham was going away to the mountains for change of air, and this was the last time Dr. Vincy would see her before her departure; so, knowing that it was possible she might never have another opportunity of urging him to seek salvation, she was more earnest than usual. Dora, who was packing up for the journey, listened intently, and, as she knelt beside the trunk putting in the books for perusal on the visit, she ceased her work, and offered a silent prayer that God would send her mother's words home to the young man's heart.

"It is very good of you, Mrs. Bentham," he said, "to take so much interest in my welfare. I know you think I am in a bad way, but really I do not feel that I am so myself."

"I suppose you have had patients in that state of mind, have you not? I have known cases in which the physician was more apprehensive than the patient."

"Yes, I have known such cases, and I am willing to admit that the physician was generally right."

"Then, will you not ask God to reveal your true condition to you, Dr. Vincy? Believe me, you are in peril, and God only can save you."

"I will think of it, madam," said the young physician, rising. "Now I must say good bye, and I sincerely hope the journey and the mountain air will give you new life."

Dr. Vincy Hesitates About the Promise.

Mrs. Bentham retained his hand for a moment and said: "I know my life is precarious, doctor; I am not deceiving myself. I may not live to return; will you not give me your promise that you will seek the Saviour? I assure you that I could not be so calm in the prospect of death if I had not His strength to support me, and He is just as good a friend in health and strength. Let me have your promise, Dr. Vincy."

The young man hesitated. The promise, if given, must be kept, and he had no mind to become a religious man. Mrs. Bentham and Dora waited anxiously his next words.

"You are very good, Mrs. Bentham," he said. "I am sure you are sincere, and I will give you my promise."

"He is always found of them that seek Him," Mrs. Bentham said, solemnly.

Several months passed before Mrs. Bentham and her daughter returned to Gordonsville. Letters had passed between them and Dr. Vincy, but no word had been said of his promise. When he visited them, however, on their return, he spoke of it with heartfelt gratitude. "I had a bad time after you left, Mrs. Bentham," he said. "I did not know that I was so great a sinner till God opened my eyes. He has been marvelously good to me. I was near despair for a long time, but now I have entered into light. I owe you a debt of gratitude I can never repay."

"Thank God" was the only response Mrs. Bentham could make, and it was said with reverence and sincerity.

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

Sorrow and Separation.

It was with a haggard face that Leroy appeared at the breakfast-table on the morning after the crushing blow fell, which seemed to paralyze his energies for all his future life. He looked the image of blank despair and answered abstractedly the courteous questions addressed to him by the family. He maintained a gloomy silence during the greater part of the meal, ate little and sighed heavily. He appeared to have no care whether the family thought him morose or not. What any man thought of him, or however they might treat him henceforward, was a matter of indifference. The one disappointment made him reckless and he believed he would never recover from its effects.

After the meal he had an interview with Carrie, alone. His object was to discover her reason for rejecting his suit. True to her resolution, she firmly declined imparting it. In fact the violence of his agitation, and the intense distress his rejection evidently caused him, confirmed her in her conviction that it would be dangerous to tell him that his infidelity was the sole obstacle to their union. A man suffering as he suffered was capable of sacrificing principle and conviction to his desire for marriage. Therefore the very vehemence of his anxiety to surprise Carrie into revealing her secret defeated its purpose and kept her lips sealed.

"You must believe me, Leroy," she said: "I am acting conscientiously. I can give you no promise, I can hold out no encouragement, I can give no explanation. I can only tell you that union is impossible for us. I am suffering poignantly, but I am doing my duty, and my resolve is unalterable."

"Then I will go away," said Leroy in a tone of profound melancholy. "I cannot bear to be under the same roof and know that my hopes are vain. It is only adding to my burden. I will leave to-day. I can bear it better among strangers."

Carrie saw that it was so, and would not dissuade him. So he bade a brief farewell to the family and set out for the railroad station. Carrie accompanied him, and, finding it impossible to cheer him, walked by his side in silence.

"I will not ask you to write me," said Leroy: "if, as you say, your decision is irrevocable, there is nothing to be gained by writing. To forget you is impossible, but it would be folly to stimulate memory by correspondence."

"I too, think it would be best that we should not correspond," said Carrie: "But I shall always feel a deep interest in your welfare. And I will ask you this: if you ever meet with some great happiness, let me know."

"I promise," said Leroy. It will entail no trouble. The road I travel is one in which I am little likely to meet happiness. Nevertheless, if so strange a thing should happen, you shall hear of it. That is a small thing to promise to you. I would lay down my life for you if you asked it."

The train entered the station. One respectful, lingering kiss, the two pair of eyes full of tears gave one farewell look of love, and Leroy sprang on board. Carrie stood there until the last car was out of sight, and then walked sadly homeward. To her, too, life seemed very melancholy that day. She really and truly loved him, and it was hard that the union could not be. But she knew she was right, and looked to God for help and comfort. The burden was not removed from her even when she was again at the old college. Much of her vivacity had disappeared. There was a dull pain at her heart. Her affections had been violently disturbed. She often sat at the evening fire and mused over the past few months, fraught with events which seemed so much like a dream, and yet had left such a real pang in her heart. Every familiar spot—the hall where Leroy had so often spoken, the church where they so frequently sat together, the grove, the street—every thing brought back some reminiscence associated with by-gone pleasures. Yes, those delightful days were gone. Would such days ever return to her again? Her aching heart gave conflicting responses. Yet she waited and tried to trust.

As if to increase her vexation, Pendleton Sanderson renewed his attentions to her. While she endeavored to treat him courteously and kindly, yet she could not conceal the fact that he was more disagreeable to her than ever. He persisted in calling upon her, much to her annoyance; for she could see that he was becoming more and more ardent in his attentions and expressions. Yet she could not rudely tell him to remain away, as long as she had not a sufficient reason for doing so.

One evening he was more than usually demonstrative, and endeavored to draw the conversation into such a channel that he might have some excuse to make an open avowal of his love. She adroitly evaded the questions he asked as long as she could; but the very fencing of words seemed to pique him, and impel him to more direct speech. She glanced at her watch at last, as a hint to him that her time was precious.

"Am I detaining you, Miss West?" he asked. "Have you an engagement for to-night?"

"Oh, no," she said, "but I meant to have an hour's study, and I wondered if I should get it."

"But no engagement?" he asked, with some emphasis on the word.

"No, except so far as I have said. Why do you ask?"

"My thoughts were occupied with another sense of the word. Miss West, do not think me impertinent; I should much like to know if you are engaged in the sense in which young people commonly use the word."

"I think the question is somewhat impertinent, Mr. Sanderson; but I will answer it. There is no reason why there should be any secrecy about it, though it cannot concern you. No, I am not engaged."

She knew what his motive was in persisting in asking her that question; but, she thought, since he was determined to make a declaration, it might as well come now as later.

"And—and—you don't wish to be?" he asked, in a tremulous voice, bending his eyes intently upon her.

"Now you are impertinent, Mr. Sanderson," she said, rising, with some indignation.

"I beg your pardon," he rejoined quickly, rising to his feet. "I did not mean to offend you. It was my intense concern and earnestness that led me into it. But you must let me speak; you must hear me." His tones became almost husky with excitement. "You must have known that—that my heart is not my own."

"How should I have known that, since I have never seen that vagrant organ?" she answered, lightly; but the moment she said it she was sorry that she had spoken so flippantly, when the poor fellow was so intent and serious.

"For pity's sake, Miss West, do not trifle any more! It is almost a matter of life and death with me. I thought you might have inferred the fact from my conduct, that I am deeply, sincerely attached to you—that you are the possessor of my affections. Oh, Carrie, I must tell you of my love. It will consume me if it remains unexpressed any longer. Can you—can you return my love?"

He tried to grasp her hand, but she quickly withdrew it, saying, kindly but firmly:

"I am sorry to say I cannot. I say sorry, because it grieves me to give pain to any one. But you are aware, Mr. Sanderson, that I never gave you any encouragement."

"No, I confess you did not; but still I hoped that—that your heart might turn toward me. Do you think you could ever—"

"No, no; do not ask me."

Then a look of anger passed like a black shadow over his face. Jealousy, vindictiveness, hatred, were all blent in it, and Carrie read them with as much distinctness as if they had been written in words. Had there been any hesitation before, it would have ended with that look.

"I believe your mind has been poisoned against me," he said. "You saw a great deal of that infidel, Ransom, last year, and he must have prejudiced you against me. Confess; is it not so?"

"I reject you, Mr. Sanderson, on sufficient grounds of my own. I am not influenced by any one. In plain words, I do not love you, and knowing my own heart, I am sure that I never should love you. Is not that enough?"

"You might have loved me if you had never talked with Ransom. I am sure it is he who has influenced you. Let him beware. I am not a man to be injured with impunity."

"Do not utter threats here, Mr. Sanderson, against Mr. Ransom or any one else. It is unmanly. I assure you that under no circumstances could I accept you as a lover."

"Will you say that Mr. Ransom has nothing at all to do with your rejection?"

"No, I will not. I will say nothing about it further. You have asked me a plain question, and I have given you a direct answer. With that, you must be content."

"I am not content, Miss West, because I feel sure that Mr. Ransom has prejudiced my case, and he will have to answer for it."

He took up his hat and quitted the room, looking back at the door to say: "He has purchased his happiness at my cost, and he shall be made to feel as I feel now, if that is possible."

Could the vindictive, rejected lover have seen, that night, the man whom he threatened, he would not have thought that he had purchased happiness. No one would have looked at Leroy, and associated the word "happiness" with him. A gloomy, taciturn, moody man, he went about his duties in that Western town, whither he had gone, with an aching heart. It was only his innate desire for intellectual advancement in himself and others that saved his reputation as an instructor of youth. While engaged in the solution of some mathematical problem, or tracing the evidence of an historical event, or studying some fact of special interest in literature or science, he, for a time, almost forgot his sorrow. And then it would come back again with redoubled power. Frequently his pupils noticed his lowering brow in the morning, and oftentimes the clouds were not dissipated during the entire day.

One thing, more than all others, crippled every effort he made—he could believe in nothing. It was all doubt, doubt—continual groping in moral darkness. Once he had advocated, with much zest, the cause of intellectual culture. Educate the minds of the people—that was the panacea for every individual and social ill. But when he reflected that, since he had attained some measure of culture himself, he was in greater doubt and infelicity than when he had been an ignorant school boy, he lost confidence in his former idea of the efficacy of education. What strong stimulus had he, therefore, to advocate the cause of education? Little good had education done for him. He had fallen almost into the pessimistic despair of some of the German sceptics, who cry that culture only enhances our miseries—only brings us to a knowledge of our woes.

Then he cast about him for some theory for reforming the world; but what could he devise that had not already been tried? The principles of honesty, courage, and all the catalogue of virtues, had been advocated by brilliant-tongued orators all over the world, and yet there was misery and sin. The churches had also been propagating these principles for many centuries. What virtue could he discover that the Bible did not inculcate? "The heart and the intellect must both be cultured!" he said aloud as he meditated in his room. But the thought struck him that he had said that before a hundred times, and yet what was the result upon himself of his attempt in the direction of such symmetrical culture? Deeper doubt, profounder darkness!

Strange, that in all his speculations about ameliorating the condition of mankind, he never thought of making an effort, as Christian workers do, to reform individuals, thus making a few persons around him, who came under his influence, better and happier, and in this way adding his efforts to the numberless efforts put forth all over the world for the elevation of moral character among the people. But that is too small and humble a work for an unbeliever. There is no fame in it. Nothing in the toilsome work of helping this man and that, to gratify ambition. To raise the masses, to found a great philosophical school—that is something to achieve. A man who could do that would be revered and honored in his life and would be lauded by posterity. But what was the reformation of one or two isolated individuals to labor for? Again he missed the stimulus of the Christian worker, who knows the inestimable value of a single soul.

And so Leroy came to doubt the utility of effort and became a cynic, doubting everything that was worth believing. Most of all, he began to question the validity of all moral distinctions; there really was no such a thing as sin; it was a mere misnomer for accident, or for a necessary transition point in the development of the world; we could not, de facto, call one thing right and another wrong; and from this he went to the conclusion that man is not a responsible being. These conclusions were logical deductions from the theory of a blind, unbending and irresistible evolution of the universe, which he had, at least in part, accepted. Everything had to be just as this great law of development formed and impelled it. In such a theory there was no place for the freedom of the will. Where, then, had Leroy any incentive for helping in the work of reformation? Men do not often rise above their theories.

He could not close his eyes to the moral effects his materialistic theories would have upon society, if universally accepted. "Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" Neither can they gather the precious fruit of moral excellence from the thorn-tree of materialistic evolution. Get all men to believe thoroughly that mind is only the result of material organism or molecular motion, and what a riotous mob of brutes you will let loose upon the earth. Destroy men's belief in their own personal moral responsibility, and you will open the flood-gates of lust, passion and vice. It is because men have a higher nature, made in the image of God, that they still have aspirations after the true, the beautiful and the good. Leroy felt all this keenly. How could he then advocate these morally emasculating doctrines any longer? He knew too well their pernicious effect upon his own moral nature. They had robbed him of all enthusiasm and hope, and had destroyed his sensitiveness to that which is wrong.

Did his theory of evolution give him any peace of mind? No; the higher interrogations of his soul still remained unanswered. Neither could he resign himself to the blind, iron-clad laws of nature, as he thought them. The everlasting why was continually in his heart. "Why is life so full of suffering? Why are we environed with difficulties and made to chafe after greater freedom? Is our aspiration a sign that there is another existence after death in which we shall enjoy more power, and be free of these restrictions? Who could tell?"

So, in ceaseless interrogation his musings always ended. Thought was only another name for pain, and he persistently sought the light while rejecting the kindly guidance which God gives to all who seek it.

JESUS RISEN.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson, for October 31. John 20: 1-16. Golden Text: 1 Cor., 15: 20.

Christ the First Fruits—An Answer to Satan—Resurrection Power—Prophecies Accurately Fulfilled—Courage Imparted by His Death—Joseph's Petition—The Enemies Dreading Resurrection—Mary's Vigil—John the First Believer—Mary Clinging to the Spot—The Awakening—Recognition—The New Light.

"Now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first fruits of them that slept" (1 Cor., 15: 20). He was the first man who rose from the dead by His own inherent life power—the first who rose and never died again. He was the only Man whose death destroyed the sting of death to them that believe, who hath abolished death and hath brought life and immortality to light, through the Gospel (II. Tim., 1: 10)—therefore is He the first fruits of them that slept, the Pentecost of God's harvest, the sample, the best and ripest, God's foretaste of what His bride shall be when she is gathered out from the nations and presented to His Father without spot or wrinkle or any such thing. God's first fruits of man more perfect by far than Adam, when God saw him that he was "very good." What what a power against besetting sin, what a strength in work for men lies in this glorious truth! "Now, is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept." Death till now had spoken only God's curse upon sin. Now precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints (Psalm 116: 15). "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord" (Rev. 14: 13). For, since by man came death, by man also came the resurrection of the dead, for as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. Born into the death of Adam, and just as much, born again by faith into the life of Jesus Christ! Oh how we need to pray in faith the prayer of Paul, "That I may know Him, and

THE POWER OF HIS RESURRECTION!

But this can only be, as we know, the fellowship of His sufferings and conformity to His death (Phil. 3: 10). Only as we are really given up to Him and take just the place He would take; the meek, lowly, despised, misunderstood place which men give us, do we practically come into the risen life, which is above being vexed or troubled or oppressed by these things.

When our beloved Lord had given up the ghost, the same Jews who had feared to enter the judgment hall lest they should be defiled, required that the body of Jesus, as well as those of the thieves, should not remain on the cross on the Sabbath day. Strange how sinners should fear defilement from Him who alone cleanseth from sin! Perverted human nature calls "evil good and good evil"! (Isa. 5: 20). Pilate gave orders that their legs should be broken, to hasten the lingering death of crucifixion. But it had been foretold of Jesus, "A bone of Him shall not be broken," for He is the very Passover Lamb (Ex. 12: 46; Num. 9: 12). He is the Righteous One (Psa. 34: 20). Jesus was dead already, and "they brake not His legs." They pierced His side, for yet another Scripture had to be fulfilled, "They shall look on Him whom they have pierced." But that body of Jesus which was so despised and loathed by the Jews, was dear, infinitely dear, to His disciples. No sooner had He breathed His last breath than a reaction took place among these timid and faithless ones. One who was only a secret disciple, up to this time, Joseph of Arimathea, the only member of the council who had not consented to Jesus' death (Luke 23: 51), hesitated no longer to declare himself, but went boldly to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus. His suit was not in vain. Pilate would have saved Jesus if he had not feared for his own interests, and was nothing loath to favor His disciples now. Nicodemus, too, who had once spoken for Jesus (John 7: 51), now brought a costly and lavish compound of myrrh and aloes to prevent the decomposition of that sacred body. But God was beforehand with him. Of Jesus it was written, "In Him was life,"

HE COULD NOT SEE CORRUPTION.

Egyptian mummies have been preserved over three thousand years, the features as perfect as the day when they were embalmed, but when they are exposed to the air the dust returns to earth as it was, and they crumble into a shapeless mass. But Jesus is the "Life of men." He is "that Life Eternal which was with the Father and was manifested unto us" (1 John 1: 2). He needed no spices to conserve His body from corruption, for there was life power in Jesus to quicken the dead. They laid Him in a new tomb with the spices, the chief priests only interfering to seal the stone and set a watch. Strange that His enemies, who did not believe on Him, took measures to prevent His resurrection, while His disciples, to whom He declared repeatedly that He should rise again, prepared His body for a long sleep in the grave! The chief priests and Pharisees were those who noted His words, "After three days I will rise again" (Matt. 27: 63). Mary Magdalene and the other Mary, probably the mother of Jesus, sat without the sepulchre until the Sabbath, when they rested, according to the commandment" (Luke 23: 56).

But one of them could not rest apart from Jesus. Mary Magdalene (if, as some suppose, she was the same as Mary of Bethany) had understood that Jesus should die, had anointed His body for the burying, and, no doubt, had more comprehension of the resurrection than had the rest of the disciples. No sooner was the Sabbath past, than, long before the day dawned, she was at the sepulchre while it was yet dark. She was the first to discover that the stone was rolled away, that the precautions of the chief priests had, some way, been in vain; "the watch" of Roman soldiers were there on guard no longer; something, she knew not what, had happened. When God leads on His believing children to know something of the power of Christ's resurrection, they find themselves out in all their experiences and all their expectations.

It is glorious to know Jesus as a Saviour who died for us in the past, and who reveals to us the forgiving love of our Heavenly Father, and who opens to us the door into everlasting blessedness. But to know the power of His resurrection is to know Him in His Almighty power over sin, death, circumstances, past, present, everything. To know Him as now, above principalities and power and every name that is named, and to know that He has made us to sit with Him in heavenly places, not in a dreamy kind of vision, but in an actual, present, glorious experience, by which, without effort on our part, He makes us see things in His light, and discern God in everything around us. Jesus risen, Jesus conqueror, changes all things—circumstances, like the stone upon His grave, are changed from God's side—men, like the keepers of the sepulchre, are made to tremble and to flee, when our faith claims Jesus as above them.

Mary ran to Peter and John:

HER FIRST CONCEPTIONS WERE EARTHLY.

"They have taken away the Lord out of the sepulchre, and I know not where they have laid Him." Did she suspect the soldiers of stealing His body? O why did she not believe His own words? Peter and John came to the sepulchre: John looked in, Peter went into the sepulchre, they saw His empty grave-clothes, which the soldiers would not have left if they had taken the body away. Then John went in, and "he saw and believed; for as yet they knew not the Scripture that He must rise from the dead." Four distinct times He had taught them this precious truth (Mark 8: 31; 9-9, 31; 10-34), yet "they understood none of these things; and this saying was hid from them, neither knew they the things which were spoken" (Luke 18-34). Then the two disciples went away; even John who had "believed," even Peter to whom it had been revealed that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of the living God! But Mary did not go away. He whose body had lain in that sepulchre had been too much to the saved sinner out of whom He had cast seven devils, and His works and teaching had thrown the world into the shade for her too much to find any other point of interest. If Jesus were lost, then all was lost; what certainty had she that the demons who once possessed her, should not return? If she could not find Jesus living, she would not at least leave the spot where she had last seen Him. This is how Jesus risen is found by His disciples. Cling to all you know of Jesus and you shall yet know more.

Mary looked into the sepulchre and she saw life there, not death, not emptiness, but life. True, it was not the life of Jesus, but it was heavenly life: two angels sitting there, and the grave of Jesus spoke to her in those angel voices, "Woman, why weepest thou? Whom seekest thou?" It was the same story; she had no other. "Behold they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." But Another was on the scene whom she had not perceived, though He saw her. His voice repeated the angel's question, yet she was so unprepared to see Him living that she recognized neither voice nor form. Her conceptions were still earthly, she was still accounting for things on human lines. She, supposing Him to be the gardener, saith unto Him, "Sir, if thou have borne Him hence, tell me where thou has laid Him, and I will take Him away." She still hankered after the dead Christ, the experience of Him which she had had in the past.

ONE WORD AWOKE HER,

"Mary." It was the old voice, and spoke her name. On an instant the whole truth flashed across mind and heart. She turned herself and said unto him, Rabboni, which is to say "Master." Yes, she yielded herself to the risen Christ to be, to do, to suffer, as He would. When God has led His children to turn their backs once and forever on a life of sin and worldliness, when, as far as they know, they are wholly yielded up to Him, and yet in their nearest approaches to Jesus they find their experience only what Mary found, an empty, unoccupied grave, and yet there is nowhere else to seek Jesus, what shall they do? Go away like Peter and John, or abide by the last traces of Jesus? Surely the latter. The empty grave is the token to faith that Jesus Christ is risen. The conscious emptiness of our own hearts so long as, like Mary, we seek to be satisfied with nothing else, only shows us that Christ is going to reveal Himself in power and glory, as never heretofore. But are we abiding by the empty tomb like Mary, with thoughts and words full of "my Lord" even when He seems to be taken away from us? Are we in the place of blessing?

"Jesus saith unto her,

for I am not yet ascended to my Father." He allowed the women who returned shortly after with Mary to the sepulchre, to hold Him by the feet and worship Him (Matt. 28: 9). Why should this privilege be denied to Mary? Jesus gives us His reason: "For I am not yet ascended unto my Father: but go to my brethren and say unto them, I ascend unto my Father and your Father, unto my God and your God." It was as though He had said, Mary, thou shalt have a privilege of love far greater than to embrace my feet; be thou the apostle of the resurrection, and tell those whom I, the risen and soon the ascended Son of God, am not ashamed to call brethren, that I am going to resume my place of power in Heaven with my Father.

He had another message to send by the other women: they should tell His brethren to go before Him into Galilee (Matt. 28: 10). But Mary learned more of the heavenly glory of Jesus than was given to the others to know; to her Heaven and earth, God and man, were bound together as never before; a new world was open to her; Jesus risen, was God, the Lord of Heaven manifest in the flesh, yet her Saviour, her Lord, her Friend!

BY CHARLOTTE MURRAY.

"When the even was come, they brought unto Him many that were possessed of devils; and He cast out the spirits with His word, and healed all that were sick; that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying, 'Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses.'" (Matt. 8, 16, 17).

He healed them all—the blind the lame, the palsied, The sick in body and the weak in mind; Whoever came, no matter how afflicted, Were sure a sovereign remedy to find.

His word gave health, his touch restored the vigor To every weary, pain exhausted frame, And all He asked before He gave the blessing, Was simple faith in Him from those who came.

And is our Lord, the kind, the good, the tender, Less loving now than in those days of old? Or is it that our faith is growing feeble, And Christian energy is waxing cold?

Why do we not, with equal expectation, Now bring our sick ones to the Lord in prayer, Right through the throng of unbelieving scruples, Up to His very side and leave them there.

He never health refused in bygone ages, Nor feared to take the "chastisement" away; Then why not ask it now, instead of praying For "patience to endure from day to day?"

Yes, ask it for ourselves, if we need healing, Pleading those instances of olden cure; But if He then refuse, we still will trust Him, And He will make it happier to endure.

Ay, happier to bear with Him the suffering, Or even death itself, with Him close by; For in His presence there is joy forever, And with Him near "it is not death to die."

M. DE LESSEPS—M. BARTHOLDI—The Gigantic Statue of LIBERTY in New York Bay, Dedicated this Day.

M. FERDINAND DE LESSEPS.

ON the first page of this number we print a picture of the mammoth Statue of Liberty, as it appeared last week when approaching completion. As our readers are aware, the statue is the gift of the French people to the citizens of the United States. It is arranged that the dedication shall take place this day (October 28). A number of illustrious French citizens are expected to arrive in time to participate in the ceremonies, and among them the famous M. de Lesseps, whose portrait accompanies that of M. Bartholdi, and the picture of his magnificent work. Our sister Republic across the Atlantic could have selected no man from among her citizens better fitted than this wonderful man to represent her on such an occasion. In sending the Statue of Liberty as a token of national good-will and friendship, France has displayed a spirit worthy of the time when nations shall learn war no more. It is therefore appropriate that the French citizen who has won his fame, not in the field of battle, but by triumphing over natural difficulties, and providing facilities of travel for the benefit of the whole world, should be chosen to take part in the ceremonies of a day consecrated to international amity.

The Vicomte Ferdinand de Lesseps was born at Versailles, in France, in 1805, and is therefore now in the eighty-first year of his age. He chose diplomacy as his profession, and occupied several important positions in the diplomatic service of his country. During the time of Mehemet Ali's supremacy, from 1836 to 1840, he was employed in the French Consular service in Egypt. He was subsequently appointed consul at Barcelona, and afterwards became French Minister at Madrid. In 1849 he went as special envoy to Rome, when the French military intervention took place for the restoration of the Papal Government. In the year 1854, when Said Pasha became Viceroy of Egypt, M. de Lesseps, who knew him intimately, was invited to pay a visit to Cairo. There, living as an honored guest in the Viceroy's palace, he matured the project of the Suez Canal, which he had been considering ever since 1840.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

The difficulties in the way of the enterprise were formidable. They were not physical only, nor, indeed, were the physical the most formidable. England interposed obstacles, and opposed the construction of the canal by every means at her command. She feared that the safety of her Indian Empire would be imperilled if the necessity of reaching India by the long journey around the Cape of Good Hope was removed. Besides, so long as Gibraltar formed the only outlet from the Mediterranean, and remained in the possession of England, she held control of that sea, which control would be lost if a new outlet should be cut at Suez. The canal, however, was cut in spite of her, and then, with the adroitness which she has displayed in so many crises of her history, she succeeded, by purchasing the rights of the Khedive of Egypt, in gaining control of the new waterway.

It was in November, 1869 that M. de Lesseps saw the great achievement of his life completed. After years of anxiety, labor and ceaseless vigilance, the day of triumph came to the indomitable old man. The canal was formally opened in the presence of the Khedive of Egypt, the Emperor of the French, the Emperor of Austria, the Crown Prince of Prussia, and other illustrious personages. His confidence has been justified by the result. The canal is now a necessity to commerce, and is so much used that travelers would deem any event which closed it, even temporarily, a public misfortune.

POPULARITY IN FRANCE.

A Paris correspondent of a London daily journal observes that "the feeling with which his countrymen regard M. de Lesseps is something more intense than admiration. So implicit is their confidence in him that when he holds a meeting of shareholders, his report is accepted, all is unanimity, the only interruptions being the malapropos of gushing, gray-haired shareholders rising to propose medals for him and votes of thanks. His call for ayes and noes seems a mere matter of form; his meetings are models of despatch.

HOME LIFE.

"Apart from his power, the French love in him his human nature. He recently hurried back from London, in the very crisis of negotiations, to watch a sick baby, and he may be seen any day in the Park, riding at the head of a whole detachment of healthy children. It is really one of the sights of the Paris Row; people look for it as they used to look for the carriage of the Queen of Spain. The cortège goes in a quaint diminuendo, from the rather big father on a big horse down to the tiniest daughter on a pony not much larger than a mastiff. If any one goes to see him, unless on business, and sometimes not even with that exception, he will talk about his family all the time, and on the slightest excuse will lead his visitor out of his study into the large bedroom where they lie, as in the dormitory of a boarding-school, with their beds all in a row. M. de Lesseps often goes to look at them, forgetful entirely of Suez and Panama."

M. FREDERIC AUGUSTE BARTHOLDI.

Birth and Early Studies—In the Studio of Ary Scheffer—Engaged in the Franco-German War—Mission to America—A Farewell Conference of Artists—A Friendly Project—Conception of the Statue—Sojourn in America—The Project Launched—Progress of the Work—Its Arrival and Reception.

THE eminent sculptor whose name has become a household word in America, and whose portrait appears on the first page of this number, was born in Colmar in 1835. He is, therefore, now fifty-one years of age. Colmar is a manufacturing town of Alsace-Lorraine, the province which France was compelled to cede to Germany after the war of 1870. Though the native place of M. Bartholdi is now a German town, he prides himself on his French nationality, and was one of those who felt most acutely the humiliation of the conditions of peace imposed by Germany upon France.

Having resolved to devote himself to art as his profession, he placed himself under the tuition of the celebrated French painter, Ary Scheffer, whose striking pictures "Christ in the Garden," and "Christ Bearing the Cross," are known through engravings all over the world. Scheffer died in 1858, at the age of sixty-three. Under Ary Scheffer, and other famous masters, the genius of M. Bartholdi developed, and he was winning renown in his profession when the outbreak of war called him away from peaceful pursuits.

DEATH OF IMPERIALISM.

In common with other enlightened Frenchmen, M. Bartholdi was realizing then in the stern school of adversity what Imperialism really meant. The adventurer who, for twenty years, had ruled France, was responsible for that war. It was a war undertaken with no high or noble purpose, but, as it appeared at a later day, with no other object than that of strengthening his own throne. France was slipping out of the Emperor's fingers, and there was no surer way of tightening the grip than a successful war. The man who could bring glory to the flag of France was the man who would command the loyalty of the French people; and caring not for the misery involved by war, thinking lightly of the lives that must inevitably be sacrificed, Napoleon had tried to purchase a renewed lease of power for himself by a payment in blood. That was Imperialism! That was the selfish motive which animated the man who sat on the French throne! M. Bartholdi, like many other Frenchmen, began to think it might be better if that throne were empty, and that it would be better if the people governed themselves. They, at any rate, if they made war, would know by experience the cost of it, and could have none but patriotic motives in quarreling with other governments. Naturally, the eyes of these newly converted republicans were turned to America, the most successful instance, on a large scale, of the ability of the people to govern without king or emperor, or any hereditary ruler. M. Bartholdi determined to pay that he might see with his own eyes government by the people, and for the people, in practical operation. Before sailing, he paid a brief visit to his Parisian friends, whom he had not seen since he left Paris with the army. They were gathered at Versailles, the capital being then in the hands of the Commune, its flaming buildings and blood-stained streets crying aloud the lesson that a country must not look to its law-breakers for just government. He saw MM. Laboulaye, Lafayette, Henri Martin, Remusat, and other ardent Frenchmen, and told them of his contemplated voyage across the Atlantic. The project was warmly applauded, for the cordial friendship of young Frenchmen for America was newly stimulated by the resolve to adopt Republican institutions in France. America was a sister Republic, and as the group of enthusiastic Frenchmen sat and talked, the desire was born that in some way the two great nations might be drawn more closely into the bonds of friendship. Could not some gift, some striking token of regard, be devised, that would show to the whole world that nations could love one another as individuals may do? That was the mustard-seed of an idea, out of which grew the magnificent gift that has since been landed on our shores.

THE CONCEPTION.

M. Bartholdi sailed for America, charged with the mission of finding some way in which the French people could testify their regard for the sister Republic, so that all the world might understand and appreciate it. The mission was discharged before he set foot on American soil. No sooner did the vessel on which he sailed enter the unrivalled bay of New York, than there entered his mind the conception that has now been moulded into enduring metal. To the artistic mind, there could be no grander or more appropriate gift than a colossal statue, which should stand at the portals of the New World to tell to every traveler from the monarchy-ridden countries of Europe, that he was entering a land of liberty and self-government, so strong and so stable that a sister nation rendered it spontaneous homage.

The visit of the French artist was an extensive one. He traveled from New York to California, and from Maine to Florida, not confining his attention to the great cities, but visiting small towns and wild Western settlements. He studied the people and the Government, enjoyed himself thoroughly, as a Frenchman will, if enjoyment can be had by any means, and as an artist is sure to do, in the most magnificent scenery in the world. He painted and sketched, made friends everywhere, and when his visit approached a termination, it seemed as if he had made for himself a new home.

THE PROJECT LAUNCHED.

Soon after the traveler's return, a meeting of the same circle of artistic comrades that had bade him good-by so many months before, was held at the house of M. Laboulaye, to consider the project started at their former meeting. M. Bartholdi explained his ideas more fully than he had been able to do by mail, and showed a sketch in water-colors of the bay of New York, and the site on Bedloe's Island, where he proposed that the colossal statue should stand. The idea was received with enthusiasm, and the French-American Union was organized, to receive subscriptions and to arrange details. Subscription lists were prepared, and circulated throughout France. They bore at their head the following introduction of the project to the French people, which M. Bartholdi quotes in his narrative, published in the New York Tribune: "The Monument of Independence will be executed in common by the two peoples associated in this fraternal work, as they were of old in establishing Independence. In this way we declare by an imperishable memorial the friendship that the blood spilled by our fathers of old sealed between the two nations. It is a treaty of friendship which should be signed by all hearts which feel the love of their country."

COMPLETION.

Six years were occupied in preliminary work, and in October, 1881, the various pieces were completed, and the work of putting them together was commenced. Two years later the statue was declared finished, and stood in the suburbs of Paris a conspicuous object, towering high above surrounding buildings, and eagerly visited by the Parisian public. It remained on exhibition for a few months, and then on July 4th, 1885, it was formally presented to Mr. Morton, the United States Minister to France at that time.

French munificence had not even then been exhausted. At a dinner given by Mr. Morton to the members of the French-American Union, on July 11th, M. Ferry, the Prime Minister of France, speaking on behalf of the French Government, announced that he and his colleagues desired to share in the substantial message of good-will. They had decided to place a Government steamer at the service of the Union, and to carry the statue to its destination in a vessel bearing the national flag of France. It arrived here on June 17, 1885, and was formally accepted on behalf of the Government. Sixteen months have been occupied in its erection, and now the work is finished and in position on Bedloe's Island.

Appropriate as is the statue as a gift from the people of France to the people of the United States, and thoroughly in character as it is with French thought and genius, the Christian spectator who in years to come looks at the colossal figure, holding aloft its torch at our gates, will wish that both the people who gave and the people who received the magnificent emblem might better understand what true liberty is, and how to attain the liberty that alone can "enlighten the world." The liberty which is only another name for license, the freedom from control and from the fear of God, is a darkening influence leading to misery and death. That liberty which gives light and life to the world, is that which is enjoyed by the individual soul that has realized the truth of Christ's words, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free" (John 8: 32).

THE GIGANTIC STATUE.

Details of its Proportions and Method of Construction

M. BARTHOLDI has communicated to the Philadelphia Press an elaborate and exhaustive article describing in detail his extraordinary work of art. From that article we extract the following particulars:

"The total height of the first model was four feet. This was the study model, which was long sought and often recast. After this first study I made the statue, which measures, from the head to the feet, nine feet four inches. This statue, executed with rigid precision, was reproduced four times as large by the ordinary processes. The model, which was the result of this work, measured about thirty-six feet in total height. Placed in a large space, it could be taken in by the eye in its entirety, and the corrections to be made could still be noted. This statue was divided into a large number of sections, destined to be produced separately at four times their size. After this last enlargement, changes were no longer possible. Now, the sculptor could only aim at very great precision, and at great care in the modelling of the surfaces, which were becoming enormous.

"In an immense workshop, specially constructed for the work, were to be seen four plane surfaces on which the work was carried on. They were encompassed with frames, laid out in numbered divisions. Another similar frame, corresponding exactly to the one below, was fastened beneath the ceiling of the workshop. Lead wires and rulers hung all around the frames. On these frames thus geometrically laid out, the sculptors executed in wood and in plaster enormous fragments of the statue. The sculptors executed the enlargement by measurements taken with the compass on the lead wires and the rulers. They first laid out the general form with wooden beams covered with lathwork. The wood was then covered with a coating of plaster. They verified the large measurements already established, and then executed the reproduction, point by point, and finished the modelling of the surfaces.

"On these wooden moulds or gabarits, the hammerers pressed the sheets of copper by pressure with levers and by hammering with mallets. The pieces of copper were finished by beating them with little hammers and with rammers. The profile of the forms was again taken in detail with sheets of lead pressed upon the model, again working the copper according to the profiles. The pieces of copper were furnished from point to point with iron braces, intended to give them rigidity. Thus furnished, the pieces were mounted, brought together, and fastened on a powerful trusswork of iron beams, which serves as support for the whole envelope of the statue. The trusswork was designed and executed by the eminent constructing engineer, M. Eiffel. The copper plates, kept in shape by iron bands, are supported by iron braces, which are clamped on to the central core. They do not bear in the least upon the lower plates, and their weight is always independent of all that is above and below. The statue is constructed of copper sheets, two-and-a-half millimetres in thickness. It measures one hundred and fifty feet from the base to the top of the torch, and one hundred and eleven feet from the heel to the top of the head. This will make the top of the torch three hundred and five feet above the water of the bay. That is, twenty-one feet higher than the spire of Trinity Church, and twenty-three feet higher than the towers of the Brooklyn Bridge.

"The forefinger is seven feet eleven inches in length, and four feet eight inches in circumference at the second joint. The head is thirteen feet six inches in height. The eye is over two feet in width. The nose is three feet seven inches in length. About forty persons were accommodated in the head at the Universal Exposition of 1878. It is possible to ascend into the torch above the hand. It will easily hold twelve persons. It represents an outlay of more than $200,000.

"The Liberty is the largest work of its kind that has ever been completed. The famous Colossus of Rhodes, according to the proportions which the legends attribute to it, was but a miniature in comparison. The Column Vendome is not so high by seven feet.

"Yet we must not expect its appearance to be colossal when it is in its place. In the immense picture which will surround it, it will appear simply in harmony with the whole, and have the normal aspect of a statue in a public place. It should be thus, because its part is not to appear extraordinary in itself, but to connect itself intimately with an extraordinary whole."

has been a difficult problem to solve. It was at first intended to cut a strip out of the bronze torch which the statue holds in its uplifted hand, and put inside ten lamps of eight thousand candle power. It was found, however, that the heat radiating from the lamps would injure the statue. Thirty holes have been cut in the torch and the apertures filled with circular pieces of glass through which the light will shine. At the base of the pedestal there will be placed several 8,000-candle-power lamps for the purpose of lighting the outside of the statue. These lights will be put at the angles of the parapets and provided with parabolic reflectors to throw the light upon the statue. Incandescent lamps will also shine from the diadem, giving the appearance of jewels.

The Mayor of New York has asked that the day of dedication be kept as a holiday. The ceremonies at the statue will last during the afternoon, after which the fleet of French and American war vessels will salute each other and go through evolutions. The huge torch of the statue will then be lighted and then the flotilla will return to the city and the French visitors will be entertained at a banquet.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

"Not Right Over the Border-Land."—Mr. Campbell White related at a recent meeting: "A young person came to me one evening, and said, 'Will you speak a word of warning to my friend?' 'Have you ever spoken to him yourself?' I asked. 'No,' she replied; 'as it is a very delicate subject to speak upon, I think it would come better from a stranger, and it would scarcely do for me to speak to her.' 'You are just the one to speak to her,' I said. 'Do you know the reason why you shrink from doing so? It is because you are not out-and-out for Christ yourself.' It is very true that people who shrink from telling what the Lord has done for them, or pointing others to Christ, have not got right over the border-land of Egypt themselves."

"Don't Mind What That Fellow Says."—At a Gospel meeting, George Clark related the following: "The other day I was trying to persuade a young man to become a follower of the Lord, when a companion, who was near, said, 'Come away, don't mind what that fellow says.' Turning to him I said, 'Look here, if your friend goes to hell you will be to blame, and you will have to answer for it.' 'In what way shall I be to blame?' he asked, with a sneer. 'Because if it had not been for you he would probably have closed with Christ.' 'Don't try that game on with me,' he said; 'I had nothing to do with it.' I turned away, praying God to have mercy upon him. Before I had gone many yards he was by my side, apologising for the way in which he had spoken, 'Do not apologise to me, my dear fellow,' I said; 'it is God from whom you have to ask pardon.' I saw I had touched a tender chord in his heart. He walked on by my side until we reached the railway station, where I got into a carriage, and there by that carriage window I sincerely believe that young man closed with Christ."

A Message the Sea Breeze Brought.—Mr. Calder says: "I knew a man who was sometimes on the side of religion, and other times would speak against it. A few Christian friends and myself set apart a certain time of each day to pray for this man, being fully persuaded that the Lord would bend a listening ear to our cry for our brother, who was doing so much harm in His cause. About this time Mr. Moody visited Aberdeen; he was one day preaching in the open air at a place called the Broad Hill, beside the sea. This man, on this particular day, was among the many hundreds who thronged to hear Mr. Moody. When he began to address the people this man was heard to mutter something against the preacher, and then move away from the crowd. A little girl overheard him, and, running after him, she touched him on the arm and said, 'Do you think anybody sees you?' 'Get away, child,' he said, angrily; 'no, I do not believe it.' The child turned sorrowfully away at being so rudely rebuffed in her efforts to do good, but her words were not lost; they had accomplished the work which God meant they should. The man seated himself on the brow of the hill and looked down on the throng below. The child's words kept ringing in his ears. While he tried to persuade himself that they were not true, a breeze from the sea wafted a sentence from the speaker's lips up to where he sat: 'O man, God sees you.' This confirmed the child's question. He came down from his seat and was found at the close of the service among anxious inquirers. He is now an active worker in the cause of Christ in Aberdeen."

THE FINISHED WORK.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday,
Oct. 24, 1886.

"I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." John 17:4.

Joy in Successful Achievement—Alexander's Life Saved by a Dream—The Ghastliest of all Wounds—The Balm Bearer—Christ's Undertaking—His Triumph Over Embarrassments—His Occupation—Producing Fatigue—Dress and Diet—His Poverty—Lack of Education—A Short Life—Unpopular Principles—No Organization—Victorious Over Nature—Over Disease—Over the Grave—Theodosius and the Bishop—The Test of the Crosses.

THERE is a profound satisfaction in the completion of anything we have undertaken. We lift the capstone with exultation, while, on the other hand, there is nothing more disappointing than, after having toiled in a certain direction, to find that our time is wasted and our investment profitless. Christ came on which the whole world might, if it chose, mount into heaven. He did it. The foul-mouthed crew who attempted to tread on him, could not extinguish the sublime satisfaction which he expressed when he said: "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do."

Alexander the Great was wounded and the doctors could not medicate his wounds, and he seemed to be dying, and in his dream the sick man saw a plant with a peculiar flower, and he dreamed that that plant was put upon his wound, and that immediately it was cured. And Alexander, waking from his dream, told this to the physician, and the physician wandered out until he found just the kind of plant which the sick man had described, brought it to him, and the wound was healed. Well, the human race had been hurt with the ghastliest of all wounds—that of sin. It was the business of Christ to bring a balm for that wound—the balm of divine restoration. In carrying this business to a successful issue, the difficulties were stupendous.

In many of our plans we have our friends to help us; some to draw a sketch of the plan, others to help us in the execution. But Christ fought every inch of His way against bitter hostility and amid circumstances all calculated to depress and defeat.

In the first place, His worldly

OCCUPATION WAS AGAINST HIM.

I find that He earned His livelihood by the carpenter's trade—an occupation always to be highly regarded and respected. But you know, as well as I do, that in order to succeed in any employment one must give his entire time to it, and I have to declare that the fatigues of carpentry were unfavorable to the execution of a mission which required all mental and physical faculties. Through high, hard, dry, husky, insensate Judaism to hew a way for a new and glorious dispensation, was a stupendous undertaking that was enough to demand all the concentrated energies even of Christ.

We have a great many romantic stories about what men with physical toil have accomplished in intellectual departments, but you know that after a man has been toiling all day with adze and saw and hammer, plane and axe, about all he can do is to rest.

A WEARY BODY

is an unfavorable adjunct to a toiling mind. You, whose life is purely mechanical, if you were called to the upbuilding of a kingdom, or the proclamation of a new code of morals, or the starting of a revolution which should upturn all nations, could get some idea of the incoherence of Christ's occupation with His heavenly mission.

In His father's shop, no more intercourse was necessary than is ordinarily necessary in bargaining with men that have work to do; yet Christ, with hands hard from touch of tools of trade, was called forth to become a public speaker, to preach in the face of mobs, while some wept, and some shook their fists, and some gnashed upon Him with their teeth, and many wanted Him out of the way. To address orderly and respectful assemblages is not so easy as it may seem, but it requires more energy, and more force, and more concentration to address an exasperated mob. The villagers of Nazareth heard the pounding of His hammer, but all the wide reaches of eternity were to hear the stroke of His spiritual upbuilding.

So also His habits of

were against Him. The mighty men of Christ's time did not appear in apparel without trinkets and adornments. None of the Cæsars would have appeared in citizen's apparel. Yet here was a man, here was a pretended king, who always wore the same coat. Indeed it was far from shabby, for after he had worn it a long while, the gamblers thought it worth raffling about; but still it was far from being an imperial robe. It was a coat that any ordinary man might have worn on an ordinary occasion.

Neither was there any pretension in His diet. No cupbearer with golden chalice brought Him wine to drink. On the seashore He ate fish, first having broiled it Himself. No one fetched Him water to drink, but bending over the well in Samaria He begged a drink. He sat at only one banquet, and that not at all sumptuous, for, to relieve the awkwardness of the host, one of the guests had to prepare wine for the company.

Other kings ride in a chariot; He walked. Other kings, as they advance, have heralds ahead, and applauding subjects behind; Christ's retinue was made up of sunburned fishermen. Other kings sleep under embroidered canopy; this one on a shelterless hill. Riding but once, as far as I now remember—on a colt, and that borrowed, was against Him. It requires money to build great enterprises. Men of means are afraid of a penniless projector, lest a loan be demanded. It requires money to print books, to build institutions, to pay instructors. No wonder the wise men of Christ's time laughed at this penniless Christ. "Why," they said, "who is to pay for this new religion? Who is to charter the ships to carry the missionaries? Who is to pay the salaries of the teachers? Shall wealthy Judaism be discomfited by a penniless Christ?" The consequence was that most of the people that followed Christ had nothing to lose. Wealthy Joseph of Arimathea buried Christ, but he risked no social position in doing that. It is always safe to bury a dead man. Zaccheus risked no wealth or social position in following Christ, but took a position in a tree to look down as He passed. Nicodemus, wealthy Nicodemus, risked nothing of social position in following Christ, for he skulked by night to find Him.

All this was against Christ. So the fact that he was

was against Him. If a man comes with the diplomas of colleges and schools and theological seminaries, and he has been through foreign travel, the world is disposed to listen. There was a man who had graduated at no college, had not in any academy by ordinary means learned the alphabet of the language he spoke, and yet he proposed to talk, to instruct in subjects which had confounded the mightiest intellects. John says: "The Jews marvelled, saying, how hath this man letters, having never learned?"

We, in our day, have found out that a man without a diploma may know as much as a man with one, and that a college cannot transform a sluggard into a philosopher, or a theological seminary teach a fool to preach. An empty head after the laying on of hands of the presbytery is empty still. But it shocked all existing prejudices in those olden times for a man with no scholastic pretensions and no graduation from a learned institution to set Himself up for a teacher. It was against Him.

So also

was against Him. He had not come to what we call mid-life. But very few men do anything before thirty-three years of age, and yet that was the point at which Christ's life terminated. The first fifteen you take in nursery and school. Then it will take you at least six years to get into your occupation or profession. That will bring you to twenty-one years. Then it will take you ten years, at least, to get established in your life work, correcting the mistakes you have made. If any man, at thirty-three years of age, gets fully established in his life work, he is the exception. Yet, that is the point at which Christ's life terminated.

Men in military life have done their most wonderful deeds before thirty-three years of age. There may be exceptions to it, but the most wonderful exploits in military prowess have occurred before thirty-three years of age. But as a legislator—no man becomes eminent as a legislator until he has had long years of experience. And yet the gray-bearded scribes were expected to bow down in silence before this young legislator, who arraigned sanhedrims and accused governments.

Aristotle was old; Lycurgus was old; Seneca was old. The great legislators of the world have been old. Christ was young. All this was against Him. If a child, twelve years of age, should get up in your presence to discuss great questions of metaphysics, or ethics, or politics, or government, you would not be more contemptuous than these gray-bearded scribes in the presence of this young Christ.

declared in those days, "Blessed is the merchant who has a castle down on the banks of Lake Tiberias." This young man said, "Blessed are the poor." Popular opinion said in those days, "Blessed are those who live amid statuary, and fountains, and gardens, and congratulations, and all kinds of festivity." This young man responded, "Blessed are they that mourn." Public opinion in those days said, "Blessed is the Roman eagle, the flap of whose wing startles nations, and the plunge of whose iron beak inflicts cruelty upon its enemies." This young man responded, "Blessed are the merciful." Popular opinion said, "An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth." In other words, if a man knocks your eye out, knock his out. If a man breaks your tooth, break his. Retort for retort; sarcasm for sarcasm; irony for irony; persecution for persecution; wound for wound. Christ said, "Pray for them that despitefully use you."

They looked at his eye. It was like any other man's eye, except, perhaps, more speaking. They felt his hand, made of bone and muscle, and nerves and flesh, just like any other hand. Yet what bold treatment of subjects, what supernatural demands, what

STRANGE DOCTRINE!

They felt the solid earth under them, and yet Christ said, "I bear up the pillars of this world." They looked at the moon. He said, "I will turn it into blood." They looked at the sea. He said, "I will hush it." They looked at the stars. He said, "I will shake them down like untimely figs." Did ever one so young say things so bold? It was all against him.

After the battle of Antietam, when a general rode along the lines, although the soldiers were lying down exhausted, they rose with great enthusiasm and huzzaed. As Napoleon returned from his captivity, his first step on the wharf shook all the kingdoms, and two hundred and fifty thousand men flocked to his standard. It took three thousand troops to watch him in his exile. So there have been men of wonderful magnetism of person. But hear me while I tell you of a poor young man who came up from Nazareth to produce a thrill which has never been excited by any other. Napoleon had around him the memories of Marengo, and Austerlitz, and Jena; but here was a man who had fought no battles, who wore no epaulettes, who brandished no sword. He had, probably, never seen a prince, or shaken hands with a nobleman. The only extraordinary person we know of as being in his company was his own mother, and she was so poor that, in the most delicate and solemn hour that ever comes to a woman's soul, she was obliged to lie down, among drivers grooming the beasts of burden.

I imagine Christ one day standing in the streets of Jerusalem. A man descended from high lineage is standing beside Him, and says: "My father was a merchant prince; he had a castle on the beach in Galilee. Who was your father?" Christ answers: "Joseph, the carpenter." A man from Athens is standing there unrolling his parchment of graduation, and says to Christ: "Where did you go to school?" Christ answers: "I never graduated." Aha! the idea of such

AN UNHERALDED YOUNG MAN attempting to command the attention of the world! As well some little fishing village on Long Island shore attempt to arraign New York. Yet, no sooner does He set His foot in the towns or cities of Judea, than everything is in commotion. The people go out on a picnic, taking only food enough for a day, yet are so fascinated with Christ that, at the risk of starving, they follow Him out into the wilderness. A nobleman falls down flat before Him, and says; "My daughter is dead." A beggar tries to rub the dimness from his eyes, and says: "Lord, that my eyes may be opened." A poor, sick, panting woman presses through the crowd, and says: "I must touch the hem of His garment." Children who love their mother better than anyone else, struggle to get into His arms, and to kiss His cheek, and to run their fingers through His hair, and for all time putting Jesus so in love with the little ones, that there is hardly a nursery in Christendom from which He does not take one, saying: "I must have them. I will fill heaven with these; for every cedar that I plant in heaven, I will have fifty white lilies. In the hour when I was a poor man in Judea, they were not ashamed of me; and now that I have come to a throne, I do not despise them. Hold it not back, oh weeping mother! lay it on my warm heart. Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Again, I remark, there was

in His behalf, and that was against Him. When men propose any great work, they band together, they write letters of agreement, they take oaths of fealty; and the more and complete the organization, the more and complete the success. Here was One who went forth without any organization and alone. If men had a mind to join in His company, all right; if they had a mind not to join in His company, all well. If they came, they were greeted with no loud salutation; if they went away, they were sent with no bitter anathema. Peter departed, and Christ turned and looked at him; that was all.

All this was against Him. Did any one ever undertake such an enterprise amidst such and by such modes? And yet, I am here to say it ended in a complete triumph. Notwithstanding His worldly occupation, His poverty, His plain face, His unpretending garb—the fact that He was schoolless, the fact that He had a brief life, the fact that He was not accompanied by any visible organization—notwithstanding all that, in an exhilaration which shall be prolonged in everlasting chorals: "I have finished the work Thou gavest Me to do."

SEE HIM VICTORIOUS

over the forces of nature. The sea is a crystal sepulchre. It swallowed the Central America, the President and the Spanish Armada, as easy as any fly that ever floated on it. The inland lakes are fully as terrible in their wrath. Recent travelers tell us that Galilee, when aroused in a storm, is overwhelming; and yet that sea crouched in His presence, and licked His feet. He knew all the waves and the wind. When He beckoned, they came. When He frowned, they fled. The heel of His foot made no indentation on the solidifical water. Medical science has wrought great changes in rheumatic limbs and diseased blood, but when the muscles are entirely withered no human power can restore them, and when a limb is once dead, it is dead. But here is a paralytic—his hand lifeless. Christ says to him, "Stretch forth thy hand," and he stretches it forth.

In the eye infirmity, how many diseases of that delicate organ have been cured? But Jesus says to one blind, "Be open!" and the light of heaven rushes through gates that have never before been opened. The frost or an axe may kill a tree, but Jesus smites one dead with a word. Chemistry may do many wonderful things, but what chemist, at a wedding, when the wine gave out, could change a pail of water into a cask of wine?

What human voice could command a school of fish? Yet here is a voice that marshals the scaly tribes, until, in a place where they had let down the net and pulled it up with no fish in it, they let it down again, and the disciples lay hold and began to pull, when, by reason of the multitude of fish, the net broke. Nature is His servant. The flowers—He twisted them into His sermons; the winds,—they were His lullaby when He slept in the boat; the rain—it hung glitteringly on the thick foliage of the Parables; the Star of Bethlehem—it sang a Christmas carol over His birth; the rocks—they beat a dirge at His death. Behold his

VICTORY OVER THE GRAVE!

The hinges of the family vault become very rusty because they are never opened except to take another in. There is a knob on the outside of the door of the sepulchre, but none on the inside. Here comes the Conqueror of Death. He enters that realm and says, "Daughter of Jairus, sit up!" and she sits up. To Lazarus, "Come forth!" and he came forth. To the widow's son he said, "Get up from that bier!" and he goes home with his mother. Then Jesus snatched up the keys of death, and hung them to his girdle, and cried until all the graveyards of the earth heard him, "O Death! I will be thy plague; O Grave! I will be thy destruction!"

No man could go through all the obstacles I have described, you say, without having

A NATURE SUPERNATURAL.

That arm—amid its muscles, and nerves, and bones were intertwined the energies of Omnipotence. In the syllables of that voice there was the emphasis of the eternal God. That foot that walked the deck of the ship in Gennesaret shall stamp kingdoms of darkness into demolation. This poverty-struck Christ owned Augustus, owned the Sanhedrim, owned Tiberias, owned all the castles on its beach, and all the skies that looked down into its water; owned all the earth and all the heavens. To Him of the plain coat belonged the robes of celestial royalty. He who walked the road to Emmaus, the lightnings were the fire-shod steeds of His chariot.

Yet there are those who look on and see Christ turn water into wine, and they say, sleight of hand. And they see Christ raise the dead to life, and they say: Easily explained; not really dead; playing dead. And they see Christ giving sight to the blind man, and they say: Clairvoyant doctor. Oh! what shall they do on the day when Christ rises up in judgment, and the hills shall rock, and the trumpets shall call, peal on peal?

In the time of Theodosius the Great, there was a great assault made upon the Divinity of Jesus Christ, and during that time Theodosius the Great called his own son to sit on the throne with him, and be a co-partner in the government of the empire; and one day the old bishop came and bowed down before Theodosius the emperor, and passed out of the room, and the emperor was offended, saying to the old bishop: "Why didn't you pay the same honor to my son, who shares with me in the government?" Then the old bishop turned to the young man and said: "The Lord bless thee, my young man," but still paid him no such honor as he had paid to the emperor. And the emperor was still offended and displeased, when the old bishop turned to Theodosius the Great and said to him: "You are offended with me because I don't pay the same honor to your son whom you have made co-partner in the government of this empire, the same honor I pay to you, and yet you encourage multitudes of people in your realm to deny the Son of God equal authority, equal power, with God the Father."

My subject also reassures us of the fact that in all our struggles

WE HAVE A SYMPATHIZER.

You cannot tell Christ anything new about hardship. I do not think that wide ages of eternity will take the scars from his punctured side, and his lacerated temples, and his sore hands. You will never have a burden weighing so many pounds as that burden Christ carried up the bloody hill. You will never have any suffering worse than He endured, when with tongue hot, and cracked, and inflamed and swollen, He moaned: "I thirst." You will never be surrounded by worse hostility than that which stood around Christ's feet, foaming, reviling, livid with rage, howling down his prayers, and snuffing up the smell of blood. Oh! ye fainthearted, oh! ye troubled, oh! ye persecuted one, here is a heart that can sympathize with you!

Again, and lastly, I learn from all that has been said this morning, that Christ was awfully in earnest. If it had not been

A MOMENTOUS MISSION,

He would have turned back from it disgusted and discouraged. He saw you in a captivity from which He was resolved to extricate you, though it cost Him all sweat, all tears, all blood. He came a great way to save you. He came from Bethlehem here, through the place of skulls, through the charnel house, through banishment. There was not among all the ranks of celestials one being who would do as much for you. I lay His crushed heart at your feet to-day.

Let it not be told in heaven that you deliberately put your foot on it. While it will take all the ages of eternity to celebrate Christ's triumph, I am here to make the startling announcement, that because of the rejection of this mission on the part of some of you, all that magnificent work of garden, and cross, and grave is, so far as you are concerned, a failure, went to the Holy Land to find the cross of Christ. Getting to the Holy Land there were three crosses excavated, and the question was, which of the three crosses was Christ's cross. They took a dead body, tradition says, and put it upon one of the crosses, and there was no life; and they took the dead body and put it upon another cross, and there was no life. But, tradition says, when the dead body was put up against the third cross, it sprang into life. The dead man lived again. Oh, that the life-giving power of the Son of God might dart your dead soul into an eternal life, beginning this day! "Awake, thou that sleepest, and rise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee life!"

HELENA, THE EMPRESS,

A Decided Stand Against Worldly Amusements is, we are glad to observe, being taken by a prominent clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The Rev. Lindsay Parker, who is well known and esteemed among all denominations in New York, has emphatically expressed his conviction that worldly methods and amusements in connection with church work are inconsistent. He has especially indicated dancing as one of those amusements, and it is expected that, during the coming winter, the young people connected with his church will be conspicuous by their abstention from the amusement. It may be hoped that other ministers will follow his example. There are cases personally known to us, of young persons who acquired a love for dancing at parties which their clergymen attended, and who, failing to get sufficient dancing at those church parties, have gone into the world to get it, and have now abandoned their church connection. Every clergyman organizing a dancing party, or encouraging it by his presence, assumes a responsibility which may involve him in remorse.

A TRAIN OF INCIDENTS.

The following suggestive narrative is sent by Mr. T. F. Judd to the Chicago Watchman:

Soon after opening our Young Men's Christian Association last year a brakeman on the C. M. & St. P. Ry., came in one evening, and, in the course of conversation, confessed that he had neglected his Bible and become cold in his life, but was determined to do differently. One Sunday, shortly after, this brakeman brought into the gospel meeting a friend, a fireman, who was not a Christian. This young man was impressed by the truth, and a day or two after came into the rooms, and, being dealt with personally and the "Way," made plain by the use of God's Word, he accepted Jesus as his Saviour, and soon united with one of the city churches, and has been an active Christian ever since.

Soon after his conversion, while spending the Sunday at La Crosse, at the other end of the run, he made the acquaintance of a young man, a fireman from another road, and in the course of conversation told him of his own conversion and urged upon him an acceptance of Christ. About the middle of that week these two men met on the streets of this city, and while walking together came upon an open air service being conducted by the City Mission. They stopped to listen and the Christian fireman gave his testimony for Christ.

At the close of the service some of the workers asked the unsaved man if he was a Christian, and upon his replying in the negative they inquired if he did not want to be a Christian, and he admitted that he did desire that very thing. So with his friend he went to the Mission rooms, and had the "way" unfolded and there accepted of Christ. It was only the other day that I learned of these facts from the lips of this man who was last converted, and who is working at quite a distance from the city. The incidents teach us the power of personal testimony, and how God will honor His Word.

A WORTHLESS REPENTANCE.

A CLERGYMAN writing in one of Mr. Spurgeon's publications relates an incident of his pastorate, which has led him to distrust the value of death-bed repentance. Not that genuine repentance, even at the eleventh hour, is unacceptable to God, but that repentance arising from fear of impending dissolution is often a mere panic which lacks the elements of true change of mind and heart. He says:

I remember when I was a village pastor, very late one Saturday night, while I was in a sound sleep, I was suddenly startled by a loud knocking at the street door. When I went out, I looked down upon the pale face of a young woman, who exclaimed, "Please, sir, will you come and see mother? Her's cruel bad, in a dying state." As soon as possible I was ready, and we made our way to one of a row of poor, broken-down cottages, which had the repute of being haunted, or "ill-wished." My guide led me up the broken stairs into the upper room, a sort of loft under the roof, and there, upon a miserable bed, lay the mother of the girl who had called me, surrounded by her sons and daughters who had come from far to "see mother die."

The moment I entered, the poor creature sprang up in her bed, and seizing my hand, cried in agony, "Oh, sir, do pray for me, do pray for me! I'm dying, I'm a poor lost soul, pray, pray!" Just then the day began to dawn, and the rays of light fell upon her pale face. In that solemn moment we all knelt by the bedside, she held my arm, and in a hoarse whisper kept crying: "Pray for me, do pray for me!"

Those were awful moments, for she had to look back upon a bad life; and a bad life and a death-bed are sorry company. I prayed, I read the passage, "The Son of Man is come to seek and save that which was lost," and I preached from that text to the poor creature; and still she held my arm, and still she cried, "Oh, sir, pray for me; I'm dying!" We prayed on through the early morning; the sun rose, the Sabbath day began, and still she cried, "Pray for me!"

As the service-time was approaching, I sent a hurried request to a friend to preach for me, and continued in prayer with the poor woman, pointing her to Christ as her only hope of salvation. About midday the light began to dawn upon her dark mind, the burden of sin seemed to roll away, and joy lit up the pale face of the sufferer. Suddenly starting up, she clapped her hands and called out, "Jesus loves me, I am so glad. Jesus loves even me." We joined in singing, and praised God for His love and His grace through Jesus Christ. It seemed as if heaven had begun in that poor chamber.

I wish I could stop here, but I must tell the rest. The excitement and strain of singing caused a gathering in her throat to break, and ultimately she recovered. What did she do? How did she live? Did she show her gratitude to God, who had saved her? No; she rose from her bed to seek again the liquor-shop, and to return to the mire and filth of a sinful and unholy life; her hatred to God's people was intense, and her bitterness of spirit was terrible to behold.

AN INCENDIARY'S CONFESSION.

IN a letter from Mexico City, dated August 18th, to the Foreign Missionary, Rev. Hubert W. Brown writes: About a year and a half ago our church in Tuxpan, Guerrero, was burned, but all trace was soon lost of the perpetrators of the outrage. A short time back, however, a man arrested for robbery, in attempting to establish his innocence and win favor with the judge, exclaimed: "The only thing I ever did was to burn the Protestant Church." The magistrate, as it happened, was a friend of Mr. Zavaleta, and at once proceeded to cross-examine the culprit, thus obtaining the names of several others implicated in the same crime. It is hoped the case will be pushed to a conviction, as punishment would afford a most salutary deterrent to other would-be offenders.

AN ENGINEER'S ANSWER.

THE following is related by Mr. C. H. Spurgeon: A young engineer was being examined, and this question was put to him: "Suppose you have a steam-pump constructed for a ship under your own supervision, and know that everything is in perfect order, yet, when you throw out the hose, it will not draw; what should you think?" "I should think, sir, there must be a defect somewhere." "But such a conclusion is not admissible; for the supposition is that everything is perfect, and yet that the pump will not work." "Then, sir," replied the student, "I should look over the side of the ship to see if the river had run dry."

Even so it would appear that if true prayer is not answered the nature of God must have changed.

A WHEELBARROW EXCURSION.

THE following description of a curious Sunday-school excursion is given in a letter to the Missionary Link, by Miss Bennett, who is laboring at Shanghai, China:

"We have a boarding-school of forty-three girls, and four day schools. To-day is Saturday, and the girls, having a half-holiday, are starting for a wheelbarrow excursion a few miles in the country. Forty pupils were accommodated in fourteen wheelbarrows, and all were as excited as children are the world over. The Chinese do not have picnics as foreigners enjoy, nor are there any woods here to hold them in. I have not seen any woods since I left dear America, and one may travel miles in this part of China and only find a small tree scattered here and there or a cluster of bamboo. The Chinese have special feast days, when they go in great droves, mostly in wheelbarrows, to some temple for worship, and I think this takes the place of our excursions.

Lately on Sabbath our little chapel was full to overflowing, one hundred and seventy Chinese being present. Over one hundred were our pupils, but the rest were strangers who came from the city and country. The bright, inquisitive faces of these people would delight you.

THE VATICAN ARMING.

By the Rev. J. P. Wylie, LL. D. Author of "The History of the Reformation," etc.

Conscious of an Approaching Opportunity—Preparing to Aid Antichrist—The Plan of the Campaign in the Syllabus—Securing the Schools—The Power of the Confessional—Revival of Pilgrimages—A Preparation for Crusades—Organization of Fraternities—The Weapon of Infallibility.

[Students of prophecy have long seen that the Pope will play a very important part in the closing scenes of this dispensation. His alliance with the Napoleonic Antichrist will be close and cordial. It will be of mutual service, the Pope being able to furnish to Antichrist the appearance and odor of sanctity which he will so sorely need to disguise his sulphurous origin and relations, and Antichrist being able to supply the Pope with the power of the secular arm which Rome always welcomes as an engine of persecution. The following article by Dr. Wylie shows that the Pope is preparing to render himself a valuable ally.]

THE faint image of a world governed by a Pope was exhibited in the thirteenth century during the reign of Innocent III. That image will revive and be seen in the greater splendor and completeness of that kingdom over which the Popes of the future will sway their sceptre. But how is this grand project to be realized? What are the instrumentalities which are to be put in operation for quelling the great revolt against the Papacy in the form of constitutionalism, toleration, and liberty of conscience.

In the Syllabus we see the programme of the future, we see there the foundations traced out of that great Babel which the builders of the Vatican are about to erect. But how, you ask, are the ideas and principles of the Syllabus to be rendered into facts? In order to this a great and various mechanism has been constructed, and is being put at this hour into busy operation.

THE SCHOOL.

There is, first the School. Wise for her own interests, the Church of Rome has taken into her own hands the education of youth, in some countries partially, in others entirely; she is training young Europe in the principles of the Syllabus. In France she has a staff of not less than 70,000 persons, male and female, engaged in the work of teaching youth. What are these 70,000 doing but binding down France in the chains of the Syllabus? In Italy and Spain the schools are worked mostly by priests and monks. In Belgium "Christian brothers" teach the boys, and nuns the girls. In Southern Germany the teachers in the schools are mostly clerical; it is the same in Austria. Here are millions and millions being reared in the Syllabus—being taught as the truth of God that all merely civil laws and civil rulers, so far as they are not in consonance with Popish Canon law, are moral nullities, and that the Pope is the one God-appointed and Divine governor of the earth.

The generation now being so trained will soon have the affairs of Europe in their hands. They will be the cabinet ministers of monarchs, the legislators of kingdoms; the editors of newspapers; teachers in colleges and schools; generals in the army; and, especially, they will form the rank and file of the soldiery which will fight the future campaigns.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

The Confessional is an ancient institution, suffered to languish in the last century, but which is again starting into new life, working with greater intensity and daily widening its range. Think of that tribunal, set up in every city, in every family, high and low, and in every bosom, and you will see what a power there is here to mould society, to write on the conscience of Europe the doctrines of the Syllabus. And think of the moral weakness of the men and women of Popish countries, their manliness and virtue sapped by the teachings of their Church, and their patriotism and loyalty undermined by the pretended Divine supremacy of the spiritual over the temporal power. Such a population is powerless to resist the organization and wiles of Rome. As clay in the hands of the potter, so are such men and women in the hands of the confessor.

THE REVIVAL OF PILGRIMAGES

is another sign of our times, prognosticating trouble. Nothing is better fitted to fan into a flame the fanaticism of the masses of Popish Europe than these pilgrimages. Lines of pilgrims on the roads of Europe have, in former times, been the sure prelude of the march of armies for the extirpation of heresy. Nothing is easier than to transform a band of devotees, with rosary and palm-staff, into a host of crusaders, who recite their breviary, or sing their aves, clad in shirt of mail and begirt with consecrated sword, for the rooting out of heresy. A signal from the Vatican, and lo! where pilgrims are now seen wending their way in peaceful guise to some favorite shrine, armed warriors would be seen marching to fight the battles of the Church.

ORDERS AND FRATERNITIES.

We see another yet more unmistakable sign that Rome, like Job's war-horse, scents the coming battle, in the revival of orders and confraternities. Numerous religious orders have been resuscitated of late, and almost all of them partake of a military character. Among these may be mentioned in particular the Order of St. Dominic. To the Order of St. Dominic was committed in an especial manner the task of rooting out heresy and heretics, their chief weapon being the sword, in other words, the Inquisition. It was the hordes of St. Dominic that overran the south of France, and swept away the young Protestantism of the thirteenth century in a tempest of fire and blood; and when we see that Order again called out, we take it that it is for service, and that the possibility is not unthought of, of sweeping away the Protestant liberties of the nineteenth century by a similar stroke, and of re-enacting in modern Christendom the scenes of slaughter and rapine which were witnessed in Provence and Languedoc in the Middle Ages.

THE DOGMA OF THE INFALLIBILITY.

There is another weapon for the coming conflict to which I can refer in only a single sentence—a space altogether disproportioned to its transcendent importance: I refer to the Infallibility. The Infallibility of the Pope it is that gathers up all the instrumentalities I have just enumerated, and combines them into one tremendous mechanism, and makes the working of that mechanism so swift and crushing. It strikes with the promptitude and power of omnipotence. Take a moment's survey of it. At the summit sits the Pope, infallible. From the Mount of Infallibility goes forth the fiat. It descends to the rank below, these send it on to the more numerous rank below them, and these to the yet more numerous rank below them; and thus it goes on, widening and widening, till it sets the world in motion. Of all these millions the Pope is the master.

THE JESUITS.

But has the Pope himself no master? Yes, he has a Master, and that Master is the Society of Jesus. Behind his throne stand in shadow the followers of Loyola. The Pope is simply the mouth through which the Jesuits speak, the hand by which they execute their deeds; and be the crime to which they prompt ever so enormous, he must issue the order for its perpetration, or prepare the robe and ring which are used at the funeral of popes. The Pope cannot abdicate. The man who once sits down in the fatal chair of St. Peter can never again leave it, for should he descend from his throne he would find a Jesuit waiting for him with a cup of poison at the foot of the steps.

The situation is farther complicated by another and very formidable fact. A new foe to liberty has suddenly sprung up in the leading countries of Europe. I refer to that Atheistic Socialism which has had so rapid and portentous a development of late, in France, in Italy, and more specially in Germany, and even in Russia.

This vastly enhances the dangers of the situation. We behold the European world falling asunder, dividing into two great camps. On the one side we have the governments and their friends; on the other, Communism and its adherents. The Ultramontanes are sure to come in between the two, and to play the same game they have been playing of late years in diplomacy. It will go to the kings, and it will say to them, "These men will uproot everything. Neither order, nor property, nor religion will they leave standing. I alone can save you from their fury. But in order that I may be able to save you, you must renew your former concordats with me. You must give free scope to my Canon law in your kingdoms; you must give all liberty to my bishops and priests in dealing with your subjects. If you do that I will tame these wild spirits, I will speedily quell these revolted masses, and lay them bound in chains at the foot of your thrones. But if you decline my bargain I shall retire, and then the deluge will inevitably roll in and overwhelm you."

The governments will find themselves between two formidable enemies. They will have the commune beneath them and Rome above them, and between these upper and nether millstones it may yet happen that they will be ground to powder.

THE SPIRIT OF THE GOSPEL.

From an Address by Rev. Sam Jones, at Toronto, on Oct. 7.

My Christian brethren and ladies and gentlemen of Toronto, it gives me great pleasure in the Lord to meet you and greet you in Christ Jesus my Lord. I come to you with a heart full of love of God and full of sympathy with my fellow-men. I come to you to-night with the conscience that I bring the prayers of twenty different States of the United States to this work. Thousands of persons have said to me, "We will pray for you every day, that God may make you a power in the Gospel of Christ." Brethren, can any man preach, not only with the consciousness that a hundred thousand people pray for him daily, but with this as a fact; can any man thus preach without power? There is a God, and that God hears and answers prayer; blessed be His holy name.

Let us try to get along friendly and kindly with each other. I promise you this much: nothing you say or do shall hurt my feelings. Really, I never carry my feelings round with me. When I leave home I leave my feelings there. I'm afraid somebody will hurt them, and I don't want them hurt.

LEAVE YOUR FEELINGS AT HOME.

Come to the house of God to be benefited, and take what will benefit you and leave the other for somebody else, because, I assure you, the thing you don't like is the very thing some other fellow does like, and when you have to speak to a crowd like this you have to have a great deal of variety to suit every fellow. Let us work in harmony. Above all things, you Christian people who have the ear of God, pray and pray, and I promise you this much: things will look bright and happy from the other end of the meeting.

Come in the name of Jesus. I come in the name of our Father in Heaven. I believe He will help me. If I didn't, I would shut this book and shut my mouth and take the first train that leaves this city for home. Trusting in God and believing you will co-operate with me in God, I shall begin the work; and remember this if you remember nothing else, that I said, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive all honour, and riches, and power and dominion forever and ever."

Religion is the setting of the Ten Commandments to music in your soul. Oh, we hear of Christian people taking up crosses. Brethren, do you know what a cross is? There is a cross where God's will is one way and yours another—right across—what a cross! But if your will is on a right line parallel with the will of God, the cross is all gone. And, brethren, let me say right at this point, no man can be religious in anything unless he is religious in everything. Religion is loyalty to God and the right. It is not doing right ninety-nine times out of a hundred; but it is doing right a hundred times in a hundred, and a thousand times in a thousand, and a million times in a million.

This term, holy holiness, if you will put a "w" before it, you will get the best idea of believers you ever had. It is a hundred cents on the dollar—it is doing the square thing every time you do anything. Now, you hear a man say, "Business is is religion." Yes, that's true, and I hope when you get through doing business, I hope you will set in and be religious some of these days. Some people can't run two things at once, especially when they are so diametrically opposite as the way you run business and the way God wants you to run religion. A man ought to be just as devout and religious selling calico or sugar, as he is at home in his family devotions. This world will never proceed on the lines of peace, happiness, and prosperity until every man trades and talks and lives on Gospel principles. Who trades on Gospel principles? Well, I would make the merchant trade in the interest of the customer, and the customer in the interest of the merchant. Suppose you had that sort of tradesmen in this country, do you reckon there would be anybody that would not pay their debts? Do you reckon there would be anybody swindled in a trade? This is simply doing unto others as you would have them do unto you. These are Gospel principles. I wish we would run this world on Gospel principles. We would have a grand world. Why, if we are not going to get to heaven at all, the next best thing is to get up as much of a heaven down here as it is possible for us to have. Ain't that a good idea? We have been singing to-day "Sweet By-and-bye." We are ringing the changes on this all over the land. I wish that we would hush that for twelve months and sing "The Sweet Now and Now."

God will only incorporate

when it is like the New Jerusalem—free from sin. A devout man has religion through and through him every day in the week and all the time, everywhere he goes. You have not got many of that sort of men. When you meet such a member of a church as that, you know him. He is worth his weight in gold in any of your churches. You know what to expect of him. If you have a prayer-meeting, you know he will be there if he is alive; when you have work to be done in your Church, you know he will lend a hand. I wish we had them all of that sort. I will tell you another thing. That is just what is the matter in all this broad land of ours. We have so few in the Church who are what they profess to be. It is true to-night, and it was true 1800 years ago. Jesus never received a wound or a blow from anyone but

A PROFESSED FRIEND.

Did any of you ever think of that? Do you know who it was that denied him? A professed friend. Do you know who sold him for thirty pieces of silver? A professed friend. Who signed his death-warrant? A professed friend. Never from anybody but professed friends were these wrongs received by Jesus Christ. There are three classes of men whom God has never been able to do much with—the tool, the stingy man and the lazy man. I have seen the Lord do His best with them, and fail utterly. I speak that reverently, too. God help us to be noble, to be pious, to be gentle and loving and true.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Both Houses of the Vermont Legislature voted, by a large majority, on Oct. 19, to elect Mr. George F. Edmunds for another term in the United States Senate. The event has more significance than usual, because threats were freely uttered that Mr. Edmunds would be disciplined for his lack of enthusiasm for the Presidential ticket in 1884. It appears that his conduct then has not cost him his seat, nor has the Senator repented, and promised to be more faithful in future. To a Vermont representative who wrote him on behalf of himself and others, before voting, asking if he would give some assurance of supporting the Presidential nominee in 1888, Mr. Edmunds replied that if any Republican had doubts of his fidelity to the principles of the party in the past or future, that Republican had better not vote for him. Mr. Edmunds seems rather to have evaded the question, which referred to persons, not principles.

An Address to the Republicans of the Nation has been forwarded to us for publication by the National Executive Committee of Anti-Saloon Republicans. It presents in vivid colors the history of the rise and progress of the saloon power in politics and shows how it is breeding criminals, defying the law, corrupting the legislature, and adding to the financial burdens of the people. It also declares that "the prestige, resources and championship of a great historic party are needed on the side of the home and the public welfare. The Republican party is called to this place and work, and called by a cause as genuine and majestic as that which summoned it into existence." All this manifesto we steadfastly believe. The difficulty is as to whether the Republican party will respond to the call. The Democratic party is also called, and both parties contain many good men who would like nothing better than to grapple vigorously with the monster evil. But both parties recognize the fact that though it is safe to denounce the liquor traffic in platforms, they cannot take practical steps for its suppression without losing millions of votes, and hitherto both parties have shown a disposition to sacrifice principle to expediency in this matter. We heartily wish success to the Anti-Saloon Republicans in their effort to gain control of their party and set it right on this issue. If they succeed, thousands of Prohibitionists will gladly return to the party, which they were reluctant to leave; but until their prospects of success are more hopeful than they now are, earnest temperance men will not pledge themselves beforehand to support the candidates who may be nominated by a national convention.

The Contest for the Mayoralty of New York shows clearly that the power of the workingman in politics is being recognized by the millionnaire class. Mr. Hewitt, the Democratic candidate, devoted his chief speech last week to the task of convincing his hearers that he had been a workingman from his youth, and had even paid for his education himself, by his earnings. Mr. Roosevelt, the Republican candidate also presented his claims. Being charged with belonging to "the employing and landlord class," he replied: "On the contrary, I own no land at all except that on which I live," and adds, "the only place where I employ many 'wage workers' is on my ranch in the West, and there almost every one of the men has some interest in the profits, either because he is partly paid by a share out of them, or because he has invested a portion of his surplus earnings in the business with me." Evidently the workingman has more friends than he thought he had, and we may hope that the friendship will be as considerate and cordial after the first week in November has gone by.

The Arrest of Jacob Sharp and Three Other prominent railroad officials in New York on October 19 is a gratifying sign of the times. There is no vindictiveness in the statement, for we bear no ill-will to Mr. Sharp and his friends; but it is well in the interest of public morality that when a crime is committed, all the guilty parties should be punished. The result of the previous trials showed that the New York Aldermen had been purchased, and as the bargain was a crime, it would appear that the buyer was as culpable as the seller. It will be a good thing for New York and other cities if it becomes known that the giving and taking of bribes is not only a moral wrong, but is liable to involve a long term in the penitentiary for both him who gives and him who takes. Men, who are not deterred from doing anything by the knowledge that it is wicked, will often hesitate when they become aware that it is dangerous.

An Extension of the Free Delivery System may be expected as a result of last year's post-office business. The annual report of Superintendent Bates, submitted last week, shows that the cost of the free delivery service of the Post-office Department in the last fiscal year was $4,312,306, while the revenue derived from local matter collected and delivered by this service was $5,839,242. The number of pieces handled was greater than the number of the preceding year by one-tenth. As the twenty-seven cities in which the system is in operation yielded a profit to the government of a million and a half, there is clear encouragement to the department to extend it to cities of the next grade.

Earthquake Shocks More Violent Than Any felt since the terrible convulsion of August 31st, were noticed on Friday afternoon in the Southern States. The disturbance affected an area of one hundred thousand miles, and was most severe in South Carolina and Georgia. It was also felt in parts of Virginia and Ohio. In Washington, D. C., it shook the higher buildings perceptibly, and in the Star office a quantity of type was thrown down. No injuries to life or property are reported. Scientists on both sides the Atlantic are earnestly studying the phenomena. The majority of them agree in believing that earthquakes are due to the cooling of the earth's crust, while the interior is a mass of liquid fire generating gases and steam. Dr. Archibald Geikie, writing in an English periodical, says: "Never within recorded human experience has there been more terrestrial disturbance than during the last few years," and adds that, if the theory above mentioned is correct, "the gradual increase in the thickness of the cool outer crust will offer continually augmenting resistance to the movements of the hot interior, and, hence, that earthquakes and volcanic eruptions ought now to be less constant, but more violent, than in the older time." This, prophecy leads us to expect. It is also worthy of notice that one result of the recent earthquake prefigures a characteristic of the great future earthquake. A high hill in Tazewell County, Virginia, known as Flat-Top Mountain, was rent asunder. The crack remains, and large trees and rocks have been flung in to render a passage over it possible (See Zech. 14: 4).

Preparations for War Continued to be the burden of the communications which the European correspondents of the American press cabled to their respective journals last week. They were based apparently, not on definite international complications, but on the general uneasiness and mutual antagonism which is regarded by careful observers as a sure precursor of war. In every country in Europe the gunsmiths are busy, and the governments are actively engaged in bringing their military and naval forces to the highest point of efficiency. A significant feature of the situation is the antagonism manifested by the French press toward England. Since France has entered into cordial relations with Russia this antagonism has been more marked and more violent than that displayed toward Germany before the war. The French premier is being urged to demand the immediate evacuation of Egypt, and is assured that France will support him enthusiastically in menacing England with war in the event of non-compliance. Meanwhile, the meeting of the Bulgarian Sobranje is anticipated with some anxiety. In the present state of mutual jealousy and hostility the Bulgarian spark may ignite the powder magazine, the explosion of which will shake the continent. There has never been a period in history so full of awful interest to the observer of current events, who is also a student of prophecy, as that on which we are now entering.

An Effort to Reconcile the Two Factions into which the British Liberal party is now split has been made by Lord Monck. It is an ingenious attempt to combine the principles of Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Hartington. Like all compromises, it has few friends, but all recognize that it presents the only available ground for united action. Lord Monck proposes that the Imperial Parliament should delegate its functions in certain clearly defined provinces of Irish affairs to a council or councils sitting in Ireland, retaining the right of veto in its own hands, but with no power to amend. Thus, an Irish bill, debated and passed in Ireland, could not become law without the consent of the British Parliament, which would vote directly, yea or nay, on the question of its enactment. It is understood that Mr. Gladstone is willing to accept the scheme, though not entirely approving it, and that Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Hartington would accept it with modifications. The prospects of reconciliation are, however, clouded by the advanced programme of Lord Randolph Churchill. The Liberal deserters appear to be more inclined to assist Lord Randolph than to meet Mr. Gladstone on Lord Monck's platform.

The Jubilee of Queen Victoria's Accession to the British throne will be celebrated on June 30, 1887. A large assemblage of loyal persons of prominence took place on October 18 to decide on an appropriate method of showing the national gratification on the occasion. The meeting was held at Lambeth Palace, the residence of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The meeting did not decide to present the Queen with a testimonial in money, which would doubtless have been misconstrued by the public, even if it would have been approved by the Queen. A proposition advocated by the Archbishop and other prelates was eventually adopted, to erect a memorial church, and a committee was appointed to collect funds and select a site. Mr. Gladstone declined to allow his name to be associated with the project.

The Bible and Prophetic Conference to be held at Chicago on Nov. 16-21, promises to be a gathering deeply significant of the progress of prophetic study in America. The correspondence of the indefatigable secretary, Rev. George C. Needham, shows that the interest in all denominations throughout the United States, Canada and England increases as the time appointed for the assembling of the Conference approaches. In addition to the list of subjects and speakers published in these columns on Sept. 30 (page 615), Mr. Needham has received promises of the following papers: The Sure Word of Prophecy, by Bishop Baldwin, of Canada; Palestine Restored and Re-Peopled, by Dr. J. R. Graves, of Memphis, Tenn., author of "The Seven Dispensations"; Interpretation and Fulfillment of Prophecy, by Prof. E. G. Reaser, of Fulton, Mo. Dr. George C. Lorimer, of Chicago, will also deliver an address. Contributions to the fund for defraying the expenses of hiring a hall, printing, and correspondence are needed. They should be sent to Rev. George C. Needham, 148 Madison St., Chicago, Ill.

The Annual Week of Prayer for Young men begins Sunday, Nov. 14. This appointment is made by the World's Conference and the American International Convention of Young Men's Christian Associations. It will be the twenty-first observance of this season, and the indications are that it will be more widely observed by the Associations, in this country particularly, than in any previous year. According to the latest gathered statistics, there are in the world 3,372 associations. In America there are 1,071, with an aggregate membership of 140,000; 148 boys' departments, 66 railroad branches, 13 German branches, 226 college, and 27 colored Associations. The early establishment of the International Organization in America, with an efficient managing committee and visiting secretaries, the subsequent establishment, through this parent agency, of strong State organization, with effective executive committees and travelling secretaries, together with the large increase in the number of local secretaries, are among the principal causes of the marvellous growth of the American Association.

The Rev. Thomas Harrison's Health is now steadily improving. His many friends in New York and other States, who were deeply concerned by the announcement made a month ago, that he was suffering from paralysis and his recovery was despaired of, will be glad to learn on the authority of the Christian Advocate, that he has at no time been so ill as was reported, and is now so far on the way to recovery that he is hoping to resume work at no distant day.

At the Annual Meeting of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of New York, held recently at Albany, Mrs. Mary T. Burt was re-elected President. The report showed that in thirty-nine counties there are 383 auxiliary branches, with a membership of 9,459. In the 179 temperance schools, there is an enrollment of 10,595 scholars. During the year 2,357 meetings were held, and $18,295.49 was collected. There are 25 auxiliaries in the 14 unorganized counties. The total membership is 10,045, an increase of 1,462. The total collections were $20,111.56. Including juveniles, 125 new unions have been organized, with a membership of 1,000.

The Executive Committee of the Temperance Association of Friends of which Mr. Jabez Wood is chairman, has issued an earnest and timely appeal to voters in the present electoral crisis. The committee calls attention to the danger threatening society from the enormous increase of the liquor traffic in our great cities, and reminds all voters, and the mothers, wives, sisters, and all ladies who have influence over voters, of the individual responsibility resting upon every person holding the right of elective franchise, and the importance of his vote in the coming elections; and it makes the appeal to these, that in no case may they give encouragement to, or cast their vote for, any candidate for official position—more especially for a place in any legislative assembly—who is not known to be in favor of legislation for the suppression of this great evil, and who will not use, conscientiously all proper means to have it eradicated.

The Basement of a House was Swallowed up by a colliery at Shenandoah, Penn., on Oct. 13. Early in the morning of that day a girl, residing with her parents on West Coal street of that town, went into the basement, and seeing at the foot of the stairway what appeared to be a bar of iron, she attempted to pick it up. The bar turned out to be a lead pipe, which conveyed the supply from the water main to the rear of the house. She then opened a door, and when the light shone in, she found herself standing on the brink of a cave-in about eighteen feet in diameter and perhaps one hundred feet deep. The whole bottom of the basement had fallen into the workings of Oakdale colliery. The house is still standing, but fears are entertained not only for its safety, but for the safety of other houses in the neighborhood. The girl felt amazement and terror at seeing that yawning chasm instead of the solid floor on which she was accustomed to set her foot. Happily for her, she saw her danger in time. Her experience was something like that of an awakened sinner, when, enlightened by the Holy Spirit, he sees himself standing on the brink of perdition. (Acts, 16: 30).

A Pre-occupied Mother Received a Shock the other day in a Boston street. The Record says that a woman came into the city from the near suburbs trundling her baby, a year and a half old, in a baby carriage, and looking into the shop windows as she went along. There was a milliner's window that was particularly resplendent and the suburban mother stood looking at the bonnets for a long time. Then she started on her way across the street trundling the carriage before her. On the other corner a grocery man, who stood in front of his store, said to her: "Ain't you dropped something, ma'am?" "Why, no, I guess not," she replied. "What makes you ask?" "Nothing; only you seemed to be shoving that baby carriage kind o' careful like, as if there was something in it, and there ain't nary a baby there." "Oh, mercy!" screamed the mother. She looked into the carriage and it was empty. There was no telling how soon she would have fainted if she had not heard a faint cry, from the other side of the street. Her offspring had amused himself while she was looking at the bonnets by climbing down out of the carriage and moving along to the next store. There is reason to fear that the time is coming when many mothers will discover that while their attention was engrossed in dress, gaiety and the affairs of the world their children were lost for the next world if not for this (Prov. 23: 13, 14).

A Marriage Engagement Broken by a Church collection, is an item of news published by a Georgia journal. It states that a Macon young man, somewhat given to display, succeeded in winning the affections of a Christian girl residing at Griffin, Ga. He concluded that there was no better way of raising himself in her esteem than by professing an ardent devotion to religion, and he professed more than he felt. On a recent Sunday while visiting her at Griffin they went to church together. When the contribution box started out on its rounds the young man took a five-dollar gold piece out of his vest pocket and displayed it in such a way that the young lady saw it. She mildly rebuked his extravagance, but he said he often contributed that much, especially when in strange churches. Watching his chance he slipped the gold coin into his pocket and slyly took out a silver quarter, which he as slyly slipped into the box when it reached him. This fixed the impression on the young lady that her lover was generous, and desirous of aiding the cause of Christ. At the close of the services, as was the custom of the church, the amount in the box was announced. The total was $3.75. The humiliating disclosure frustrated the young man's hopes of winning the lady as his wife. She rightly concluded that a deception of that kind was an evidence of a contemptible mind, and her loss of respect was a death-blow to her love. It may be hoped that his loss of a wife will be a lesson that will lead to a reformation in the young man's character. An opportunity for repentance is given to him as it was not given to Ananias and Sapphira, who sinned in the same way (Acts 5: 2).

A Million Dollars a Word is said to have been the value of a sentence spoken by the presiding judge of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania on October 18. The question before the court was whether it should reverse the decision of the court below, forbidding the transfer of a large block of stock in the Beach Creek, Clearfield and Southwestern Railroad Company from one holder to another. Having listened to long and elaborate arguments by counsel on both sides, the Court decided to confirm the decision of the lower court. The judge pronounced the decision in eleven words. He said: "Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed at the cost of the appellants." The ownership of more than eleven million dollars was determined by those few momentous words. The parties concerned must have listened to them with breathless attention. It would be so with the words in which God's message offering eternal life to the world is conveyed if men realized their full import as they do the words involving the possession of money (John 5: 39).

A Life of Subjection to Money-Lenders ended recently in New York. The man, who was well-known in the city, was seized with pneumonia and died. An acquaintance who had heard of his death inquired of one of his friends whether it was true that the man had died of pneumonia. The answer was: "No, sir! he did not die of pneumonia; he died of bill-brokers, sir. He incurred a street debt of $2,000, which rapidly rolled up to $8,000, and crushed the life out of him. He borrowed money on call, got paper discounted, and he worked, lived and died for the bill-brokers. Yes, sir, he died of a street debt, upon which he expended his strength every week, throwing it ahead from one day to seven." It was a melancholy picture. The man must have led a harassed life in borrowing money daily to repay loans and interest contracted but a short time before, repeating the process as each new loan fell due. It was like the fabled punishment of Sisyphus—a weary, hopeless labor. It is such an occupation that the dupes of Satan are engaged in when they try to win salvation for themselves, instead of accepting Christ's work. (Rom. 10: 3).

The Witty Retort of a Maine Lawyer is reported in the Lewiston Journal. It states that Mr. Curran, a noted lawyer of Washington County, Maine, recently attended a banquet given in St. Stephens, N. B., and listened somewhat restlessly to the invidious remarks made by the gentleman who responded to the toast of Great Britain, and who appeared to think that no other nation enjoyed the favor of God to a similar extent. The Englishman made frequent use in his speech of the well-worn phrase: "The empire on which the sun never sets," and reminded his hearers that it could be applied to no empire but the British. To Mr. Curran was committed the duty of responding to the next toast, which was that of the United States. He said that although he could not say of his country what the preceding speaker had said of his, that the sun never set upon it, he was grateful to God that He was not afraid of leaving it in the dark. However it may be with the country, the individual Christian has reason to be thankful when he enjoys so completely the keeping power of God, that he is in privacy and obscurity as blameless as in the light of publicity (Micah, 7: 8).

Earnest Christian Men and Women, who can raise hymn tunes and give short gospel exhortations, are wanted to be permanently stationed as evangelists at mission stations of the Gospel Union; salary ranging from five to ten dollars a week. Address Rev. M. Baxter, President Gospel Union, 63 Bible House, New York.

THE ANNUAL ATONEMENT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For on that day shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the Lord." Lev. 16:30.

The Way of Access to God—By Atonement Only—God's Own Way—The Institution of the Day of Atonement—I. What was Done on that Day—The Persons Cleansed—Purged of Sin—Impurity of Holy Things—II. How it was Done—III. Who Did It—The Solitary Worker—IV. What the People were to Do—Afflict their Souls—Cease from Work.

BEFORE Adam transgressed he lived in communion with God; but after he had broken the covenant, and grieved God's Spirit, he could have no more familiar fellowship with God. Under the Mosaic dispensation, in which God was pleased in His grace to dwell among His people and walk with them in the wilderness, it was still under a reserve: there was a holy place wherein the symbol of God's presence was hidden away from mortal gaze. No man might come near to it except in one only way, and then only once in the year, "The Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing." Our subject to-day illustrates the appointed way of access to God. This chapter shows that to God is by atonement, and by no other method. We cannot draw near unto the Most High except along the blood-besprinkled way of sacrifice. Our Lord Jesus said: "No man cometh unto the Father, but by Me;" and this is true in many senses, and in this among them, that our way to God lies only through the sacrifice of His Son.

The reason of this is that sin lieth at the door. Brethren, a pure and holy God cannot endure sin: He cannot have fellowship with it, or with those who are rendered unclean by it, for it would be inconsistent with His nature so to do. On the other hand, sinful men cannot have fellowship with God: their evil nature could not endure the fire of His holiness. Hence the difficulty of access, a difficulty which only a Divine method can remove. God cannot commune with sinful men, for He is holy. Sinful men cannot commune with a holy God, because He must destroy them, even as He destroyed Nadab and Abihu, when they intruded into His holy place.

How, then, shall men come to God? Only in GOD'S OWN WAY.

He Himself devised the way, and He has taught it to us by a parable in this chapter. It would be very wrong to prefer any one passage of Scripture beyond another, for all Scripture is given by inspiration; but if we might do so, we should set this chapter in a very eminent and prominent place for its fulness of instruction, and its clear yet deep doctrinal teaching. It treats upon a matter which is of the very highest importance to all of us. We are here taught the way by which the sin that blocks the door may be taken away, so that a seeking soul may be introduced into the presence of God and stand in His holy place, and yet live.

Before I proceed to enlarge upon this chapter, I want to notice that, of course, this was only a type. This great day of atonement did not see an actual atonement made, nor sin really put away; but it was the figure of heavenly things the shadow of good things to come. The substance is of Christ. If this day of atonement had been real and satisfactory, as touching God and the conscience of men, there would never have been another; for the worshippers once purged would have had no more conscience of sin. If they had lived fifty or a hundred years, they would never have needed another day of atonement; but because this was, in its nature, imperfect and shadowy, being only typical, therefore every year, on the seventh month, on the tenth day of the month, a fast was proclaimed, sin was confessed, victims were slain, and atonement was again presented. This Israel had to do constantly until Jesus, the true High Priest appeared, and now they have no sacrificing priest, nor altar, nor holy of holies. By Jesus Christ's one offering of Himself, sin was put away, once for all, effectually and finally, so that believers are really clean before God.

I. Now, then, let us come to the text, and note, first, on that particular day. The text tells us what was done symbolically—"On that day shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the Lord." The persons themselves were cleansed. If any of them had become unclean so as to be denied communion with God and His people, they were made clean, so that they might go up to the tabernacle, and mingle with the congregation. All the host were that morning regarded as unclean, and all had to bow their heads in penitent sorrow because of their uncleanness.

WHAT WAS DONE

It is a far simpler thing to remove outward stains than it is to purge the very substance and nature of man; yet this is what was done on the day of atonement typically, and this is what our redeeming Lord actually does for us. We are outlaws, and His atonement purges us of outlawry, and makes us citizens; we are lepers, and by His stripes we are so healed as to be received among the clean.

Their persons being made clean, they were also purged of all the sins confessed. I called attention, in the reading of the chapter, to its many "alls." I think there are seven or eight of them. The work which was done on that day was comprehensive: a clean sweep was made of sin. Certain grievous sins are comparable to cauldrons of foaming filth: no man will willingly own to them, however clearly they may be his; but when he does own to them before God, let him recollect that it is this real sin, this foul and essentially abominable transgression, which is put away by the atonement of Christ. Sin confessed with tears, sin which causes the very heart to bleed—killing sin, damning sin—this is the kind of sin for which Jesus died. Sham sinners may be content with a sham Saviour; but our Lord Jesus is the real Saviour, who did really die, and died for real sin. Oh, how this ought to comfort you, you that are sadly bearing the pressing burden of an execrable life; you, too, who are crushed into the mire of despondency beneath the load of your guilt!

It appears from this chapter, too, that another thing was done. Not only were all the sins that they had committed put away, but also all their

HOLY THINGS WERE PURGED.

There stood the altar upon which only holy things were offered; but, because imperfect men ministered there, it needed to be sprinkled with blood before it could be clean. Even the mercy-seat and the ground whereon it rested, was sprinkled with the blood of the sacrifice seven times. O, brothers and sisters, I do feel so glad that our Lord has atoned for the sins of our holy things. I rejoice that Jesus forgives the sins of my sermons. I have preached my very soul out among you with purity of motive, seeking to win men for Christ; but I dare not hope to have them accepted in and of themselves, for I perceive that they are defiled with sin. Blessed be God, atonement is made for all our faults, excesses and shortcomings. Jesus puts away, not only our unholy things, but the sins of our holy things also.

It is written, "The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin." I have often heard the text quoted with the "us" left out; permit me to put it in at this moment—"cleanseth us from all sin." Now, put yourself into the "us." Dare to believe that grace admits you there. By an act of faith, let all of us all round the galleries and in this great area say, "The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us." If you pull "us" to pieces, it is made up of a great many "me's." A thousand thousand times "me" will all pack away into a single "us." Let each one say: "The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth me, and cleanseth me from all sin." Be glad and rejoice forever because of this gracious truth. This was done on the day of atonement in the symbol, and it has been really done by the Lord Jesus through His atoning sacrifice.

II. Now we notice, in the second place, HOW IT WAS DONE.

We have seen what was done, and this is most cheering; but now we will see how it was done. I shall have to be brief in this description. The atonement was made, first of all, by sacrifice. I see a bullock for a sin-offering, a ram for a burnt-offering, and, again, a goat for a sin-offering. Many victims were offered that day, and thus the people were reminded of the instrumental cause of atonement, namely, the blood of sacrifice. We know that the blood of bulls and of goats could never take away sin; but very distinctly do these point to the sufferings of our dear Redeemer. The woes he bore are the expiation for our guilt. Atonement was made for your sins and mine by the shedding of blood—that is to say, by our Lord's suffering, and specially by His laying down His life on our behalf.

Notice, next, that the

not only by the blood of sacrifice, but by the presentation of the blood within the veil. With the smoke of incense and a bowl filled with blood Aaron passed into the most holy place. Let us never forget that our Lord has gone into the heavenly places with better sacrifices than Aaron could present. The presenting of the blood before God effects the atonement. The material of the atonement is in the blood and merits of Jesus, but a main part of the atoning act lies in the presentation of these in the heavenly places by Jesus Christ himself. Furthermore, atonement was made effectual by its application to the thing or person cleansed. The atonement was made for the holy place; it was sprinkled seven times with blood. The same was done to the altar; the horns thereof were smeared seven times. So, to make the atonement effectual between you and God, the blood of Jesus must be sprinkled upon you by a lively faith.

Further, my dear brethren and sisters, inasmuch as no one type was sufficient, the Lord set forth the method of the removal of sin, as far as we are concerned, by

THE SCAPEGOAT.

One of two goats was chosen to live. It stood before the Lord, and Aaron confessed all the sins of Israel upon its head. A fit man, selected for the purpose, led this goat away into a land not inhabited. What became of it? Why do you ask the question? It is not to edification. You may have seen the famous picture of the scapegoat, representing it as expiring in misery in a desert place. That is all very pretty, and I do not wonder that imagination should picture the poor devoted scapegoat as a sort of cursed thing, left to perish amid accumulated horrors. But please observe that this is all fancy—mere groundless fancy. The Scripture is entirely silent as to anything of the kind, and purposely so. All that the type teaches is this: In symbol the scapegoat has all the sin of the people laid upon it, and, when it is led away into the solitary wilderness, it has gone, and the sin with it. Sin is carried away into the silent land, the unknown wilderness. By nature sin is everywhere, but to believers in the sacrifice of Christ sin is nowhere. The sins of God's people have gone beyond recall. Where to? Do not ask anything about that. If they were sought for, they could not be found; they are so gone that they are blotted out.

Yet, dear friends, the ceremony was not quite finished; for now everybody who had had a hand in it must needs be washed, so that everybody might be clean. There is Aaron: he takes off his garments and washes himself scrupulously clean; yea, he does it a second time. Here is the man who took the scapegoat away, and he washes himself. Here is a third person, who carried away the skin and the flesh of the sin-offering, and burnt them without the camp; he also washes himself. Everybody becomes purged; the whole camp is clean right through. So, when Jesus completes His sacrifice, no sin remains upon him on whom the Lord once laid the iniquities of us all. The great atonement is made, and everything is cleansed, from beginning to end. Christ hath put it all away forever by the water and the blood which flowed from His riven side. All is purified, and the Lord looks down on a clean camp; and soon He will have them rejoicing before Him, each man in His tabernacle feasting to the full. I am so glad; my joy overflows. O Lord, who is a pardoning God like Thee? Where can such forgiveness be found as Thou dost freely give to sinners through Jesus, Thy Son?

III. In the third place, I ask your attention for a brief interval to this special point,
WHO DID IT?

The answer is, Aaron did it all. Aaron was quite alone in the work of that day. It was heavy, and even exhausting work, but he had no assistant. Aaron performed the work of priest and Levite that day, and no one helped him; for it is written, "There shall be no man in the tabernacle of the congregation when he goeth in to make an atonement in the holy place, until he come out, and have made an atonement for himself, and for his household, and for all the congregation of Israel." The tabernacle seemed lonely that day. Methinks I see him looking around in the solitude. He says, "I looked, and there was no man." Of the people, there was none with him. In the holy place there stood no priest to minister before the Lord save himself alone. It must have been with trembling that he lifted up the curtain and passed into the secret place of the Most High with the censer smoking in his hand. The tension of mind and heart which he endured alone that day must have been trying indeed. All that livelong day he must have been conscious of a burden of responsibility and a weight of reverence enough to bow him to the dust, and yet no one was present to cheer him.

Now fix your eye on the Great antitype of Aaron. There was none with our Lord: he trod the winepress alone. He his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree. He alone went in where the thick darkness covered the throne of God, and none stood by to comfort him. "All the disciples forsook him and fled." Worship our Lord as working salvation by his own single arm. Do not tolerate those who would share his work. Do not believe in priests of any church who pretend to offer sacrifice for the quick and the dead. They cannot help you, and you do not need their help. Do not put your own merits, works, prayers, or anything else side by side with your one lone High Priest, who in his white garments of holy service performed the holy work of expiation, and then came forth in his garments of glory and of beauty to gladden the eyes of his chosen.

IV. Lastly,

WHAT WERE THE PEOPLE TO DO

for whom this atonement was made? There were two things they had to do that day, only I must add that one of them was doing nothing. For the first thing, they had to afflict their souls that day. Brethren, does it seem to you a strangeness that on a day of rest they were to afflict their souls? Think of it a little, and you will see that there was cause for it. It was a day of confession of sin. And should not confession be made with sorrowful repentance? A dry-eyed confession is a hypocritical confession. To acknowledge sin without grieving over it, is to aggravate sin. We cannot think of our sin without grieving, and the more sure we are that it is forgiven, the more sorry we are that ever it was committed. Sin seems all the greater because it was committed against a sin-forgiving God. If you do wrong to a person, and he grows angry, you may be wicked enough to persist in the wrong; but if, instead of growing angry, he forgives, and does you good in return, then you will deeply regret that ever you had an unkind thought towards him. The Lord's pardoning love makes us feel truly sorry to have offended him.

Not only was it a day of confession, but it was a day of sacrifice. No tender-hearted Israelite could think of that bullock, and ram, and goat dying for him, without saying, "That is what I deserve." If he heard the moans of the dying creature he would say, "My own heart groans and bleeds." When we think of our dying Lord our emotions are mingled: we feel a pleasing grief and a mournful joy as we stand at Calvary. It was a day of sacrifice, and hence a day of affliction of their souls, and herein we are in sympathy with them.

Once more, it was a day of

and hence, by a strange logic, a day of the affliction of the soul; for, oh! when sin is forgiven, when we know it is forgiven, when by divine assurance we know that God has blotted out our sins like a cloud, then it is we mourn over our iniquities. "They shall look upon me whom they have pierced"—that look gives life; "and they shall mourn for him, as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for him, as one that is in bitterness for his firstborn"—this bitterness is one of the truest signs of life. They were to afflict their souls. Brethren, we cannot talk of the cross of Christ except in subdued tones. If you think you can laugh and sport yourself because your sin is forgiven, you know nothing of the matter.

Sin has been pardoned at such a price that we cannot henceforth trifle with it. The sacrifice was so august that we must ever speak of it with holy trembling. I always feel a suspicion of those converts who get up and glibly boast that once they were drunkards, thieves, blasphemers and so forth. Brother, if you do tell the story of your sin, blush scarlet to think it should be true. I am ashamed to hear a man talk of his sins as an old Greenwich pensioner might talk of his sea-fights. I hate to hear a man exhibiting his old lusts as if they were scars of honor. Friend, these things are disgraceful to you, however much the putting of them away may be to the honor and glory of God; and they are to be spoken of by you with shame and confusion of face. Afflict your soul when you remember what you once were.

On the day of atonement they were to afflict their souls, and yet

THEY WERE TO REST.

Can these things come together—mourning and resting? Oh yes, you and I know how they meet in one bosom. I never am so truly happy as when a sober sadness tinges my joy. The purified people were to rest; they were to rest from all servile work. I will never do a hand's turn to save myself by my own merits, works or feelings. I have done forever with all interference with my Lord's sole work. But you say to me—"Have we not to work out our own salvation?" Certainly we have. We are to work out our own salvation because God works it in us. It is our own salvation, and we show it forth in our lives: we work it out from within; we develop it from day to day, and let men see what the Lord has done for us. It must first be worked for us, and then in us, or we can never work it out.

They were assuredly to cease from all sinful work. How can the pardoned man continue in sin? We have done with toiling for the devil now. We will no more waste our lives in his service. Many men are worn to rottenness in the service of their lusts, but the servant of God has been set free from that yoke of bondage. We are slaves no longer: we quit the hard bondage of Egypt and rest in the Lord.

We have also done with selfish work; we now seek first the kingdom of heaven, and look that all other things shall be added unto us by the goodness of our heavenly Father. Henceforth we find rest by bearing the easy yoke of Christ. We joy to spend and to be spent in his beloved service. He hath made us free, and therefore we are under bonds to His love for ever. O Lord, I am thy servant, I am thy servant, thou hast loosed my bonds; henceforth I am bound to thee. God grant that this may be a high day to you, because you gladly realize the grand truths which are shadowed forth in these delightful types. Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.*

AN UNWELCOME COMMISSION.

"I HAVE a story to tell you, boys," said the old Doctor.

"One day, when I was a boy, I met my father on the road to town. 'Jim,' he said, in a hesitating way, 'I wish you would take this package into the village for me.'

"I was then about twelve years old, and not very fond of work. I had just come from the hayfield, where I had been hard at work since daybreak. I was tired and dusty and hungry. It was a two miles' walk into town. I wanted to go home and get my supper, and then wash and dress myself and go to the evening singing school.

"My first impulse was to refuse to go, for I was vexed to be asked to do this after my hard day's work. If I had refused he would have gone himself. He was a gentle, loving, kind, old man. Something stopped me from doing what I was just on the point of doing. I think it must have been one of God's good angels.

"'Of course, father, I'll take it,' I said, heartily, giving my scythe to one of the men. He gave me the package, saying as he did so, 'Thank you, Jim; I was going myself, but somehow I don't feel very strong to-day.' He walked with me to the road that turns off toward the town, and as I left him he laid his hand on my shoulder, saying again: 'Thank you, my son. You have always been a good boy to me, Jim.'

"I hurried to town and back home again. As I came near the house I saw a great crowd of farm hands about the door. One of them came to me, and, with the tears rolling down his face, said, 'Your father fell down dead just as he reached the door of his home. The last words he said were those he spoke to you in parting.'

"I am an old man now," said the doctor as he told the story, "but I thank God now, as I have over and over again, for the help he gave me in honoring and obeying my father upon that occasion."

WILLING TO SHOVEL.

Some years ago a young man came to this country from England to take a position as clerk in a new business enterprise, which had been started in the Southwest. He had been well educated at home, and had learned the warning against slothfulness; but, when he reached the place which he expected to make his home, he found to his surprise and sorrow that some unlooked-for change had occurred, and the business had failed. There he was, without friends, without money, and without a home in a strange land. He managed to work his way back to New York. He found himself an unknown stranger in the midst of that great, busy city. It was midnight; and the first morning after his arrival he set out to find work. He was accustomed to the use of the pen, but made up his mind to take any work he could get.

It was a snowy morning, and as he passed down Fourth Avenue he saw a lot of men shovelling snow from the sidewalks. He asked permission to join them in their labor. This was granted him, and he went to work as heartily as if shovelling had been his regular employment. While they were at work, the owner of the store from the front of which the snow was being shovelled, came out. He noticed the intelligent look of the young stranger's face, and wondered how it was that such a smart young man was working at such an occupation. He spoke to him, receiving a cheerful and respectful answer. Then he asked him some questions, drawing from him the story of his disappointment and present position. He was so much pleased with the young man's manner, that he invited him to call upon him at his office the next day. That night the young man laid aside his shovel, which he had no occasion to use any more.

The next morning he called on the merchant, and was offered a small place, at a low salary. He filled it so well, that in a few months he was raised to a higher position, and at the end of three years he was chief clerk in that great establishment, with the prospect of an interest in the business.

SIGNOR SUCCI, THE ITALIAN FASTER.

(See Illustration.)

SIGNOR GIOVANNI SUCCI, who has just carried out a thirty days' fast under rigid medical supervision, is thirty-six years of age, and was a bank clerk in Rome until about ten years ago, when he commenced travelling, and visited Arabia, North and South Africa, and South America. While in the East he said he had discovered a certain liquid, distilled from herbs, which would sustain life for a lengthened period.

On his release he gave a proof of the potency of his elixir by fasting fourteen days at Forli, after drinking it, and then consented to submit himself to a vigilance committee at Milan, under whose watchful care he would fast thirty days and thirty nights. At midnight, on Aug. 18th, he began his task, having fortified himself for the ordeal by taking sixty grammes of his elixir. For the first two or three days, which he asserted were the most trying, he remained in bed, only rising to wash and have his hair and beard trimmed. On the fourth day he got up and spent a hour in fencing and single-stick, and on the eighth went out on horseback for an hour and a half. On the twelfth day he went for a swim at the Ticino Baths, and returned to his house on foot. One of the most remarkable features of the case was, that Succi's muscular force did not appear to decrease, but rather to increase, during his fast.

Five physicians of position watched him through the month, and aver that it is certain that he has swallowed nothing but pure water, a portion of which was hot and some of it was heated to 104 degrees Fahrenheit. Small quantities of Vichy and Hunyadi Janos water completed his menu for the thirty days. In all, he drank two gallons of pure water and five gallons of medicinal water—which made about a quart of liquid a day.

When the month was at an end, the physicians and other witnesses signed a declaration that Signor Succi had faithfully observed the conditions laid down.

Signor Succi evidently suffered less than did Dr. Tanner, who fasted forty days. It may be that the other ten days would have been a more severe trial, but Succi contends that his immunity from pain was due to the sustaining virtue of his elixir, which continued to support him thirty days after being taken into his system.

The search for the elixir of life which would enable men to live for centuries, has been prosecuted by fanatics in all ages, especially in the East, where Signor Succi traveled. No man has discovered it yet, and better evidence is needed before we can believe in the claims of Signor Succi. Those who so eagerly seek long life on earth would do better if they spent their time in telling men how they may attain an immortality, not in this world of sin and sorrow, but in the land of holiness and bliss, through Him who said, "I am the living bread: if any man eat of this bread he shall live forever" (John 6: 51).

THE TRAMP'S REQUEST.

(See Illustration.)

ONE Sunday evening a few years ago, a lady remained home alone with her little daughter, while the other members of the family and the hired girls went to church. She had undressed her little one and was hearing the child say her evening prayer, when she was startled by a ring at the door-bell. The house was a lonely one and so few visitors came, especially on a Sunday evening, that the lady could not imagine who it was that sought admission. With a promise to the child that mamma would return soon, she ran down to the front door.

The man who stood there was too well dressed for the ordinary tramp, but though he claimed to be a workingman, there was about him the characteristics that indicated that whatever else he might be, it was not by his work that he lived. He looked strong and active, and his clothing was little worn, but the air of honest independence that the genuine workingman has about him, wherever he goes, and whatever his misfortunes, was conspicuously absent. Yet, he told a plain story. A sick wife, an aged mother, a family of children, hard times and no work at home, and a long journey to another State to seek employment.

The kind heart of the lady was touched by the story. She had her doubts about its truth, but it was better to err on the right side, she thought, and as the man asked only for something to eat, she yielded. "Come in," she said, and she took him into the kitchen and with her own hands found and set before him a substantial meal. The man did full justice to it, but all the time he was eating his eyes were peering suspiciously about the room. The lady tried to induce him to tell her more about his family, but failed. He was evidently thinking of something else, and his manner was so suspicious that the lady felt she would be glad when his appetite was satisfied and he was safe on the other side of the door.

The man ate until even he appeared to be unable to eat more, and pushed his plate from him. As he did so the door of the kitchen was quietly opened and the little girl, tired of waiting for mamma, glided in, dressed in her night-clothes. The man pushed his chair back, and started as if he had seen an apparition.

"Lucy," he said, "why Lucy, what are you doing here?"

"Come to fetch mamma," said little Lucy.

"Beg pardon," said the man in clumsy apology, "your little girl, marm?"

"Yes," said the lady, "I was taking her to bed when you came. How did you know her name?"

"Didn't know it, marm, but I've got a little girl at home of that name, just her size, and I thought it was her." He sighed heavily. "She's fond of her father, she is, and she's all the world to me. I ha'n't seen her for months, but I can feel the kiss she gin me now, the last time I seen her. She's an angel, that's what she is.

I guess this little un's a good child. Might I just shake hands with her?"

"Why, certainly. Come in, Lucy."

The little girl was standing shyly by the door with her finger in her mouth, just as she had halted when she saw the stranger. She came forward now, and placed her little hand in the broad palm held out to her. The man drew her toward him lovingly, and then little Lucy put up her mouth and kissed the dark, heavy face.

"The good Lord bless you, little girl," said the surprised man, huskily. "You've got a loving heart. There ain't many as 'ud kiss a rough chap like me. I was a very different man once, marm," he said, turning to the mother, but still keeping his arm around the child. "I'm a bad 'un now, but this little innercent seems to think there's summat good left in me. Pretty dear, she kinder makes me wish I had a chance again."

"Of course there is good in you," said the lady. "You cannot have sunk so low but that God would receive you and make you a good man, if you ask Him. Jesus came to save the lost, you know."

"Oh! I heerd o' Him when I was a little lad at school, but such as me soon forgets that. You don't know, marm, how hard it is to get straight when you've once took up wi' crooked ways. I'm afraid it's gone too far now ever to get back."

"That is what the Devil will tell you, I dare say, but it is not true. God can save you yet. I know you cannot get right yourself, but if you ask Him, He will surely help you."

"Think so, marm? Maybe you'd ask Him. I'm a pretty bad un. It ai'n't likely as he'd listen to the likes o' me. Does the little girl ever say a prayer?"

"Yes, I always say my prayers when I go to bed," said little Lucy.

"Well, my little girl, think you could say a prayer for a poor chap wot's gone wrong, and can't help hisself? You needn't mention no names; say the chap as you gin a kiss to. Ask if he could be helped to be a good fellow, if he ai'n't got too low down. I'm hanged if I don't try, marm, if the little girl 'ud ask for me. I'm about sick o' the life."

"She will pray for you every night, and I hope you will let me know if we can help you in any way."

The man thanked her, and went his way, saying, "It's a bargain."

Nothing more was heard of him for nearly six months, but little Lucy regularly prayed for the man she had kissed. One day a soiled, ill-spelt letter, which had evidently cost the writer no little trouble, came to hand. "I wanted to tell you marm," it said, "as how I think the good Lord is a hearkening to the little gel's prayers, and as how I hope she won't quit on no account. I've got work and I'm keeping straight so fur, but it's hard lines, and sometimes I feels like goin' back, but I aint yet. I'd like to say, too, as that night when I come to your house and you fed me, and the little gel kissed me, I'd come to look around cause me and another had settled to crack the house that night, and we weren't jest sure o' the right track. It was the little gel as stopped it. That's all, marm, only don't forget to tell her to keep on. Don't tell her about the robbery, but it'll kinder encourage her to keep on if she hears as the Lord is alisten'ing and attending to her. I prays myself as well."

Little Lucy's prayers were not discontinued, and with them ascended the prayer of her mother that this brand might be plucked from the burning.

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

A Practical Test.

FIRM and unmistakable as Carrie's words had been, Leroy cherished the hope that some day in the future he would yet have the supreme joy of calling her his own. True, she had given him no ground for hope; she had told him clearly and solemnly that she could not marry him; but still she had admitted that she loved him, and was not that a reason for hope?

One day—it was just before the holidays—a letter arrived from his brother Allan. It was full of kindness and sympathy, as Allan's letters always were. There was a message from his mother to her dear boy, and there were items of interest from the neighbors and expressions of love and esteem from Allan himself. It was all very pleasant and cheering to the young man, isolated by his disappointment and his grief, living among strangers. But what was this? A postscript, written apparently at a later date, probably when Allan carried the letter over to the Post Office. "I have just met an acquaintance of yours," Allan wrote, "formerly a student of N. S. College. He heard some one call me by name in the store, and asked if I was a relative of yours. I told him we were brothers, and he spoke kindly of you. He had been there on a visit, and while there heard, among other things, that a friend of yours was about to be married—Miss Carrie West. I could not believe it, and asked him if he was sure. 'Oh yes,' he said, 'quite sure. I had the news from the bridegroom-elect.' I asked his name, but he only laughed and said we should hear in good time. Now, brother," Allan added, "I know this will give you pain, but it is best you should know, lest you should be indulging futile hopes."

A few days later the rumor received unexpected confirmation. A newspaper came for him through the mail, and opening it he found it was a journal printed in the little city where Carrie lived. Glancing over its pages a paragraph encircled by a blue pencil mark caught his eye. It ran as follows:

"It is currently reported that an intelligent and charming young lady, whose home is in the northern part of town, but who is now at the N. S. College, will soon be married to a former student of that institution. Our congratulations and best wishes go with them."

The reference to Carrie was unmistakable.

He knew of no other young lady at the college from Carrie's town; and it was a fact that her home was in the part of the city indicated in the paragraph. A "former" student! This must be the explanation of the mystery which had puzzled him so much—this was the reason of his own rejection. Another suitor had secured a prior claim on her hand. There must have been circumstances, perhaps, in Carrie's former life which she did not feel at liberty to make known to him. She must certainly have had some adequate reason for her conduct.

The next question was, Who had sent him the paper with the marked paragraph? The marking had been done with blue pencil. Strangely enough, he remembered that Carrie had frequently carried such a pencil when at college, and he had often seen her use it when they were reading together; and he naturally remembered it now. For a few minutes his face flushed with anger as he thought of it.

"She hadn't the courage to write to me in a straightforward way about her prospective marriage; but took this indirect plan to give me the information."

But the next moment he exonerated her from the suspicion. It was so unlike Carrie, who had always despised subterfuges of every kind. Perhaps some friend had thought he would be interested in the information which the paragraph afforded, and, of course, other persons besides Carrie used blue pencils.

Whoever might have sent the newspaper, however, the paragraph clearly showed that there must be some basis for the report that had reached Allan's ears, and it must be pretty far advanced to have become matter for public comment. His confidence was shaken, and all his effort in regard to Carrie, now, must be to exclude her image from his thoughts.

He went on with his duties steadily, but almost mechanically. Gloomy, dull, and with a gravity far beyond his years and alien to his natural disposition. His mental and spiritual life was dark and miserable. The authors who had supplied him with mental food before, were now sterile. He could obtain from them nothing that would satisfy him. There was no system of philosophy that seemed to him trustworthy. His own experience contradicted the doctrines enunciated by the men whom he called his teachers. He wavered between the ideal pantheism of Von Hartman and the materialism of Haeckel. However, as he had so assiduously applied himself to the study of the natural sciences, and as idealism is so abstract and difficult of apprehension by the practical mind, he inclined most strongly to the materialistic hypothesis. Whatever the doctrines were which he accepted, they led him into hopelessness and despair. Von Hartman's unconscious intelligence was as good as no God at all, as far as making any practical use of it (it! what else could it be called?) in life, or gaining any help from it in moral endeavors, were concerned. When we call him a materialist, it is to be understood that he was affected in his thinking most powerfully by the naturalistic philosophy, and not that he was uninfluenced by other systems. How could a man of refined sensibilities ever fall into such a gross philosophy? Ask those men who are advocating this system to-day, for some of them are men of marked culture and refinement.

While conscious that the only theory of life which he could be said to hold was far inferior, in its power to comfort, to the doctrines of Christianity, he did not realize how barren it was until it was tested by a painful experience which came to him soon after the news of Carrie's defection.

The young people with whom he boarded were persons of earnest Christian character. They were the parents of a lovely little girl about eight years of age, who was the light of the household, and who was a special favorite with Leroy. One evening the child fell suddenly ill. Medical aid was immediately summoned, but the physician shook his head ominously, and gave little hope. As soon as Leroy was informed of his little favorite's sickness, he offered his assistance in ministering to her needs.

"Oh, Mr. Ransom, do stay with us in the room," the grief-stricken mother said, bursting into tears; "how can we bear to see our child suffering so, without help and sympathy?"

"Certainly I will stay, Mrs. Wallace," Leroy said. "Anything I can do for the dear girl I will do gladly. Poor little Lucy! It is very sad, but we will hope she will pull through."

During the earlier part of the night the little one tossed from side to side on her couch, consumed by the raging fever. Leroy watched most of the time by the bedside, fanning the livid face, and, at intervals, applying a little cold water to the parched lips; and as the parents were almost distracted with grief, so that they scarcely noted the passage of time, Leroy administered the medicines left in his care by the physician and did all in his power to alleviate the sufferings of the child.

But his heart was rent by many conflicting emotions, as he stood by the bedside of the little sufferer. Tears of sympathy would sometimes start to his eyes, as he saw her pain, and then indignant words would almost break from his lips, as he asked: Why should the child suffer so? What power controlled a world in which gentleness and innocence must bear such agony? Could that power be benevolent? Was it not, rather, blind caprice?

Toward midnight the child became more quiet, and for an hour slept peacefully. Hope began to revive in the hearts of those who kept vigil. But it was only the calm that precedes the storm. As morning approached, the fever rose again, and the child moaned with an agony of pain. In a few hours the anxious watchers saw, from the white lips, the pallid brow, and the fixed stare of the eye, that death had seized upon its victim. Leroy could scarcely bear to see the poor, struggling child. With pale, set lips he bent over the sufferer, and soothed her as best he could.

At length, after a brief interval of comparative quiet, the little girl, as so often happens just before the final crisis arrives, recovered consciousness, and looking up into her mother's tear-stained face, she spoke in a feeble, faltering tone, catching her breath between the words:

"Why do—you cry—so—mamma? You often said—Jesus—loves—little children, and puts his hands on—them and blesses them. And if—I—die, won't I go to Jesus, mamma?"

In her distress the mother fell upon her knees before the bed and tried to pray. But her heart was closed, and the words she tried to speak would not come. God seemed to be hidden behind a cloud. Her husband, though his own grief was almost more than he could bear, tried to soothe her, but his own heart was too full, and he could only mingle his tears with hers.

Leroy looked on and was speechless. The mental suffering of the parents and the physical suffering of the child were a spectacle very painful to a sympathetic heart. Tears sprang to his eyes and ran down his cheeks. He bent over the dying child and laid his hand on her brow. She looked up at him lovingly.

"Don't you cry, Mr. Ransom," she said, feebly. "I am going—to Jesus—He loves me—and He loves you, too, Mr. Ransom—He will take me to the happy land." Her eyes closed again, and she sank into a stupor, breathing in short, fluttering gasps.

"Oh! Mr. Ransom," said the mother, "she is surely dying. Can nothing be done? My heart will break."

It was terrible to hear that agonizing appeal and have no words of consolation to give. Nothing could touch that mother's woe, but the assurance that she would meet her child again in the world beyond the grave. But that he could not give. He could hold out no hope, could offer no consolation. The mother's suffering was a pain for which his philosophy provided no alleviation.

"Believe me," he said at last, "I sympathize with you most deeply. It is heart-rending to see the poor little creature suffer and have no power to help her. We can do nothing more. I am afraid she is dying."

"O, Mr. Ransom, will you not pray? Even now God can save her. Do pray; I cannot pray while I am so agitated."

Pray! What a request to him. To whom could he pray? And yet he saw that prayer would soothe that agonized mother as nothing else could. In the presence of this crushing blow, faith only could give her fortitude. The feeblest, poorest, most illiterate Christian would have been more useful in that chamber of sorrow than he. Someone without any knowledge of philosophy, if he could only remind that mother that she and her child were in the hands of a loving Father, that the little plant she had reared so tenderly was only being transplanted into the Lord's garden, could have calmed that mental agony. But he, Leroy said to himself, he was of no use there. He looked at the mother in blank despair. He found his voice at last. "I cannot pray, my dear friend," he said. "I am not a Christian; but I will run for a minister, if you wish."

"Do, do, Mr. Ransom. Fetch our own minister, Mr. Philliput. I am sure he will come."

Leroy snatched up his hat and hurried off, and the first rays of the gray dawn saw the infidel running eagerly to summon a member of the profession he despised and ridiculed, to undertake a task which had proved too difficult for himself.

The minister was soon found, and Leroy told his errand. It pleased him to see the promptitude of the good old man in rising from his bed and dressing to go on this mission of consolation. Leroy had never thought that any circumstances could combine to make him glad to have a minister as his companion. Yet here was he rejoicing that he was taking back with him to that scene of suffering one of the despised profession and actually expecting benefit to come from the visit.

Mr. Philliput grasped the hands of both parents as he stood and looked at the child now almost gone. "Let not your hearts be troubled," he said, softly. "Ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my father's house are many mansions. . . . I go to prepare a place for you." Your little one is only going on before, my friends: her place is prepared for her. You will find her there when your time comes. You can trust Him with your child?"

The words came like a balm upon a painful wound. Leroy at once saw the soothing power of the words upon the parents. They were becoming calm and trustful under the pious man's tender ministrations. He even felt the tranquilizing influence himself. And he was compelled to admit that the preacher's philosophy—for what else can you call the grand system of Christian truth?—was of more practical utility than his own.

"And now," said the clergyman, "we will all stand by the bedside, and while you watch, we will pray."

Leroy never had heard a prayer of such tenderness, such pathos, and such congruity with the occasion. While a solemn stillness pervaded the room, broken only by an occasional sob from the parents, and the quick breathing of the child, the old clergyman lifted up his voice in devout supplication.

He prayed for the child's life, if it were possible for God, in His wisdom, to spare it. If this were not consistent with His will, the petition ascended in behalf of the stricken parents, that they might be submissive to a higher and better wisdom than their own; God, who had made all things, and knew all things, certainly understood what was for the good of the child and its parents better than they. He prayed that they might be helped to realize in their hearts that, if the child should be taken from its earthly home, she would be afforded a better shelter above; that she would be the gainer for exchanging worlds; would go from this sinful sphere to a painless and a tearless world. How well she would be cared for there, since Christ, the Good Shepherd, would gather the lambs with His arm, and carry them in His bosom.

The minister ceased, and as he rose from his knees and stood with the others looking down on the little sufferer, a holier feeling filled all hearts. Even Leroy involuntarily became calmer, and the suffering he witnessed seemed to take a new phase. Whether the clergyman was right or not, it was less painful to think of that agony as the partition pang by which the child was passing from a lower to a higher life. It really seemed so, for when they were all listening intently at a pause in the fluttering breath, her eyes opened, a bright smile came upon her face, her lips formed the word "Jesus," and she was gone. They closed her eyes reverently, and as Leroy, with the others, kissed the unconscious lips, he saw that the smile still lingered there.

"The Lord comfort you, my bereaved friends," said the clergyman, in solemn benediction. "You can trust Him even when you cannot understand His ways. He does not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men."

"That is my only comfort now," said the weeping father.

And the mother, in the midst of her tears, with a smile that seemed to Leroy almost heavenly, added: "The Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away: blessed be the name of the Lord!" And the words fell into Leroy's heart with a new meaning, though he had often heard them before, and thought them devoid of significance.

When, a few days later, he helped to lower the little casket into the grave, and heard the solemn words: "Earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust," he could not hush the interrogation in his soul: "Which is better, here and now, Atheism or Christianity?" He saw now, as he had never seen before, that his system of belief, or rather non-belief, was inadequate for the great emergencies of life; and could such a philosophy be true? Was it not incomplete, to say the least? What would he do with a scientific hypothesis which did not account for the most important phenomena of nature? His philosophy, as a matter of fact, had been weighed in the balance and found wanting; but he was still not prepared to part with it.

THOMAS CONVINCED.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 7. John 20: 19-31. Golden Text: Verse 29.

Doors Closed through Fear—The Divine Salutation—The Sight of the Risen Lord—The Impartation of the Holy Ghost—The Disciples Commissioned Representatives of Christ—The Power of Absolution—The Character of Thomas—The Will as a Foundation of Unbelief—Thomas Reproved—Difference Between Faith and Superstition—Where Faith Looks.

It was the evening of the resurrection day. Although Mary Magdalene, Peter, John and some of the women had seen Jesus risen, although some of them had held Him by the feet and worshipped Him, yet fear so prevailed in their midst that the company of about one hundred and twenty (Luke 24: 33—Acts 1: 15) had closed doors for fear of the Jews. But such doors did not keep Jesus out; He came and stood in the midst—as near to Peter who had denied Him, as to John who lay on His heart at supper, and to one and all of them He said

"PEACE BE UNTO YOU."

It was the ordinary salutation; but from such lips to such ears, how much it meant! It was the Prince of peace; it was He who had made peace through the blood of His cross, speaking as the Victor over death and sin—the very sin which then pressed upon their consciences—He spoke with Divine authority, "Peace, which I have purchased, peace which is Mine by right, I give unto you." And when He had so said, He showed unto them His hands and His side. Surely the prophet's words must have shone in vivid light into their minds and hearts, "He was wounded for our transgressions, He was bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was upon Him and with His stripes we are healed" (Isa. 53: 5).

"Then were the disciples glad when they saw the Lord;" they saw Him the Saviour, the Propitiation, "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." O! what joy is like that joy when we first know Jesus as our own personal Saviour. Then Jesus repeated the words, but fraught with a new significance, "Peace be unto you; as My Father hath sent Me, even so send I you." He had said so much about them to His Father, "As Thou hast sent Me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world" (John 17: 18). But now, under the banner and the authority of His peace: allied with Him, one with Him, He gives them the commission, "As My Father hath sent me," as the express image of His Person (Heb. 1: 3) as His Message and Messenger, in His Name, so I send you as My image, as My message, as My messengers, to be instead of Me to a lost world; to do the works which I do (John 14: 12) to speak the words which I speak."

"And when He had said this, He breathed on them and said,

RECEIVE YE THE HOLY GHOST:

whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them, and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained." By comparing Luke 24: 33-40, it is evident that the Apostles Luke and John are writing of one and the same occasion, it was the resurrection evening; there is the same salutation, "He showed unto them His hands and His feet (or side)." St. Luke mentions that the eleven were together and they that were with them;" St. John says, "the disciples," without mentioning names. From this we gather that these words just quoted, were spoken to the assembled company of the hundred and twenty disciples. Thus the gift of the Holy Ghost is to all who will believe and receive Him. Our Lord Himself says how much more is our heavenly Father ready to give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him than an earthly father to follow His parental instinct in giving good gifts unto his children (Luke 11: 13). Paul writes by inspiration to the Ephesians, "Be filled with the Spirit." By no other power can such a commission be carried out. Only God can do divine things, only Christ dwelling in us by the Holy Ghost can execute such a commission as is here given to His disciples. But O, how transcendently glorious is such a calling! No angel in heaven is honored thus. The aged apostle John takes up almost the very words when he says, "As He is, so are we in this world" (1 John 4: 17). As recipients of the Holy Ghost, we are God's witnesses and God's commissioners in the world to proclaim remission of sins through a crucified Redeemer. This is the commission given as we have seen, on the same occasion, by Christ to His disciples.

He opened their understanding that they might understand the Scriptures, and said unto them, "Thus it is written, and thus it behooved Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead the third day; and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem;" and then follows the promise of the Spirit. He had breathed on them, they had received the "earnest of the Spirit" (2 Cor. 1: 22) in their hearts, but the fullness of the Spirit was to be the gift of the ascended and glorified Jesus. But what means, then, "Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them"? Surely just as much, just as little, as that commission given first to Peter (Matt. 16: 19) and then to all the disciples (Matt. 18: 18), "Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be followed immediately by the words, "Again I say unto you, that if two of you shall agree as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of My Father which is in Heaven. For where two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them." It was as much as to say, With My Spirit and My presence you can declare as absolutely to a soul that his sins are forgiven, when you see he believes in Me, as though I were there visibly speaking in My own Person. The sins of the man who believes, and to whom you take the message of pardon in My name, are remitted unto him—he is loosed on earth and loose in heaven.

One of the disciples, Thomas, the man who always looked on the dark side, the man who said of Lazarus, "Let us also go, that we may die with Him" (John 11: 16), was not with the disciples when Jesus came; that breath of Jesus which had breathed the Holy Spirit into the other disciples had not been inhaled by Thomas; he was still breathing in and breathing out the world's atmosphere of rationalism and unbelief. The first impulse of the little company of believers, when he returned to them, was to tell him on all sides the wondrous glad tidings, "We have seen the Lord." A man who is unbelieving is generally a captious, contradictory kind of man. He was rejecting the testimony of nearly a hundred and twenty witnesses who had staked their all upon Jesus, and had left them all for Him. What motive could they have for deceiving him, and how could they, whose lives were in danger from their adherence to Him, be themselves easily deceived? He answered, "Except I shall see in His hands the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into His side, I will not believe—

This is at the bottom of very much unbelief, there is an unwillingness to be convinced. Perhaps Thomas was vexed with himself, that he, of all the disciples, should have been absent just at that critical moment. Faith springs from a true appreciation of God: unbelief comes from measuring God by ourselves, or by our most imperfect conceptions of Him, instead of by His own gracious revelation of Himself.

But O, how long-suffering is our Lord. If Thomas would not make the first advance, then the Lord he had injured would make it. After eight days the disciples were again within, and Thomas with them; the doors were shut, as before, but no door but that of unbelief can shut Jesus out. He came and stood in the midst, and said, "Peace be unto you." "Then saith He to Thomas, Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side, and be not faithless, but believing." Thomas was conquered. Abashed, ashamed, humbled, confused, he cried, "My Lord and my God." He had been untrue to Jesus, but Jesus was unchanged to him. But He uttered His rebuke, "Thomas, because thou hast seen, thou has believed, blessed are they that have not seen, and

YET HAVE BELIEVED."

Faith and superstition are diametrically opposed to one another. Faith ennobles a man, because it unites him to One who is so far greater than himself. Superstition, the blind credulity which believes what is against and opposed to reason, because some fellow-man influences him, degrades a man. Faith sets free, superstition enslaves. Thomas would not believe the testimony of his brethren, although it was in exact accord with the words which Jesus had again and again spoken: virtually he said, "The evidence of my senses is more to me than either your experience or the words of Christ." A man who lives a life of faith is one who counts on God's fulfilling His word in everything, however contrary it may be to his own past experience, or to the doctrine or experience of other men. Thus Abraham, when God promised him a son, when he was a hundred years old, "considered not his own body," "staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God." Thus was Joseph in his bondage and imprisonment, ever lifted above the circumstances of trial in which he was placed; that which made him so unlike others, was that he and God were so at one that his heathen master and the keeper of his prison saw that "the Lord was with Joseph." Neither Abraham nor Joseph saw the fulfillment of the promise, while they still glorified God in the quiet, steady certainty that He could not fail them; they were blessed, for while they did not see, they yet did believe.

O, how many pray for the conversion of friends, and then watch them to see if it is coming about, instead of watching God to see how faithful He is. Unless they see, they will not believe He has undertaken it. Others pray God to fill them with the Holy Ghost, and then keep their eye on themselves to see whether they perceive any difference in themselves, and then get disheartened because they think God has failed them, while the very look within is hindering God from doing what they desire. We look out to receive a gift. O, how poor are our conceptions of our God, when we cannot trust Him out of our sight. John saw the world full of God. He says: "And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of His disciples, which are not written in this book, but these are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing, ye might have life through His name."

THE REV. EDWARD WHITE,
Chairman of the British Congregational Union.
Parentage and Conversion—Begins his Ministry in Hereford—Removal to London—Growing Influence—His Reverence for the Word of God—Address as Chairman of the Congregational Union—His Sister, the Late Mrs. Ranyard.

THAT the highest honor at the disposal of the Congregationalists—the chairmanship of the Union—should have been bestowed on the Rev. Edward White caused much surprise in that and other denominations. Mr. White is known in London as a preacher of great ability, an earnest worker, and a man of profound learning and eloquence; but outside London he is chiefly known as the pronounced and unflinching advocate of what is known as the doctrine of conditional immortality. That is the doctrine that man is not immortal by nature, but that to those who, through Christ are saved, and made new creatures in Him, immortality is given, and only they will live throughout eternity. He believes and preaches that immortality is brought to light through the Gospel (II Tim. i : 10); that those who desire to live after death must seek for immortality, eternal life by patient continuance in well-doing (Rom. 2 : 7), and that the doom of the wicked and impenitent will be the second death, or annihilation. It need not be said that this is not the creed of the majority of Congregationalists here or in Great Britain, and the Congregational press was very explicit last year, when Mr. White was elected, in defining the attitude of the denomination, and in stating with much emphasis that the chairmanship was a tribute to Mr. White's abilities, earnestness in preaching Christ, and his commanding

POSITION IN THE DENOMINATION.

It was not a sign of acceptance of his views. It was a mark of the universal respect in which he is held by his brethren on account alike of his signal abilities, his unimpeachable moral character, his life-long sacrifice to conscience, and his abandonment of gain, repute, and good fellowship, for what has seemed to him truth and duty.

The Rev. Edward White is the pastor of the church assembling in Hawley Road, London. He is sixty-seven years of age, having been born at Lambeth, in the year 1819. He received his collegiate training at Glasgow University. He first commenced his pulpit services at Cardiff, and settled as minister of the old Congregational Church at Hereford, where he remained for ten years. His next and only other charge was at Hawley Road Chapel, and there Mr. White settled in 1852. Some years before this change—viz., about 1845—he first gave publicity to his views on conditional immortality, in connection with which he had to endure no little obloquy and ostracism, which he had strength of mind to submit to without great discouragement.

LITERARY WORK.

With immense labor and erudition Mr. White matured his views on the subject, and they were eventually given to the world in 1875, in a complete volume, entitled "Life in Christ," which went through three editions.

In 1868 Mr. White published "The Mystery of Growth," a volume of discourses, of which a second edition was brought out by Dickenson. In 1868 appeared "The Minor Moralities of Life," being the lighter papers written for the Christian Spectator, of which Mr. White was editor from 1859 to 1864. Three series of his lectures have also been published, one on "Certainty in Religion," a second on "Genesis the Third: History not Fable," and the third on "The Laws and Limits of Responsibility." There is in most of Mr. White's writings, combined with great originality of thought, a quaintness and raciness of style and a flavor of humor which make them very attractive and acceptable reading.

Mr. White was in 1884 appointed Professor of Homiletics at New College for three years, in succession to Rev. J. C. Harrison. The church of which he is pastor is in reality, if not nominally, a union church—that is, its members consist of both Independents and Baptists, though, as a matter of fact, it has been identified with the Congregational Union, of which its pastor is this year the chairman.

One of the foremost aims of Mr. White in his ministerial sphere has been to lay hold of THE ARTISAN CLASS.

This is not a new aspiration on the part of the esteemed pastor of Hawley Road Chapel. Again and again during his ministerial career in London he has urged the question on public attention. Twenty years ago or more he was the means of bringing about a conference of ministers of religion and artisans at the London Coffee House, at which Dean Stanley and other eminent clergymen, as well as workmen leaders, were speakers. This, the first movement of the kind, was supported by the Rev. F. Denison Maurice and many eminent church laymen, and commanded much public attention at the time.

Mr. White has never lost sight of this great object in his ministrations. The Kentish-town district, in which his chapel is situated, is by no means genteel, and abounds in craftsmen engaged in piano and other important factories. They are particularly well looked after by the Secularists, who provide entertainments and lectures at their so-called workmen's clubs. Mr. White organized a soon after Moody and Sankey's recent visit. "The Alliance Club," which now numbers about one hundred and fifty members, has a dozen rooms suitably furnished, and an assembly-hall, which will accommodate about half as many more. Here are held mission services on Sunday evenings, and it is utilized for entertainments, lectures, instruction-classes, a penny bank, and by friendly societies during the week. At this club there is also a strong staff of Christian workers, who do their best, and with some success, to counteract the infidel teaching which is so rife in the neighborhood.

PRINCIPLES OF PREACHING.

From his first settlement in London as before in Hereford, Mr. White made the unfolding and exposition of the Bible the one prominent feature of his preaching, having a strong dislike to the practice of mere textual preaching—the practice of choosing a subject and preparing a sermon upon it, and then looking for a text in any part of the Bible that would suit it. That was not his idea of a minister's duty. He desired that his hearers should view the Bible as a whole, and give it at least as fair a treatment as they would another book. He urged on his brethren in the ministry and set them the example of simply preaching Christ in all the fulness and efficiency of His atoning sacrifice for man's redemption, and contended that the honest unfolding of the truths of Holy Scripture formed the best answer to any and all the forms of modern infidelity. That his early opinion of the value and preciousness of God's Word remains unmodified and unimpaired, his latest official utterances give ample and gratifying proof.

The handling of the Scriptures in the pulpit was the subject taken by Mr. White for HIS ADDRESS FROM THE CHAIR of the Union, on October 20th, and in introducing it he invited the attention of his ministerial brethren especially to the organic unity of the Bible, and said: "Consisting of books, some of them the most ancient in the world, the rest due to an authorship extending over fourteen centuries, and written in several languages—each book when first written, whether historical, devotional, prophetic or doctrinal, as distinct in date and execution, and as independent a work as the histories of Thucydides, or the poems of Homer or Sophocles, and by no means composed as an assigned portion of a collection to be subsequently organized into a canon, or printed in a single convenient volume for the modern world—these writings, originating thus in widely distant ages and in so many and different authorships, do, nevertheless, when brought together, reveal a spiritual unity; constitute a progressive but organic whole; agree during all these ages in setting forth One Living and Holy God, who is the same Almighty Lover of mankind and Lover of righteousness, the same inexorable foe of obstinate vice, crime, and sin alike under every dispensation; and manifestly record the slow development of one far-reaching purpose for reconciling men to God—for setting forth, throughout, one way to everlasting life, in the Christ of prophecy, the Christ of history, and the immortal ascended Christ of the Epistles and the Apocalypse." This unique phenomenon is only explained on the theory of a revelation inspired by one Infinite Spirit.

It may interest many of our readers to know that the late Mrs. Ranyard, better known as L. N. R., the founder of the Bible Women's Mission and originator of the Missing Link magazine, was the sister of Mr. White. She ceased from her labors on February 11th, 1879, and on January 8th, 1880, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published her portrait and the history of her life and labors for Christ.

JEREMIAH J. COLMAN, M.P.

AT several of the great meetings of the Congregational Union, held last month in the ancient city of Norwich, Mr. Colman, the Member of Parliament for that borough, presided. His portrait accompanies that of Mr. White on the first page. He is the son of James Colman, of Stoke Holy Cross, Norfolk.

Mr. Colman was born June 14th, 1830, and is therefore now fifty-six years old. Having received a first-class private education, he entered into business, and by his intelligence and perseverance laid, very early in life, the foundation of the world-famed firm, in which his brother and others are now partners, for the manufacture of starch and mustard; in fact, the firm seem to have nearly appropriated to themselves the mustard industry.

From his earliest youth he had the advantage of the watchful training and superintendence of his father, who, though not a member of the Society of Friends, was always in deep sympathy with them, and was a prominent member of the Peace Society, of which Norwich is a conspicuous centre. Local and national efforts for the suppression of the liquor traffic, or for the repeal of the taxes upon the food of the people, had always the help and countenance of the elder Colman.

It is, therefore, no wonder that his son, the subject of this sketch, should be one of the best-balanced minds in the House of Commons. The motto upon his crest, Soon enough, if well enough, would indicate that the wearer was a Conservative, but he is an ardent though independent Liberal, and a member of the Nonconformist community, having formerly been officially identified with St. Mary's Chapel, Norwich.

He first sat as Member of Parliament for Norwich in the year 1871, has represented that ancient constituency ever since, and at the recent election he was returned at the head of the poll. While the exercise of his philanthropy is judicious, his benefactions are universal. Cases of real need always secure his sagacious consideration and ample aid. His practical sympathy with evangelistic work in the Norfolk villages is proverbial.

THE SCENE OF THE CONGREGATIONAL MEETINGS.

THE proceedings were inaugurated on Monday evening, October 11th, by a reception of delegates and friends in St. Andrew's Hall, nominally by the Mayor and Mrs. Gurney; but in consequence of ill-health the chief magistrate was unable to be present, and Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, Bart., acted as host.

ST. ANDREW'S HALL

nave has been metamorphosed into a hall for civic entertainments and musical festivals, and whose chancel—separated now by an organ and a corridor from the nave, known as Blackfriars Hall, and forming a building itself larger than many an ordinary church—after serving long as a Dutch church, and then as a church for the Primitive Methodists, has this year been acquired by some gentlemen, and presented by them to the city for public uses. Associated with some famous scenes, and once the place of some of Jenny Lind's vocal triumphs, its walls are adorned with portraits of ex-mayors, and one of Admiral Lord Nelson—who was a Norwich man—and with other pictures, the value of some of which is fabulous. Among the notable guests were Rev. Dr. Noah Porter, the President of Yale College, the Recorder of Norwich, and several of the local clergy, including the Rev. Canons Ripley and Heaviside.

SOME REMINISCENCES OF NORWICH

were given by Mr. White in a vote of thanks to the Mayor for the kindness he had extended to his visitors. He said that the very name of the city of Norwich spoke of Saxon times, and the cathedral of the Norman conquest; while all around were memorials of the Roman Catholics, and of their persecutions. The Lollards' pit recalled those persecutions, and one of Mr. White's own ancestors, four hundred years ago, had been among the sufferers. He trusted there would be no more of the Inquisition in any form—an expression to which many responded with a fervent "Hear, hear." Looking still forward to the time of the Puritans, they found that Norwich has many noble recollections of their party, and many noble memorials of Nonconformity. Dr. Collinge worked there for many years, and in more recent times they met with names that will never die. There they met also with examples of Catholic Christians, among whom must be named Bishop Stanley, whose son, the late Dean Stanley, was an example to men of all types, and exerted an influence on the country that could never be forgotten. Such thoughts led Mr. White to the reflection that all good men are "exceedingly alike inside." He concluded with a respectful acknowledgment of the kindness shown by the Mayor to the visitors, and by invoking the blessing of God on the city.

LONDON STREET AND THE GUILDHALL form the subject of the larger picture in the lower portion of our front page. The Guildhall of Norwich is a very ancient building, and is now used as an Assize and Sessions Court, for Town Council and School Board meetings, and as a Police Station. Its outer walls are almost entirely of flint stone, and there are curious relics inside the structure, among which may be mentioned some furniture which was placed there in the reign of King Henry VIII.

A Dangerous Plaything was Found in the possession of a child in Chicago on August 23d. The coachman of a millionaire noticed that his employer's daughter, a child seven years old, was rolling something about on the grass, and he went to see what it was. To his horror he found it was a dynamite bomb. It was the ordinary gas-pipe arrangement of which so many specimens have been found of late. It was apparently of exceptional strength, and intended to accomplish no small work of destruction when used. It was fully two feet in length, and nearly or quite two inches in diameter. One end was securely sealed, while protruding from the other was a slow fuse, in which, secured close to the mouth of the tube, were three common lucifer matches. The gas-pipe was heavy, and was evidently well filled with explosives. Some miscreant had placed it near the house, and the child had found it, and not knowing its dangerous character, was using it as a toy. It was, of course, promptly taken from her, much to her vexation. Some of our losses may have arisen from a similar cause. God mercifully deprives His children of treasured possessions which imperil their safety (Ps. 119 : 75).

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Blotted Out with Blood.—Mr. Wilson observed at a recent meeting: "A little boy was asked what he meant by his sin being blotted out by the blood of Christ. 'Well,' he said, 'it just appears like this to me. God has a great big book, and in it He had written all the sins I had ever committed, and when I gave myself to Christ to keep forever, He walked up to that book and put His hand all flowing with blood right on the page where my sins were written, and drew it along, and when He took His hand off all my sins were covered, entirely blotted out, and hidden from every one by Jesus' blood.'"

In the Head and in the Heart.—"At the time of the Reformation, a minister of the Gospel was trying to impress upon the mind of a young student a certain doctrine in which he believed. On the following day, after a careful study of the Bible, the student came to the minister, and said: 'I have found that doctrine which you taught me here in the Bible.' 'I am glad of that, but have you received it here?' said the minister, placing his hand upon his heart. That question was the means of the student's awakening. He was not content with mere head-knowledge, but he searched deeper, until his heart was made right with God."

An Unfortunate Marriage.—Mr. McFarlane said: "At a 'free breakfast' one Sunday morning a wretched-looking woman was asked what painful circumstances had led her there to seek charity, and her answer was: 'Well, sir, I was just unfortunate in my marriage. I married a man who was given to drink, and now I am glad to come here to get a morsel of bread for my child and myself.' Instead of that woman saying that she was 'just unfortunate,' if she had been honest she would have said that her present misery was the result of her own sin, for she had kept company with and married an ungodly man, and now this is what she might have expected, for sin and sorrow go together. If such infatuated wrong-doers will only forsake their evil ways and turn to Jesus, they will save mistake and misery."

A French Lady's Blunder.—An Evangelist, speaking lately of God being no respecter of persons, tells the following: "A French lady of high rank was talking to a friend about a nephew, a duke in the court of Louis the Great. This noble led a very wicked and licentious life, and his aunt, after hearing of a number of misdeeds, or 'irregularities,' as they were then politely called, said: 'Yes, that is true; and if he were a common man he would have very little chance of heaven; but, depend upon it, God will think twice before He damns a man of his quality.' And, on another occasion, after having heard of a more than usual piece of wickedness, the same person said: 'That is very bad and totally unjustifiable, and deserves punishment both in this world and that which is to come; but,' and she comforted herself with this: 'God will surely never damn a duke and a peer of France.' The lady was mistaken, as many are in the present day who are so accustomed to deference on account of their wealth or rank that they expect that God will show similar regard to them" (Acts 10 : 34).

A Young Lady Abandons Dancing.—Mr. Campbell observed: "Not long ago I was living with a gentleman, and the young lady of the house asked me about the harm of worldly amusements. After we had discussed that matter for some time, she asked me if there was any great harm in dancing. I asked her if before going to a dance she could kneel and ask God's blessing on what she was about to do. She had not as yet fully come out for Christ, and these pleasures of the world were very dear to her. So I brought her face to face with the Master Himself, for I think it right to leave such inquirers to work out the details for themselves. I had given her a system on which to work, and that was all that was needed. The next morning when she came down to breakfast, I saw by her appearance that she had not had much sleep, and when I was about to leave the room she followed me and said: 'Mr. Campbell, I have resolved to give up dancing; I thought I would just like to do so for Jesus.' 'Just a little love-gift for Him,' I said. 'Yes, just that,' she replied. She had taken her difficulty right to the Lord, and she had conquered."

Tidings of a Fortune.—Mr. Knox said: "A few days ago I was speaking to a man about his soul, and as I was urging him just to have faith in Christ, he interrupted me by saying: 'But how have I to know if I have the right kind of faith?' I said to him: 'If you met a man whom you knew very well, knew to be an honorable man, and one on whose word you could rely, and if he told you of a fortune which had been left you, or something else to your advantage, and told where you could go at once and get it, what would you do?' 'Go immediately and look after it.' 'Just because he told you?' 'Yes.' 'And you have no doubt of the truth?' 'No, because I knew the man and could believe him.' Then I said: 'You would believe and have faith in the message because of the speaker. You looked beyond the message to the sender and trusted him. Just do the same with Christ and His message; if you have doubts about the message—the invitation—you can have no doubt about the inviter, the Lord Jesus Himself.' Faith is not an end, but only a means to an end. Faith is the road, Christ Jesus the goal."

A Terrified Band of Thieves.—Mr. Calder said: "A few days ago a young friend of mine told me a little incident which proved to be the means of his conversion; for, he said, it gave him a strong faith in God which he previously lacked. A friend of his, a widow lady in Ireland, lived in a large mansion house alone. A band of thieves who had learned this resolved to find access to the house by night, and rob the lady of her possessions. They gained an entrance, and found their way to the kitchen first to get some food. There they took off their shoes that they might move about more quietly, but she heard them, and guessing at once what their intention was, and knowing that her only help was in God, she quietly crept to the kitchen and knelt, and being a Methodist, she cried aloud to God for help, so loud that she was overheard by the men. They looked at each other in blank astonishment, and thinking there must be a number of people in the house, they escaped as quickly as possible, and the lady was left in safety to return thanks to God for her speedy deliverance."

A Puzzle Made Plain.—Mr. J. Gilbert Forbes said: "A number of ministers met at the house of an aged pastor to discuss how they could obey the Lord's command, when He says: 'Pray without ceasing.' This verse was a perfect puzzle to them. They could not see how it was possible to pray forever, never stopping; and, at last, after much consultation and discussion, they were obliged to go away as perplexed as when they had come. This aged minister at whose house they had met had a servant who had been with him for many years, a most sincere Christian, who lived very near to God. She had overheard the debate, and after the ministers were gone asked her employer what conclusion they had reached. 'No conclusion, Mary,' said the clergyman; 'it is not possible to pray literally without ceasing.' 'That is strange,' said the domestic, 'when I do it every day.' 'How?' asked the minister. 'When I awake in the morning,' answered the servant, 'my first thought is of Jesus and His love to me, and I ask Him to awake in me a new and purer love for Him. When I go down to the kitchen to kindle the fire I pray God to kindle in my heart a new love for my fellow-creatures, that I may be able to love them even as I love myself. When I sweep the floor I ask the Lord to sweep my heart clear of all uncleanness, to wash it and make it whiter than snow; and so while doing my work I pray to the Lord, and it does not keep me from my work, but makes me do it the better.'"

THE SCHOOL OF HARD KNOCKS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Oct. 31, 1886.

"Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord."—ROM. 12: 11.

INDUSTRY, devotedness, Christian service are all recommended in this one short text. What, is it possible to conjoin them? Oh, yes! There is no war between religion and business, between Bibles and ledgers, between churches and counting houses. On the contrary, religion accelerates business, sharpens men's wits, sweetens acerbity of disposition, fills the blood of phlegmatics, and throws more velocity into all the wheels of hard work. To the judgment it gives more skilful balancing; to the will more strength; to industry more muscle; to enthusiasm a more concentrated fire. You cannot show me a man whose business prospects have in any wise been despoiled by his religion.

GROUPS OF WORKERS.

The industrial classes are divided into three groups—producers, manufacturers, traders. Producers, such as farmers and miners. Manufacturers, such as take the corn and change it into food, or the wool and flax and change them into apparel. Traders, who make a profit out of the transfer and exchange of that which is produced or manufactured. Now, a business man may belong to one of these classes, or he may belong to all of them. Whatever be your avocation, if you plan, calculate, bargain; if into your life there come annoyances, vexations, and disappointments as well as gains, dividends, and percentages; if you are harassed with a multiplicity of engagements; in a word, if you are driven from Monday morning to Saturday night, and from January to January, with relentless obligation and duty, then you are a business man or a business woman, and my subject is appropriate to your case.

We are apt to speak of the moil and tug of business life as though it were an inquisition or a prison into which a man is thrown, or an unequal strife where, half armed, he goes to contend. Hear me this morning, while I try to show you that God intended business life to be a glorious and if I shall be successful in what I want to say, I shall rub the wrinkles out of your brow and unstrap some of the burdens from your back.

I. I have first to remark, that God intended business life to be to you a school of Christian energy. God started us in the world, giving us a certain amount of raw material out of which we were to hew our own character. Every faculty needs to be reset, rounded, sharpened up. After our young people have graduated from the schools, and colleges, and universities, they need a higher education, that which the collision and rasping of every-day life alone can effect. Energy of soul is wrought out only in the fire. And when a man for ten, or fifteen, or twenty, or thirty years has been going through business activities, his energy can no longer be measured by weights, or plummets, or ladders. It can scale any height. It can plummet any depth. It can thrash any obstacle.

Now, do you suppose that God has spent all this education on you for the purpose of making you a more successful worldling, of enabling you to more rapidly accumulate dollars, making you sharp in a trade? Did God make you merely to be a yard-stick to measure cloths, or a steel-yard to weigh flour? And did He intend you to spend your life in doing nothing but to chaffer and higgler? My friend, He has put you in this school to develop your energy for His cause and kingdom. There is enough in the churches and in the world to-day to reform all empires, and all kingdoms and people, in three weeks. Oh, how much idleness amid strong muscles and stout hearts! How many deep streams that turn no mill-wheels and haul on the bands of no factory! God demands that He have the best lamb out of every flock, the richest sheaf in every harvest, the best men of every generation; and in a cause where the Newtons, and the Lockes, and the Mansfields of the earth were proud to enlist, you and I need not be ashamed to toil. Oh, for fewer idlers and for more consecrated Christian workers!

Dr. Duff visited a man in South Wales, who had inherited a great fortune. The man said to him: "I had to be very busy for many years of my life getting my livelihood. After a while this fortune came to me, and there has been no necessity that I toil since. There came a time when I said to myself: 'Shall I now retire from business, or shall I go on and serve the Lord in my worldly occupation?'" He said: "I resolved on the latter, and I have been more industrious in commercial circles than I ever was before, and since that hour I have never kept a farthing for myself. I have thought it to be a great shame if I couldn't toil as hard for the Lord as I had toiled for myself, and all the products of my factories and my commercial establishments to the last farthing have gone for the building of Christian institutions and supporting the Church of God." Oh, if the same energy put forth for the world could be put forth for God! Oh, if a thousand men in these great cities who have achieved a fortune could see it their duty now to do all business for Christ and the alleviation of the world's suffering!

II. Again, God intended business life to be to you

A SCHOOL OF PATIENCE.

How many little things there are in one day's engagements to perturb, and annoy, and disquiet you! Bargains will rub, and men will break their engagements. Collecting agents will come back empty handed. Tricksters in business will play upon what they call the "hard times," when in any times they never pay. Goods placed on the wrong shelf. Cash books and money drawer in a quarrel. Goods ordered for an especial emergency failing to come, or, if coming, damaged in the transportation. People who intend no harm going about shopping, unrolling goods they do not mean to buy, and trying to break the dozen. Men obliged to take up other people's notes. More counterfeit bills in the drawer. More bad debts. Another ridiculous panic. Under all this friction men break down, or they are scoured up into additional brightness. How many you and I have known who, in the past few years, have gone down under the pressure, and have become petulant, and choleric, and crabbed, and sour, and pugnacious, until customers forsook their stores, and these merchants have become insolvent, and their names were pronounced with detestation!

But other men have found in this a school for patience. They toughened under the exposure. They were like rocks, more serviceable for the blasting. There was a time when they had to choke down their wrath. There was a time when they had to bite their lip. There was a time when they thought of a stinging retort they would like to utter. But now they have conquered their impatience. They have kind words for sarcastic flings. They have a polite behavior for discourteous customers. They have forbearance for unfortunate debtors. They have moral reflections for the sudden reverses of fortune. How are you going to get that grace of patience? Not through hearing ministers preach about it. Oh, no! If you get it at all, you will get it in the world, where you sell hats, and plead causes, and tin roofs, and make shoes, and turn banisters, and plough corn. I pray

God that through the turmoil, and sweat, and exasperation of your every-day life, you may hear the voice of Christ saying to you: "If patience possess your soul, let patience have a perfect work."

III. Again, God intended business life to be to you

A SCHOOL OF KNOWLEDGE.

Merchants do not read many books, nor study many lexicons, nor dive into great profounds, yet through the force of circumstances they get intelligent on questions of politics, and finance, and geography, and jurisprudence, and ethics. Business is a hard schoolmistress. If her pupils will not learn in any other way, with unmerciful hand she smites them on the head and on the heart with inexorable loss. You went into some business enterprise, and five thousand dollars got out of your grasp. You say the five thousand dollars were wasted. Oh, no! that was only tuition. Expensive schooling, but it was worth it. Misfortune, with hard hand, comes upon a man and wakes him up, and by the very force of circumstances business men get to be intelligent.

Traders in grains must know about foreign harvests. Traders in fruit must know about the prospects of tropical production. Manufacturers of American goods must know about the tariff on imported articles. Publishers of books must know the new law of copyright. Owners of ships come to understand winds, and shoals, and navigation. And so every bale of cotton, and every raisin cask, and every tea box, and every cluster of bananas becomes literature to our business men. Now, what is the use of all this intelligence unless you

GIVE IT TO CHRIST?

Do you suppose God gives you these opportunities of brightening up your intellect and of increasing your knowledge merely to get larger treasures and grander business? Oh, no! Can it be that you have been learning about foreign lands and people that dwell under other skies, and yet have no missionary spirit? Can it be that you have been learning the follies, and trickeries, and hollowness of the business world, and yet you are not trying to bring to bear upon them this gospel which is to correct all abuses, and abolish all ignorance, and correct all mistakes, and arrest all crime, and irradiate all darkness, and lift up all wretchedness? Can it be that, notwithstanding your acquaintance with the intricacies of business, you are ignorant of those things which will last the soul long after bills of exchange, and commissions, and invoices, and consignments, and rent-rolls have crumpled up and consumed in the fires of a judgment day?

IV. Again, God intended business life to be to you

A SCHOOL OF INTEGRITY.

No age of the world ever offered so many inducements for scoundrelism as are offered now. There is hardly a statute on the law books that has not some back door through which miscreants can escape. How many deceptions in the fabric of goods! Commercial life plies the land with trickeries innumerable, and there are so many people in Brooklyn and New York who live a life of plunder, that when a man proposes a straightforward, honest business, it is almost charged to greenness and want of tact. Ah! my brethren, this ought not to be. But I have to tell you that it requires more grace to be honest now than it did in the days of our fathers, when business was plain, and there were no stock-gamblers, and woollen was woollen, and silk was silk, and men were men.

How rare it is that you find a man who can from his heart say: "I NEVER CHEATED IN TRADE.

I never overestimated the value of goods when I was selling them. I never covered up a defect in a fabric. I never played upon the ignorance of a customer, and in all my estate there is not one dishonest farthing." There are those who can say it. They never let their integrity bow or cringe to present advantage.

They are as pure and Christian to-day as on the day when they sold their first tierce of rice or their first firkin of butter. There were times when they could have robbed a partner, when they could have absconded with the funds of a bank, when they could have sprung a snap judgment, when they could have borrowed illicitly, when they could have made a false assignment, when they could have ruined a neighbor for the purpose of picking up some of the fragments; but they never took one step on that pathway of hell fire.

Now they can pray without being haunted with the chink of dishonest gold. Now they can read the Bible without thinking of the day when, with a lie on their soul, they kissed the book in a custom-house. Now they can look into the laughing faces of their children without thinking of orphans left by them penniless and houseless. Now they can think of death without having their knees knock together, and their hearts sink, and their teeth chatter, because there is a judgment where all defrauders, and jockeys, and tricksters, and charlatans shall be doubly damned. Now they can read in the Bible without flinching: "As the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not; so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at the end shall be a fool."

Alas! if any of you, for the purpose of getting out of temporary embarrassment,

DARE TO SELL YOUR SOUL,

or any portion of it. You may wake up in the midst of embarrassment, and say: "No one is looking. This transaction may be a little out of the way, but it is only once, only once." On that one occasion you not only wreck your spiritual nature but you despoil your business prospects. You put one dishonest dollar in an estate, but it will not stand. You may take a dishonest dollar and put it down in the very depths of the earth, and you may roll on the top of it rocks and mountains, and on the top of those rocks and mountains you may put all the banks and moneyed institutions, piling them up heaven high; but that one dishonest dollar down in the depths of the earth will begin to rock, and heave, and upturn itself until it comes to the resurrection of damnation. You cannot hide a dishonest dollar.

A MESSAGE ON A BANK-NOTE.

A merchant in Liverpool got a five-pound Bank of England note, and holding it up toward the light he saw some interlineations in what seemed red ink. He finally deciphered the letters, and found out that the writing had been made by a slave in Algiers, saying in substance: "Whoever gets this bank-note will please to inform my brother, John Dean, living near Carlisle, that I am a slave of the Bey of Algiers." The merchant sent word, employed government officers, and found who this man was spoken of in this bank bill. After a while the man was rescued, who for eleven years had been a slave of the Bey of Algiers. He was immediately emancipated, but was so worn out by hardship and exposure he soon after died. Oh, if some of the bank bills that come through your hands could tell all the scenes through which they have passed, it would be a tragedy eclipsing any drama of Shakespeare, mightier than King Lear or Macbeth.

In the review of this subject there are two or three things I want to say, and the first is, let us have a larger

SYMPATHY FOR BUSINESS MEN.

I think it is a shame that in our pulpits we do not oftener preach on this subject, and show that we appreciate the sorrows, and struggles, and temptations, and trials of every-day life. Men who toil with the hand are very apt to be suspicious of those who move in the world of traffic, and think that they get their money idly, and that they give no equivalent. Men who raise the corn, and wheat, and rye, and oats are very apt to think that grain merchants get easy profits. The hand is very apt to be jealous of the brain. Plato and Aristotle were so opposed to all kinds of merchandise, that they said commerce was the curse of the earth, and they recommended that cities should never be built any nearer the sea-coast than ten miles. But we have become wiser than that, and you know that there are no harder workers than those who plan and calculate in stores, and banks, and counting-houses. What though their apparel be neat, what though their manners be refined, do not put them down as idlers. They carry loads heavier than a hod of bricks, they go into exposures keener than the cutting of the east wind, they scale mountains higher than the Alps and Himalayas, and maintaining their Christian integrity, Christ will at the last accost them, saying: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

I also enjoin you to

about business matters. Is there not something in your own household that you would not give up for the worldly success other men have? Besides that, if these trials lifted you up you ought to bless God for the whip of discipline. The larger the note you have to pay, the greater the uncertainty of business life, the better for your soul, if Jesus Christ leads you triumphantly through. How do I know? I know it by this principle—that the hotter the furnace, the better the refining. There have been thousands of men who have gone through the same path you are now going through with an aching heart. There are multitudes before the throne of God who were lashed with cares and anxieties innumerable, and were cheated out of everything but their coffin. They were sued, they were ejected, they were imprisoned for debt, they were maltreated, they were throttled by constables with whole packs of writs, they were sold out by sheriffs, they had to confess judgments, they had to compromise with creditors, and their last hour on earth was disturbed by the fact that their door-bell was rung loudly and angrily by the hand of some impetuous creditor, who was surprised that that sick man should be so impertinent and outrageous as to die before he had paid him the last three shillings and sixpence. Oh, how men are tossed and driven!

I had a friend who went from one anxiety to another; a good and great heart he had, but everything he put his hand to seemed to fail. Misfortunes clustered around, and after awhile I heard he was dead; and the first word I said was: "Good, he has got rid of the sheriffs!" There is a great multitude of business men who on earth had it hard, but, by the grace of God, they stand triumphant in heaven; and when the question is asked of them: "Who are they?" the angels of God, standing on seas of glass, will cry out: "These are they who came out of great tribulation, and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb." A man arose in Fulton Street prayer-meeting, and said: "I wish publicly to acknowledge the goodness of God. I was

IN BUSINESS TROUBLE.

I had money to pay, and I had no means to pay it, and I was in utter despair of all human help, and I laid this matter before the Lord, and this morning I went down among some old business friends I had not seen in many years just to make a call, and one said to me: 'Why, I am so glad to see you; walk in. We have some money on our books due you a good while, but we didn't know where you were, and therefore, not having your address, we could not send it. We are very glad you have come.' And the man standing in Fulton Street prayer-meeting said: "The amount they paid me was six times what I owed." You say it only happened so? You are an infidel. God answered that man's prayer.

Once more, I want you to SEEK BUSINESS GRACE.

Commercial ethics, business honor, laws of trade, may do very well for awhile; but there will come a time when the ground will slip from under your feet, and the world will frown, and the devils will set after your soul, and you will want more than this world can give you. You will want the eternal rock to stand on. For the lack of that grace, you have known men to forge, and to maltreat their friends, and to curse their enemies, and you have seen their names bulletined among scoundrels, and spit upon, and blistered by scorn, and ground to powder. They not only lost their property, but their souls were mauled, and putrefied, and blasted for eternity. You could count up scores of such persons, while there are others who, tossed on the same sea, sustained by the grace of God, have all the time kept their eye on the light-house. Men coming out of that man's store say: "If there ever was a Christian trader, that is one." Stern integrity kept the books and waited on the customers. Light from the future world flashed through the show-windows. Wrath never stamped that floor, nor did sly dishonesty cover up imperfections in goods. Love to God and love to men were the principles that ruled in the store of that Christian trader.

Some day the shutters are not let down from the store window, and the bars are not taken from the door. Men pass along, and stop, and stare, and go up to read a card on the door which announces: "Closed on account of the death of one of the firm." That day it is told in commercial circles how that good man has gone. Boards of trade pass resolutions of sympathy, and churches of Christ pray: "Help, Lord, for the godly man ceaseth." He has made his last bargain. He has suffered his last loss. He has ached with his last fatigue. The results of his Christian industry will bless his children after he is dead, and bequests to the kingdom of God will gather many sons into glory. Everlasting rewards in place of business discipline. There, "the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

A PARISIAN SUICIDE ARRESTED.

REV. R. W. MCALL, the director of the Paris missions, writes in the current number of the American McAll Record:

The minister in charge of one of the missions in Paris recently received the following letter: "You asked last night: 'Are there not some here who wish to return thanks to God for mercies received?' Dear minister of the Gospel, out of gratitude for the grace God has given me, thanks to your earnest words in the mission-room, I make this acknowledgment." The writer goes on to describe her past careless and unhappy life. So far had she gone in neglect of all religion that she had become a solitary being without hope in the world. At last, wearied of existence, she left her poor lodging resolved to put an end to her own life. It was a bleak evening, the rain fell in torrents, and she was driven to seek shelter. Observing a large doorway open, with light gleaming from within, she entered. The place was wholly strange to her, and all she heard spoken there came to her as a new discovery. The text was: "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." As the result of the simple presentation of the Saviour's love, she abandoned her dark purpose, became a regular attendant of the meeting, entered into conversation with our colleague, and in the end obtained peace in believing. These are her own expressions translated from her letter: "Can I ever forget your words, 'God is infinitely good, always ready to forgive the sinner, however great and numerous the sins may be!' I prayed when you prayed at the close of the meeting—I who had never prayed before. Returned to my lodging, I fell on my knees, and asked and received God's pardoning mercy."

AN INDIAN CHILD BRIDE.

In a letter to the Missionary Link from Miss Lathrop, who is laboring for Christ in Allahabad, India, she says:

Now I must tell you of a very sad thing among the very highest "Kulin Brahmins." We are teaching a family of lovely girls in the zenana of one of them. The father was the terror of his children always, and especially so since the death of his much-suffering wife a year ago. Within the past few months there has been talk of marrying the eldest girl, and she, in common with her sisters and other female relatives, hoped the bridegroom was to be a youth whom her mother had said she would like her to marry. Before the holidays no one knew that arrangements were actually being made, and so imagine the surprise and sorrow of our teacher when she went to the zenana this week and was met with the announcement that the girl was married and had gone away.

With grief and indignation they told her that nothing was said to them until one morning early they were all roused by the father and told to perform a ceremony which takes place three days before marriage. In vain they protested, and at last had to carry out his orders. By that morning's train the bridegroom came, a man nearly fifty years old, of whom not one of them knew anything. The father had heard of him through a friend. Three days later this bright, pretty child of twelve years was married, and the fourth day taken to his home beyond Calcutta, where he already had one wife, for Kulin Brahmins often have many wives. What can one think of such a parent? I am indignant all the time over it.

There are so many abuses in this land that one is powerless to remedy, and most of them practised on women, that I feel sometimes that I cannot endure it. I am thankful still to be here and do what I can to bring a ray of brightness into dark lives.

THE PERILS OF STREET PREACHING IN INDIA.

THE heroism demanded of earnest men in India, in spite of British rule in that country, is graphically described in a letter published in the Indian Witness, by Mr. B. Peters, an Hindoo gentleman who has been converted to Christianity, and is now zealously laboring for the Saviour in Bangalore. He says:

As usual, I and other brethren, in company with a Mohammedan convert who has been recently baptized by me, finished our evening open-air preaching, two weeks ago, and were returning home, when a mob of between two and three hundred Mohammedans shouted "Kaffir! Kaffir!" and followed hard upon us, pelting us with cowdung, stones, pieces of sugar-cane, bricks, and slippers, for a short distance. Then they took to striking us with sticks, the new convert receiving the severest strokes. One of our company, Brother Paul Davarajloo, was hit hard under the ear with a man's fist. Meanwhile the thought occurred to some of our assailants to send a party round by a lane, to meet us in front, thus surprising us by a side attack and stopping our advance. A native Christian official heard them advising this, and at once, with his sons and a son-in-law, ran to where we were and conducted us to the house of an East Indian gentleman, Mr. David, and in doing so they suffered the violence of the mob with us. When we had taken shelter, the house was mobbed and would certainly have been broken into had it not been for a few bold Christians who guarded the door at the risk of their lives.

We could not obtain any relief or protection from the police, although there were eight Mohammedan constables at a few yards' distance, quite indifferent to what was taking place. The Christian gentleman above referred to, finding the mob becoming more furious, greater in number, and bent on mischief, wrote to the police inspector and obtained relief consisting of a few police constables, who with difficulty escorted us safely home. When we lodged a complaint with the police, all the satisfaction we obtained was simply to be told not to preach in our usual place, but to choose another spot.

Thank God, we are not dismayed nor frightened; but by the help of God we still continue to preach the Gospel, and we mean to fight the devil and storm the fort, and win souls for Christ until we are summoned to lay down our arms, and enter on our glorious reward, and enjoy our pension, in our King Immanuel's land.

A FOUNTAIN IN A DUNGEON.

IN the course of an exposition Mr. C. H. Spurgeon uses the following illustration: The dungeon of the Mamertine, where a probable tradition declares that Paul was for a while confined, is entered through a round hole in the floor of another dungeon above. The uppermost apartment is dark enough, but the lower one is darkness itself, so that the apostle's imprisonment was of the severest kind. We noticed, however, a strange fact: in the hard floor there is a beautiful fountain of clear crystal water, which doubtless was as fresh in Paul's day as it is now; of course the Papists believe the fountain to be miraculous; we, who are not so credulous of traditions, rather see in it a symbol full of instruction: there never was a dungeon for God's servants which was without its well of consolation.

A CHRIST-LIKE LIFE.

THE following testimony to the beneficent life of Dr. Grant, the first medical missionary to labor in Persia, is given by one of his associates to Dr. Dowkontt's Medical Missionary Record:

One of the most noted men in Asia Minor has passed away. He pursued his course in the medical department with such quiet zeal, exhaustless patience, and consummate skill, that he attained an eminence reached by comparatively few in his profession. The almost unprecedented number of surgical operations have given him celebrity, not only in the East, but also in Europe and America. The blind eyes he has opened are past counting; the crippled, the deformed, the sick from various diseases, who have been relieved by him, if all assembled, would make a great host. Much the larger portion of these cases were attended without pay, and all his earnings from patients able to pay were turned over to the treasury of the American Board. He received personally nothing but his regular salary; yet many a case which he has attended would, in America, have brought him hundreds, or even thousands, of dollars. Wherever he went, the diseased, the lame, the halt, the blind thronged him. It reminded one of the multitude following our Saviour; and the natives remarked: "He is like Jesus!" Pashas and great men would humble themselves to secure the help of this plain, unpretending physician.

Dr. Grant found that his medical practice gave him twenty times as much intercourse with the Mohammedans as the clerical missionary sent out expressly to them. Having prescribed for the Governor of Tabriz, the way was prepared for his favorable reception when the mission was established at Oroomiah; and on another occasion his medical aid to a powerful Kurdish chief no doubt saved his own life. And the fact is notable that the two missionary stations in Western Asia, where the foundations were laid by missionary physicians, Aintab and Oroomiah, have been among the most successful.

SPLIT GREENBACKS.

A DEXTEROUS swindler is engaged in a fraudulent operation requiring remarkable skill and ingenuity. The Baltimore Sun states that last week a somewhat worn ten-dollar bill was presented at the sub-treasury in that city with a request for change, which was given. When the note was examined afterward it was discovered that while one side of it was good, the other was a well-executed counterfeit of the original. It was found that a genuine ten-dollar bill had been split, the face being separated from the back, a seemingly impossible undertaking. The original face, with a counterfeit back, had been used, and it is quite likely that the genuine back with a counterfeit face had been passed in some other quarter. As an official of the treasury points out, this system of manipulating paper money is one of the most dangerous forms of swindling ever attempted. One or more genuine "fronts" mixed with several whole notes would be liable to deceive expert bank tellers. The face bearing undoubted proof of genuineness, very few would be apt to examine the backs of all the notes, unless something in the feel of the paper might arouse suspicion. Then, should any one, especially if not so expert as a bank teller, happen to strike the counterfeit side and have his doubts about the note, a glance at the other side would possibly set at rest all questions. Latterly society has been afflicted with a class of men whose character resembles these notes; they have two sides, one of which is shown to the Church, and the other to the world. With them, however, it is always the Church side that is counterfeit; and though it often imposes upon the Church, the day is coming when the fraud will be exposed (Ezek. 33:31).

THE DESIRE OF THE HEART.

By Rev. Sam Jones.

(From a Sermon preached at Toronto.)

The Mother's Wish—The Pastor's Wish—When a Mean Man is Miserable—Non-Sectarian People—Losing the Church—Obedient Horses—Mr. Beecher's Hired Horse—A Horse that will not Pull a Plough—How to Tell a Dog's Owner.

I AM going to speak to you about a very broad promise which you will find in the thirty-seventh Psalm, fifth verse: "Commit thy way unto the Lord: trust also in Him; and He shall bring it to pass." I suppose every person here, every earnest, true Christian, certainly has some supreme desire. I suppose that some good Christian mother here would say: "My supreme desire is to see my children safe in the arms of Jesus." Well, now, sister, listen: "He will bring it to pass." That is, all your loved ones shall be brought into the fold of Christ. Another says: "My supreme desire is to get more religion myself; the Lord knows I never had enough. O God, make my life more like the best of Thy servants, and more like Christ." Haven't you said it? God says if this is your supreme desire He will bring it to pass. Another says: "My desire is to see my church"—the pastor says: this—"made better." And, brethren, I believe it is laudable and scriptural for a pastor to be careful about his own church. I love to see a pastor stand by his people. It is right to want a good revival in your own church. It is right for you to want your own people to be the best in town. But I'll tell you what I dislike. I dislike to see a preacher happy when he has a big meeting and miserable when the brother round the corner is having a good time. You don't see that in Toronto, but if you were over in the States I'd show it to you occasionally. It takes more religion right on that point than at almost any other point in the pastor's life. I believe it takes more religion to sit still and see another fellow do a thing you wanted to do and couldn't, than to do anything else under the sun. I believe that.

A man who has got no religion at all,

HE IS NOT SECTARIAN.

If he's got a great deal he's not sectarian; but if he's just got enough religion to make him sectarian he's the most despicable man I ever saw on earth. I despise a man that's clever (used in the American sense of liberal, generous) in everything but religion, and he's as mean as a dog in that. It's meet and right for pastors to want their churches to do well. If I was colonel in a regiment in the army I would want my soldiers to do as much as any regiment in the army for my country. So, as a pastor, the captain of one of God's regiments, I want my church to get in the front of the battle. I want them to die with their faces to the enemy. But there is a sense in which we can unite—

WE MAY LOSE OUR IDENTITY.

There were such thick, hard-fought battles during the last war between the United States that companies got scattered from their regiments, and regiments from their divisions, and the battle was getting hotter and stronger; and when the victory was won, every man was inquiring where his regiment was. Good Lord, make us so earnest in fighting the devil and sin that we will forget which our church is. And when the battle is over we will all be inquiring for our churches. If we want to see our churches built up, that is laudable, and God says He will bring it to pass.

"Commit thy way to the Lord." I walk down to a livery stable this afternoon and I say, I want a horse and buggy. The horse is hitched and driven to the front door, and the livery man places the lines in my hands. The moment he does so, he commits the horse to me. The horse don't want to go anywhere in particular, but he will go where I want him to go. I sit in the buggy. When I chink to him he starts. If I pull on the right line, he turns to the right; if I pull on the left line, he turns to the left; if I check him up straight, he goes ahead; when I clap him with the lines he strikes a trot, and when I say "whoa," he stops. Now, that horse does what I want him to do. He is committed to my hand. Commit yourself to God; give the lines of your life into His hands; when He pulls on the right line, turn to the right; when He pulls on the left line, turn to the left. If the Lord wants you to go faster and slaps you with the lines of His Providence, if He says, "Whoa," stop. That is exactly what "commit" means. One old woman got mad because I compared folks to horses. I thought the horses might get mad, but never thought the folks would. I didn't, as true as you live. You know once they brought a horse to Mr. Beecher to go out on dress parade. Mr. Beecher asked if he was steady. The man said: "He's afraid of nothing, and he'll do just whatever you want him to." Mr. Beecher said: "I wish I had one such member in my church, who was afraid of nothing and would do whatever work I gave him." How would you like to have a church full of that kind? You have got few of that kind of horses, perhaps, and that reminds me of another kind of horse. Have you seen a horse that would not work except to one of these light skeleton buggies? They go with that like the wind, as we sometimes say. He moves grandly, with his head up, a magnificent animal, muscular and well formed. Hitch him to a wagon or a plough, and he won't pull at all, just prances around. Now, haven't some of these Sunday morning, put you in mind of this skeleton buggy horse, as they come into service all dressed up so grand, got up for dress parade, and having a magnificent time? But if you want to hitch them up to prayer-meeting or family prayer, they wouldn't pull at it a bit, not to save your life. And some of you remind me of the typical Georgia mule that the darkey brings into town. I have often seen the darkey come into town with his buggy without a dashboard, the seat all torn to pieces, and he sitting up there in magnificent style. He starts out of town driving his mule, and when he gets to the forks of the road he wants to go and tell his kinspeople good-by, and the mule wants to go the other way, and the old darkey begins to pull him round and round. I have seen the mule's head turned the way his master wants him to go, but his body the other way.

STRIKE A TROT;

ELEVEN O'CLOCK CHRISTIANS,

I tell people sometimes that if I see a dog going along the street following two men riding on horseback, I can't

to save my life. But I go up here to the forks of the road, where one man takes one course and another takes another. I can tell whose dog he is, because he will follow his master. Stand on some of these corners where one way leads to the theatre and one to the prayer-meeting. You can't tell where that man is going, but if you stand at the forks of the street you can tell. If you are going along and you take the road to the theatre you are the devil's dog, and you needn't say anything more about it. That is my candid judgment.

RUSSIA'S PREDICTED INVASION OF TURKEY.

By Rev. Samuel Valentine Edwards.

A Terrible War Impending—The Future Ten-Kingdomed Confederacy—The Progress of Antichrist—His Earlier Attitude toward Israel—God's Vengeance on the Great Northern Power—Perfect Deliverance Achieved for Israel.

It is clear, from a comparison of the present aspect of the world with the prophetic Scriptures, that Daniel's predicted "time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time" (Dan. 12 : 1; Matt. 24 : 21), is now about to commence throughout the earth. Prophecy leads us to expect, not only a terrible war between Russia and Turkey, but also yet again between Germany and France, in which (however unlikely it may appear) France must triumph, and re-annex Alsace, Lorraine, and all the left bank of the Rhine to its territories. And this will lead to the formation of the Confederacy of ten kingdoms of the Roman Empire—five in the West, probably Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria; and five in the East, apparently Greece, Turkey, Syria, Egypt, and the north-eastern coast of Africa—as represented by the ten-horned wild beast of Daniel 7, and the ten-toed human image foreshown to Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. 2).

After the distinct and unmistakable appearance of these ten kingdoms with ten sovereigns reigning over them—the ten horns of Daniel 7—there will arise an eleventh little horn, or sovereign, who will be and ultimately develop into the character of the last great Antichrist. He will, at the outset of his career, arise as the sovereign of an eleventh small kingdom, within the boundaries of the Roman world (probably in the neighborhood of Greece), and will presently overthrow three of the ten kingdoms, and, by degrees, rise to the attainment of "power over all nations and kindreds and tongues, and all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him" during the final three and a half years of this dispensation (Rev. 13 : 5-7).

That this great Antichrist will be some Napoleon appears from the fact that the Napoleon dynasty, being the seventh dynastic headship of the Roman Empire, is predicted in Rev. 13 : 3 to have the deadly wound, inflicted upon it by the sword of war at Waterloo and again at Sedan, ultimately healed, so that "all the world shall wonder," when they shall behold the Napoleon empire, "that was, and is not, and yet is" (Rev. 17 : 8).

But before the great Antichrist commences his persecuting career for three and a half years in that character, Christ will come in the air (1 Thess. 4 : 16, 17) and raise His deceased saints, and remove them with His waiting people then living on the earth, to meet Him in the atmospheric heavens.

This personal Antichrist, the last secular head of the Roman Empire (Daniel's fourth kingdom), divided into ten kingdoms—the man of sin, the son of perdition—is the little horn who shall speak blasphemous words against God, and shall sit in the temple of God, and require all men to worship him and his image (II Thess. 2; Rev. 13). Though for the first half of the covenant week of seven years, he will be friendly to Israel, allowing at Jerusalem, and the Jewish sacrifices to be offered, and the Jewish ceremonial worship to be carried out; he will, nevertheless, turn against them when the Jews refuse to worship his image, the idol of desolation set up by the false prophet in the holy place, he will break his seven years' covenant (Dan. 9 : 27) previously made with them, and become their persecutor for the last 1260 days of the present dispensation. He will then besiege and take their city Jerusalem, with his armies gathered from all nations, causing two thirds of the inhabitants to be slain or carried away captives (Zech. 13 : 8). But when the end of his predestined three and a half years of universal dominion and power is reached, he will be cast alive with the false prophet into the lake of fire, by Jesus Christ, the King of Israel. If by

GOG, MESHECH, AND TUBAL

(Ezek. 38) we are to understand Russia and the nations under her sway (the words chief prince of Meshech and Tubal, signifying literally, "prince of Russia, Muscovy, and Tobolski") it is probable that the fact of the restoration of Israel to the Holy Land—the revival of the Jewish sacrifices and feasts, and of the Levitical temple worship at Jerusalem—the great wealth of the Jews, flocking like doves to Palestine, from Russia, Poland, and the Eastern and Western nations, may influence the head of the Russian Empire, now spreading with gigantic strides eastward and southward, with the countless hordes of cavalry and various nationalities at his command, to endeavor to realize the dream of Peter the Great, the founder of the Russian Empire, and become the possessor of Constantinople, Turkey in Asia, and the Holy Land, the key to India and future conquests, and further to obtain exclusive possession, in Palestine, of the Holy Sepulchre and the other spots held sacred by the Greek Church, of which the Czar is the head.

There can be little doubt, in fact, that the nations signified by Ezekiel, in the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters, as Gog, Magog, etc., are nations now existing upon the earth—namely, Russia and the Eastern nations who are more or less subject to the sway of

THE EMPEROR OF ALL THE RUSSIAS.

A careful examination of the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of Ezekiel clearly shows that there will be an invasion by Russia of Palestine (which at present forms part of Turkey), and, before reaching Palestine, the Russian army will invade the central portion of the Turkish Empire, which lies between Russia and Palestine.

But whatever success may attend Russia's earlier invasions of Turkey, the ultimate result is to be that, after the lapse of a few years, the hosts of the great Northern power are, in a great measure, to be destroyed by pestilence and blood, "an overflowing rain and great hailstones, fire and brimstone." Their weapons of war are then to be sufficient for fuel throughout the land of Israel for seven years, and the burial of the bodies of the slain is to occupy the house of Israel seven months; for "Gog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal, shall fall with all his bands, and the people with him, upon the mountains of Israel."

It is clear, from the account given of this invasion and its results, that Gog's hosts will be defeated and destroyed by the hand of the Lord, and not by the armies of Israel; that as Israel stood still, on the shore of the Red Sea, and beheld the destruction of Pharaoh and his hosts, so that not one of the mighty host returned to tell Egypt the story, in like manner Israel, in the latter days, will behold the destruction, the plagues, the judgments, and the vials of Divine wrath poured out upon Gog, and all his bands, by the mighty God, the King of Israel, the true Joshua. For a fire from heaven will consume the enemies of Israel, and mighty hailstones will destroy them; while the pestilence shall decimate them, and a terrible panic shall constrain them to turn their swords against each other; so that the hosts of Gog, like the hosts of Pharaoh and of Sennacherib in former days, shall melt away before the fury of the Lord God of Israel.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Proclamation in the Spanish difficulty has produced the desired effect. It was formally revoked on October 28th. As soon as the proclamation terminating the one-sided system was issued by President Cleveland, the interference of Spain was invoked by the colonies, and the Spanish minister had a consultation with Secretary Bayard early last week.
They arrived at an agreement by which all that the United States contended for, under the agreement made in 1884, was accepted by the Spanish Government. The Spanish minister told the Secretary of State that his Government would now readily accept the construction of the agreement of 1884 put upon it by the United States and evaded by the officials of Cuba and Porto Rico. The new agreement removes all discriminating duties upon vessels wholly belonging to citizens of the United States, or upon the produce, manufactures, or merchandise imported in the same from the United States or from any foreign country. The agreement is made so broad that all ground for quibbling about merchandise being transhipped from foreign to American vessels in our ports or whether carried by American bottoms direct from foreign countries to Spanish American ports has been, it is believed, entirely removed.
The proclamation was not revoked until this agreement was formally ratified, though efforts were made to have it done on the faith of verbal promises.

An Interesting Report on Indian Affairs was issued last week by Commissioner J. D. C. Atkins. The commissioner severely arraigns existing laws and shows how in his opinion changes might be made of mutual benefit to the Government and the Indians. His principal recommendation is that which has often been urged—the allotment of land to the Indians in severalty instead of in tribes. He contends that there is no better way of keeping out white settlers, and that an Indian who owns his own land would take care of it without requiring an army to defend it. He also insists that the present system involves injustice and invidious distinctions among the Indians themselves. He says: "At present the rich Indians who cultivate tribal lands pay no rent to the poorer members of their tribe, although they are equal owners of the soil. The rich men have too large homesteads and control many times more than their share of the land." The commissioner dwells at length upon the surplus land in the Indian Territory, and says were all the Indians of the United States to be uprooted and transplanted to this Territory there would then be, including those now resident there, more than two hundred and fifty acres for each living Indian. This is estimating the whole Indian population of the United States, excluding Alaska, at two hundred and sixty thousand. He suggests that the Kiowas, Comanches, Wichitas, Cheyennes, and Arapahoes be removed to the unoccupied lands, which, if divided equally, would give to each Indian four hundred and ninety acres. The commissioner asserts that the five civilized tribes contain men fit to form a territorial government and of sufficient intelligence to legislate and manage public business at least as well as it is managed in the other Territories.

The Landing of Mormon Immigrants at Philadelphia commenced last week. Elder Greenwood was in charge of them, and his party comprised three hundred and seven recruits, chiefly women and children. Three Mormon leaders had cabin accommodation, but their dupes came over in the steerage, where they were seen huddled together like sheep and suffering much from cold and damp. Of the party one hundred and three are Scandinavians, three Swiss, ten Germans, and the rest English, Scotch, and Welsh. More than half of these converts are English. They were inspected and passed as ordinary emigrants by the commissioners, and allowed to proceed to Baltimore, and thence to Chicago, whence they will be taken to Utah,
Wyoming, Colorado, and Idaho to their fellow-Mormons. The elder confirmed the report previously circulated that Philadelphia will be the port used in future in preference to New York.
It may be hoped, however, that when the news reaches Philadelphia of the obstacles to the immigration raised by New York, that the authorities there will also interfere to check the disembarkation. This is the third cargo Greenwood has brought this year.

The Extent to which International Correspondence has grown may be inferred from the report of Mr. Nicholas M. Bell, the Superintendent of Foreign Mails, published last week.
From this it appears that the total weight of letters despatched during the fiscal year just closed to foreign countries by sea was 500,198 pounds, and of papers 2,367,583 pounds. The estimated total number of letters sent to foreign countries was 37,002,893, and 30,405,847 were received; 47,049,064 newspapers were sent and 26,700,050 were received. A careful estimate of the mail matter of all kinds exchanged throughout the world in one day places the total at 11,640,000,000, or about five pieces for every human being. Evidently the prophecy is fulfilled that "many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased."

The Dedication of the Statue of Liberty Enlightening the World, which has been presented to the United States by the people of the French Republic, and has been erected in the harbor of New York, took place on Thursday last. As was stated in our last issue in connection with the picture of the statue, there arrived from France a number of distinguished French citizens, among whom were M. de Lesseps and M.
Bartholdi, to take part in the inaugural ceremonies. The weather was unpropitious, but there was nevertheless a parade such as the city has rarely seen for extent and magnificence.
President Cleveland, with Secretaries Bayard, Whitney, Lamar, and Postmaster-General Vilas and General Sheridan reviewed the procession and assisted at the dedication. M. de Lesseps spoke on behalf of the French guests. In the course of his speech he said: "I come to bring to you a tribute of fraternity with America. I hastened to avail myself of the gracious invitation which was given to me by the great American Republic. The idea of erecting the statue of liberty was a generous one. It does honor to those who conceived it, as it likewise does to those who executed it. Liberty lighting the world!" Senator Evarts made one of his characteristic speeches in reply. The display of fireworks and the lighting of the statue were postponed until a fair night.

A Socialist Demonstration in London is threatened. Socialist clubs have proposed that when the newly-elected Lord Mayor goes in state procession through the streets on November 9th his procession should be followed by two thousand starving workingmen in their rags, that Londoners may see at a glance the contrast in the two social extremes. The chief of the police has forbidden this addition to the mayoral pageant, but the workingmen have replied that they have as much right to parade as any other body of citizens, and strongly protest against what they are advised is an illegal and arbitrary attempt to interfere with their privileges as English citizens. It is believed the commissioner's orders will be disregarded.

The Utterances of Prominent British Conservatives during the past week indicate that Lord Randolph Churchill is carrying with him the whole of his party in his new career of Radicalism. While the watchword of the party has hitherto been the maintenance of the existing order of things, the party under its new leader is disposed to consider and adopt reforms which even the Whigs of the Hartington type regard as little short of revolutionary. Sir Edward Clarke, the Solicitor-General, speaking last week, declared that Lord Randolph's programme was heartily indorsed by his colleagues, and intimated that projects still more advanced might be advocated. The new energy displayed by the Conservatives astonishes politicians and renders the prospect of a return to power of a Liberal administration extremely gloomy. Mr.
W. H. Smith also hinted in a speech, delivered on Friday last, that Ireland might get the essence of self-government from the Conservatives. This, it may be presumed, would be effected by local legislatures, which would be intrusted with large powers, while avoiding the difficulty of a central assembly at Dublin. It is understood that the Ulster Protestants would approve the plan and that the Nationalists would accept it as a stepping-stone to independence. The system, if adopted in Ireland, would probably be extended to the entire empire, and the conception of federal government realized.

The Meeting of the Bulgarian Sobranje, which is charged with the task of choosing a successor to Prince Alexander, took place on Monday last. It is expected that the whole of this week will be occupied in verifying the credentials of delegates. Outwardly the Bulgarian statesmen display abject submission to Russia, and have even given assurances to the Czar that if he will name a candidate for the throne his nominee shall be elected. On the other hand, there are many indications of deep-seated hostility to Russia. An edict issued last week orders the teachers in the public schools to cease teaching the Russian language and to substitute German therefor. A Bulgarian colonel, who is the commander at Rustchuk, memorialized the Government at the suggestion of the Russian minister, urging the release of the officers now in prison on the charge of aiding in the deposition of Prince Alexander. The response of the Government was to deprive the colonel of his command and imprison him for a month. These acts showing a similar spirit neutralize the professions of submission tendered to Russia and render the present crisis a serious one.
There appears to be little doubt that Bulgaria would drop her mask and openly defy Russia if she could be assured that England and Austria would support her. England, however, is shocked by the discovery of corruption and inefficiency in her army and navy as exposed by Lord Beresford and the Duke of Cambridge, and seems now to shrink from a conflict that would be one of the most gigantic of modern times.
In this uncertainty Bulgaria is endeavoring to conciliate the Czar while trying to maintain her independence. A peaceful issue from the complication is by no means probable.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $3. They are from New Brunswick, N. J., $1; Cincinnati, O., $1; Auburn, Ala., $1. A large number of these subscriptions are now expiring, and much anxiety is felt by the recipients as to the future. We deeply sympathize with them, but as there are some hundreds, we cannot do more than promise that for every dollar received one name shall be renewed for a year. Those who write us describing the help they have received during the past year from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in expounding the Word of God and in their general ministrations, and reminding us that they have no libraries nor the means of buying books, and that one copy of the paper received every week is a means of blessing not only to them but to their people, may be assured that we fully realize their need and shall be as thankful as they will if God inclines the hearts of His people to support this fund. He will certainly do it if they pray to Him; for He knows their necessities.

The Annual Meeting of the National Women's Christian Temperance Union, held at Minneapolis, Minn., was a most remarkable gathering. Delegations from nearly every State attended. Mrs. Lucas, the sister of the venerable British statesman, John Bright, Mrs. Youman, President of the Canadian W. C. T. U., Mrs. Parsons, from England, were also present, and took part in the proceedings. Miss Frances E. Willard, the president, in her annual address, made the following recommendations: A system of township organization; an address to the Knights of Labor, asking them to include total abstinence in their basis of membership; to send out circulars urging work in behalf of the White Cross movement; urging Congress to pass the Blair Educational bill; for the abolition of prison chain gangs; for the placing of women under women's care in all penal and philanthropic institutions; a petition to Congress for a prohibitory amendment to the Constitution; also one granting the ballot to women.

The White Cross Meeting to be Held on Saturday next at eight o'clock in the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association at Twenty-third Street and Fourth Avenue, New York, promises to be one of deep interest. It is for men only. William Blaikie, Esq., Captain Jasper T. Goodwin, of Columbia College, Mornay Williams, Esq., and Cleveland H. Dodge, Esq., are among the speakers who will address the meeting. A very large attendance is expected, and prayers are being offered that God will bless the meeting to the young men of the city. During the past few weeks vice has been showing increased effrontery, and temptations which were suppressed some months ago have taken new life and vigor. There is therefore the more need for activity in warning young men and urging them to seek divine aid in living a pure life.

The Rev. W. F. Re Qua is Expecting to Remove to McAlister, in the Indian Territory, before the end of this month. Tidings have reached him that in a settlement not far from that place a missionary and his church have been praying for six months past that it would please God to send an earnest, zealous worker to McAlister, where there are indications that an abundant harvest might be gathered by a consecrated man. There is no church building there, but Mr. Re Qua believes that it is a call from God, and that, without the usual accessories of worship, much good may be done. Mrs. Re Qua, whose beautiful poems, "Stones for the Temple," many of our subscribers have read, goes with her husband and will assist him in his labors among the Indians. A poem which she has written expressly for this journal appears on page 704 of this issue. The remaining volumes of "Stones for the Temple" which are left of the edition Mrs. Re Qua proposes to sell and devote the proceeds to the mission work in the Territory. The price of each volume, postage paid, is $1.25. Mr. Re Qua's address for the present is 135 North Fourth Street, Aurora, Ill.

A House is Being Besieged by Officers of the law at Sandwich, Ont. Some weeks ago a well-known literary man who resides in that town committed a breach of the peace, but managed to escape and reached his house unmolested. He rapidly collected a stock of provisions and then bolted and barred every door and window. He had scarcely done so when an officer armed with a warrant arrived. Being unable to gain admittance he procured assistance, and though now there is quite a company surrounding the place, the warrant has not been executed. The house is well adapted to resist any sudden assault, and in vain the officers have made regular approaches to seize the garrison. Save the occasional fluttering of a curtain at an upper window, no sign of life denotes the activity of the besieged; but the moment an effort to gain admittance is detected on the part of the enemy, the defenders are instantly on the alert and the foe repulsed at all points. All sorts of stratagems have been resorted to to get the owner out, such as the cry of "Fire! Fire!" messages from alleged friends and other devices, but he is too wary to be duped. It is a pity that when Satan assaults the soul he does not meet with so stubborn a resistance. Some traitorous appetite or desire generally opens the gate to him. Yet victory is promised to those who will oppose him (James 4:7).

An Unexpected Legacy Has Been Received by a commercial traveller. While staying at St. Paul, Minn., on October 25th, he received a letter forwarded to him from New York announcing that five thousand dollars would be paid to him on application to a legal firm. The letter further stated that it was a bequest from a lady recently deceased. The legatee strove to remember where he could have met a person who would thus endow him. At last he recollected the name. Some years ago he spent a few days at Coney Island, and seeing a young lady, who was bathing, sink, he plunged into the water and rescued her only just in time to save her life. The young lady was profuse in her thanks when she had recovered, and a few days later he received a letter from her mother expressing her gratitude in warm terms, but not hinting at any reward. The incident passed from his mind until the notice of the legacy was received last week, when he recognized the name of his benefactor as that of the mother of the girl whose life he saved some years ago. The legacy was a genuine surprise, as he did not expect any reward for his service, especially after so long a time. We are told that there will be similar surprise manifested at the last great day when God distributes rewards to those who have succored and helped needy Christians for Jesus' sake (Matt. 25:37-40).

The Disclosure of a Secret After Twenty years appears to have turned the brain of a young Canadian. A few weeks ago a young gentleman in the best society of Montreal suddenly disappeared, and on October 21st news arrived in the city that he was lying in imminent danger of death at Omaha from a wound inflicted by his own hand. It appears that the day before his departure from Montreal some person had taunted him with being illegitimate. The high-spirited young man immediately went to the gentleman whom he had always regarded as his father, and asked him to tell him the truth. Seeing that the secret could no longer be kept, the gentleman admitted that he was not his father. Twenty years before he had found him in the street an abandoned infant only a few days old, and had taken him home and reared and educated him as his own son, and intended to make him his heir. The young man was almost crazed by the disclosure, and resolved to leave the country. A considerable sum of money was given to him, and he went to live among strangers. When he reached Omaha, however, two weeks ago, he shot himself, though, it is hoped, not fatally. It would appear that the young man had cherished family pride too much, or the stain on his birth would not have affected him so disastrously. If he had been a Christian the consciousness of his adoption into God's family would have dwarfed every other consideration (Gal. 4:5).

A Grave was Sent to California from Chicago by express recently. It was sent to a former citizen of Chicago, who some years ago went to California to make his fortune. He was successful, and concluded to spend the rest of his days in that State. But there was one thing he had left behind that was very dear to him. Shortly before he left Chicago he had buried a beloved child, and now, being able to afford it, he desired to have the body removed to his new home. He was not content with having the casket containing the remains, but wanted the sods that he had watered with his tears. A box about five feet long and covered with glass was accordingly prepared, and the little mound covered with sods and flowers was transferred to it in bulk and shipped with the casket to California. This act, so significant of a father's love, suggests a thought which should comfort any to whom death and the grave are objects of horror. Even the dead bodies of His children are precious in God's sight, and will be raised in glory at Christ's coming (1 Cor. 15:52, 53).

A Disappointed Bridegroom is Returning from a futile journey of two thousand miles to fetch his bride. He is a soldier stationed with his command at Cœur d'Alene, I. T., but some time ago he obtained leave of absence to be married, and set out for Louisville, Ky., to meet the lady who had promised to be his wife. He arrived there on October 26th, but found that his long journey had been taken in vain. The lady had accepted the offer of another suitor, and though she was to be married on the next day, it was not to the young officer. He found her with her family and friends gathered around her preparing for the ceremony, and reminding her of the promise she had made to him two years before, he reproached her bitterly for her unfaithfulness. The young lady was surprised to see him, as she had telegraphed him not to come, and had written him also of the change in her affections; but the telegram and letter did not arrive until after he had started on his two thousand mile journey. His disappointment and chagrin may be imagined. Those who blame the fickle young lady must remember, if they form part of the Church, the bride of Christ, that there is a danger of their own unfaithfulness. Jesus Himself intimated very clearly that at His coming again He would find many unprepared to meet Him and a general lack of faith on the earth (Luke 18:8).

The Future Bride of a King is in Hanover County, Virginia. She is residing, according to the local correspondent of the Cleveland Leader, with an Episcopal clergyman who was formerly a missionary in Western Africa. While the clergyman and his wife were in the African field a strong attachment sprang up between them and a little child eight years old, a daughter of the king of the country in which they were laboring. When they returned to America the child was anxious to come with them, and the missionaries, as may be supposed, were still more desirous to bring her. The father's consent was obtained, and now for seven years the little African princess has been a member of the clergyman's family, being treated in every respect as his own child. She is described as gentle, affectionate, and intelligent. She is thoroughly well educated, and has given proof of the sincerity of her Christian profession. Communications with her family have been kept up through the missionary's successor, and now she is invited to go back to Africa to become the wife of a king. As her Christian character is formed, the missionary and his wife are not opposed to her accepting the offer, believing that she may do much to raise her people and lead them to Christianity. Though royal by birth, and becoming royal by marriage, the really important thing for her is the royalty she has attained by adoption into the family of the King of kings (Rev. 17:14).

AN INCIDENT AT BETHABARA.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Therefore they sought again to take Him: but He escaped out of their hand, and went away again beyond Jordan into the place where John at first baptized; and there He abode. And many resorted unto Him, and said, John did no miracle: but all things that John spake of this man were true. And many believed on Him there."—JOHN 10: 39-42.

The Time—Just after Opposition—A Quiet Time—III. The Fact—What Jesus Lived for—IV. A Second Edition Needed—King George's Rejection of a Book.

BECAUSE our Saviour's reasoning was unanswerable, "therefore the Jews sought again to take Him." When men are convinced against their wills, when the heart struggles against the head, it usually happens that they turn persecutors. If they cannot answer holy arguments with fair reasonings, they can give hard

ANSWERS WITH STONES.

If you cannot destroy the reasoning, you may, perhaps, destroy the reasoner; and this naturally suggests itself to the heart which is rendered cruel by obstinate unbelief. He who hates truth soon hates its advocate. Yet it is a very wretched business when a man knows that he is wrong, and therefore attacks the person who has convinced him.

When our Saviour found that there was nothing to be done with the bigoted Jews, but that all He said and did only provoked more furious opposition, He escaped out of their hand, and went away. He knew when to speak, and when to refrain. Divinely guided, He neither fled as a coward, nor rashly pushed on where nothing could be gained.

But though our Lord left the obstinate, He never ceased to do good. He did not say: "It is of no further use to preach and plead; I am, therefore, driven away to Bethabara, by the lonely Jordan, and I will warn the people no more." Nay, rather, as many resorted to Him there, He went on with His teaching, and in that place many believed on Him. Though Jesus withdrew from the stones which filled the hands of angry Jews, He went to that place where John had said: "God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham."

I. The first remark I shall make is, that when men believe in Jesus Christ it is very pleasant to know therefore is it recorded by inspiration that "many believed on Him there." I do not say it is essential for a man to know the place where he believed in Jesus; it is not at all essential. It is not necessary for a person's life for him to know where he was born; yet I am glad that I know my birthplace, and I am happy to remember the humble spot. If anybody were to say to you: "Do you know where you were born?" and you were forced to answer "No," would you expect him to say: "Then you are not alive"? If he did say so, it would be very bad argument, as you would be able to prove at once by letting him see that you were far from non-existent; and so, if you cannot state where you were converted, nor when you were converted, do not fret about it. A far more needful inquiry is: Are you converted? If so, it is by no means essential that thou shouldst know the place, or the means, or the hour.

Still, it is very interesting to be able to point out the place of our new birth. I am thankful to be able to do so; and many others of us are glad that they have an equally vivid memory of the spot whereon they stood when they passed from death unto life. "Yes," you can say, "I believed on Him there." Happy place! Holy place! Some of us know the spot to a yard where we looked unto Christ, and felt our burden of sin loosed from our weary shoulders. Standing in one of the halls of the Orphanage is the very pulpit from which I savingly heard the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. Though I have no reverence for relics of any sort, yet a flood of grateful memories flows before me as I look upon the platform whereon stood the unknown brother who pointed me to Jesus. Who he was I shall never know till the Day of Judgment; but the text: "Look unto Me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth," was the voice of God to my soul. It is an interesting thing to know where you were converted.

What was there particular about in which our Lord Jesus, on this occasion, gathered so many disciples? What was there about the place beyond Jordan where John at first baptized?

It was a place where divine ordinances had been observed: "The place where John at first baptized; and many believed on Him there." Where the Lord is obeyed, we may hope to see Him revealed. "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it," was the word of the blessed Virgin concerning her Son; and it was a good word, worthy to be spoken in the ear of the entire Christian Church. If a church labors to keep the ordinances as they were delivered, and endeavors to follow in the track of Christ's teaching and example, it may hope to receive the divine blessing. In keeping His commandments there is great reward. Outward ordinances cannot secure a blessing; but the spirit of obedience which leads to a careful observance of them according to the divine command is a blessed fruit of the Spirit.

WHERE JOHN BAPTIZED,

and Jesus submitted thus to fulfil all righteousness, we find a spot which is suited for a divine revival. Secondly, remember, this Bethabara was the place where faithful preaching concerning Jesus had been heard. For this John who baptized also preached the Gospel of repentance. He laid great stress upon that part of the Gospel which prepares men for the coming kingdom. Where repentance has been thoroughly preached, I believe that many will come to believe in Jesus Christ. Jesus fitly followed John; and faith will follow readily where repentance has been thoroughly preached and explained. Herod had cut off John's head, but he had not silenced John's voice. From the wilderness there still came the cry: "Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." A hallowed influence lingers about the scenes of faithful labors; and I wonder not that our Lord sought retirement where every ripple of the river repeated the Baptist's testimony. From scenes like these the Church will be recruited with new disciples.

What fine preaching was that of John! No wonder that many believed on Jesus there, where the savor of such a ministry lingered in men's minds! Brethren, wherever there has been earnest preaching we may expect that many will believe in the Lord Jesus Christ before long. Let no faithful preacher's heart be faint within him; Christ is not preached in vain; you have not pointed to the Lamb of God for nothing. Even should you die without seeing it, there will come another after you who will reap a harvest from the seed which you have sowed. Hidden truth will break out on a sudden, and it shall be said: "Many believed on Him there."

As for the place wherein we stand, I can solemnly assert that I have with all my heart preached to you the Gospel of the grace of God. If a thousand persons were to believe in Jesus this morning I should not be in the least surprised; for this I surely can claim, that to the best of my knowledge and ability I have these many years preached nothing among you but the cross of Christ. I, too, have cried: "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." I have endeavored to point out to you Him whose shoe latches I am not worthy to unloose. I have prayed that He might baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire. Many saints have joined me in that earnest prayer. If at Bethabara many believed on Him there, we may expect that many will believe on Him here.

The next remark about the place is this: it was a spot where God had borne witness to His Son Jesus. Jesus had come to be baptized of John, and when He was baptized He came up straightway out of the water; and the heavens were opened, and the Spirit descended upon Him like a dove, while a voice said: "This is My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." The Holy Ghost is wont to go where He has gone before; and where the Father has borne witness to Christ once, we may expect Him to bear witness again.

Once more: not only was this

to our Lord Jesus Christ; but Bethabara was also very interesting to the leaders of the little band who accompanied Him; it was the place where the Lord's first disciples had been won. They heard John speak, and followed Jesus. John and James and Andrew and Peter had been there brought to Jesus, and certain others also had joined the chosen band. To visit the place of their own spiritual birth would cause a renewal of their vows, and act as an encouragement to persevere in winning others. Eternity alone shall tell how many souls have been born to God in this house. We have actually registered nearly eleven thousand persons, who have come forward and confessed their faith, and joined this church; but these are only a small part of the whole; for great numbers come here and return to the country, and unite with other churches.

I suppose it was a lovely quiet spot by the banks of the Jordan, with only a little village or hamlet, named Bethany, close by. The word Bethany was altered by Origen into Bethabara, I suppose for distinction's sake. It really was Bethany, and so our Lord had two Bethanias. It was there, in a rural retreat, that many believed on His name. O hills of Piedmont, when the Vaudois preached the Christ amid your valleys, it may be said of you: "Many believed on Him there"! O mosses and hill-sides of Scotland, in the Covenanting times, many believed on Him there! Talk not so exceedingly proudly, O ye cathedrals or ye great tabernacles; for many have believed on Jesus by the highway side, out on the village green, or under the spreading oak. Go forth, ye heralds of the cross, and preach the Gospel everywhere beneath the arch of heaven. At the corners of the street or on the hill-side publish the proclamation of the Great King. In all ears proclaim the Gospel, till by river, sea, and plain it shall be said: "Many believed on Him there."

II. Secondly, it is very instructive to when persons are led to faith. Many believed on Him there and then—when He was preaching at the place where John first baptized.

As I have said, some of you do not know when you believed, but you know that you have believed, and that knowledge is quite sufficient. Still, it is interesting to know when you believed. Let us see if there were not certain noteworthy circumstances about the season of the conversion of these many. When was it?

First, it was after a time of very great and obstinate opposition. The Saviour could make nothing of these cavilling Jews; they were so desperately prejudiced against Him, that He turned away from them to more hopeful spirits. No sooner does He cross the river than we read that "many believed on Him there." So great a difference may we find in a few miles and a few hours. Opposition is no sign of defeat, but the contrary. When the devil roars, it is because his kingdom is being shaken, or he is afraid that it will be shaken. It should not depress us when we see a bitter spirit aroused; it should grieve us to see men opposing the truth, but it should not lead us to abstain from spreading it. In the face of intense opposition our eyes should sparkle

"With that stern joy which warriors feel
In foemen worthy of their steel."

Nothing is worse than stagnation. The stolid indifference of a thoughtless age is hard to deal with; but there is some little hope of a people who will resist you. Take courage from the blackening down of the darkness, and hope that very soon you will see the dawn of a better day.

The next point which is worthy of thought is that the time when these believed was a time of calm, unbroken quietude. I thank my God most heartily for giving us quiet worship. We are not dull and sleepy, but we are not excited and noisy. I am glad to hope that some men are converted to God amid war, and earthquakes, and pestilence; but I am inclined to be suspicious of that kind of conversion, for fear it should die with its cause. We had some time ago, and in the little towns everybody went to the place of worship that week. I asked one of the ministers of a certain village in Essex how they were getting on now that frisky Essex had once more settled down. "Oh," said he, "we are as dead as ever. We need an earthquake every week to wake us up." If that had not been true of Essex I am sure it is true of other places. That which is born with fear dies with fear; but our Saviour, in the calm of the hamlet by the river's bank, instilled the truth into thoughtful minds. If you are this day free from care, free from labor, free from fret, I beseech you, calmly judge of your condition as to the world to come whereof we speak.

What else shall I say as to this time when many believed in Jesus? I will say nothing else except that it was a time of which nothing else need be said. "Many believed on Him there." Blessed is that age which has no history; but more blessed is that age of which this is the history: "Many believed on Him there." Happiest of days in which many believed in Jesus! Brightest of spots of which it is said: "Many believed on Him there"! The most honorable record of any house of prayer will be this: "Many believed on Him there." I am praying that this may be the case here to-day. Why should it not be so? Why should it not be said to-day: "Many believed on Him there and then"?

III. We now make a third remark, which is this: It is cheering to observe

THE FACT ITSELF.

We have noticed the place and the time, but these are of secondary consequence; it is most charming to observe the fact—"Many believed on Him." This fact was a great refreshment to our dear Saviour's heart. I do not say that John tells us so; but I do think that from the style of his writing in this passage it looks so. There is an air of quietude about the passage. He writes, "and there He abode." He seemed at home there; He could rest at Bethabara, because many believed on Him there. This was to be an oasis of comfort for our Lord before He traversed the burning desert of His passion and death. Ere He was called by His last bitter agony to finish the work which the Father had given Him to do, He was to be refreshed by many true hearts putting their trust in Him.

The fact is very cheering, for you notice concerning

that it was decided. They did not say that they would try to believe, but they believed on Him there. They did not promise to think of it, but they believed on Him there. They did not say that they felt impressions, but they believed on Him there. They did not say that they hoped and trusted, and so on, but they believed on Him there. That is the consummation for which I pray at this time, that you should not talk about faith or feeling, nor resolve and promise; but that you should actually believe on Him straight away. Oh, that I might see in you a sharp, clear, crisp faith in Jesus Christ—a faith about which there shall be no question! Remember, if you have a certain faith, you have a certain salvation. A doubtful faith will leave a doubt about your security; but those who believe out and out shall have joy and peace through believing.

This faith is said to have been widespread; for "many believed on Him there." I do not think we have anybody left in this congregation of that ancient who glory in the fewness of the elect. I hope they are nearly all gone to heaven out of all the congregations, whom once they harassed. These brethren used to think that if one or two converts were brought in in a year, a great work was being done. If they heard of an evangelist holding revival services, and learned that two or three hundred were added to the Church, they said: "Ah, h'm! These excitements end in reaction. It is all very fine to hear of so many joining the Church. I hope they will all turn out right." This meant, being interpreted, that they did not think they would, and that they would be sorry if they did. Now we are not of that mind. We believe in many conversions; we look for them, and we have them.

"Many believed on Him." This was what He lived for; this is what He died for, that men might believe in Him. This is what we preach for; this is what you have come here for. God gives you to hear the Gospel that you may believe on Jesus. "If ye believe not, surely ye shall not be established." "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved: he that believeth not shall be damned." God save us from that, for Christ's sake!

IV. And now I close with the fourth head, which is this: it has been pleasant to know the place, instructive to note the time, and cheering to observe the fact, and now it is most important that we should have

A SECOND EDITION OF IT.

It is most important that many should believe on Christ here, in this very place, at this very hour.

For first, this morning many are here. From different motives and from different quarters of the globe you have come hither at this time. We have so far realized the text that "many resorted unto Him." This is a good beginning; we ought to be very thankful to see it. Next, the Lord Jesus Christ is here by His Spirit. He declares that where two or three are met together in His name there He is; we have many twos and threes here. He has promised to be with His people to the end of the world when they go forth to preach the Gospel. We have been crying to Him for a blessing this morning, and He comes to answer our prayers. So far all is hopeful. We have the Lord and the many resorting to Him.

Beside that, you have the testimony of His own Gospel. The Gospel is its own sufficient witness. Somebody wrote a book, and wished to present it to old George the Third. Farmer George said: "What's the book about, sir?" "Sire, it is an apology for the Bible." "What!" said George, "what! Apology for the Bible! Apology for the Bible! Never heard of such a thing. Don't want your book, sir. Apology for the Bible indeed!" Quite right, King George! Surely we do not want any apologies for the Gospel—it is its own witness. "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them." Jesus Christ suffered, bled, and died, bearing human sin in Himself, and whosoever believeth in Him shall be immediately forgiven, immediately renewed in his heart by the Holy Spirit, and made a new creature in Christ. Why, this is evidently a divine message. "Look and live."

Let us now come to bayonet point. Friend, will you believe in Jesus Christ?—that is the point. You have heard about Him long enough—will you now believe on Him? Wagon-loads of sermons have been lost upon you—will you now believe on Him? "I will think about it." I don't ask you to think about it, but to believe on Him. "I shall go home and try what I can do." Do not try to do anything; believe on Jesus, for the Gospel precept is: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." May the sweet Spirit of God come upon you mightily now, and take you away from all things but the one thing needful! The Lord bless you! Amen and amen.

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE FIRST STEAM-BOAT.*

PRIOR to the year 1800 many inventors of different nations had attempted to build boats that could be moved by steam, but so far all had been unsuccessful. Fulton set himself about finding where the faults lay, and after many trials and failures, at last made a model which he thought would answer. From this model he built a boat while still in France, and proposed making an experiment with her on the Seine. But just as the preparations were about complete word was brought to him that the boat had broken in pieces and gone to the bottom. Fulton found that the machinery had been too heavy for the frame of the boat; but not in the least discouraged by the accident, began building a larger vessel. The same engines were used, and the boat when completed was sixty-six feet long and eight feet wide. The trial trip was made in the presence of the members of the French National Institute and large numbers of Parisians, and was entirely satisfactory.

Fulton was now so confident that steam could be used for propelling boats that he immediately sent to England and ordered parts of a steam engine to be made and sent to America, intending that his next steam-boat should be built in that country. He reached the United States in 1806 and at once set about the work of building a larger vessel than he had yet attempted.

During all the time that the new boat was building Fulton and his friends were subject to the sneers and ridicule of those who had no faith in the project. As it was very expensive to undertake such a work, there was an attempt made to borrow money, giving the lender an interest in the vessel; but every attempt of this kind met with utter failure. Men would as soon thought of lending money to build a flying-machine to go to the moon. One of the chief objections to the scheme was that it would take so much wood to keep up the fires that the boat would break under the weight of the engines and fuel. But Fulton paid no heed to these objections, and kept on with the work.

The boat was finished in 1807, furnished with the engines from England, and in the same year made her first trip on the Hudson. On the day of launching the shores of the Hudson were lined with spectators, nearly all of whom had been drawn thither by the desire to ridicule the boat and its builder.

But the new vessel, which had been named the Clermont, soon proved that Fulton well knew how wisely he was building. She glided out from the wharf with the ease of a swan, and as each revolution of the wheels showed the success of the undertaking, loud shouts went up from the excited lookers-on, and the name of Fulton was cheered to the skies.

A short time after this the Clermont made her first trip to Albany, producing the most intense excitement all along the shores of the Hudson; many of the people of that region had never even heard of a steam-engine, and when they saw this strange-looking object moving up the river in the face of wind and tide, their curiosity and surprise knew no bounds. Never before since the white sails of the Half-Moon had appeared beneath its wooded hills had the Hudson witnessed so strange a sight as this. The simple villagers looked out of their windows in dismay at this strange monster which was breaking the quiet of the night with such unearthly sounds and breathing out flames and smoke as he approached.

The fishermen in their little shallops and the crews of the small vessels drifting down the stream or lying at anchor were terror-stricken, and fled to the shore or took refuge in their cabins, only venturing to look out again when the dreadful noises had died away and the awful object had vanished in the darkness, leaving only a long train of light behind to show that the whole thing had not been a dream.

When the Clermont passed Poughkeepsie a group of villagers standing on a high bluff opposite were just as terrified, although it was day. They watched the strange visitant approaching without being able to imagine its nature. Some declared it was a sea-monster, while others said they believed it to be a sign of the approaching judgment. When it came nearer, and they saw it to be some kind of a vessel, their astonishment was still greater; for instead of gracefully tapering masts and swelling sails, they saw only straight black pipes rising high above the deck, and naked paddle-wheels, turning and splashing, while dense clouds of smoke filled the air and dimmed the vision of the wondering crowd.

The Clermont reached Albany safely, running at the rate of five miles an hour, and proving beyond a doubt that navigation by steam was as safe and practicable as sailing or rowing, while the advantage gained by being able to move against wind and tide was so great that it could not be calculated.

In 1812 two steam-boats were built by Fulton to be used as ferry-boats for crossing the Hudson River, taking twenty minutes for the trip, and at the same time floating docks were built at the wharves, so that the boats could come to shore without a shock.

After this the building of steam-boats went on rapidly, and in a few years the sound of the steam-whistle and the cloud of smoke and sparks from the huge black pipes became almost as familiar to the dwellers of the Ohio and Mississippi valleys as had been the Indian canoes or the ugly and ungraceful flat-boat. Ocean travel by steam was delayed only a few years. In 1819 the steam-ship Savannah made a voyage across the Atlantic to Liverpool, going from there to St. Petersburg, stopping at Denmark, Norway, and Sweden.

THE PROCLAMATION OF THE JEHAH.

(See Illustration.)

THE French Government appears to be threatened with a conflict in Algeria similar to that which the English have recently passed through in the Soudan. Their intrigues in Tunis and their armed intervention in its affairs have aroused the animosity of the people, who, believing that the Bey of Tunis has been bribed or coerced into alliance with the French, are scarcely less hostile to him than to the French. The extensive confederacy of North African Mohammedans have already declared their hostility, and a Jehad or holy war has been proclaimed by a chief of the Oran tribes with some little pomp and ceremony, as shown in the illustration on this page.

The "Jehad" of the Mussulman believers, sometimes resorted to as a military and political expedient in a national struggle against foreign enemies, rulers, or invaders of a Mohammedan population, is only proclaimed with the express sanction of their ecclesiastical authorities. But it may then be preached by any of the princes or chiefs of the nation; and the eloquence of such an Arab leader as he who figures in our illustration threatens a formidable resistance to the French dominion. Cable despatches recently received indicate that the French are aware of their danger and are preparing for a military advance in the country south of Tunis against the renowned sacred city of Kairouan, in hopes thereby to subdue the Mussulman tribes who have repudiated the Bey's authority. Already Arabs have destroyed a railway station near Tunis and massacred ten Europeans, including the station-master.

Christians must deplore this new outbreak of hostilities as being liable to embitter the Mohammedans still further against Christianity. Their relations with Christian nations hitherto have for the greater part been warlike, and very little has been done by the Church to show them that the Christian religion is a religion of love. Though there are seventeen million Mohammedans in Morocco, Algeria, Tripoli, Tunis, and the Sahara, there are only thirty Christian missionaries laboring among them. Of those thirty few have been there long enough to acquire proficiency in the language or familiarity with the customs and habits of the people. It is only of late years that any organized effort has been made to send the Gospel to them.

THERE was something wrong at Gaines's Mill. All the hands had left their work and were hurrying down to the basement to see why the machinery had stopped and what was the meaning of that fearful cry which had penetrated every room. It was soon explained. Jim Clark, the fireman, had slipped, missed his footing, and fallen against the big driving wheel of the engine, had been struck, carried round, and thrown on the floor crushed and dead.

"Where is Brown?" asked the superintendent. "Here, boy, go to the office and tell Brown I want him to go out. Bring him here first." The boy went to the office and soon returned with the book-keeper.

"Say, Brown, you are a sort of a preacher in your way; here is a job for you. Clark has been killed, and somebody ought to go and break the news to his wife. I think you will do it best."

Brown sighed heavily as he went away. It was a sad errand. He was not a clergyman, but he did a great deal of Christian work in the evenings after the mill closed, and sometimes, when there was no one else to be had, he read and prayed and gave a short address at a little mission hall which he had helped to establish.

He had comforted many a mourner and pointed many an anxious soul to Christ, but this business was a different matter, and he shrank from it. Still it had to be done, and who could do it so well as a follower of the sympathizing Saviour?

With all the care and delicacy he had, Brown told the dreadful news, but its effect on the bereaved woman could not be other than agonizing. It was no time to say much then in the way of consolation. Nature must have her way first. After the first shock and tears had brought relief to the crushed spirit an opportunity would come to pour in the oil of Gospel comfort.

Brown visited the poor widow each evening until the funeral, saying a few words, advising her to go to the God of the widow for consolation. On Sunday afternoon he went again, judging that it would be on that day that poor Jim would be most missed in the home. The widow had her new mourning on, and a clean white apron that was but little whiter than the poor sorrowful face.

"I thought you would be feeling lonely this afternoon, Mrs. Clark," said Brown, gently, "so I looked in to see if you would like me to read a chapter and pray. I am not a clergyman, only a clerk at the mill, but I know how good God is and how ready He is to comfort a poor sorrowing heart if we ask Him."

"It's good o' you to come," said the widow, "but it ain't o' no use. I'm past comforting. I ain't a Christian, and I guess God won't do nothing for me. Jim used to say I'd have need o' religion some day, but he little thought as it 'ud be through anything o' this kind. I wish I'd minded him some. He was always wanting me to go to church with him, and I went sometimes to please him, but I never cared for it myself. I'd ha' gone regular if I'd a known he was going to be took off so soon. I've no heart to go now."

"Jim was a Christian man, then?"

"Oh, yes! He's all right, he is. He's gone to heaven; there's no doubt o' that. I'll never see him again. His folks did not like him marrying me, but he would have his way. He used to say, 'Jennie'll come right some day, and be as good a Christian as any of you.' He was kinder disappointed I didn't take to it, but I never did, and now he's gone I never shall."

"But why not? Think how glad Jim would be to welcome you when your time comes."

"It won't never be; it's no use; I'm too bad. I'll never see him again," and poor Jennie covered her face with her hands and wept.

"You may see him again, if you will seek God. Let me read to you just one chapter, and tell you how you can get to heaven, where he is." Brown opened his Bible and read the fourteenth chapter of John, making simple comments as he went along. Then he knelt down and prayed that God would draw the bereaved heart to Himself and reveal Himself to her as the loving, tender Father, long-suffering and patient, not willing that any should perish.

Jennie appeared that night at the church where Jim was a member, and though she heard but little of the service and spent most of the time crying over her loss, she came away with a quieter, more submissive spirit than she had manifested since Jim died. Brown continued his visits and busied himself so earnestly in finding employment for the widow and looking after her comfort that she was touched by his kindness and sympathy, which contrasted sharply with the indifference of her own worldly friends. The companions of her husband also came about her, helping her in many ways, and at least showing friendliness when they could do no more. Thus she was drawn into the Christian circle, and before long was brought to trust in Christ for salvation, and looked forward to joining her husband in "the better land."

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

Another Test.

OFTEN, by a succession of concurring events, God leads His wayward children to the point where they will at last voluntarily yield themselves to Him. During the latter part of the winter Mr. Philliput, the clergyman, whose acquaintance Leroy made on the morning of his little friend's death, held a series of special meetings in the church of which he was pastor. Leroy would not attend them. He had always despised such meetings as mechanical devices for producing spiritual excitement, drowning the voice of reason and judgment by the clamor of emotional panic. Although the meetings were conducted in an orderly and dignified manner, yet he spoke of them contemptuously as the forcing-house of excitement and fanaticism.

However, one of his oldest and brightest pupils in the school became very much impressed at the meetings. This youth was of a naturally wild disposition, and Leroy had often felt that if something did not arrest him in his course the bright boy would lay the foundation of ruinous habits, and might finally make shipwreck of himself. Yet he was not only talented, but also large-hearted and open-handed, ready at any time to assist his teacher or befriend a fellow-pupil in trouble; and on account of his many excellent qualities, Leroy was deeply concerned for his welfare. This youth had been reared in a Christian home, but, like many others, had failed to heed the pious admonitions of his parents—a fact with which Leroy was acquainted.

The youth became seriously alarmed about his state before God while attending the services held by Mr. Philliput. Leroy had noticed the change in his conduct for a few days, but could not divine the cause. One evening after school hours Leroy heard a timid knock at the door of his room, and upon opening it he saw the boy standing there.

"Why, William, I am glad to see you. Step in and sit down," said the teacher, taking the other's hat. The boy sat down and remained silent, while a troubled expression passed over his face. This was something so unusual with the vivacious youth that it immediately attracted Leroy's attention. So he remarked, rather banteringly:

"Why, William, what is wrong? Your face is as long as an undertaker's. Have you found your proposition in geometry too much for you, eh?"

A faint attempt at a smile parted the boy's lips for a moment, but it was succeeded by a look of agitation, as he answered, "I have a worse kind of trouble than that, teacher—a more difficult problem to solve."

"Indeed! What is it?"

"Oh," cried William, in tones of distress, "I am so wretched! I feel that I am such a sinner; I have wronged God and you and my parents, and I am afraid God will never forgive me. I want to do better—indeed I do. My determination is to change my course of life. I want to leave all my sins and evil habits, and from now on live a straightforward, upright life; for I know that if I keep on in the course I have been pursuing for the last few years, I shall be ruined." He looked up at his teacher with an imploring expression.

"Well, I must say, William, that I am really glad that you have resolved to do better. Accept my congratulations, in italics. What put these good notions into your head?"

Now, Leroy had spoken several times personally to William about his conduct, and had also spoken to his pupils collectively about the elevating power of culture; and now he was just beginning to congratulate himself that his instructions were commencing to bear fruit, when the agitated youth cried:

"Oh, it was Mr. Philliput's preaching and my mother's prayers that opened my eyes to my condition!"

"Ah!—well—ahem!" faltered Leroy, completely taken by surprise; and he was actually piqued to think that the preacher had been able to exercise so much more influence than himself in shaping the moral character of this talented youth. Outdone by a preacher again! It was humiliating. He experienced a pang of jealousy.

"And I thought," continued the young religious inquirer, "that you could show me how to get rid of my burden of sin. When I pray, it seems that the way is so dark, and my convictions become more intense, I feel my need of some one to direct me. Can't you show me, teacher, how I may find peace with God? You have read so many books, and—and—" He looked imploringly into the face of his teacher.

He must have noticed the shadow that passed over Leroy's face, for he turned away with a sigh of disappointment.

Our sceptic was now in a deep quandary. He had again gotten beyond his depth. He knew nothing about directing a penitent, inquiring soul to the loving and forgiving God; and he did not dare to benumb the boy's aroused conscience by denouncing religion, and calling it only fanaticism, or sneering at the youth's convictions as the consequences of a disturbed and disordered fancy; nor did he dare to declaim against the meetings, for it was those very meetings that had produced this desire in the youth to lead a better life; and Leroy had great reason to fear that if these convictions were stifled in any way, his beloved pupil would go right back to his wicked and dissolute habits. And Leroy was not prepared to take the responsibility of such a tremendous risk, which might be so far-reaching in its consequences.

Neither could he offer him any help from his materialistic philosophy; for that did not make any provision for the forgiveness of sin or the removal of the feeling of guilt from the convicted conscience. Here again it failed to meet the most urgent demands of human experience. Nor would it afford any aid to weak human nature in its struggle against the allurements of sin and the forces of evil habit. It made man only a machine, destroying not only all hope of divine help, but also all power in man of self-determination; for materialism strikes at the very heart of human freedom. Again he was brought to realize that the theory he had adopted was not a good working hypothesis. It was utterly useless and helpless, and even ridiculous in the case of this youthful inquirer after moral renovation. He felt discouraged in making any more proselytes to scepticism. What great and vital question had it ever answered for him? or what satisfaction had it ever brought him? or what forces had it ever imparted to his nature which actuated him to the attainment of higher moral excellence? His unbelief had never put into his being the moral aspirations that religion had imparted to this youth. Oh, the shameful inadequacy of it, when brought to the test!

But what should he say to William? He was nonplussed. So long was he silent that William regarded him awhile with a puzzled look, and then said, "Can't you help me, teacher?"

"Had you not better go to Mr. Philliput with your perplexities, as he has aroused them? If it had been an educational difficulty I could have helped you, but this is a matter for a clergyman. Yes, go to Mr. Philliput. It is quite in his line. He makes a business, you know, of religious affairs."

"Yes, I know that; but that is why I did not go to him. I cannot understand him as I can you. I asked him what faith was, and he said it was the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen. You would not have given me such an answer. When I ask you a question you help me to understand it; and oh, sir, I do so want to know this! Can I be forgiven? And how can I do right and be saved? I know I am wrong, and if I were to die I should be lost forever. O teacher, will you not pray with me and advise me?"

"I cannot advise you in such matters, my boy. I am no theologian. Believe me, Mr. Philliput is your proper adviser."

"But you will pray with me, will you not? You want me to be saved, I am sure. You know I was going wrong, for you warned me."

"Don't ask me, William. I cannot explain to you, but I cannot help you in this matter in any way. It is impossible. If you were sick, William, you would not go to a watchmaker, however skilful he might be; you would go to a physician. Well, your sickness is spiritual, and you must go to men who make a specialty of spiritual diseases. You are making as great a blunder in coming to me as if you went to a watchmaker to cure you of pneumonia. Go to Mr. Philliput; he is your man. If you are in a difficulty in algebra or geometry or a German idiom, come to me."

William looked earnestly at him, as if he would like to have asked him whether he had not himself found peace in Christ, and so was able to direct others, but his teacher's face showed impatience and irritation, so the boy concluded to leave him. He went away with a downcast and disappointed face.

A few days afterward Leroy received another visit from his young friend. William entered his room quietly, and with a steady calmness and equanimity that contrasted sharply with the agitation which he had displayed on his former visit. Leroy looked at him irritably when he entered, but his annoyance vanished with the first sight of his face. The youth was completely changed. His distress and anxiety were gone, and in their place was peace and joy indescribable. His demeanor showed none of the boisterous excitement which is seen in shallow natures and weak minds, and which soon sinks, by sheer fatigue, into lassitude and indifference, but was pervaded by an intelligent tranquillity, the result of conscious deliverance from a great danger. Before he spoke Leroy saw that this was a veritable experience of conversion, whatever conversion might be. Emotional exhilaration he would have despised as childish, but this was the holy peace that comes to a great nature transformed and dominated by supernatural influence. Whatever the change was, however it might have been produced, it was beneficial, and Leroy involuntarily perceived that there was no longer any ground for the apprehensions he formerly entertained about the lad's future.

"I have come to you, Mr. Ransom," said William, simply, "to thank you for your advice. I went to Mr. Philliput again, as you suggested, and he gave me a little book called 'The Anxious Inquirer Directed,' by John A. James, and it has made the whole thing plain to me. I have found peace of mind, and there is such a change in my entire nature that the Bible expression, 'born again,' is not too strong to describe it. I am different in every way, and am quite conscious of a new life in me. It is a marvellous experience; I cannot describe it, but it brings happiness, peace, joy, and love for everybody. There is nothing like it. I am a new creature in Christ Jesus."

"How did you get it?" Leroy asked, curiously.

"I am not sure that I can explain it. When I saw you last I was in great terror and distress. I had just realized that I was in a perilous and shameful state. I had found that I had been sinning for years against God, while He had been patient, kind, and good to me. I felt mean, and I was frightened, too. God says plainly that sinners shall be turned into hell, and that meant me. The idea of spending eternity in misery appalled me. I saw no way out of it, and when I was here last I could not endure myself. Shame for the past and despair for the future filled me. I could not repent and I could not believe. I did not know what to do. Well, sir, after I had talked with Mr. Philliput and had read the little book, I concluded I could do nothing. So I just knelt down and told God so. And I said I believed Jesus could save me, and I just trusted Him to do it. I gave the thing up to Him, and said I could do nothing myself; but as Jesus came to save sinners, and as He had died to save them, I asked Him to do it for me as a helpless sinner unable to save himself. And then the peace came. It has been with me all the time since, and it grows stronger, and I have more confidence the more I think of it. I am sure now He will save me, and I feel so glad I would do anything to please Him. I don't care whether I die or live, but if I live I should like to work for Him every hour of my life."

"Yes," said Leroy, "it is a strange experience. I frankly own I do not understand it, but I am very glad you have had it, and I believe it will make you a better man. I should like to think it over, so I will say good-night now, William."

The boy obeyed, and Leroy, left alone, sat down to think. The story he had just heard was strangely like that told him by his brother

Allan. The two had held no communication, yet their experience was almost identical. Evidently this was the normal course of religion, and it operated on different minds in the same way. How to account for it was the problem. Might it be that religion first alarmed a votary and caused him to dread an imaginary danger, until the subject was almost demented with terror, and then relieved him of apprehension by a doctrinal nostrum efficacious only for imaginary maladies? Quack doctors had been known to use such devices, assuring a dupe that he was afflicted by a disease surely fatal, describing his symptoms, and warning him that he would suffer torture and die a horrible death. Then, when the man was sufficiently alarmed, selling him the quack pills and getting him to believe that they were the only infallible cure. It might be so; but then how to account for the permanent results? Well, he would watch this special case and see if the results were permanent. If the lad's disposition was radically changed he could not fail to see it in the school. He knew where William's faults lay and where he went astray; he would see whether temptation and old habits retained or lost their power. It would be a fascinating study, which, from a philosophical standpoint, would be worth following up.

As a commencement Leroy resolved to go and hear Mr. Philliput that night. There was just time to reach the church before the sermon commenced. The preacher announced his text as Leroy entered the building: "What think ye of Christ?" It was a plain, simple sermon, adapted to his audience, devoid of rhetorical effort, and free from oratorical display. Leaning over his reading-desk, his eye-glasses in his hand, the silver-haired preacher talked with his hearers as a friend.

"What think ye of Christ as a man?" he asked. With a few graphic touches he described the wondrous life—noble, blameless, lovable, gentle, sympathetic, kind to the fallen, indignant only to the pretentious and the hypocritical, patient under contumely, passive under personal injury, and with blessings instead of curses for those who murdered Him. "What think ye of Christ as a teacher?" Mr. Philliput asked again. The teaching was novel and original, but was it not magnificent? What a changed world it would be if every man was a learner in Christ's school! Injuries were not to be resented, the poor were to be cared for, the unhappy comforted, the penitent encouraged, selfishness was a crime, a clean life must be clean at the fountain. Truly a grand philosophy, that would transform society, making every man the brother of every other man. "What think ye of Christ as a Saviour?" was the next question, and on that the preacher grew enthusiastic and spent most of his time. But the former questions were those that most deeply moved his sceptical hearer. He had not yet realized that he needed a Saviour, but the picture of that noble character and the exalted philosophy of His teaching filled Leroy with admiration. He had never taken that view before, and as he walked homeward his mind was full of new thoughts.

In his present perturbed state of mind the issues between science and the Bible were insignificant. "What does it matter," he said, "whether these miracles ever occurred or not? What if these stories of Eden and the talking serpent and Jonah and the whale are the legends of a child age, and the Bible writers used the material ready to their hand in preaching sublime moral truth? Æsop's teaching is good, and I accept it without believing that animals could talk. Mr. Philliput would expect me to swallow the Bible intact, and believe that Balaam's ass spoke, before he would consider me a Christian. Well, I could never do that; but perhaps I may find, when all these incredible things are eliminated, that there are more valuable lessons and sound philosophy in the Bible than I imagined. It is worth the effort to find out. I don't think he misstated the case to-night, and certainly, whether Christ was God or mere man, there never lived a nobler being or a wiser teacher. His teachings must be good for the race, and if they are good for the race, they must be good for the individual. I will examine them afresh. Who knows but new light may come?"

It was a more cheerful and a more hopeful man that entered the lonely room that night than he who had left it two hours before. It was as if the perplexed captain of a ship tossing in darkness and storm on an unknown sea had suddenly learned that the despised chart which he had flung away as obsolete and antiquated was actually true in the main, and that the errors which had disgusted him with it were unimportant and superficial only. Alone in his room Leroy sat and read far into the night, and before he went to bed he had read nearly the whole of Matthew's Gospel.

PETER RESTORED.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 14, John 21: 1-19. Golden Text, Ps. 23: 3.

Peter's Impulsive Decision—The Duty of Waiting—Jesus Unrecognized—His Provision—The Personal Message to Peter—The Lord's Question—The Triple Ordeal—The Graduated Intensity of the Words—Peter's Stronghold—Fully Commissioned—The Single Duty of Following Jesus.

AFTER these things Jesus shewed Himself again to the disciples at the sea of Tiberias. The angel in the sepulchre had said to the women: "He is risen from the dead; and, behold, He goeth before you into Galilee; there shall ye see Him" (Matt. 28: 7). A company of the disciples had gathered there, the once unbelieving Thomas among them. The impulsive, restless, energetic Peter said: "I go a fishing."

"I GO."

How much more easy it is to our carnal nature to do something or to go somewhere than to wait until God calls! When John the Baptist began to preach, it was as "a man sent from God" (John 1: 6); when Paul and Barnabas went forth as the first missionaries, neither of them said "I go" until they had been "sent forth by the Holy Ghost" (Acts 13: 4). Jesus had just been teaching His disciples: "As My Father hath sent Me, even so send I you." Yet the disciples seemed to think that in a common thing such as fishing, which was their business and ordinary trade, they could go forward independently. Oh, what pains our Lord takes to teach us His truth: "Without Me ye can do nothing" (John 15: 5)! "Oh, but that means nothing spiritual!" says one. Who thus charges Jesus with exaggeration? A dear old man of God in Cheltenham says: "Many Christians can tell you concerning the Word of God what it means, but very few really know what it says." And this is shamefully true. Oh, how long-suffering is our God!

Disciples are like sheep, ready to follow one another; the other disciples said to Peter: "We also go with thee." They went forth, and entered into a ship immediately; and that night they caught nothing." Once before this had happened to Peter. He and James and John had toiled all night and taken nothing, but when, at the word of Jesus, they let down the net, so great had been the draught of fishes that their net broke and their ships began to sink (Luke 5: 4-7). Yet neither this experience nor yet the word of Jesus had emptied them of their self-reliance; it needed the indwelling of Jesus by the Holy Ghost for this.

The morning came. Thank God, He does not leave His children. We may toil in vain, and in the darkness may gain nothing but a sense of our own nothingness and insufficiency; but "the Light of the world," "the Sun of Righteousness," comes to us shedding light into the darkness. Jesus stood on the shore, but the disciples knew not that it was Jesus. Mary Magdalene had not known Him, the two disciples at Emmaus had not known Him; but He had shown Himself to these disciples on the resurrection evening, yet now

THEY KNEW HIM NOT!

Perhaps they were preoccupied with their disappointment and failure, and so missed the personal presence of Jesus as He stood so near to them. We need to be at leisure from ourselves and all else in order to recognize Jesus as the risen One coming right into our life. "Jesus saith unto them, Children, have ye any meat? They answered Him, No. And He said unto them, Cast the net on the right side of the ship, and ye shall find. They cast therefore, and now they were not able to draw it for the multitude of fishes." The voice, the command, the result—all proclaimed to one among them, the loving John, who it was that spoke. "It is the Lord!" he cried. Peter was first to initiate the fishing; John was first to recognize his Lord. But Peter was not long after; he cast himself into the sea; nothing must come between him and Jesus. The other disciples followed, dragging the net with fishes. Peter seemed to have lost interest in his business for the time.

The first thing which met their view was a provision already made, "a fire of coals and fish laid thereon, and bread." Jesus did not need, and yet was ready to use the fish which they had caught through obedience to His word, and Peter drew the net to land full of great fishes, "and yet the net was not broken." Formerly when they let down the net at the word of Jesus the net had broken, but not now. At that time they had not left their nets to follow Jesus; now all they had and all they were was the Lord's, and He cares for all which is His. "Jesus said to them, Come and dine." There was a constraint about the disciples; they knew He was the Lord, yet not one of them called Him by name. But in His wonted way He took bread and gave them, and fish likewise, and set them at ease with Him.

But something remained to be done. Peter had denied Jesus, even with oaths and curses. True, the look of Jesus had recalled him; he had gone out and wept bitterly; the message of the resurrection and the invitation to meet Him in Galilee had been

SENT PERSONALLY TO PETER

(Mark 16: 7); he had been breathed upon by Jesus, and had received the Holy Ghost; he had seen the hands and side of Jesus when He had said: "Peace be unto you." But a definite wrong needs to be definitely set right. Peter had said: "Though all men shall be offended because of Thee, yet will I never be offended" (Matt. 27: 33). Peter had valued himself as being the most faithful and most devoted among the disciples; now Jesus said to him: "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou Me more than these?" When Peter had acknowledged Him to be the Christ, the Son of the living God, Jesus had surnamed him Peter; but He calls him now by the old name, "Simon, son of Jonas." Peter had counted on himself, not on the grace of God, and so the Lord calls him by the name he had before he knew Him.

"LOVEST THOU ME?"

Jesus uses the word for love which expresses the least intensity, "Dost thou care for Me more than these?" Peter had learned at last that to compare himself with the other disciples could not result in any blessing, and so does not answer that part of our Lord's question; He says: "Yea, Lord, Thou knowest that I love Thee." And Jesus committed unto him the charge, "Feed my lambs." Once before Jesus had said: "Simon, Simon, behold, Satan hath desired to have you (all of you), that he may sift you as wheat: but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not: and when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren" (Luke 22: 31, 32). Converted Peter was from the world to God, but he needed to be converted from self to God, from his self-dependence to nothingness in himself, that he might know the keeping power of Jesus. Now he does not venture so much as to say: "I am sure I love Thee," but "Thou knowest." He has been disappointed in himself, and can count on Jesus only.

Three times had Peter denied Jesus, three times must he pass through the humbling ordeal of Jesus' questions in the presence of his brethren, who had all heard his strong assertions that he would die for Jesus and would not deny Him in any wise. A second time Jesus asked him: "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou Me?" This time He did not say "more than these." Peter replied as he had done before, using the intense word for love, "Thou knowest that I love Thee with all my soul." Jesus repeated His charge and said: "Feed My sheep." But a third time He asked him the same question, now using the intense word Himself: "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou Me?" Peter was grieved because He said unto him the third time, Lovest thou Me? and he said unto Him: "Lord, Thou knowest all things; Thou knowest that I love Thee. Jesus said unto him, Feed My sheep." Peter was converted from himself, weaned from self-confidence at last.

All through this test he does not assert himself at all. "Thou knowest" is and thus he is deputed to strengthen his brethren. Usefulness is not a reward for superior faithfulness. Peter had no faithfulness to boast of. But he took the place of nothingness, and so could be an instrument ready to the hand of God. God never slurs over sin in His children, never treats it as though it had not been. He forgives freely, His blood cleanseth from all sin; but that He may fully restore our souls and lead us in the paths of righteousness, He must bring us to see the sin in His light, know His mind upon it, and see ourselves as He sees us. If in a reconciled, sanctified child of God a failure recurs again and again on the same line, it is because self has still some play, the lesson has not been fully learned that we cannot in anything reckon upon ourselves, and that without Jesus we can do nothing. There is no place from which we may not fall but the place of dependence on, and obedience to, Jesus.

When Peter was thus fully conquered, fully humbled and self-emptied, and yet by the wondrous grace of God at such a time for his work among the sheep, among believers, Jesus said to him: "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, When thou wast young, thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldest: but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldest not. This spake he, signifying by what death he should glorify God." The earnest, zealous, devoted impulse of Peter to lay down his life for the Master was accepted, but he must first be purified, that he might be an offering "without blemish." Then Jesus said: "Follow Me." Peter turned and saw John following without waiting to be told, and asked: "Lord, what shall this man do?" Jesus does not make His dealings with individual disciples to be common property. He replied: "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Follow thou Me." He made no assertion that John should not die, but shewed Peter that his one vocation was to follow Jesus, leaving his Lord to deal with John. Let us learn to take our hands off fellow-Christians while we are occupied in following Jesus.

THE LOST ONES.

HARRIET WANNER RE QUE.

MASTER, lead on, the desert sands outspread.
With the long reach of mountains wild and steep;
And sunken snares may line the path ahead;
But O, lead on, for we must find Thy sheep.

They lie bruised, fainting 'neath the burning skies,
They strangle amid briars; and they stand
Wrapped in the swirl of waters, with soft eyes
Waiting for pity, for some saving hand.

They drain out poisonous juices as they stray
Among noisome swamps that fleck the arid wilds,
And lambs, unmindful of their danger, play
Along the broken mountains' steep defiles.

Ah, in the shadowy silence we have heard,
And trembled hearing, "with uncounted cost
I purchased you, and healed you with my word;
Go 'tend my dying, and bring home my lost."

Let us be going—it is safe to go.
Behold His footprints on the rock before;
Haste, haste! O, Earth, farewell! if only so
We bring some lost one to His open door.

India Shawls.

Probably the last opportunity for procuring an India Shawl for a fraction of its cost.—There are few, if any, left in India; there are only a few (and those not the best) in London. Virtually all there are in existence to supply the present or any future want, are in the hands of a few merchants. The prices are so low that those who have made them all their lives have been driven to other kinds of labor, and in the natural course of events will not return to making shawls until the prices of ten years ago prevail again.

We have a surplus which we will sell at present as follows:

SIX of the PRINCIPAL SPEAKERS at the BIBLE AND PROPHETIC CONFERENCE at CHICAGO.

THE BIBLE AND PROPHETIC CONFERENCE.

It is impossible to overestimate the importance of the Conference which is to open its sessions next Tuesday in Farwell Hall, Chicago. The Church of Christ in these days needs, above all things, stimulating to a closer walk with Christ, a wider separation from the world, and a deeper consecration to the Master's service. These results cannot but ensue if ministers and churches come to the realization of the fact that the time is short, and that the Coming of the Lord to summon His waiting servants to meet Him in the air is near at hand. The Conference will show how God has revealed this by His Spirit to men of different sections of the Christian Church, and in coming together to consider their position and their duty in these perilous times, and to seek God's guidance and blessing, they will, we pray, be strengthened and invigorated for service.

In view of the importance of the Conference, we this week publish portraits of six of its prominent members, with the following sketches of their lives.

REV. A. J. GORDON, D.D.

PROMINENT among the clergymen who have signed the call for the Conference and engaged to assist in its deliberations is Dr. Gordon, the pastor of the Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, Mass. He is well known through his works not only in his own denomination and country, but throughout the Christian Church on both sides the Atlantic.

He was born at New Hampton, N. H., on April 19th, 1836. He is therefore now a little over fifty years of age. His father was a worthy deacon eminent for his piety. The good deacon had been for many years an enthusiastic supporter of foreign missionary work and an ardent admirer of the devoted men who leave home and country to preach the Gospel of Christ to those who sit in darkness. One heroic man especially had won the good deacon's respect, the pioneer American missionary, Adoniram Judson. To that man the deacon tendered a tribute of homage by naming his infant child for him. The boy was named Adoniram Judson Gordon, and there is reason to believe that the pious father offered many prayers that he might prove worthy of the name given to him. It is certain that in many characteristics of his religious life and work, and notably in his interest in foreign missionary work, Dr. A. J. Gordon has been and is a living testimony of the power and influence of early training and of the results of parental prayers.

COLLEGE LIFE.

At the age of sixteen the young man was converted and united with the church in New Hampton. Almost immediately after uniting with the church a powerful influence began to make itself felt in the young convert's mind, moving him to preach the Gospel. It was not stifled by worldly cares or diverted by worldly ambition. It grew and strengthened with the years, until it became a settled purpose, and ended in a complete consecration of his life to the Lord's use and service. He entered a preparatory school with the distinct object of fitting himself for a theological training in college. Thence he went to Brown University, Providence, R. I., where he entered with zest, even while a student, into active Christian work, teaching in the Sabbath-school and helping in missions in the neighborhood around.

FIRST PASTORATE.

In 1860, at the age of twenty-four, Mr. Gordon graduated. He proceeded to Newton Theological Seminary for a more special course of training for ministerial work. Before the completion of his studies there he had already entered upon his life's labor, by accepting, at the earnest solicitation of the people of Jamaica Plain, the pastorate of their Baptist Church. His ordination took place in June, 1863, and until the year 1869 Dr. Gordon continued his work in the same church. It was a period of quiet, unob-trusive usefulness. The preaching of the Gospel was accompanied by the blessing of God; the congregation largely increased, and many additions were made to the church.

REMOVAL TO BOSTON.

At the close of his seven years' labors at Jamaica Plain Dr. Gordon received a call from the Clarendon Street Baptist Church, of Boston. The prospect there was full of opportunities for arduous and effective labor. It was a "down-town church," which had once been prosperous, but had declined, owing to the movement, which has taken place in most of our cities, of the population from the business streets to the suburbs. Dr. Gordon, however, accepted the call, and went to his new sphere with the expectation of doing vigorous and energetic work. He was not disappointed in that expectation nor in the results. A new edifice was erected in the south end of the city, which was soon filled with worshippers. A deep, earnest spirituality pervaded the place, and the membership was doubled.

Dr. Gordon is an

and like most students of prophecy is a firm believer in the Premillennial Advent of Christ. In the fall of 1878 he took a prominent part in the Prophetic Conference held in the Church of the Holy Trinity, New York. There are few who were present at that conference who will ever forget the fervent address he delivered there on "The First Resurrection," or the rapt attention in which he held the vast audience which hung breathless on his lips.

AS AN AUTHOR

Dr. Gordon has become known to English-speaking Christians the world over. In 1872 he issued the volume entitled "In Christ," in which he dealt with one of the deepest and tenderest themes of the Gospel—the believer's union with his Lord. Dr. Gordon intended the book to be an aid to meditation, and very excellently it fulfils that purpose, being devout as well as suggestive. It is now in its fifth edition, and has been reprinted and largely circulated in England.

A volume of twenty sermons appeared in 1880 under the title "Grace and Glory." They cover a wide range of Christian life and thought, and are, withal, so simple that the child in Christ may understand and feed upon them. Among the most characteristic and impressive of these sermons is that on "The Virgins' Lamps," in which Dr. Gordon gives a very lucid and impressive exposition of his belief in the Premillennial Coming of the Lord.

"Congregational Worship" was the title of his next work. Dr. Gordon's design in writing it was to urge Christian congregations to take a more direct part in the worship of God's house.

In 1883 appeared

"THE MINISTRY OF HEALING."

This is the most argumentative and scholarly of all Dr. Gordon's works. In it he takes the position that there is no evidence of the age of miracles having ceased with the apostolic age. That in the present day there is existing and growing, not only in the world, but in the Church also, a dangerous tendency to explain away the supernatural, and to look askance on any declaration of direct answer to prayer for healing or deliverance. Yet, as he shows with logical force, we are daily witnessing in conversion a greater miracle than that of healing the body. Nevertheless, they who pray that God will cure the soul of sin shrink from praying that He would cure the body of disease, though the contact of the divine and the human is closer in the former case than in the latter.

Dr. Gordon's latest work is "The Twofold Life; or, Christ's Work for us and Christ's Work in us." While it is written for the benefit of all Christians who may read it, it is especially intended to enlighten those who are in danger of looking "upon the salvation of the soul as the goal rather than as the starting-point of faith"—for those who "have settled into a condition of confirmed infancy."

THE RIGHT REV. W. R. NICHOLSON, D.D., Bishop of the Reformed Episcopal Church.

ANOTHER of the speakers at the Conference whose utterances will be sure to command the closest attention of his hearers will be Bishop Nicholson, who is well known not only as an expositor of prophecy but for his power as a preacher and an administrator.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

William Rufus Nicholson, is one whom the South is proud to claim among her sons. He is now sixty-four years of age, having been born in Green County, Mississippi, on January 8th, 1822.

The future bishop's calling in life was not, as in the cases of some ministers, a matter of uncertainty in his youth. An event, the most momentous for any man, dwarfing into insignificance all other events in life, settled that question while he was still a boy. In 1835 he attended a Methodist camp-meeting, and at one of the services the Holy Spirit touched his heart. He was but a lad—he was only thirteen years old—but he realized then his need of salvation, and accepted the sacrifice of Christ as his one and only foundation of hope for eternity.

The young convert, full of youthful ardor, consecrated his life, while it was still all before him, to the Master's service. He was received into the Methodist Episcopal College at La Grange, Northern Alabama, and there gave himself vigorously to the work of preparation for the ministry.

HIS FIRST CHARGE

was at New Orleans, and his first sermon as a regular minister was preached at the little church in Poydras Street, where he labored for nearly four years.

At the conclusion of his term at New Orleans the young minister seriously considered his position. Four years' experience in the pulpit, visiting among his people, mixing with his brethren in the ministry, had started a train of thought which resulted in his severing his connection with the Methodist Episcopal Church, to the sincere regret of many friends who remained in the communion, but who, respecting the conscientious motives which had prompted the step, maintained their friendship and cordial feeling toward him unimpaired.

He applied for admission to the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and was accepted. In 1847 he was whose zeal in the cause of the Confederacy has rendered his name a notable one. Mr. Nicholson's first charge in the Protestant Episcopal Church was the Grace Church Mission in New Orleans, which he conducted until called to St. John's, in Cincinnati, O. Mr. Nicholson spent ten years in labor at St. John's, and they were ten years of continuous and increasing success. In 1859 Mr. Nicholson received a call to

ST. PAUL'S, IN BOSTON,

Mass. After prayerful consideration he deemed it his duty to accept the invitation as the circumstances were of a character to indicate that the Lord was directing his course thither.

In Boston Dr. Nicholson succeeded the Rev. Alexander H. Vinton, D.D., and proved a worthy successor. During the thirteen years of his ministry there, the church grew and prospered; a steady, uninterrupted work of grace was maintained, and the agencies of the church as a missionary power in the city were multiplied. In 1872 Dr. Nicholson was invited to the pastorate of Trinity Church, Newark, N. J., the oldest and most prominent church in the Diocese of New Jersey. He accepted the invitation, and labored there nearly three years.

The cause which determined Dr. Nicholson's resignation of the Newark charge was to him a very painful one. He had spent twenty-six years in the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and in that communion God had given him many souls as evidence of His acceptance of his labors. His brethren in the ministry were warmly attached to him, and had given proof of their respect by nominating him to a bishopric, and though he felt it his duty to decline the high office, he could not but regard it as a very gratifying token of their confidence and esteem.

But in spite of these personal ties, Dr. Nicholson decided upon leaving the Protestant Episcopal Church.

THE REFORMED EPISCOPAL CHURCH had recently been founded by Bishop Cummins, the Associate Bishop of Kentucky, whose motives in taking that step were precisely those which operated with Dr. Nicholson in retiring from the church. Bishop Cummins cordially welcomed Dr. Nicholson to the new church, and has since found him one of his most active, able, and zealous coadjutors.

Dr. Nicholson received an invitation to the pastorate of the Second Reformed Episcopal Church in Philadelphia, which he accepted. The church was then worshipping in a hall, but it grew so rapidly that a church edifice was begun which was completed in 1877. It is situated on Chestnut Street, above Twenty-first Street, and with its commodious chapel cost $180,000.

Dr. Nicholson was, in May, 1875,

ELECTED TO THE BISHOPRIC

at the General Council held in Chicago, and was consecrated at his own church in Philadelphia on February 24th, 1876. The ceremony was conducted by Bishop Cummins, assisted by Bishop Cheney, and—to the general surprise—by Bishop Simpson of the Methodist Episcopal Church, who took part at his own request, and thus testified his regard for his former colleague in his own communion. The diocese thus committed to his charge comprised the States of Pennsylvania and Delaware. In 1879, however, he was chosen Presiding Bishop of the New York Synod, having jurisdiction in New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, New Jersey, and all New England.

REV. EDWARD P. GOODWIN, D.D.

THE name of Dr. Goodwin, of Chicago, is familiar to Congregationalists in all parts of the world. In a denomination famous for the abilities and learning of its preachers, it is no slight distinction to occupy so high a position as that Dr. Goodwin rightly holds. It is gratifying to see such a man identifying himself with the Bible and Prophetic Conference, and notwithstanding his various and numerous engagements devoting his time to service on the committee having charge of its management.

Edward Payson Goodwin is now fifty-four years of age, having been born at Rome, N. Y., on July 31st, 1832. After acquiring an excellent education under private tuition, he entered Amherst College at the age of twenty, where he remained for the four years' course. When he left Amherst it was with the intention of consecrating his life to the service of Christ in the ministry, and already he had tested his capacities for usefulness by Sunday-school work and occasional services in mission-halls. Realizing the necessity of a sound, theological training, he entered himself as a student in Union Theological Seminary, New York, and studied there for three years.

Dr. Goodwin commenced his ministerial career at the age of twenty-seven at East Burke, Vt. It was, however, soon seen that a larger sphere than that of the little town would demand the services of such a preacher. He received many calls, and eventually accepted one from Columbus, O., where he labored for seven years with much success. In 1868 Dr. Goodwin was sought by the First Congregational Church of Chicago as its pastor. The separation from his attached friends at Columbus was painful on both sides, but there were many indications which could not be ignored that Dr. Goodwin's duty lay in the great metropolis of Illinois. He commenced his labors in the old church which stood at the corner of Washington and Green streets. Three years later the church acquired a new site on the corner of Ann Street, where it reared a handsome edifice. This was destroyed by the fire of 1873, and the present building was erected in the following year.

Dr. Goodwin has a natural aptitude for practical work. During his ministry three promising branch churches have been organized which are already partially self-supporting, and will probably in a short time be entirely independent of the mother church. Besides these, two mission churches and three industrial schools have been established.

THE RIGHT REV. M. S. BALDWIN, D.D., Bishop of Huron.

STUDENTS of prophecy in Canada, the United States, and England have long been accustomed to read with avidity any production bearing the name of Dr. Baldwin. Some new thought, some light on an obscure passage, some lucid interpretation would, they knew, surely be found in it to repay perusal. A laborious student and a vigorous and logical thinker, Dr. Baldwin has done much to elucidate the prophetic Scriptures, and to arouse men by his sermons and printed articles to a realization of the fact that the Lord's Coming is not the distant event that too many suppose it to be. The paper on "The Sure Word of Prophecy," which he has promised to read at the Conference, will be anticipated with much interest.

Maurice Scollard Baldwin is fifty years of age, having been born at Toronto in the year 1836. He is a first cousin of the Hon. Robert Baldwin so long and favorably known in connection with Canadian politics. His early education was acquired at Upper Canada College whence he proceeded to the University, graduating from Trinity College in 1859. He was ordained deacon in April, 1860, by the Bishop of Huron, and became curate to the Rev. Dr. Caulfield, at St. Thomas, Elgin County, Ontario. In 1862 he became incumbent of St. Luke's, Montreal, and subsequently was unanimously elected rector of the parish of Montreal. In 1871 he was appointed Canon of Christ Church Cathedral in that city. On the elevation of Dean Bond to the bishopric Canon Baldwin succeeded him in the deanery, and has now himself entered the Episcopate as Bishop of Huron.

Dr. Baldwin is remarkable for his oratorical powers. There are few men who possess the capacity he has for swaying an audience and moving his hearers at his will to action or to tears. He preaches extemporaneously, yet his sermons are remarkable for purity of diction and conciseness of expression. He is intensely evangelical in doctrine, and never preaches a sermon without impressing on his hearers the necessity of looking to Christ as the only and all-sufficient Saviour. Beside a large number of short articles in religious journals, and many pamphlets Dr. Baldwin has written two works which have been widely circulated and much blessed. They were, "A Break in the Ocean Cable," published in 1877, which had a large sale in Canada and ten thousand copies in England; and "Life in a Look," published in 1880, which has also been reprinted in England.

Bishop Baldwin married in April, 1870, Sarah Jessie, youngest daughter of Mr. John J. Day, Q.C., of Montreal. They have one son and three daughters issue of the marriage.

REV. J. D. HERR, D.D.

THE subject which Dr. Herr has promised to introduce to the conference is "The Importance of Prophetic Study." There is no one better fitted to impress this fact on the minds of an audience.

Joseph Daniel Herr was born at Sharpsburg, Penn., on February 23d, 1837. He is therefore now in his fiftieth year. It was at the age of seventeen that he was led to give his heart to the Saviour and consecrate himself to His service. He united with the Methodist Protestant Church, and four years later after a course of study at Madison College, Pennsylvania, he was ordained. Though only twenty-one years of age he was judged worthy to have charge of an important church in Pittsburg, Pa., and subsequently in Cincinnati, O. He also undertook the onerous duties of Secretary to the Board of Trustees of Adrian College, Michigan, and was also Secretary of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Protestant Church.

In 1870 a conviction which had been slowly forming in Dr. Herr's mind finally culminated in his severing his connection with the church with which he had been identified for twelve years, and entering the Baptist communion. He was at that time pastor of the Second Methodist Protestant Church at Pittsburg, Pa., and his friends in that city being desirous of retaining him among them, he was invited to become pastor of the Union Baptist Church there. After laboring in that sphere for a short time he succeeded in forming the Penn Avenue Baptist Church and became its first pastor. A marked success attended his ministry in that church and his fame spread through the denomination. The Central Baptist Church, of New York City, then seeking a pastor, heard of his earnestness and eloquence and sent him an invitation. He gave it his prayerful consideration and finally was led to accept it. He removed to New York in 1875 and commenced a ministry which was fruitful in the conversion of many souls. Subsequently he was called to Norwich, Conn., and quite recently he has accepted a call to Milwaukee, Wis.

REV. P. S. HENSON, D.D.

AMONG the famous preachers of the Baptist denomination, Dr. Henson, of the First Baptist Church of Chicago, is entitled to a place of honor. He is a born orator and has the happy gift of speaking pointedly and vigorously on almost any subject connected with his work at a moment's notice. He is a Southerner by birth and is fifty-five years of age. He was born in Fluvanna County, Va., on December 7th, 1831. His talents developed at a very early age, and while a mere boy shrewd observers predicted for him a brilliant career. He was only twelve years of age when he matriculated at Richmond College, and only seventeen when he graduated. Three years later he graduated from the University of Virginia.

Dr. Henson received a flattering mark of public confidence in the appointment, soon after leaving college, of Principal of the Milton Classical Institute of North Carolina. He held that position for two years, combining with the efficient discharge of its duties the study of law and the editorship of a weekly journal. He resigned in 1853 to become Professor of Natural Science in Chowan College, Murfreesborough, N. C. He still intended, however, to follow the legal profession and had he adhered to his resolution there is no doubt that he would have won in it fame and fortune. But God called him to a higher duty, and, obeying the call, Dr. Henson abandoned law and entered the ministry. He was ordained in February, 1856, and became past of Fluvanna Baptist Church. He had labored there four years when a call came from the Broad Street Church in Philadelphia which he accepted, and commenced his pastorate there in December, 1860. During his ministry the church grew with great rapidity, and in 1867 it was divided, the pastor and about two hundred members removing to a new location at Broad and Master streets, where a beautiful church was erected at a cost of $200,000, all of which was raised in five years.

In 1882 came the call from the First Baptist Church of Chicago, then in a crisis of its existence, owing to the separation of a large portion of its membership under Dr. Lorimer's charge. Dr. Henson's arrival gave new life to the connection. The church and pastor worked together with indefatigable energy, and in a short time the church was cleared of debt and a solid and harmonious body of over one thousand members was built up. It is now one of the most active and aggressive churches in Chicago.

For Dr. Henson's portrait and for that of Dr. Goodwin, we are indebted to the kindness of our friend, Mr. E. B. Treat, the publisher of the Pulpit Treasury.

ACELDAMA.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Nov. 7, 1886.

"Aceldama, that is to say, The field of blood."—ACTS 1: 19.

The Gambling Epidemic—Merchants Unconsciously Interested—What Gambling is—A Hoary Transgression—Generally Denounced—Its Prevalence—How it Ruins Men—An Unhealthy Stimulant—A Foe to Industry—The Career of John Borack—No Consolation for Gambling Losses—Promotes Dishonesty—A Foe to Domestic Happiness—An Only Son's Letter to his Parents—Gift Stores—Church Fairs—Gambling for Graves—The Gambler's History—His Death-bed.

THE money that Judas gave for surrendering Christ was used to purchase a graveyard. As the money was blood-money, the ground bought by it was called in the Syriac tongue, Aceldama, meaning "The field of blood." Well, there is one word I want to write to-day over every race-course where wagers are staked, and every pool-room, and every gambling saloon, and every table, public or private, where men and women bet for sums of money, large or small, and that is a word incarnadined with the life of innumerable victims—Aceldama.

THE GAMBLING SPIRIT,

which is at all times a stupendous evil, ever and anon sweeps over the country like an epidemic, prostrating uncounted thousands. There has never been a worse attack than that from which all the villages, towns and cities are now suffering. The farces recently enacted in our Brooklyn court-room by which it was proved that in the City of Churches there is not enough moral force to put into the penitentiary the gambling jockeys who belong there, is only a specimen of the power gained by this abomination, which is brazen, sanguinary, transcontinental and hemispheric.

While among my hearers are those who have passed on into the afternoon of life, and the shadows are lengthening, and the sky crimson with the glow of the setting sun, a large number of them are in early life, and the morning is coming down out of the clear sky upon them, and the bright air is redolent with spring blossoms, and the stream of life, gleaming and glancing, rushes on between flowery banks, making music as it goes. Some of you are engaged in mercantile concerns, as clerks and book-keepers, and your whole life is to be passed in the exciting world of traffic. The sound of busy life stirs you as the drum stirs the fiery war-horse. Others are in the mechanical arts, to hammer and chisel your way through life, and success awaits you. Some are preparing for professional life, and grand opportunities are before you; nay, some of you already have buckled on the armor. But, whatever your age or calling, the subject of gambling about which I speak to-day, is pertinent.

A COMMON ENEMY.

Some years ago, when an association for the suppression of gambling was organized, an agent of the association came to a prominent citizen and asked him to patronize the society. He said: "No, I can have no interest in such an organization. I am in no wise affected by that evil." At that very time his son, who was his partner in business, was one of the heaviest players in "Herne's" famous gambling establishment. Another refused his patronage on the same ground, not knowing that his first book-keeper, though receiving a salary of only four thousand dollars, was losing from fifty to one hundred dollars per night. The president of a railroad company refused to patronize the institution, saying: "That society is good for the defence of merchants, but we railroad people are not injured by this evil;" not knowing that, at that very time, two of his conductors were spending three nights of each week at faro tables in New York. Directly or indirectly this evil strikes at the whole world.

Gambling is the risking of something more or less valuable in the hope of winning more than you hazard. The instruments of gaming may differ, but the principle is the same. The shuffling and dealing cards, however full of temptation, is not gambling unless stakes are put up; while on the other hand, gambling may be carried on without cards, or dice, or billiards or a ten-pin alley. The man who bets on horses, on elections, on battles, the man who deals in "fancy" stocks, or conducts a business which hazards extra capital, or goes into transactions without foundation but dependent upon what men call "luck," is a gambler.

Whatever you expect to get from your neighbor without offering an equivalent in money, or time, or skill, is either the product of theft or gaming. Lottery tickets and lottery policies come into the same category. Fairs for the founding of hospitals, schools and churches, conducted on the raffling system, come under the same denomination. Do not, therefore, associate gambling necessarily with any instrument, or game, or time, or place, or think the principle depends upon whether you play for a glass of wine or one hundred shares of railroad stock. Whether you patronize "auction pools," "French mutuels," or "book-making," whether you employ faro or billiards, rondo and keno, cards or bagatelle, the very idea of the thing is dishonest; for it professes to bestow upon you a good for which you give no equivalent.

This crime is no newborn sprite, but that comes staggering down under a mantle of curses through many centuries. All nations, barbarous and civilized, have been addicted to it. Before 1838 the French Government received revenue from gaming houses. In 1567 England for the improvement of her harbors instituted a lottery to be held at the front door of St. Paul's Cathedral. Four hundred thousand tickets were sold at ten shillings each. The British Museum and Westminster Bridge were partially built by similar procedures. The ancient Germans would sometimes put up themselves and families as prizes, and suffer themselves to be bound, though stronger than the persons who won them.

But now the laws of the whole civilized world denounce the system. Enactments have been passed, but only partially enforced, and at times not enforced at all. The men interested in gaming houses, and in jockey clubs, wield such influence by their numbers and affluence, that the judge, the jury, and the police officer must be bold indeed who would array themselves against these infamous establishments. The House of Commons of England actually adjourns on Derby Day to go out and bet on the races; and in the best circles of society in this country to-day are many hundreds of professedly, respectable men who are acknowledged gamblers.

PERMEATING SOCIETY.

Hundreds of thousands of dollars in this land are every day being won and lost through sheer gambling. Says a traveller through the West: "I have travelled a thousand miles at a time upon the Western waters, and seen gambling at every waking moment from the commencement to the termination of the journey." The Southwest of this country reeks with this sin. In some of those cities every third or fourth house in many of the streets is a gaming place, and it may be truthfully averred that each of our cities is cursed with this evil.

Men wishing to gamble will find places just suited to their capacity, not only in the underground oyster-cellar, or at the table back of the curtain, covered with greasy cards, or in the steamboat smoking cabin, where the bloated wretch with rings in his ears deals out his pack, and winks in the unsuspecting traveller—providing free drinks all around—but in gilded parlors and amid gorgeous surroundings.

THIS SIN WORKS RUIN,

first, by providing an unhealthy stimulant. Excitement is pleasurable. Under every sky and in every age men have sought it. The Chinaman gets it by smoking his opium; the Persian by chewing hashish; the trapper in a buffalo hunt; the sailor in a squall; the inebriate in the bottle, and the avaricious at the gaming table. We must at times have excitement. A thousand voices in our nature demand it. It is right. It is healthful. It is inspiring. It is a desire God-given. But anything that first gratifies this appetite and hurls it back in a terrific reaction, is deplorable and wicked. Look out for the agitation that, like a rough musician, in bringing out the tune plays so hard he breaks down the instrument! God never made man strong enough to endure the wear and tear of gambling excitement.

AN ESTATE IN A DICE-BOX.

A young man having suddenly inherited a large property, sits at the hazard tables, and takes up in a dice-box the estate won by a father's lifetime's sweat, and shakes it, and tosses it away. Intemperance soon stigmatizes its victim, kicking him out, a slaving fool, into the ditch, or sending him, with the drunkard's hiccough, staggering up the street where his family lives. But gambling does not in that way expose its victims. The gambler may be eaten up by the gambler's passion, yet you only discover it by the greed in his eyes, the hardness of his features, the nervous restlessness, the threadbare coat, and his embarrassed business. Yet he is on the road to hell, and no preacher's voice, or startling warning, or wife's entreaty, can make him stay for a moment his headlong career. The infernal spell is on him; a giant is aroused within; and though you bind him with cables, they would part like thread, and though you fasten him seven times round with chains, they would snap like rusted wire; and though you piled up in his path heaven-high Bibles, tracts, and sermons, and on the top should set the cross of the Son of God, over them all the gambler would leap like a roe over the rocks, on his way to perdition. "Aceldama, the field of blood!"

Again, this sin works ruin

BY KILLING INDUSTRY.

A man used to reaping scores or hundreds of dollars from the gaming-table will not be content with slow work. He will say: "What is the use of trying to make these fifty dollars in my store, when I can get five times that in half an hour down at Billy's?" You never knew a confirmed gambler who was industrious. The men given to this vice spend their time, not actively employed in the game, in idleness, or intoxication, or sleep, or in corrupting new victims. This sin has dulled the carpenter's saw, and cut the band of the factory wheel, sunk the cargo, broken the teeth of the farmer's harrow, and sent a strange lightning to shatter the battery of the philosopher. The very first idea in gaming is at war with all the industries of society.

Any trade or occupation that is of use is ennobling. The street sweeper advances the interests of society by the cleanliness effected. The cat pays for the fragments it eats by clearing the house of vermin. The fly that takes the sweetness from the dregs of the cup, compensates by purifying the air and keeping back the pestilence. But the gambler gives not anything for that which he takes. I recall that sentence. He does make a return; but it is disgrace to the man that he fleeces, despair to his heart, ruin to his business, anguish to his wife, shame to his children, and eternal wasting away to his soul. He pays in tears and blood and agony and darkness and woe.

ONE VICTIM.

What dull work is ploughing to the farmer when in the village saloon in one night he makes and loses the value of a summer harvest! Who will want to sell tapes and measure nankeen and cut garments and weigh sugar, when in a night's game he makes and loses, and makes again and loses again the profits of a season? John Borack was sent as mercantile agent from Bremen to England and this country. After two years his employers mistrusted that all was not right. He was a defaulter for eighty-seven thousand dollars. It was found that he had lost in Lombard Street, London, twenty-nine thousand dollars; in Fulton Street, New York, ten thousand dollars, and in New Orleans, three thousand dollars. He was imprisoned but afterward escaped, and went into the gambling profession. He died in a lunatic asylum. This crime is getting its lever under many a mercantile house in our cities, and before long down will come the great establishment, crushing reputation, home comfort and immortal souls. How it diverts and sinks capital may be inferred from some authentic statement before us. The ten gaming houses that once were authorized in Paris passed through the banks yearly, three hundred and twenty-five millions of francs.

Furthermore, this sin is

THE SOURCE OF DISHONESTY.

The game of hazard itself is often a cheat. How many tricks and deceptions in the dealing of the cards! The opponent's hand is oftentimes found out by fraud. Cards are marked so that they may be designated from the back. Expert gamblers have their accomplices, and one wink may decide the game. The dice have been found loaded with platina so that doublets come up every time. These dice are introduced by the gamblers unobserved by the honest men who have come into the play, and this accounts for the fact that ninety-nine out of a hundred who gamble, however wealthy when they began, at the end are found to be poor, miserable, haggard wretches, that would not now be allowed to sit on the doorstep of the house that they once owned.

In a gaming-house in San Francisco, a young man having just come from the mines deposited a large sum upon the ace, and won twenty-two thousand dollars. But the tide turns. Intense anxiety comes upon the countenances of all. Slowly the cards went forth. Every eye is fixed. Not a sound is heard until the ace is revealed favorable to the bank. There are shouts of "Foul! Foul!" but the keepers of the table produce their pistols, and the uproar is silenced, and the bank has won ninety-five thousand dollars. Do you call this a game of chance? There is no chance about it.

AN ENEMY TO THE HOME.

Notice also the effect of this crime upon domestic happiness. It has sent its ruthless ploughshare through hundreds of families, until the wife sat in rags, and the daughters were disgraced, and the sons grew up to the same infamous practices, or took a short cut to destruction across the murderer's scaffold. Home has lost all charms for the gambler. How tame are the children's caresses and a wife's devotion to the gambler! How drearily the fire burns on the domestic hearth! There must be louder laughter, and something to win, and something to lose; an excitement to drive the heart faster, fillip the blood and fire the imagination. No home, however bright, can keep back the gambler. The sweet call of love bounds back from his iron soul, and all endearments are consumed in the fire of his passion. The family Bible will go after all other treasures are lost, and if his crown in heaven were put into his hand he would cry: "Here goes; one more game, my boys. On this one throw I stake my crown of heaven."

MORE VICTIMS.

A young man in London, on coming of age, received a fortune of one hundred and twenty thousand dollars, and through gambling, in three years, was thrown on his mother for support. An only son went to New Orleans. He was rich, intellectual, and elegant in manners. His parents gave him, on his departure from home, their last blessing. The sharpers got hold of him. They flattered him. They lured him to the gaming-table and let him win almost every time for a good while, and patted him on the back and said: "First-rate player." But fully in their grasp they fleeced him, and his thirty thousand dollars were lost. Last of all, he put up his watch and lost that. Then he began to think of his home, and of his old father and mother, and wrote thus:

"My beloved parents, you will doubtless feel a momentary joy at the reception of this letter from the child of your bosom, on whom you have lavished all the favors of your declining years. But should a feeling of joy for a moment spring up in your hearts, when you should have received this from me, cherish it not. I have fallen deep, never to rise. Those gray hairs that I should have honored and protected, I shall bring down in sorrow to the grave. I will not curse my destroyer, but, oh, may God avenge the wrongs and impositions practised upon the unwary, in a way that shall best please Him! This, my dear parents, is the last letter you will ever receive from me. I humbly pray your forgiveness. It is my dying prayer. Long before you will have received this from me, the cold grave will have closed upon me forever. Life to me is insupportable. I cannot, nay, I will not, suffer the shame of having ruined you. Forget and forgive is the dying prayer of your unfortunate son."

The old father came to the post-office, got the letter, and fell to the floor. They thought he was dead at first, but they brushed back the white hair from his brow and fanned him. He had only fainted. I wish he had been dead, for what is life worth to a father after his son is destroyed? "Aceldama, The field of blood!"

When things go wrong at a gaming-table they shout:

"FOUL! FOUL!"

Over all the gaming-tables of the world I cry out: "Foul! foul! Infinitely foul!"

"Gift stores" are abundant throughout the country. With a book or knife, or sewing-machine, or coat, or carriage, there goes a prize. At these stores people get something thrown in with their purchase. It may be a gold watch, or a set of silver, a ring, or a farm. Sharp way to get off unsalable goods. It has filled the land with fictitious articles, and covered up our population with brass finger-rings, and despoiled the moral sense of the community, and is fast making us a nation of gamblers.

The Church of God has not seemed willing to allow the world to have all the advantage of these games of chance.

A CHURCH FAIR

opens, and toward the close it is found that some of the more valuable articles are unsalable. Forthwith, the conductors of the enterprise conclude that they will raffie for some of the valuable articles, and, under pretence of anxiety to make their minister a present or please some popular member of the church, fascinating persons are dispatched through the room, pencil in hand, to "solicit shares," or perhaps each draws for his own advantage, and scores of people go home with their trophies, thinking that it is all right, for Christian ladies did the embroidery and Christian men did the raffling, and the proceeds went toward a new communion set. But you may depend on it, that as far as morality is concerned, you might as well have won by the crack of the billiard-ball or the turn of the dice-box. Do you wonder that churches built, lighted, or upholstered by such processes as that come to great financial and spiritual decrepitude? The devil says: "I helped to build that house of worship, and I have as much right there as you have;" and for once the devil is right. We do not read that they had a lottery for building the church at Corinth, or at Antioch, or for getting up an embroidered surplice for St. Paul. All this I style ecclesiastical gambling. More than one man who is destroyed can say that his first step on the wrong road was when he won something at a church fair.

The gambling spirit has not stopped for any indecency. There transpired in Maryland a lottery in which people drew for lots in a burying-ground! The modern habit of writing about everything is productive of immense mischief. The most healthful and innocent amusements of yachting and base-ball playing have been the occasion of putting up excited and extravagant wagers. That which to many has been advantageous to body and mind, has been to others the means of financial and moral loss. The custom is pernicious in the extreme, where scores of men in respectable life give themselves up to betting, now on this boat, now on that; now on this ball club, now on that.

that once was chiefly the accompaniment of the race-course, is fast becoming a national habit, and in some circles any opinion advanced on finance or politics is accosted with the interrogation: "How much will you bet on that, sir?"

This custom may make no appeal to slow, lethargic temperaments, but there are in the country tens of thousands of quick, nervous, sanguine, excitable temperaments, ready to be acted upon, and their feet will soon take hold on death. For some months, and perhaps for years, they will linger in the more polite and elegant circle of gamblers, but, after a while their pathway will come to the fatal plunge.

Shall I sketch

THE HISTORY OF THE GAMBLER?

Lured by bad company he finds his way into a place where honest men ought never to go. He sits down to his first game, but only for pastime and the desire of being thought sociable. The players deal out the cards. They unconsciously play into Satan's hands, who takes all the tricks and both the players' souls for trumps—he being a sharper at any game. A slight stake is put up, just to add interest to the play. Game after game is played. Larger stakes and still larger. They begin to move nervously on their chairs. Their brows lower, and eyes flash, until now they who win and they who lose, fired alike with passion, sit with set jaws, and compressed lips, and clenched fists, and eyes like fireballs that seem starting from their sockets to see the final turn before it comes; if losing, pale with envy and tremulous with unuttered oaths cast back red-hot upon the heart—or, winning, with hysteric laugh—"Ha, ha! I have it!"

A few years have passed, and he is only the wreck of a man. Seating himself at the game, ere he throws the first card, he stakes the last relic of his wife—the marriage-ring which sealed the solemn vows between them. The game is lost, and staggering back in exhaustion he dreams. The bright hours of the past mock his agony, and in his dreams, fiends with eyes of fire and tongues of flames circle about him with joined hands, to dance and sing their orgies with hellish chorus, chanting: "Hail, brother!" kissing his clammy forehead until their loathsome locks flowing with serpents, crawl into his bosom, and sink their sharp fangs and suck up his life's blood, and coiling around his heart pinch it with chills and shudders unutterable.

Take warning! You are no stronger than tens of thousands who have by this practice been overthrown. No young man in our cities can escape being tempted. Beware of the first beginnings!

THIS ROAD IS A DOWN-GRADE, and every instant increases the momentum. Launch not upon this treacherous sea. Splint hulks strew the beach. Everlasting storms howl up and down, tossing unwary crafts into the Hell-gate. I speak of what I have seen with my own eyes. To there comes no hope. He will probably die alone. His former associates come not nigh his dwelling. When the hour comes, his miserable soul will go out of a miserable life into a miserable eternity. As his poor remains pass the house where he was ruined, old companions may look out a moment and say: "There goes the old carcass—dead at last;" but they will not get up from the table. Let him down now into his grave. Plant no tree to cast its shade there, for the long deep eternal gloom that settles there is shadow enough. Plant no "forget-me-nots" or eglantines around the spot, for flowers were not made to grow on such a blasted heath. Visit it not in the sunshine, for that would be mockery, but in the dismal night, when no stars are out, and the spirits of darkness come down horsed on the wind, then visit the grave of the gambler.

A WIDOW'S MOUNTAIN VIGIL.

AN incident related by the Colorado correspondent of the New York Sun shows the courage and fortitude a mother will display under trying circumstances. It also is an illustration of the course a Christian should take when, during a season of fierce trial and spiritual darkness, prayer seems impossible and they are tempted to abjure their faith. Those who cling to the way of the Lord will surely be delivered (Ps. 40 : 1-3).

The Sun's correspondent states that a young widow, whose husband died out in the mining camps of Colorado, supported herself and her dearly loved little girl by peddling handkerchiefs, buttons, threads, etc., to the women around Leadville. When trade was bad she would go out to the camps, trudging long distances in the hope of getting money enough to keep her little home together. Early last spring she went to Aspen, and being disappointed there determined to travel on forty miles farther to Crested Butte. She had to cross the bleak range over which there was only a dim trail which none but the hardest mountaineers had trodden. This trail lay over what is known as Pearl Pass, one of the most difficult and dangerous passes in the Rocky Mountains. It lies at an altitude of 12,000 feet above the level of the sea. When she reached Pearl Pass the snow began to fall, and to her horror she saw the trail becoming covered. The frightened woman paused to think. To proceed was certain destruction, and to remain would be equally fatal. She could not retrace her steps, for the snow had hid from view the serpentine trail so completely that the most experienced prospector could not follow it. She did not dare to go forward for fear of losing her way, and she could not lie down, as she would freeze to death. She decided to walk backward and forward along a certain beat for a distance of about thirty feet, where she knew the trail lay, and by this means keep up the circulation, and at the same time not wander from the trail. Through the hours of darkness she continued to walk to and fro, nerved, whenever the temptation to lie down came upon her by the thought of her orphan child. Dawn found her still pacing the beaten path footsore and exhausted. At last a mail carrier came in sight. He placed on her his long Norwegian snow-shoes and conducted her safely to a cabin on the west side of the mountain, where she could rest and recover from her exhaustion.

RUSSIA EVANGELIZED BY PERSECUTION.

A REMARKABLE example of God's overruling providence in using the acts of wicked men to spread the knowledge of His Word, as He did in apostolic days (Acts 8 : 4), was related by the Russian evangelist, Colonel Pashkoff, at a Christian Conference recently. He said :

The work in Russia is extending rapidly. It is not by might nor power that the work is going on, but it is going on in spite of all that man and authority can do to stop it. There are but few of us who can speak, and of these many have been put in prison or forced to leave the country ; yet the work goes on.

How does it go on ? After the Crimean War a copy of the New Testament (which did not then exist in Russia) was put into the hand of a prisoner ; somehow or other it reached Russia ; how it passed the Custom House I do not know. In Russia it fell into the hands of a peasant, and led to his conversion, and that of others. His mouth was unstopped, and he began to speak to those who lived in his vicinity. Soon the Government laid hold of these men, and in order to stop the work removed them to another part of the land. What was the consequence ? Why, that the work broke out there. And thus began through a single copy of the Word of God a work that is spreading all over Russia.

Another work in South-east Russia began through a weak man, who was led to offer himself as a colporteur to the British and Foreign Bible Society. He was accepted, and now wherever he goes God is pleased to work, and a revival begins.

These are but illustrations of the whole work of God in Russia. For example, in the north of Russia an English Christian was used to raise up a few noble families to accept the Gospel, and ten men of the upper classes then began to tell the good news to the prisoners and the poor, and God poured out His Spirit, and many joyfully accepted Christ. And so the work began and spread and went on, so that hundreds, I believe thousands, heard the Word of God, and many were led to the Saviour. But a great part of their work was hospitals and prisons ; and hundreds of the convicts who were going to Siberia heard the Word, and many believed, and are now scattered over Siberia in all parts, from the Ural Mountains to the borders of China, and everywhere preaching the Word.

So it is that in Russia God is working by poor and feeble instruments. For example, a tract, Come to Jesus, was translated into Russian, and one copy went into a distant part of Russia, and there it awakened a desire to know the Gospel. And by and by a colporteur came that way, and to his surprise found the people longing to buy copies of the Word, and to hear what he had to say, and many believed. All this coming from a single little tract. So the story of the Gospel in Russia abounds in such little incidents, in which small, unnoticed things have been the means in God's hand of doing a great work. Every one who comes to the knowledge of the Lord seems at once to become in a quiet way a worker, spreading, as he finds opportunity, the fire over the country. Everything man's power can do to stop the work is done, and yet it grows and goes on. God seems using the hindrances to forward His own work. In Siberia the Russian Bible Society, helped by funds from America, is doing a great work. Thus quietly the whole vast empire of Russia is being permeated by God's Word.

A FIGHT IN A MUSEUM.

AN extraordinary combat between an alligator and a lizard occurred on Oct. 28th in the Government building occupied by the Fish Commission at Washington, D. C. The alligator is a two-year-old reptile brought from Florida, while the lizard hails from the Gila River, in Arizona, and is only fourteen inches long. Both reptiles ceased eating two weeks ago and sank into a torpid condition, in which it was expected that they would remain for several weeks. They were removed from the glass cases to the floor, where, it was thought, they would do no harm to each other nor any one else. An attendant inadvertently touched the alligator's tail and caused him to move sluggishly onward a few inches, where he came in contact with the blunt nose of the monster. The snaky eyes of the latter lighted up with a gleam of Satanic malevolence, its black lips opened wide, and its jaws closed with a snap upon the fore paw of the alligator. The prisoner, though taken at a disadvantage, made for a time a gallant fight for its liberty and its life. Its movements were marvellously quick, and its jaws closed a dozen times in succession upon the mailed head of the assailant. It soon, however, became exhausted, and, moaning like a suffering child, it relapsed into quietude. The attendants sought by a variety of means to release the wretched alligator. His assailant was seized by the tail and held up in the air, taken by the bloated neck and choked severely, and plunged under water, but to no purpose. Then a large trowel was forced into his mouth, but such was the force of his grip that the steel blade, though considerably bent in the effort, failed to release the imprisoned paw. It was not until a stronger implement was used that the jaws were opened and the alligator released. It is expected that the latter will die. The attendants did not know that the apparently unconscious creatures retained so much vigor, or they would not have allowed them so much liberty. The same mistake is sometimes made by men who have once been under the power of evil habit. Their enemy's quiescence is mistaken for extinction until temptation, in an unguarded moment, brings it into redoubled activity (1 Cor. 10 : 12).

THE APPROACHING ORDEAL OF THE ANGLO-SAXON RACE.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

The Rupture of the Judæo-Antichristian League—England Involved—Its Place in the Revived Roman World—The Four and a Half Years of Trouble—The Gathering Clouds—America to Share in the Persecution.

SEVEN years before the close of this dispensation, the inspired writers clearly intimate that, there will be an alliance effected between Antichrist and the Jews, to continue in force for seven years ; but it will be violently broken when it has run half its course. Antichrist will show himself in his true colors, demanding worship and in other ways exposing his Satanic character. The Jews will then repudiate his patronage, discard his alliance, and will become his enemies. Then his wrath will be furious and the whole Roman world will feel its effects. Then it will enter upon that awful period known to prophetic students as

"THE GREAT TRIBULATION."

This great tribulation, or time of trouble, is to be of such universal prevalence, that "except it were shortened, no flesh should be saved ;" and of such severity, "as never was since there was a nation, even unto that same time ;" so that these circumstances alone would indicate the approaching ordeal of England, in common with the other nations of Christendom, to be of the most afflictive character. And besides this, it necessarily will suffer grievously from the earthquakes, famines, pestilences, and wars that will be of such general occurrence at that epoch.

But the worst element of the tribulation will be religious persecution, for we are told that the wild beast, denoting the Roman Empire controlled by the great Antichrist, is to make war with the saints, and to overcome them, for forty two months, or three and a half years !* All standard literal interpreters of the prophecies agree that this three and a half years' persecution of Christians is yet to come, and is to prevail.

THROUGHOUT ALL THE ROMAN EMPIRE, which in its fullest extent included England.

This conclusion may appear startling to superficial thinkers, who have no adequate idea of the united strength of the Continental powers, as compared with that of England alone. But it is clear from prophecy that Britain although naturally anxious to stand isolated and aloof from entangling alliances with Continental powers, will be compelled by the force of circumstances to ally herself with some of them, and will thus be gradually drawn into the predicted confederacy of the ten Roman nations.

Britain seems indicated to be exempt from religious persecution or tyranny until nearly two and a half years after the covenant, when Christ's waiting people will be translated to heaven and the ensuing great religious revival and preaching of the Gospel shall be accomplished ; and then ensues of about one year of the Ten-kingdomed Confederacy becoming infidel and anarchic and carrying aloft the then Communistic Church of Rome, drunk with the blood of saints and seated triumphantly as ecclesiastical mistress over the nations. And afterward follow the three and a half years of Antichrist's reign as the world's monarch and god. Hence there will be considerable persecution and slaughter of Christians during that season of the Scarlet Woman's supremacy and copious libation of the blood of saints, previous to the exterminating persecution by the Imperial Antichrist himself during the final three and a half years.

* Rev. 13 : 5, 7 ; 12 : 6, 14 ; 11 : 2, 3 ; Dan. 7 : 25 ; 12 : 7.

Socialism is arising, like a lion from its lair, and in rekindled Radical demagogue agitations will soon make its roar heard in various parts of the British Empire. Its present appearance may be no bigger than a cloud the size of a man's hand, but the political horizon will in due time be overcast with a dark tempest, in which the time-honored aristocratic institutions of England will be subverted by the triumph of the mobocracy. A great revolution, as violent and overwhelming as that in France in 1793, will commence in Britain in two or three years after the Covenant. But until Christ's waiting people shall have at that time been removed from the earth, there is much ground for hoping that any very ruinous revolution in England will be averted and postponed.

Britain was for four centuries an integral part of Cæsar's Roman Empire, and will unquestionably be one of the ten kingdoms into which the whole extent of that Roman Empire is to be divided during the final seven years, as signified by the ten horns of Daniel's wild beast and the ten toes of Nebuchadnezzar's prophetic image (Dan. 7:24; 2:31-45). All the ten toes are composed of intermingled clay and iron—denoting the mixture of Communism and Monarchy that is to characterize the government of each of them. This clay-iron or democratic-monarchic governmental principle will, by the beginning of the final three and a half years, although perhaps not so soon as by the beginning of the final seven years, be completely established in all

THE TEN KINGDOMS

—namely, Britain, France, Spain with Portugal, Italy, Sub-Danubian Austria, and Greece, Egypt, Syria, Central Turkey and Bulgaria. This ultimate lodgment of the sovereign power in the hands of the people in the form of universal suffrage, just before the final three and a half years, is also denoted by the entire body of the wild beast being eventually scarlet-colored. Prophecy informs us that these ten kingdoms are then at last to "give their power and strength" to Napoleon, the seventh-eighth head of the wild beast, or Roman Empire, with which he, as its controlling head, will be practically identical. (Rev. 17.)

In addition to the rising prevalence of democracy, another noticeable sign is the agitation, originated for the avowed object of effecting the separation of Ireland from England, which is the very event that prophecy foreshows to be impending; for, as England is inside, but Ireland is outside, the Roman Empire, therefore the governmental union between them must be dissolved, before the final seven years commence with the precise tenfold division or decemregal partition of the Roman-Imperial world.

Another vulnerable spot in the armor of England is the immense extent of its commerce, exposing it to the most ruinous financial embarrassments, in event of its commercial trade with other nations being interrupted by a foreign war; and in such a case, British merchant vessels would everywhere fall a prey to swift privateers. Britain depends for one third of its supply of bread upon its annual importation of nearly six million quarters of wheat from Russia, Prussia, and America, and is therefore at the mercy of those nations, which might at any time endeavor to starve it into submission by withholding such indispensable supplies.

Anglo-Saxon

AMERICA CANNOT ESCAPE

from falling under the despotic dominion of the final great Democratic-despotic Papal-Mohammedan-Infidel, Spiritualistic Napoleonic Antichrist, seeing that "power is to be given him over all kindreds and tongues and nations," a comprehensive expression, which must surely include so important a part of the world as the western hemisphere. (Rev. 13:7.)

And, again, in the same part of the thirteenth chapter of Revelation it is stated that that revived Napoleonic head of the Roman Empire is also to "make war with the saints"—that is, Christians—and to overcome them for forty-two months, or three and a half years. Nor are these saints defined to be merely such as shall be found within the ten kingdoms, although the ten kingdoms are to be the chief persecuting powers, but they will be saints generally throughout all Christendom; and probably Anglo-Saxon America contains nearly half of the entire number of true saints upon the earth at the present time.

And as the Romanists, who are principally to compose the persecuting body of which the Napoleonic Antichrist is to be the Head, are very numerous in Canada and the United States, such a fact is of itself a sufficient indication of the prospect, apart from other grounds, of matters being in such a train as to render a no improbability. The destiny of a country in times of revolution usually depends upon the issue of the popular disturbances in its central towns, and it is particularly in the leading cities of the United States and Canada that the Irish and other Romanists are proportionately very numerous, and constitute a compact and systematically organized body, so as to render their influence extremely formidable.

The impossibility of Protestant America escaping the predicted persecution is further shown by the fact that "that hour of temptation is to come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth;" and the great tribulation is to be so universal, that except it were shortened, "no flesh (not a single human being) should be saved"—plainly implying, as Daniel has foretold,† a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time.

CONSECRATED ENERGY.

From a Sermon Preached at Toronto, by Rev. Sam Jones.

BRETHREN, if you think you are pleasing God by whining round Him, you never made a greater mistake in your life. Some people have no sense, but think the more they are "nothing" the more they please God. God is my father. I am His son. God wants to see me be somebody and do some work. In Atlanta, Georgia, we have one little man; he is small in stature and young in years, but he is

THE BIGGEST MAN I EVER SAW.

There is one trouble about him and that is his stinginess. He is worth $20,000, and we can't get but $1500 a year out of him for the cause of religion. That will give you some idea! Last year when they held the meeting for Foreign Missions, little George got up and said, "Mr. Preacher, last winter I gave the best sister a boy ever had to the cause of Foreign Missions, and this year I give $500." I would like to bring him to Toronto, only that he might set a bad example to you in stinginess. How many men have you in any church in Toronto who are worth $20,000 and will plank down $1500 a year for the cause of Christ and religion. Hey?

The crowd that was to save the city was ten, and if you haven't got that many you need more religion here, that is all there is about it, and the more religion a man has got the looser his purse-strings get. Did you ever notice that?

When God wants to reach a man He puts His augur right into his head, runs down through his heart, and so on down into his pocket-book, and it springs up like an artesian well. God doesn't commence at the heart and bore up to the head. What would He do with the dirt? You have mistaken ideas about this whole business. I have no patience with this everlasting talk about heart religion. I want religion all over me. If I am to have it only in one place, I want it in my right hand, so that I can go on and do something for God and Christianity.

I was going on to tell you about this grand man in Atlanta. We had

where all the members get up and talk one with another about their own experience, and we were talking about the locomotive. I said a locomotive was an organized pile of iron, and a church was an organized lot of Christians, and we got talking about the Church being like a locomotive, and one thought he would like to be this part and another thought he would like to be that. One would like to be the driving wheels, another the cow-catcher, and another the headlight. Another said he would and sound the praises of God all over this country. We have got more whistles now than anything else, and some of you are like the whistle on a little steamboat on a river down in Georgia. It is a little steamer and has got the smallest boiler and engine you ever saw, and a big, old-fashioned whistle, and when it blows the whistle the boat stops. It can't go and whistle at the same time. When she runs she can't blow, and when she blows she can't run. I have seen many a Christian take it out in blowing. They can't both blow and run in the good work. George, my brother, got up and said, "I will tell you—I am perfectly willing to be the black coal they put into the furnace to burn up and make steam and carry the engine along." That was the grandest Christian sentiment I ever heard escape from human lips. O Lord, let us be the black coal to be burned up in Thy service, and if there is anything left take it and use it. That is the kind of Christians we want.

I was preaching at High Bridge, Kentucky, for three or four days, and the pastor of one of the churches said: "Brethren, I have been thinking and repenting. Twenty years ago I and left my home and never set eyes on my friends for four years, and all for love of the Southern Confederacy; from a mere sentiment of patriotism I went to the front, slept out in the cold and in the snow. I have gone twenty-four hours, many a time, without a bite to eat. I have marched with blood spurting from my feet at every step. I have bared my bosom to a thousand bullets. But shame upon me, I have been a soldier of the cross for thirteen years and have never missed a meal for God, never slept out in the cold a night for God, never denied myself a single pleasure for God, and never bared my bosom to a single bullet for the sake of Christ, and I am ashamed of myself to-day in the sight of God."

I want to tell you

AN INCIDENT IN A BATTLE

which took place near the close of the war. The general in command on one side noticed that from a certain fort in a locust grove a deadly fire was pouring in upon his troops. He sent his adjutant to one of his generals with this message, "Give General Cheltham my compliments, and tell him that I ask at his hands that fort in the locust grove." General Cheltham had been missing for two hours and was thought to be dead; so had a second general, to whom the same message was sent. Then a message was sent to a third general: "Give him my love (no compliments this time), and tell him I ask at his hands the fort in the locust grove." The general who got the message straightened up in his saddle and said, "First Missouri Brigade, forward," and they charged through shell and death, and with the loss of many a man they captured the fort and the guns and the men that manned them; and the officer sent back to his commander this message, "Give him my love, and tell him I present him the fort in the locust grove." I tell you, brethren, I say it this afternoon as an humble adjutant of Jesus Christ—I come over to Toronto and present you the love of Jesus Christ, and tell you He asks at your hands—at your hands—this city to be redeemed by His precious blood, and I trust before one month from to-day I may be looking up to heaven and saying, "We send our love to the Lord Jesus Christ, and present Him Toronto delivered from sin." Be true soldiers, do your part, and God will bless you.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Elections Have Changed the Character of the House of Representatives. In the Forty-ninth Congress the Democrats have a majority of forty-three; in the Fiftieth Congress the Democratic majority will not exceed fifteen, and Republican journals estimate it at not more than ten. The latest figures classifying members more or less independent with the party to which they are more closely identified indicate that the House will consist of 168 Democrats, 154 Republicans, and 3 representatives of labor. One of the most remarkable changes is the defeat of Colonel Morrison, in Illinois, by his Republican opponent, Judge Baker. Colonel Morrison was elected two years ago by a majority of 2592. It is stated by persons who should know in his district that his defeat this year was due to personal and private reasons, and not to his attitude on the tariff. Another surprise was the narrow escape of Speaker Carlisle from defeat in Kentucky. It was at first thought that his opponent was elected, but the official returns give Mr. Carlisle the seat by a small majority. The Republicans did not oppose him, and he had no rival but a labor candidate. His friends, therefore, concluding that his election was safe, neglected to vote. That is the explanation given on both sides. The Prohibition vote showed a steady increase in almost every State. In New Jersey it was more than double the figures ever recorded before.

The Result of the Election in New York City has more than a local significance. The triangular contest for the mayoralty was watched with interest, not only through the United States, but in England, where the labor problem presses as it does here. Its issue depended entirely on the fidelity of the voters. If no deals were made, Mr. Hewitt, having the support of Tammany Hall and the County Democracy, would necessarily be elected. Many of his friends predicted that he would have an absolute majority of all the votes cast. That prediction was not fulfilled, but Mr. Hewitt had a plurality of over 22,000 votes. The total number of ballots cast was 219,436. Of these Mr. Hewitt received 90,456, Mr. George 67,930, and Mr. Roosevelt 60,474. The remarkable feature of the election was the large vote polled by Mr. George. Though a poor man without money to distribute and without the aid of an organization such as the old parties possess, he was placed second at the poll. This is a fact which the managers of both parties are now anxiously considering. What it means, and to what it will grow, are questions that are well worth their consideration. It means that the workingmen are a factor in local politics which cannot be safely ignored; that they know their power and how to wield it with effect; and that they have lost confidence in the old parties. These lessons are taught by the solid vote of 67,000 cast for the labor candidate in an election in which the representatives of the old parties were men above the standard of character and ability usually fixed for municipal candidates. To what extent it will grow will largely depend on the conduct of the dominant party. Corruption or blundering in office would develop the movement rapidly. It will no longer be safe to deliberately arrange for the plunder of the city treasury, and it will no longer be safe to nominate men who will steal themselves or permit their subordinates to steal. Thus the election, if the party managers are sagacious, may tend to the purification of city politics and greater efficiency in all the departments.

The Harvard Celebration which Commenced on Friday last has engaged general interest through the country. It was the celebration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of its foundation. It was on the 7th of November, 1636, that the General Court of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay voted to give four hundred pounds "toward a school or college, whereof two hundred pounds shall be paid the next year and two hundred pounds when the work is finished, and the next Court to appoint where and what building." It was two years later that John Harvard, a young clergyman then lately settled in Charlestown, died, leaving his library of about 300 volumes and one half his estate to the new college. This endowment was more than double the amount given by the colony, and the institution was named for its first benefactor. The name of Newtown was changed to Cambridge on account of the locating there of the first American college. The charter of government for the college first framed in 1640, and somewhat extended in the next ten years, still exists, with little change. The celebration covered four days, and among its prominent features were an address by Hon. James Russell Lowell, a poem by Oliver Wendell Holmes, and a sermon by Dr. Phillips Brooks. President Cleveland, accompanied by several members of his Cabinet, attended the exercises, but declined the degree of LL.D., which in past years the university has been accustomed to bestow on public men who visited it.

Renewed Labor Troubles are Reported from the Chicago packing houses. On November 6th the Master Workman of the Local District Assembly of the Knights of Labor issued an order directing that every Knight of Labor employed in or about the packing houses quit work at once. About 6000 of the 13,000 men who had gone to work left at once, and the others are expected to follow the example. Fully 16,000 beef and pork packers will then be idle. The Knights have issued a circular, in which they say that the strike is the result of dissatisfaction at the loss of the eight-hour day. In returning to work a few weeks ago they were led to believe that in accepting the ten-hour day they were doing so temporarily, with the understanding that in a short time their demand for eight hours would be conceded. Finding that there was no prospect of the concession, the strike was ordered. It is intimated that Master Workman Powderly disapproves of the action of the District Assembly, and will endeavor to mediate. In the mean time the chief packers are preparing to carry on their business with outside assistance and to board the new men on the premises. That danger of riots is apprehended appears from an order issued on Sunday by Governor Oglesby calling out the militia.

The Liberal Demonstration at Leeds Last week appears to have widened the breach between the two sections of the party. It was hoped that declarations would have been made of concessions which, without sacrificing principle, would have opened the way for the return of Hartington, Chamberlain, and their followers to Mr. Gladstone's camp. The speech of Mr. Morley, who was Mr. Gladstone's Irish secretary in the late Cabinet, destroyed that hope. He declared that if a union of the sections of the Liberals could not be obtained without the surrender of the principles of an enormous majority to a small minority, the only recourse was to fight out the battle. The majority, he said, did not wish to proscribe individuals or excommunicate sections. But it would be most contemptible if the men who had launched a protest in favor of Ireland of such magnitude and moment were to agree that all be forgotten. They would pursue the old course. Still Mr. Gladstone and other members of the late government were ready to receive a modified policy if it were supported by solid reasons. Despite recent defeats, the speaker said, he believed Mr. Gladstone was on the eve of a triumph, and that the Liberal policy was now rooted in the minds and consciences of Liberals throughout the country. This sentiment was received with enthusiastic cheers. It has had the effect of drawing the Hartington section into closer relations with the Conservatives, and rendering Mr. Gladstone's return to power extremely improbable.

The Bulgarian Difficulty is Expected to Assume definite shape during this week, and opinions vary as to the probabilities of its being pacific or bellicose. The Emperor of Austria is to make a speech to the Hungarian deputations who are anxious for war, and Lord Salisbury is to deliver a speech at the Lord Mayor's banquet in London. Both utterances are anxiously awaited, under the impression that Austria and England have arrived at an understanding which may be outlined in the speeches. Russia maintains her arrogant attitude in Bulgaria, apparently desirous of goading the people into an outbreak that may be made the pretext for an occupation of the country. A statement made by a Russian statesman, and reported by the St. Petersburg correspondent of the New York Herald, shows how near this is. He said: "Bulgaria is now on the verge of anarchy, and affords no security or protection to Russian subjects and Russian property. England, under similar circumstances, bombarded Alexandria and occupied Egypt, thus affording a valuable precedent for our action in Bulgaria." The Bulgarian Regency at present maintains a firm front toward Russia, but there are indications that unless definite encouragement is given speedily by Austria and England, the Czar's mandates will be obeyed as implicitly in Bulgaria as they are in Russia.

The Rough Usage of a Philanthropist in London is reported in a cable dispatch to the New York Times. It states that Mr. F. N. Charrington, the young man who abandoned the brewing business to take up evangelistic work, and whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on August 5th, was summarily ejected from a meeting in the London Mansion House on November 5th. The meeting was called to arrange for the raising of the funds for the completion of "the People's Palace." Mr. Charrington attended, and made an earnest appeal to the Lord Mayor in favor of the closing of the Palace on Sundays, and to give an assurance that strong drink would never be sold there. Strong opposition to Mr. Charrington's demand was manifested, and as he persisted in urging it, the Lord Mayor ordered a constable to eject him from the meeting.

Earnest Christian Men and Women who can raise hymn tunes and give short gospel exhortations are wanted to be permanently stationed as evangelists at mission stations of the Gospel Union; salary ranging from five dollars and upward a week. Address Rev. M. Baxter, President Gospel Union, 63 Bible House, New York.

Rev. M. Baxter Addressed Large Meetings at Toronto last Sunday in Shaftesbury Hall. There appears to be a marked increase in the desire of the people to gain an understanding of prophecy. The call for Mr. Baxter's well-known work, "Forty Coming Wonders," a new edition of which has just been issued, and the anxiety of people, in the cities he has visited to hear his lectures show that an unprecedented interest in unfulfilled prophecy exists.

The Bible and Prophetic Conference to be held on Tuesday next and following days in Chicago will doubtless be attended by a large number of our readers. The Secretary, Rev. George C. Needham, writes us that they may effect a saving of expense through an arrangement made with the railroad company. He says; "Railroads will give reduced rates to persons attending the Prophetic Conference at Chicago from points within five hundred miles of that city. Passengers must purchase first-class tickets to Chicago, and secure certificate or receipt of same from ticket agents. Said certificate must be countersigned by clerk of Conference, so as to secure the benefit of reduced return fare, which will be one third of full fare. (The double journey will cost one and one third fare.) Hotels, boarding-houses, and restaurants are abundant in neighborhood of FARWELL HALL, where the meetings will be held. A list will be furnished on application. Persons arriving in Chicago may go directly to Young Men's Christian Association, Farwell Hall, 148, Madison Street, where all information regarding board and lodgings can be had. Will every reader kindly inform all friends about terms of railroads and hotels? Railroad tickets will be good from three days prior to Conference to three days after (November 11th to 24th)."

The Rev. F. G. Bingley, whose Work in South America is well known, is about to return to that neglected sphere. He expects to sail on December 22d for Venezuela, where he will ~~commence~~ work immediately on his arrival. Mr. Bingley follows Bishop Taylor's plan of self-supporting mission work. He is not commissioned by any society, but goes out trusting in God for support. He asks us to state that any one desiring to aid him in defraying the cost of his passage and preliminary expenses may send a contribution to Rev. John Dooley, Broome Street Tabernacle, New York, who will forward it to him.

The Work Among the Hebrews of New York, conducted by Rev. Jacob Freshman, is making remarkable progress. On Sunday last he had the great joy of receiving into the church three Hebrews, one of them a medical gentleman. Mr. Freshman read the Baptismal Service in German, the mother-tongue of the candidates. The Rev. Mr. Edwards, of London, England, the Secretary of the British Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, was present, and preached an excellent sermon from Rom. 1:16. The Rev. Dr. Goodsell, of this city, also assisted in the services. This Hebrew-Christian Church is rapidly increasing in spiritual interest and power, but the work is sadly in need of financial assistance.

Sunday Evening Services in Cooper Union, New York, were resumed on November 7th. They are under the auspices of the Presbytery of New York. Rev. R. M. Offord, who has the direction of the services, writes that they "will be made as attractive as possible, while carefully bearing in mind the apostolic injunction to let everything be done decently and in order. A service of song, aided by a large choir and directed by a gentleman of much experience, will be held from half-past seven to eight, to be followed by a gospel service strictly within the limits of one hour. During this hour there will be more congregational singing, as well as solos, and, of course, prayer, reading of Scripture, and short gospel addresses. A corps of recognized Christian workers will be on hand and on the alert to seek conversation with individuals, in the hope of discovering those who desire to be pointed to the Saviour." The services formerly held in that building were much blessed, and prayer is desired that their resumption may similarly be useful to the thousands of non-churchgoers in that section.

The Superiority of Frame Houses Over those built of brick or stone as to safety in an earthquake, was proved during the recent convulsion at Charleston, S. C. The News and Courier of that city called attention in an article published on November 3d, to the fact that very few of the frame houses in the city had required repair or rebuilding since the earthquake, while the brick and stone buildings had all suffered more or less serious injuries. "The explanation of this," says the journal, "is that an earthquake lacks the propulsive horizontal power of a tornado, while the upheaval force is so irresistible that weight counts for nothing in securing the safety of a building." In fact, the more substantial the building seemed the more likely it was to collapse. There is reason to believe that this principle has a wider application. There are many persons living in fancied security trusting in their good moral character, who, as Christ warned them, will not be able to stand in the day of the Lord, while others less respected of men are saved (Matt. 21:31).

How to Detect the Presence of the Fatal Fire-damp in mines in time to prevent an explosion has been a problem on which much ingenuity has been exercised. Many plans have been devised, but they have been generally so complicated that they have been little used. The latest, however, which has just been made public is remarkably simple. A child's India-rubber ball with a hole in it is squeezed flat in the hand, and held in the place suspected of fire-damp while released, and allowed to suck in the sample of the air; the ball is then directed toward a safety-lamp and again squeezed, when, if it contains any inflammable vapor, it will show the tell-tale blue flame. This is a test any miner can apply for himself, and it may be supposed that it would satisfy him. He would be a very reckless man, who, after seeing the blue flame, continued in the place until an explosion occurred. Men do not show such recklessness where life is concerned, though when the soul is at stake it is not enough to show them their danger; they generally need urging before they seek safety in Christ (11 Cor. 5:20).

The Reception of an Insane Immigrant was under the consideration of the Board of Commissioners of Emigration at their meeting last week. A formidable looking document was presented for their signature accompanied by an urgent petition from a citizen of Providence, R. I. The citizen has a son in an asylum for the insane in Europe, and he wants to bring him to this country for treatment by American specialists. But the President of the Board of Commissioners is authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury to prevent any sick or insane immigrant from landing in an American port, and the father, therefore, prudently sought permission beforehand to bring his son here. The Commissioners acceded to his request on condition that he gave bonds securing the people from liability to become chargeable with his son's support. Public opinion approves the observance of these precautions, as our hospitality has been abused in the past by European governments desirous of getting rid of incurable sufferers. Happily, there is no such restriction on entrance into the kingdom of God. Christ gave a special invitation to such as an earthly government would regard as undesirable citizens (Luke 14:21-23).

A Released Prisoner's Promise was mentioned last week by Warden Pilsbury, of the New York Penitentiary, as an illustration of the difficulties encountered by prison philanthropists in their efforts for the reclamation of habitual criminals. The warden himself made such an effort recently. He had a prisoner under his care who was the son of dishonest parents, and his own name was down on the register of the Blackwell Island retreat as a frequent guest. But the warden noticed that the man was tractable, kind, and generous, and believed that he might be reclaimed. He had a bad illness during his latest term, and his life was saved only by the careful nursing he received in the infirmary. The prisoner was deeply touched by the kindness shown him, and when he was discharged he waited on the warden to express his gratitude. Mr. Pilsbury thought it a good opportunity to expostulate with him and try to get him to reform and lead an honest life. He made a long and earnest appeal to him, and the prisoner listened attentively. But the warden was stricken with despair when the prisoner said on leaving, with tears in his eyes: "Yes, warden, you've been very kind to me; I'll not forget you. The first good gold watch I can steal in New York I'll send you by express." The warden is convinced that heredity and long habit had so blunted the man's conscience that he was incapable of realizing that stealing was wrong. Whether that was so or not, it is certain that in a less degree the principle has been found true by every converted man. After the conscience has been enlightened by the Holy Spirit, it condemns as sinful many acts which before it approved (Rom. 7:13).

A Clergyman was Mistaken for a Pickpocket on a railroad car recently. Several ladies were in one of the cars of a train on the way from Philadelphia to New Haven, Conn., and one of them missed her pocket-book, in which there were twenty-five dollars. She reported her loss, and at the next station an officer was called in to investigate. Directly back of the lady sat a suspicious, seedy-looking character. With the instinct of a professional thief-catcher it required but a moment for the officer to jump to the conclusion that he had located the culprit. The suspected man good-naturedly submitted to the search which the officer made, but the missing pocket-book was not found. After the search was over the suspicious-looking man remarked: "Well, officer, I know I look rather seedy, but I never supposed any one would take me for a thief. I am the Rev. Mr. —, of New Haven." Turning to the lady who had lost her pocket-book, he presented her with three dollars to help pay her fare home. His magnanimity must have been like coals of fire on her head, and she must have regretted entertaining the suspicion. Unhappily, she is not the only person who has wronged a servant of God by an unjust accusation. In our day the apostolic injunction as to preachers is too much forgotten (1 Thess. 5:12, 13).

A Bride's Certificate of Birth is Being eagerly sought for in Wisconsin. About fifteen years ago a wealthy lady in Milwaukee, Wis., noticed a bright little girl, who was in danger of becoming an outcast, as her father had been shot in a prison scuffle, and her mother was in extreme poverty. The child's beautiful face and musical voice made a deep impression on the lady, who at length made arrangements with the mother to adopt her. The girl was educated and reared as far as possible away from the scenes of her early years, which the lady was anxious should be forgotten. During a tour in Europe this summer a distinguished Italian physician fell in love with the whilom street waif, who has now become a beautiful and accomplished young lady. Arrangements for their marriage were made, but on the eve of the ceremony it was found that under the Italian law no marriage can take place without certificates of the births of the parties being filed. No one knows where the girl was born, nor whether her mother is living, and there is therefore no clue to the register of her birth. The marriage is therefore postponed until search is made through the registers of Wisconsin cities. It may be hoped that the young lady will soon be relieved of her embarrassment by the discovery of the missing document, as its absence appears to be an insuperable obstacle to the marriage. We have reason to be thankful that no such obstacle can arise for those who seek union with Christ. Nothing in the past can preclude that union. All who come to Him in faith are accepted (Gal. 6:15).

JESUS AND THE CHILDREN.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And they brought young children to Him, that He should touch them: and His disciples rebuked those that brought them. But when Jesus saw it, He was much displeased, and said unto them, Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God. Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein. And He took them up in His arms, put His hands upon them, and blessed them."—MARK 10: 13-16.

It must be a very great sin indeed to hinder anybody from coming to Christ. He is the only way of salvation from the wrath of God, salvation from the terrible judgment that is due to sin—who would dare to keep the perishing from that way? To alter the sign-posts on the way to the city of refuge, or to dig a trench across the road, would have been deserving the sternest condemnation. He who holds back a soul from Jesus is the servant of Satan, and is doing the most diabolical of all the devil's work. We are all agreed about this. I wonder, my dear friends, whether any of us are quite innocent in this respect. May we not have hindered others from repentance and faith? It is a sad suspicion; but I am afraid that many of us have done so.

Certainly you who have never believed in Jesus yourselves have done sadly much to prevent others believing. The force of example, whether for good or bad, is very powerful, and especially is it so with parents upon their children, superiors upon their underlings, and teachers upon their pupils. Peradventure, father, if you had been an earnest Christian, your son would not have been ungodly; possibly, dear mother, if you had been decided for the Saviour, the girls would have been Christians too. We have to speak and judge after the manner of men; but, assuredly, example is a great fashioner of character. We can none of us tell if we go down to hell how many we shall draw with us; for we are bound to thousands by invisible bands. Over the tomb of each sinner may be read this epitaph: "This man perished not alone in his iniquity." "None of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself." These are solemn reflections for those who mean no harm, and yet are doing it.

Do not some persons go further than their example, and hinder others from coming to Christ by

DISCOURAGING SPEECHES?

They dishearten those who are hoping for better things. Workingmen are to be found who never see any tenderness toward holy things in a work-mate but what they hasten at once to wound his heart. If they suspect a comrade of endeavoring to escape from drunkenness, they ridicule him; and if he goes further, and exhibits faith toward God, they make him the football of their contempt.

God save us from hindering a single soul from coming to Christ and heaven. I cannot help trembling sometimes lest a cold and chilly sermon of mine should wither young buds of promise; lest in the prayer-meeting a wandering, rambling prayer from a heartless professor should damp the rising earnestness of a tearful seeker. I tremble for you, my dear brethren and sisters in Christ, lest levity of conversation, worldliness of conduct, inconsistency of behavior, or callousness of demeanor, should in any one of you, at any time, turn the lame out of the way, or give cause of stumbling to one of the Lord's little ones.

I. Let us describe this sin of hindering young children from coming to Christ. First, I may say of it that it must be common, or else it would not have been found among the twelve apostles. The immediate disciples of our Lord were a highly honorable band of men; despite their mistakes and shortcomings, they must have been greatly sweetened by living near to one so perfect and so full of love. I gather, therefore, that if these men, who were the cream of the cream, rebuked the mothers who brought their young children to Christ, it must be a pretty common offence in the Church of God. I fear that the chilling frost of this mistake is felt almost everywhere. Have we laid ourselves out for the conversion of children, as much as we have done for the conversion of grown-up folks? What? Do you think me sarcastic? Do you not lay yourselves out for anybody's conversion? What must I say to you? It is dreadful that the Cainite spirit should enter a believer's heart and make him say: "Am I my brother's keeper?" But tell me now, if you did care for the salvation of souls, would you not think it rather too commonplace a matter to begin with boys and girls? Yes; and your feeling is shared by many. The fault is common.

I believe, however, that this feeling, in the case of the apostles, was caused by zeal for Jesus. These good men thought that the bringing of children to the Saviour would cause an interruption: He was engaged in much better work; He had been confounding the Pharisees, instructing the masses, and healing the sick. Could it be right to pester Him with children? The little ones would not understand His teaching, and they did not need His miracles; why should they be brought in to disturb His great doings? Thus in these days certain brethren would hardly like to receive many children into the Church, lest it should become a society of boys and girls. Surely, if these come into the Church in any great numbers, the Church may be spoken of in terms of reproach! The outside world will call it a mere Sunday-school. I remember that when a fallen woman had been converted in one of our county towns, there was an objection among certain professors to her being received into the Church, and certain lewd fellows of the baser sort even went the length of advertising upon the walls the fact that the Baptist minister had baptized a harlot. I told my friend to regard it as an honor. Even so, if any reproach us with receiving young children into the Church, we will wear the reproach as a badge of honor.

The apostles' rebuke of the children arose in a measure from ignorance of

THE CHILDREN'S NEED.

If any mother in that throng had said: "I must bring my child to the Master, for he is sore afflicted with a devil," neither Peter, nor James, nor John would have demurred for a moment, but would have assisted in bringing the possessed child to the Saviour. Or suppose another mother had said: "My child has a pining sickness upon it, it is wasted to skin and bone; permit me to bring my darling, that Jesus may lay His hands upon her"—the disciples would all have said: "Make way for this woman and her sorrowful burden." But these little ones with bright eyes and prattling tongues and leaping limbs, why should they come to Jesus? Ah, friends! they forgot that in those children, with all their joy, their health, and their apparent innocence, there was a great and grievous need for the blessing of a Saviour's grace. If you indulge in the novel idea that your children do not need conversion, that children born of Christian parents are somewhat superior to others, and have good within them which only needs development, one great motive for your devout earnestness will be gone. Believe me, brethren, your children need the Spirit of God to give them new hearts and right spirits, or else they will go astray as other children do.

Also, no doubt, this feeling that children may not come to Christ may be derived from a doubt about to receive the blessing which Jesus is able to give. Upon this subject, if I were at this moment to deal with facts alone, and not with mere opinion, I could spend the whole morning in giving details of young children whom I have personally conversed with, some of them very young children indeed. I will say broadly that I have more confidence in the spiritual life of the children that I have received into this church than I have in the spiritual condition of the adults thus received. I will even go further than that, and say that I have usually found a clearer knowledge of the Gospel and a warmer love to Christ in the child-converts than in the man-converts. I will even astonish you still more by saying that I have sometimes met with a deeper spiritual experience in children of ten and twelve than I have in certain persons of fifty and sixty.

Capacity for believing lies more in the child than in the man. We grow less rather than more capable of faith; every year brings the unregenerate mind farther away from God, and makes it less capable of receiving the things of God. No ground is more prepared for the good seed than that which as yet has not been trodden down as the highway, nor has been as yet overgrown with thorns. Not yet has the child learned the deceits of pride, the falsehoods of ambition, the delusions of worldliness, the tricks of trade, the sophistries of philosophy; and so far it has an advantage over the adult. In any case the new birth is the work of the Holy Ghost, and He can as easily work upon youth as upon age.

Some, too, have hindered the children because they have been forgetful of

THE CHILD'S VALUE.

The soul's price does not depend upon its years. "Oh, it is only a child!" "Children are a nuisance." "Children are always getting in the way." This talk is common. God forgive those who despise the little ones. Will you be very angry if I say that a boy is more worth saving than a man? It is infinite mercy on God's part to save those who are seventy; for what good can they now do with the fag end of their lives? When we get to be fifty or sixty, we are almost worn out; and if we have spent all our early days with the devil, what remains for God? But these dear boys and girls—there is something to be made out of them. If now they yield themselves to Christ they may have a long, happy, and holy day before them in which they may serve God with all their hearts. Who knows what glory God may have of them? Heathen lands may call them blessed. Whole nations may be enlightened by them. Oh, brethren and sisters, let us estimate children at their true valuation, and we shall not keep them back, but we shall be eager to lead them to Jesus at once.

II. Secondly, concerning this hindering of children, let us watch

ITS ACTION.

I think the results of this sad feeling about children coming to the Saviour is to be seen, first, in the fact that often there is nothing in the service for the children. The sermon is over their heads, and the preacher does not think that this is any fault; in fact, he rather rejoices that it is so. Some time ago a person who wanted, I suppose, to make me feel my own insignificance, wrote to say that he had met with a number of negroes who had read my sermons with evident pleasure; and he wrote that he believed they were very suitable for what he was pleased to call "niggers." Yes, my preaching was just the sort of stuff for niggers. The gentleman did not dream what sincere pleasure he caused me; for if I am understood by poor people, by servant-girls, by children, I am sure I can be understood by others.

Parents sin in the same way when they omit religion from the education of their children. Perhaps the thought is that their children cannot be converted while they are children, and so they think it of small consequence where they go to school in their tender years. But it is not so. Many parents even forget this when their girls and boys are closing their school-days. They send them away to the Continent, to places foul with every moral and spiritual danger, with the idea that there they can complete an elegant education. In how many cases I have seen that education completed, and it has produced young men who are thorough-paced profligates, and young women who are mere flirts. As we sow we reap. Let us expect our children to know the Lord. Let them read their first lessons from the Bible. It is a remarkable thing that there is no book from which children learn to read so quickly as from the New Testament; there is a charm about that book which draws forth the infant mind.

SUSPICIOUS PEOPLE.

Another ill-result is that the conversion of children is not believed in. Certain suspicious people always file their teeth a bit when they hear of a newly-converted child; they will have a bite at him if they can. They very rightly insist upon it that these children should be carefully examined before they are baptized and admitted into the Church; but they are wrong in insisting that only in exceptional instances are they to be received. We quite agree with them as to the care to be exercised; but it should be the same in all cases, and neither more nor less in the cases of children. I thank God that the most of those dear children who have been added to this church could stand a rigid examination in doctrinal matters, and would bear favorable comparison with the older folks; but still it seems to me a very hard thing that a high degree of knowledge should be expected of them.

A very solemn person once called me from the play-ground after I had joined the Church and warned me of the impropriety of playing at trap, bat, and ball with the boys. He said: "How can you play like others if you are a child of God?" I answered that I was employed as an usher, and it was part of my duty to join in the amusements of the boys. My venerable critic thought that this altered the matter very materially; but it was clearly his view that a converted boy, as such, ought never to play! What foolery, brethren! I will say no more.

Do not others expect from children more perfect conduct than they themselves exhibit? If a gracious child should lose his temper, or act wrongly in some trifling thing through forgetfulness, straightway he is condemned as a little hypocrite by those who are a long way from being perfect themselves. Jesus says: "Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones."

III. And now let us notice, thirdly, how

JESUS CONDEMNED THIS FAULT.

First, He condemned it as contrary to His own Spirit. "They brought young children to Him, that He should touch them: and His disciples rebuked those that brought them. But when Jesus saw it, He was much displeased." He was not often displeased; certainly He was not often "much displeased," and when He was much displeased we may be sure that the cause was serious. He was displeased at these children being pushed away from Him, for it was so contrary to His mind about them. The disciples did wrong to the mothers; they rebuked the parents for doing a motherly act—for doing, in fact, that which Jesus loved them to do. There was also wrong done to the children. Sweet little ones! what had they done that they should be chided for coming to Jesus? Besides, there was wrong done to Himself. It might have made men think that Jesus was stiff, reserved, and self-exalted, like the Rabbins.

Anything we do to hinder a dear child from coming to Jesus greatly displeases our dear Lord. He cries to us: "Stand off. Let them alone. Let them come to Me, and forbid them not." Dear gray-headed friend, who art so strict and good, I must get you to stand back a bit, and suffer that child to come to Jesus; for I do not wish the Lord to be displeased with you. And you, good Christian sister, who have curdled a little in your temper, I must beg you be quiet, lest the Lord should be displeased with you, as He will be if you forbid the children to come to Him. So, you see, it was contrary to His spirit.

Next, it was

for He went on to say: "Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein." Christ's teaching was not that there is something in us to fit us for the kingdom, and that a certain number of years may make us capable of receiving grace. His teaching all went the other way—namely, that we are to be nothing, and that the less we are and the weaker we are, the better; for the less we have of self the more room there is for His divine grace. Do you think to come to Jesus up the ladder of knowledge? Come down, sir, you will meet Him at the foot. Do you think to reach Jesus up the steep hill of experience? Come down, dear climber; He stands in the plain. "Oh, but when I am old, I shall then be prepared for Christ!" Stay where thou art, young man; Jesus meets thee at the door of life; you were never more fit to meet Him than just now.

Once more, it was quite contrary to Jesus Christ's practice. He made them see this; for "He took them up in His arms, put His hands upon them, and blessed them." All His life long there is nothing in Him like rejection and refusing. He saith truly: "Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out."

IV. Let us take

THE HINT WHICH JESUS GIVES

to those who would come to Him. "Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein." How I wish that all my congregation would come and receive Christ as a little child receives Him! The little child has no prejudices, no preconceived theories nor opinions it cannot give up; it believes what Jesus says. You must come in the same way to learn of Christ. I fear you know a great deal—throw it out of the window. You have made up your mind about a great many things—unmake your mind, and be as wax to the seal before Him.

A child believes with an unquestioning faith which makes everything vivid and real. Believe just so! The child believes in all humility, looking up to its teacher, and receiving its teacher's word as decisive. Believe in Jesus just so! Say: "Lord, I am a know-nothing; I come to Thee to be taught. I am nothing, be Thou mine all in all." When a child believes in Jesus it cares nothing for critical points. That is the way you must come to Christ. You that have always been inventing religious conundrums; you that for many years have been readers of the last new novels in modern theology—for they are mere novels, and nothing better; you that have added your brains with the vain thoughts of vain men, come to Jesus as you are, and believe what Jesus says because Jesus says it. Take Christ at His word, and trust Him; that is the way to be saved.

"But I have no merit," said one, "I have no preparation." Neither has a child. I never find children troubled about being prepared for Christ, I never hear of such a thing as a child worried about qualifications for grace. A child is a sinner and knows it. That is the way to come to Christ. Come as a sinner, knowing that you are such. Say, "Jesus calls me, and I come; Jesus died for me, and I trust Him." That is the true way to come to Jesus. Oh, friends, instead of thinking yourselves fitter for Christ by growing bigger, grow smaller! Instead of getting greater, get less. Instead of being more wise, be more completely bereft of all wisdom, and come to Jesus for wisdom, righteousness, and all things. Those of you who have never looked to Christ and lived, do unto Christ, I pray you, just what these dear children did; He called them, and they came, and were folded in His arms. Come along with you! Do you half wish you could be a child again? You can be. He can give you a child's heart, and you can be in His kingdom newly-born. May it be so, for His name's sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE EDICT OF NANTES.*

HENRY was determined that the Protestants, whom he accused of a desire to dictate terms to him, should appear to have accepted only what he was pleased to grant. He insisted that the Assembly of Châtelleraut should send deputies of its own to court, there to lay before him what difficulties might still remain, and receive his ultimate decision. It was with this Commission, appointed on the 24th of February, 1598, and consisting of four Protestant members, and with the Duke of Bouillon, whom the Assembly requested to assist them, that the final arrangements were made which were promulgated two months later, in the Edict of Nantes. The Commission, like the Assembly of which it was an emanation, stood its ground firmly. The four Huguenots were shrewd negotiators, who, much to the disgust of those with whom they treated, would not abate a jot of their demands.

The king must be credited with an honest desire that the Protestants of France should obtain such a standing in the sight of the law as would enable them to live in peace and comfort. He was doubtless sincere in the declaration that he would deeply regret any disturbance of amicable relations with old associates in creed and in arms, whom he averred that he loved even more than they loved themselves. Nor is it unlikely that, in the course of the many years during which he had been forced to contemplate the subject, first as a subject and a Protestant, later as a monarch and a professed Roman Catholic, Henry had matured a scheme according to which the adherents of the two prevalent religions might live together in France with mutual forbearance and toleration. But whatever that scheme may have been, it is equally undeniable that the plan actually adopted and incorporated in the famous edict, so far as it differed from the methods of previous edicts and was not a mere indorsement of their provisions, emanated not from the sovereign, but from the resolute band of men who, month after month, and year after year stood together without flinching, without for a moment harboring the thought of the surrender of a single one of the interests for whose defence they had been convened. The brilliant king, with his sparkling wit and his affable manners, may make a more conspicuous figure on the stage of history, but the quiet and tireless Assembly which sat at Loudun, at Vendôme, at Saumur, at Châtelleraut, and would have gone to the ends of the earth if only it might secure the rights of its constituents, is better entitled to the rank of protagonist, since it was the true author of the system under whose successful operation the kingdom enjoyed for long years a peace founded upon justice and equity.

It was upon the 13th of April, 1598, that Henry signed the edict which has come to be known as the Edict of Nantes. It was a remarkable circumstance, noticed even at the time as a singular coincidence, that the great law establishing the civil rights of the Huguenots was issued at the very place where, thirty-eight years earlier, on the 1st of February, 1560, in the reign of Francis the Second, and in the midst of the most violent persecution, the first Assembly of the Malcontents, soon to be known as Huguenots, was brought together by the incredible diligence of Godefroy de la Reynaudie. By one of the strange revenges of history, the same Breton port that witnessed the stealthy convocation of a few patriots resolved to attempt against great odds the overthrow of a tyrannical usurpation of power, was destined to behold the promulgation of one of the most illustrious of laws ever enacted in behalf of religious liberty.

The Edict of Nantes is a long and somewhat complicated document. Beside the edict proper contained in ninety-five public articles, there is a further series of thirty-six secret articles, and a brevet, or patent of the king, all of which were signed on the 13th of April; and these documents are supplemented by a second set of twenty-three secret articles, dated on the last day of the same month.

For the benefit of the Protestants the cardinal concession was liberty to dwell anywhere in the royal dominions without being subjected to inquiry, vexed, molested or constrained to do anything contrary to their conscience. As respects public worship, while perfect equality was not established, the dispositions were such as to bring it within the power of a Protestant in any part of the kingdom to meet his fellow-believers for the holiest of acts, at least from time to time. The civil equality of the Protestants was assured by an article which declared them to be admissible to all public positions, dignities, offices, and charges, and forbade any other examination into their qualifications, conduct, and morals than those to which their Roman Catholic brethren were subjected. Such are the main features of a law whose enactment marks an important epoch in the history of jurisprudence.

IN A CHINESE OPIUM-STORE.

(See Illustration.)

WHAT the liquor traffic is to America, the opium traffic is to China. It is the foe that is slowly, but surely, eating away the energies of the people; it is ruining families, and taking as its victims some of the best and brightest intellects of the nation. It is often used secretly at first, but after a time the victim resorts openly to the store and buys his supply with a crowd of other purchasers, and still later is seen in the low dens where smoking is done in company. In his excellent work on the habits of the Chinese, published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, the Rev. B. C. Henry, formerly a missionary in Canton, says: "Opium-smoking is the great vice of the people, and its evils can scarcely be exaggerated. Much has been said and written on the subject. It has been contended that the habit itself is comparatively harmless, and that most, if not all the evils that have been attributed to it, are due to other causes. The opinion, however, of competent physicians, whose long experience and observation in the midst of the people give them a right to speak with authority, is that its physical effects are deleterious in the extreme. Practical observation in almost every part of the province, and among nearly every class of the people, has shown me that it is an unmitigated curse. It is fearfully prevalent, but is confined almost exclusively to the men, the cases being exceedingly rare when women are found addicted to the habit.

"They, the women, use it as a final remedy, as they believe, for all their woes, the most common method of committing suicide being to swallow opium. In some places four fifths of the men smoke, and I suppose it would not be an exaggeration to say of the whole province that one fifth of all the men are slaves to the habit. The habit is very insidious in its growth, but when once it gets control of a man it binds him by the chains of an appetite stronger even than the craving of the drunkard for drink. It saps a man's physical vitality, it stupefies his intellect, destroys his moral sensibilities, and ruins his manhood entirely. It blots out his natural affections, so that under the lash of an insatiable craving he will sell his wife and children to gratify his appetite for the drug. It renders him unfit for work or business, and being an expensive habit soon brings its victim to abject poverty. The confirmed opium-smoker is one of the most pitiable objects that can be imagined; an emaciated frame, dishevelled hair, and careless dress, dark, ashen face, teeth hideously discolored, eyes whose white has turned to yellow, and which shine with an unnatural glitter—a living skeleton,

"The pernicious practice threatens the manhood of the whole nation, and brings untold suffering and hardship upon the families whose fathers or sons are enslaved by it. Opium dens are almost as plentiful in Canton as beer saloons in New York."

FOR LUCIE'S SAKE.

"YOUR city is an awful place," said a French clergyman, who was visiting New York, and was sitting up late one night talking with an old school-fellow, a native of the same town in Alsace, who had come to New York when a young man, and lived there for nearly thirty years. "The place is full of man-traps," the clergyman continued, "I wonder that coming here as you did among total strangers that you did not go utterly to the bad, instead of becoming a respectable member of society with a fortune. How did it happen that you escaped? You were not pious, I think, when you came out?"

"Oh, no! I am sorry to say that it was not until I had been here ten or twelve years that I was converted."

"And before that, did you not have a desperate struggle to resist temptation? It seems to me that a young stranger fond of music and the theatre and loving a glass of wine, as I remember you did, must surely be ruined in such a city, though perhaps it was not so dangerous then?"

"Oh, yes, it was. In some respects it was worse. But I had a talisman with me."

"A talisman! Surely you do not believe in magic?"

"No, but my talisman saved me. I will tell you how it was. From my boyhood I cherished the hope that Lucie would be my wife. But when my father died, and I saw that I should never have any money but such as I earned, I realized that there was small prospect of my ever winning her unless I changed my course of life, and put out more energy. My salary at the bank did little more than cover my personal expenses, and it increased very slowly. So I resolved to come to America and push my way. I could not bear to leave Lucie without some definite arrangement. She and I understood each other, but we decided that the time had come to take her father into our confidence. So I went to him and told him of our love and our hope that in America I should prosper sufficiently to come back and marry Lucie. He was very indignant, and used some very hard words. Eventually, he relented so far as to promise that if I went away without speaking to Lucie again, or writing to her after I left—leaving her free, in fact—and came back in three or four years with a moderate prospect of being able to support a wife, that he would consent to our union. It was a hard bargain, but I agreed on condition that he would tell Lucie of the terms he had made, so that she would not misunderstand my leaving without saying good-by and my not writing to her.

"So it was settled, but I could not go without one more sight of her, and I crept down to a place from which I could see into the garden, and waited there to see Lucie come out. I took care, of course, to conceal myself so that she should not see me; for I was very careful of observing my promise to her father. Presently, I heard voices, and soon she came into full view. She had her brother and two little sisters with her, and they stopped under a tree, and Lucie standing on tip-toe reached down a quantity of ripe fruit, and gave it to the young ones, laughing and joking with them all the time. I waited until they were out of sight, and then I hurried away. That picture fixed itself in my memory, and was my talisman for years.

"When I reached New York and obtained employment, I never felt temptation. 'For Lucie's sake' was always a sufficient protection. I never entered a theatre, never attended a concert, never drank a glass of wine. It was a dull life, but it was for Lucie's sake, and that was enough. Many times, of course, temptation crossed my path, but I thought of Lucie as I saw her standing that day in the garden, kind and good and lovable, and I was preserved by my love for her. I went through those critical years without falling into any of the vices peculiar to that period of life, and I felt no desire for them, for the thought that they would render me unworthy of Lucie preserved me even from desire.

"Well, since then, and since we have been married, God has kept me. Many who lead comparatively blameless lives up to marriage fall afterward, but soon after we were married and settled here we were both converted. It happened at the same time with both of us. We passed through a season of deep anxiety, but we helped each other, praying together and reading the Bible together. We came into the light after a time—Lucie first, and she led me afterward. Since then, I have been able to say the love of Christ constraineth, and that has kept me. It was the same as in the earlier years only in a better and holier sense. As love for Lucie protected me then, so now the higher and greater love for the Saviour has held me, and

His power has been with me to this day.' So that ever since I set foot in the city its temptations have never troubled me personally, and I have been mercifully kept from falling."

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leander S. Keyser.*

A Crisis.

At last spring came with its glorious revival of natural life. The dull earth, released from the icy fetters of winter, put on its glorious garb of living green; the trees that a month ago looked mere dead logs, gave birth to delicate shoots that were unfolding into broad leaves. All nature was rejoicing, and as Leroy looked from his window he noticed it with a sigh. There was no spring in his heart. Dull and cold and spiritless the sunlight did not touch it. Restless, gloomy, dissatisfied with himself and the world around him, the joy and gladness without seemed to mock him, as one whose heart is heavy with bereavement yet brought by the force of circumstances to a wedding feast.

He felt less bitterness now toward Christians and the Christian religion. He could not accept Christianity; against that step his intellect rebelled. But he recognized the fact that it met a want that his philosophy failed to satisfy. The world, as he saw, would be more miserable than it was if religion was eliminated. True or false its effects were beneficent in calming, comforting, stimulating and fortifying the soul. Why should he attack and denounce it when he had nothing to give the world that would serve its purpose. Twice during the winter, once at the bedside of the sick child, and once with his dear pupil, the work he wanted to do, and yet had failed to accomplish, had been lifted out of his hands and done for him simply and effectually by a man who had no appliances but those of religion. It seemed that he would be of little use in the world after all. The success and the helpfulness would be with the religious men. He had reached the point when he even wished he could believe. But that he felt to be impossible.

The problems of life and nature perplexed him. He could find no solution for them that satisfied him. The Christian was in better case; he was satisfied with the biblical solution, but Leroy regarded that solution as a mere begging of the question at issue. Earnestly as he studied, deeply as he cogitated, there was no system of philosophy that could disperse the mist that enveloped the whole realm of being. Again and again he had been, as he thought, on the verge of discovery only to find the land of certainty a mirage of the desert.

"We have had authors," he said, "who have given us 'The New Abelard,' 'The New Magdalen,' and 'The New Timothy,' I fancy I could furnish them with an experience that they might call 'The New Tantalus,' for I feel as if I were already in Pluto's realms, standing up to my lips in the fountain of truth, but whenever I attempt to drink the waters recede. Branches laden with lucious fruits seem to be hanging over my head, but whenever I attempt to pluck them a sudden gust carries them beyond my reach."

In addition to these troubles his thoughts had gone back to Carrie with a vividness that multiplied his woes many times. Life seemed very hard to him. His ambition was foiled and love had been denied him. What was there left to hope for or to enjoy?

It was on a bright, beautiful Sunday morning that these thoughts presented themselves with irresistible force. They were always with him in latent condition, but they became acute this morning as he felt himself so utterly out of harmony with nature and with the sentient world. Oh for quiet, for rest from this ceaseless, persistent doubt and questioning. Might he not get a brief season of peace in the atmosphere of religion. Why not go to church and hear Mr. Philliput? There was a yearning in his soul for something definite and positive and tangible. For once he was tired of speculation and uncertainty. He wanted to hear a man talk who believed something; perhaps Mr. Philliput might say a helpful word to-day.

"If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether

I speak of myself," were the words the preacher announced as his text.

Leroy started. Was that in the Bible? Familiar as the passage is to students of the Scripture, he could not remember that he had ever noticed it before.

Then Mr. Philliput proceeded to unfold the thought of the text. Leroy, with thrilled heart and spellbound attention, listened to the preacher, following every line of thought, and even admitting the cogency of the reasoning.

"Here is a fundamental principle of our Christianity," said the preacher. "If you are willing to do God's will, that is, to put yourself in harmony with the God of revelation, He will reveal Himself to you; He will give you an experience of the divine touch, and an inner certitude of His truth. The same law obtains everywhere. Put yourself in harmony with nature and how many secrets she will whisper in your ear! If a pupil refuses to submit his mind to the rules of mathematical science, he will never be able to comprehend its principles. So if you would hear in your soul the whisperings of divine knowledge and love, you must put yourself in consonance with God and the laws of the spiritual world. Do you suppose God will force His revelation upon you while you are fighting against Him? No; God is a moral being, and we are moral beings, and God cannot be true to His own character or act consistently in coercing man's will. He has respect to our free moral agency—to our power of choice. You must therefore throw aside preconceived notions and prejudices, and open your being to the God who knocks, and then He will come in.

"It is God's will that you should search the Scriptures, not with a cavilling and captious spirit, not merely in detached fragments, but honestly, candidly, thoroughly, throwing the mind open to the reception of all truth; and if you do this, you will find the Book of God a firmament glowing with a brilliant radiance. You will see in it many a star of truth of whose glory you had no conception.

"Further, it is God's will that you should pray. 'Ask, and ye shall receive.' If you will take your trouble, your unsatisfied longing, your doubtings, to God in Christ's name, and earnestly implore His help, He will send the regenerating, certifying, witness-bearing Spirit into your consciousness. And you will never have assurance of truth until you get that Spirit, and it will be given only in answer to prayer. Not one of those who have been recently converted received the truth except through prayer. 'If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God.'"

Leroy started as if shot by a familiar missile. That quotation from the Scripture—where had he heard it? Ah! those were the very words Carrie had quoted to him long ago. Why, the old man spoke just as Carrie had so often spoken! They used the same language. They each presented him with the same remedy for his difficulties. It was a singular coincidence. Yet how humiliating. It was as if he were a child instead of a man! Submission and prayer when what he wanted was logic and conviction. Yet he needed rest just then so urgently that it were well bought at the cost of humiliation.

His eyes were bent upon the pavement before him as he walked to his room; for he was startled by this new thought. Truth he must have or he would become demented. Could he gain it by entering at such a gate? If so, why should he not do it? It was hard to abandon the proud attitude he had maintained so long. It was unmanly; it was an unconditional surrender. His spirit rose against it. If he were satisfied he would yield to any religion. He protested that he was neither obstinate nor prejudiced, and that his position was reasonable. It was hard that he should be expected to humiliate himself at the outset, and he resolved that he would not do it.

Yet the yearning was strong upon him for peace and rest. He sat in his room on that quiet Sunday afternoon brooding in resentful mood until he could bear it no longer. The recollection of a beautiful sequestered hollow on the other side of the hill, that stood like a sentinel over the town seemed to beckon him, and taking up his hat he was leaving the room when he turned back for a book. What should he take? A volume of George Eliot? No; the problems of actual life were too pressing for his mind to dwell on fictitious scenes and characters. A volume of poetry? He glanced along the shelf, but there was no poet in the collection who could speak the word he needed just now. What if he took the Bible and read that as Mr. Philliput had advised? He reached it out of his box and strolled out under the glorious blue sky.

He climbed the hill and descending on the opposite side he was soon seated on a moss-covered boulder in the sweet, shady retreat of which he had thought in his room. The place was so sheltered by the tall trees of the hillside that he was completely shut in. All sights and sounds associated with human life were excluded, nothing to be seen but nature in her new loveliness and the blue sky overhead. Yet there seemed a sacred presence there which he could almost fancy invited his confidence. As he looked around at the beautiful scene his eye was caught by a tiny morsel of color almost at his feet. It was a violet just peeping like some precious jewel out of the moss. He rose to pluck it but suddenly stopped. The delicate blossom seemed to mutely protest against its new life being ended so soon. The appeal touched him as if the flower had spoken.

"Little beauty," he said, addressing it as if it were a person, "I will not harm you. How modestly and unobtrusively you bloom out here in the forest alone. I am, perhaps, the only person who has ever looked upon your loveliness. And yet you do not bear yourself the less gracefully because no one sees and admires you. Ah! no one? Might there not be—" he spoke, almost with bated breath—"an all-seeing Eye for whose delight you smile so radiantly?"

At that moment, as if blending with his present mood, a little rock-wren leaped in sight and perched upon a rock a short distance away, and throwing back its head and distending its throat almost to bursting, it poured forth a fine, thread-like roundel, in fragmentary, ecstatic trills and quavers, which echoed through the surrounding woodland. After rehearsing its quickly repeated cluster of notes several times, it caught sight of its enchanted auditor, and then its song suddenly ceased, it looked about anxiously, flitted from stem to stem, and finally crept down among the rocks to its hiding-place. Leroy was always responsive to bird-melodies, and now he tried to interpret that song.

"You little seraph of the woods," he cried, enthusiastically. "Who hears your carols? You do not sing to delight human ears; for as soon as you saw me your lay ceased and you ran and hid yourself like a startled nymph. Yet I know you are as perfect in form as melodious of voice.

"It cannot be that so much beauty and perfect adaptation as I see around me has come from blind dead force. I must have erred; there must be a flaw somewhere in the reasoning that excludes a God from so glorious a universe. And if there be a God! Stay, let me try to form a conception on that hypothesis. What must be the characteristics of such a Being? Power, wisdom, beneficence; yes, and surely nature adds, love. Then what must I be? There is no humiliation if God is, in my asking Him humbly for light and instruction."

He picked up his Bible from the rock where he had laid it and turned over the leaves. As he did so a scrap of thin paper covered with writing caught his eye. Ah, yes, he remembered what it was! Carrie gave it to him one day as they were walking home from church and told him, in her quaint, whimsical way, that he was to put it in his Bible as a little commentary to use when he began to study it. He obeyed, thinking that time would never come. He remembered the incident perfectly. He examined it now. Carrie had culled the following selections for his benefit:

"All things are full of God."—THALES.

"As our minds govern our bodies, so the mind of God governs the universe of things."—SOCRATES.

"A disposing mind is the cause of all things."—ANAXAGORAS.

"The rolling year

Is full of Thee. Forth in the flowery Spring Thy beauty walks, Thy tenderness and love."

—THOMSON.

Below these quotations she had written "Compare Rom. i : 20." He sought in his Bible the place indicated, and read: "For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead, so that they are without excuse."

That was a terrible sentence! The conception of God which he had tried to form was short, as he easily understood, of the fact if the hypothesis was admitted. Recollecting his own life, his proud attitude, his denial of God, his open avowal of infidelity, the words "without excuse" thrilled through him as the words of condemnation thrill the prisoner at the bar when the judge utters them. Then the words Carrie had spoken to him solemnly came back to him as if she was there speaking to him in his solitude: "If ever you want peace of mind, you must pray."

And then this admonition was supplemented by a verse from Scripture which she had quoted, and which the preacher had repeated in his sermon that morning: "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God." And did he not lack wisdom? It came like a new revelation to him.

All the entreaties he had heard for years seemed to be concentrated into one volume and reverberated through his being. His mother had said pray. Carrie had repeated pray! pray! The boy, William, had received help in his trouble by prayer. And to-day the preacher had given the same testimony.

All the hollowness, the unsatisfactoriness of his life of unbelief crowded in upon his thoughts with accumulating force, and his heart turned sick within him at the retrospection. What good had all his cherished theories done him? Where had they ever afforded him a grain of comfort? In what respect had they ever ennobled and enlarged his manhood? Had they not failed him in the most trying ordeals? They had proved a wreath of thorns about his heart instead of what he needed—a garland of flowers. It had been all doubt, doubt, questioning, uncertainty, disappointment. His surge-tossed spirit longed for something that he might cling to as a finality. Could it be that men are placed here to grope forever in darkness? There must be, there ought to be a revelation such as Plato had longed for. Was Christianity the finality for which every voice within him was crying? Oh, for light!

And again the voices seemed to call to him, "Pray! pray!"

"I ought to—I must—no, I cannot."

For his doubts returned. He did not know whether there was a God; how could he pray to one whose existence he doubted? Just at that moment an illustration, suggested, perhaps, by the Spirit of guiding love, came to his mind. "If I were blind, and in trouble, and I even suspected that a friend were near, I certainly should call for help. I will call upon God; perhaps He will hear me. I ought to do it! I must! I will!"

He knew no formulated prayer. In his intense longing for truth he forgot all about the stereotyped phrases in which he had heard others pray. He could utter nothing but the spontaneous longings of his soul.

"O God, if Thou art, give me the truth," he cried, like a drowning man calling for help. "Thou knowest how my soul yearns for the truth. Have pity on my ignorance. Lead me aright. I grope; I stumble in the darkness. Pour light upon my way."

But the lashings of conscience became terrible as he thought of all his rebellion, all his assaults upon God's Word. Oh, how arrogant, how defiant he had been!

"I have sinned, I have sinned. I denied Thee. But, great God, forgive me; I knew not what I did. I did it in my blindness."

Still there seemed to be no answer. Doubts returned. The darkness became denser. The grim giant of Despair held him in his grip. What right had he to expect an answer to his prayer? It was conceivable that a God so outraged, so defied as he had defied Him would refuse to hear him in his need. It was only just that he should be rejected and left to himself as a punishment for his pride and self-confidence. The thought was agony to him. There was no pride now; no stipulating for terms, the surrender was absolute and unconditional. Prostrate on the earth with great drops of perspiration standing on his forehead, he could not so much as raise his eyes to heaven but cried, "God be merciful to me a sinner."

WALKING IN THE LIGHT.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 21, 1 John 1: 5; 2: 1-6. Golden Text, Eph. 5: 8.

The Cause of Darkness—Light Existing, but Obscured—The Light to be Reflected—The Profession of an Untruth—Transparent Lives—The Self-Deceived Professors—The Cleansed and Pardoned Soul—The Educated Conscience—Unconscious Sins—God's Ideal—Obedience Essential.

"BLESSED is the people that know the joyful sound: they shall walk, O Lord, in the light of Thy countenance." ("In the light of Thy face they walk habitually." Young's translation.) "In Thy name shall they rejoice all the day: and in Thy righteousness shall they be exalted. For thou art the glory of their strength: and in Thy favor our horn shall be exalted" (Ps. 89: 15-17).

"GOD IS LIGHT, and in Him is no darkness at all." Christ in us is Light, and in Him, dwelling in us, "is no darkness at all." Where is darkness? Wherever anything obscures the light. Night is only the result of our side of the earth being turned away from the sun. The darkness is not in the sun but in the earth. Thus sin and self cause darkness, because they obscure God; they come between God and us. "If we say we have fellowship with Him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth." If we walk in sin or in self, there is either darkness and depression upon our own souls, or there is something in us which hides God from others. Our precious vocation is to walk so in the light, so to take in the light of God, as to reflect, or throw off that light upon everybody and everything with which we come in contact. "Ye are the light of the world" (Matt. 5: 14).

There is such a thing as having a lie in our testimony. "If we say that we have fellowship with Him," because we once had fellowship with Him, while we at the present time are walking in darkness, "we lie, and do not the truth." God keep us from a lying testimony. It is to profess an untruth, and to speak familiarly of oneness with God when our temper is making others suffer, when envy or jealousy, readiness to talk about the faults of others, self-seeking, or any other uncleanness of heart and life, hinders others from seeing Christ in us. It makes them, in perplexity, ask the question, "Is therefore Christ the minister of sin?" (Gal. 2: 17) "Does fellowship with God encourage His children in sin?" God forbid; His testimony is clear; "If we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another (i.e., we have fellowship with God and God has fellowship with us), and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us (is cleansing us) from all sin." Walking in the light and fellowship with God are inseparably connected, and are diametrically opposed to darkness and sin. God and sin can no more exist together than can light and darkness.

What is it, then, to walk in the light as He is in the light? Surely it is to walk, moment by moment, without a cloud of any kind between God and us, not because of our righteousness, for we have none, but because of God's grace; the blood of Jesus Christ which is cleansing us all the time from all sin. Walking every moment with God between us and sin instead of with sin between us and God. Again, it is living in openness and transparency; "All things when they are reproofed are made manifest by the light; for everything that is made manifest is light" (Eph. 5: 13. R. V.). That which need not be hidden from God, need not be hidden from man. All parents know that when a child has some hidden thing upon his mind, it is sure to be something evil. That which is right and true and good comes out at once. And so with God's children; when they are in true fellowship with God, their life before man becomes very simple, very open; there is no man's face to fear. Again, walking is not standing still, but going on from place to place, from light to light; the conscience being educated by the Holy Ghost who guides into all truth, to understand God's view of things.

"If we say that we have no sin we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." Like many other passages of Scripture, these words apply to the unsaved and unsanctified, and then possess a deeper meaning for those who are walking in the light. If a sinner ignores or denies his sin, instead of confessing it, and seeking pardon through faith in Jesus Christ, it is very evident he is self-deceived, and "the truth is not in him." When a believer, who is under the power of sin that dwelleth in him, claims that because he is a child of God, it is not sin in him, he is fearfully self-deceived. If a believer talks of his standing, his sitting with Christ in heavenly places, etc., while all the time his spirit is full of animosity, and unchristlike bitterness—he deceives himself and the truth is not in him. Christ did not come to patronize but "to take away our sins, and in Him is no sin" (1 John 3: 5). "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." Thank God, the appeal of a sinner or of a believer who has sinned, is not to his own true repentance, but to the justice and faithfulness of God to forgive and cleanse for Christ's sake who died for him. And He is as just and faithful to cleanse as He is to pardon.

But there are those who have been conscious that they did not walk in fellowship with God,

THEY WERE IN DARKNESS, sin did have dominion over them, but they have come to Him who once "forgave all that debt," for pardon and for cleansing too. They have come to God to ask that the very thoughts of their hearts may be cleansed by the inspiration of His Spirit; they have accepted Jesus to dwell in, and to keep them, and they have had the blessed joy of proving how His precious blood does cleanse; how the love of drink, of dress, of praise, of novels, etc., has been so cleansed that it has become a thing of the past, because Jesus has come in to take its place, and they can say, "Now it is no more I that live but Christ that dwelleth in me." Can then these words be applicable to such, "If we say that we have no sin we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us?" We think so. The sins which are cleansed cannot be cleansed and dwelling in us at the same time, and thus whatever sins we have confessed and God has cleansed, are cleansed and taken away; they no longer have dominion over us, thank God. But as He

EDUCATES OUR CONSCIENCE,

He teaches us more of what He sees to be sin. There are, in the Word of God, four definitions of sin. "Sin is the transgression of the law" (1 John 3: 4). "All unrighteousness is sin" (1 John 5: 17). "To him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin" (James 4: 17). "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin" (Rom. 14: 23). There are some who are convicted of actual transgressions of the law, the ten commandments. Others see sin, sometimes sins of ignorance, in all which is not righteous according to Christ's righteousness. "He that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as He is righteous" (1 John 3: 7). Others make sin to be confined to our personal consciousness of sin, on the ground that we cannot be condemned for that which we did not know to be sin. But under the law we see that such sin needed cleansing (Lev. 4: 2; 5: 15; Num. 15: 24, 27, 28, 29; 13: 22, 27). Those who live a life of faith see sin in everything which is not done by faith in God. A moment of anxiety, any leaning on man for money in the Lord's work, a prayer uttered without the belief that there and then the Lord gives His answer—all this is sin to a man or woman of faith. And since the Spirit reveals from time to time such sins of unbelief which have been lurking unconsciously in the heart, one cannot say absolutely, "I have no sin," although he can say "I have not been conscious of the sin." God reveals to us the lurking-places of these sins, that they may be exposed, brought to light, and cleansed; and oh how precious to know that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin just as we believe for it.

"My little children," said the aged apostle, "these things write I unto you THAT YE SIN NOT."

This is God's ideal for us, this is His glorious possibility. He, dwelling in us and possessing us, can keep us from sinning and just as far as we trust Him to keep us, and obey Him—just so far does He keep us. How many can testify with regard to some past habit of sin. "Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers: the snare is broken, and we are escaped" (Ps. 124: 7). Yet only the grace of God can keep us. One moment our eye off Jesus, and down we go. But, thank God, "if any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Righteous; and He is the Propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only but also for the whole world" (R. V.). If this were not so how could one of us stand?

In order to walk in the light we need not only cleansing but also obedience.

"HEREBY WE KNOW that we know Him, if we keep His commandments. He that saith, I know Him, and keepeth not His commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him." Real knowledge of God brings with it an increasing love for His commandments. His will, when we know Him, becomes to us just what the Bible says it is, "good, and acceptable, and perfect" (Rom. 12: 2). We cannot want to explain it away or tone it down if we love Him. When it is beyond our reach, we will ask Him to raise us up to it, and not to bring it down to us. "Whoso keepeth His Word, in him verily is the love of God perfected; hereby know we that we are in Him." There are just a few of the true saints of God so full of His Word that all their language is formed by it; and oh how their faces beam with His love! "He that saith he abideth in Him ought himself also so to walk even as He walked," step by step in the traces which Jesus has left. He is our perfect Pattern; God has given no other. Are we thus in every relation of life living out, not our own life but the life of Jesus? We are saved, cleansed, filled for this and for this alone.

WEAVING.

BY S. L. CUTHBERT.

Yes, I'm a weaver, and each day
The threads of life I spin,
And be the colors what they may,
I still must weave them in.

With morning light there comes the thought,
As I my task begin—
My Lord to me new threads has brought,
And bids me "weave them in."

Sometimes he gives me threads of gold,
To brighten up the day;
Then sombre tints, so bleak and cold,
That change the gold to gray.

His love, alas! I oft forget
When these dark threads I spin,
That cause me grief and pain, but yet
He bids me "weave them in."

And so my shuttle swiftly flies,
With threads both gold and gray;
And on I toil till day-light dies,
And fades in night away.

Oh when my day of toil is o'er,
And I shall cease to spin;
He'll open wide my Father's door,
And bid me rest within.

There safe at home in heavenly light,
How clearly I shall see
That every thread, the dark, the bright,
Each one had need to be!

ALONE WITH GOD. STUDIES AND MEDITATIONS OF A SICK-ROOM.

By Rev. JOSEPH CROSS, D. D., LL. D.
READ THIS REVIEW.

"In singularly sweet and chaste language he gives expression to the thoughts which one who has long walked with God finds refreshing in hours of solitude. A strange, soothing, solemnizing influence comes over the spirit almost unconsciously as one reads these meditations, as if one were in the very presence of God. They breathe a spirit of simple, trusting faith, full of intelligence, as of one who says, 'I know in whom I have believed.' The section on 'The Christian surrendering his will,' and that on 'The Christian drawing nearer to Christ,' are especially beautiful. We can imagine no book of modern time more fitted for the sick-room or one more adapted to the condition of the Christian sufferer nearing the grave. It speaks of peace, of resignation, of acquiescence in the divine will, a calm loving trustfulness which few in the heyday of health and strength ever attain."—The Christian Herald.

The Late Rev. JAMES PHILLIPPO MURSELL, of Leicester, Eng.—Scenes in his Life.

THE LATE REV. J. P. MURSELL.

Born in 1799—His Parents—A Mischievous Boy—Tormenting a Minister—Playing Ghost—Victim of a Blackmailer—Conversion—Lay Preaching—Preparing for the Ministry—Intimacy with Phillippo—Settles at Wells—Removes to Leicester—Political Agitation—A Stormy Meeting—Pastoral Work—Resignation and Death.

THE name of the eminent Baptist minister whose portrait appears on the first page is doubtless familiar to many of our readers. A sketch of his long and eventful career cannot fail to be interesting to all.

James Phillippo Mursell was born at Lymington, England, on September 7th, 1799, and died November 2d, 1885, having entered on his eighty-seventh year. In his boyhood he had the inestimable advantage of godly training. His parents were both sincerely pious and intensely desirous that their boy should grow up in the nurture of the Lord. His father was a tradesman of excellent local repute in business circles, and much esteemed in the villages around Lymington as a lay preacher of power and spirituality. The mother was a devoted woman, of sweet, gentle disposition, whose help was sought and readily given among a large circle of acquaintance in any case in which comfort, or counsel, or kindness of hand and heart were needed.

James Mursell, so far from becoming a model boy under these home influences, was

A TERROR TO THE NEIGHBORHOOD through his mischievous propensities. His ingenuity in devising schemes for annoying inoffensive people was extraordinary. It seemed as if his inventive genius was in constant exercise, planning and executing tricks which would combine the greatest amount of fun for himself with the greatest amount of vexation for his victims. One of his favorite amusements, which yielded him enjoyment because it involved pain and terror to an animal, and consternation to some quiet family, was to attach a cat, by a running noose around its tail, to the knocker of a house-door. The minister's door presented facilities for the operation which could not be overlooked, and besides, he being a humane and kindly man, whose servant was a demure, elderly female, somewhat nervous, and presumably a friend to the feline race, furnished the elements required for complete success. How much delight the mischievous lad experienced may be imagined, as he stood in a convenient post of observation watching the struggles of some big cat to free itself from the minister's knocker, and the horror of the domestic when, brought to the door by the agitation of the knocker, she would be attacked by the claws of the infuriated animal as she hurried to release it from its painful position.

Another trick caused more general alarm and affected the whole parish. The story was whispered at firesides, and discussed at the alehouse, that one of the villagers, in crossing Shirley Common late at night, had seen a ghost. Sceptics ridiculed the story, and the mothers reassured the children who heard of it and were afraid to go to bed in the dark. But the report was confirmed by one and another who had caught a glimpse of the gaunt figure, enveloped, according to the immemorial usage of ghosts, in its sheet, and then had run from the spectral pursuer with all speed to spread the story with additional details through the village. Shirley Common became a place of terror, lovers avoided the once-popular resort, boys would submit to any punishment rather than go near it after sundown, and even the men would make a long circuit in coming home from their work rather than cross it in the dark. The public uneasiness developed, and the clergyman tried to allay it by an elaborate sermon on the supernatural, which increased the panic instead of allaying it. The appearances went on until one of the old patrol who did police duty in those days detected young James in the act of donning his spectral costume, and administered a summary castigation which laid the ghost of Shirley Common forever.

A more serious affair, and one showing real moral depravity, gave a serious turn to the boy's life. James became

THE VICTIM OF A BLACKMAILER.

Mr. Mursell had in his employ a man named Dagnall, who, by plot and promise, so worked upon the boy's disposition as to persuade him to rob his good father. Dagnall represented to James that he might easily secure a sum of money out of the loose coin in the store and "lend" it to him for a time. James agreed, and the money was secured and handed over to Dagnall. Having entrapped the boy, instead of repaying the loan, he prevailed upon him to increase it from time to time. But, failing at length to extort a further advance by a pathetic appeal to the boy's feelings, he suddenly changed his mood, and threatened to expose the peculation to his father unless he gave him the money. This was a fatal mistake, as far as Dagnall's object was concerned. The threat was enough for the fiery lad, and his spirit, as well as his sense of honor, was aroused. He seized the man by the arm, and said: "Come along, then, and you shall hear me tell him all about it!" The mere challenge alarmed the fellow, and he absconded and was heard of no more.

The disappearance of his tempter and tormenter deterred James from at once revealing his fault. But his own conscience took the place of the departed Dagnall, and would not let him go. So miserable did the poor lad become that he made an attempt to drown himself in the river near by, which was only just frustrated by a sailor who was near. (See Illustration on first page, No. 1.) He lay in his bed for days, refusing food, till his mother was distressed beyond measure. She thought at first he was sulking when he refused to tell her what was on his mind.

On going to his room door upon the third morning, she found all very still, and, in the hope that he was sleeping, opened the door without noise, when she started on seeing him kneeling by the bed, sobbing convulsively, in passionate and earnest prayer. Without disturbing him, the mother darted to his father's room, and cried with the fervor and gratitude which the revelation had inspired:

"BEHOLD, HE REPENTETH!"

There was a little judicious severity on the father's part before condoning the offence; but it proved to be the turning incident of his life. The boy was effectually turned from his evil ways, and, finding forgiveness through faith in Christ, united with the church and gave evidence in his changed life of a new heart. He began to accompany his father on his missions to the villages around and to take an interest in all Christian work.

"James," said his parent to him one day, when he was not well enough to face his Sunday engagement, "I can't go to Sway to-day; you must go and take the service for me." "Oh, I can't preach, father!" said the startled youth. But the result of the parley was that James set out, with two young friends of his own age, and it was arranged that one of these should read the Bible and set the tunes, the other should engage in prayer, and that James should speak to the people. The two young men turned faint-hearted at the chapel-door, as patients lose their courage in the dentist's hall, and James conducted the entire service; and it was done with such effect, simplicity, and devoutness, that his father soon left him in sole charge of that little district. James Mursell went regularly for many Sundays to the small place, and initiated an evangelical crusade, the fruits of which are manifest round that country side to this day.

His work at Sway was fruitful in spiritual results, and beneficent in its influence on the social and private lives of the people, and he was frequently urged by Christian friends to make the preaching of the Gospel his life-work. But for a time he firmly resisted their persuasions. It was, however, urged with so much persistency that at length he yielded, and went to Chipping-Norton to study under Rev. W. Gray, who was a minister of more than the average scholarship of the time. Here he became a fellow-student with the faithful and illustrious Jamaica missionary, James Phillippo. The intimacy between the two young men was very close and affectionate. As a memorial of it each assumed the other's name. Phillippo called himself thereafter James Mursell Phillippo, while Mursell always signed himself James Phillippo Mursell.

The preparatory tutelage of Mr. Gray was subsequently exchanged for the curriculum of the "Bristol Academy," of which Dr. John Ryland was at that time the erudite and accomplished principal. Here Mr. Mursell became a fellow-student with the genial Dr. Frederick Trestrail, who was for many years the secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society, and who, in this year of grace, 1886, survives him in vigorous old age. The scene of his was at Wells, in Somersetshire. There he established a Mechanics' Institute, or debating-room, as a counter attraction to the saloon. It was while residing in Wells that Mr. Mursell formed the acquaintance of the illustrious Robert Hall, whose matchless eloquence and lofty attributes exercised a marked influence upon his mind and methods. Mr. Hall had been preaching for Mursell, and the next day they visited the cathedral (see Illustration No. 2), in which Mursell was much interested.

Mursell's fame as a preacher soon spread among the churches of the Baptist denomination. The pastorate of a church in Birmingham was offered him, and shortly afterward came an invitation to succeed his friend, Robert Hall, who had just resigned his charge at Leicester. Mr. Mursell accepted the latter, and in 1826 commenced his pastorate of which was a source of good to the town. Mr. Mursell's preaching attracted a large congregation to the church, and among those who came were the advanced politicians who are always to be found in that manufacturing town. Mr. Mursell had, while at Wells, taken a deep interest in the social condition of the people, and the class of men by whom he was now surrounded in Leicester tended to deepen that interest and give it a political direction. At that time there was abundant reason for agitation. The poor suffered terrible wrongs, and were in a state of squalid misery. Mr. Mursell soon became known as a champion of their cause, and was one of the most earnest among the leaders of the movement for obtaining for them representation in Parliament. It was a difficult and delicate position for a minister of the Gospel to occupy, and Mr. Mursell after a few years made the discovery for himself.

AS A POLITICAL AGITATOR

he was associated with other men who were working for the same object, but who were unrestrained by Christian principle. In the struggle against aristocratic oppression and the selfish exclusiveness of the rich, who had a monopoly of political power, every one who could lend a hand on the side of the weak was a welcome ally; but Mr. Mursell was pained when he heard those with whom he was working uttering language of which he could not approve, and breathing threats of violence. For a time he remained with the agitators, hoping that his influence as one of the leaders would restrain them from violent and suicidal measures. When, however, Thomas Cooper, then an infidel and a Chartist, took the lead, Mursell retired, and identified himself with Henry Vincent and the moderates who agreed with the advanced section as to the necessity of reform, but disagreed with them as to the measures to be taken for gaining the end.

In 1843 Mursell presided at a public meeting called to advocate constitutional agitation and to denounce the lawless proceedings of Cooper and his friends, who were disgracing the movement by their violent and seditious proceedings. Vincent was to be the orator of the evening, but Cooper's followers packed the hall and refused to let him speak. Mursell declared that he would wait there all night, if necessary, for Vincent to obtain a hearing, and he did wait until midnight with the orator at his side. But as time passed and the audience became more violent, and every time that Vincent rose the clamor increased, the attempt was abandoned. Near the close of the meeting stones were thrown, and one of them smashed the glass containing water on the chairman's table. Mursell picked up the stone, and holding it up before the meeting (see Illustration No. 3), he said: "Gentlemen, it is not with missiles such as this that you will break the forehead of the Philistine, but the Goliath of your wrongs will fall before the stones from the brook which flows between the banks of sympathy and order."

Those were troublous times, and Mr. Mursell's mental distress was extreme as he saw the agitation he had helped to stimulate running into violent courses. There is a spot on the outskirts of Leicester still known as "Mursell's Walk," which was his retreat in those days. Too restless to remain in-doors, and too agitated to talk to callers, he would walk out to a sheltered, grass-covered place where was a rustic seat. He would sit there immersed in thought until his agitation made quiescence impossible; then he would start up and pace to and fro (see Illustration No. 4) as he meditated on the wrongs which were driving the sufferers to greater wrong.

AS A PASTOR

he was faithful and untiring in his labors. His sermons were carefully prepared, and were so simple that the most illiterate could understand them, and the most cultured admire them as models of Saxon purity, while to all the Gospel was presented with vigor and force. Out of his pulpit he was indefatigable in visiting his people. He was adviser-general to his flock, listening to their stories of trial and difficulty, and ever encouraging them to resist temptation and abstain from retaliation on those who wronged them. Wherever he heard of a case of sickness or death he knew no rest until he had been to the troubled family to point them to the great Source of consolation. On one occasion a friend who sought him on important business at his house, hearing that he had gone to call on a poor woman in distress who earned her livelihood by laundry work, followed him there, and found him in the wash-house on his knees at prayer (see Illustration No. 5).

The simplicity and tenderness of his character were manifested in his love for children. There was not a child in the families of his people that he did not know by name and who did not regard him as a friend. Nothing delighted him so much as on summer afternoons to meet the children as they came out of school, and after a preliminary visit to a candy-store, carry a number of them off to the fields to play and romp with them for an hour, entering into their sports and pleasures with all the enthusiasm of a boy. (See Illustration No. 6.)

DEATH.

In 1872, after having served the Leicester church for forty-six years, and being at that time seventy-three years of age, he intimated his wish to retire. The church, however, would not hear of losing him, and engaged another clergyman to assist him in the pastorate. Mr. Mursell continued to preach once every Sunday and to attend to other pastoral duties for three years afterward, but in 1875 he felt it his duty to seek absolute retirement. The step was precipitated by the loss of his eldest son, a preacher of great promise, who was suddenly cut off in the midst of his usefulness. Shortly afterward an attack of paralysis incapacitated him for a time for work of all kinds, and from this he only partially recovered. He lived until last year, maintaining his cheerfulness and kindness to the last.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

An Old Blasphemer's Testimony.—At a recent Gospel meeting a man said: "I well remember the first moment I entered the service of Christ. One night in a meeting my conscience was roused to a sense of my sin. I tried to smother the thoughts that worried me so much, but do what I would I could not drown the voice of conscience; and one day on the street I asked myself: 'What shall I do? I cannot bear this any longer.' Then I seemed to hear the reply: 'Give yourself to Christ.' Then Satan suggested all manner of impossibilities to me. I was a fearful swearer, and he told me that I never could give up that habit. But at that moment I got power to throw all these difficulties aside and accept Christ where I stood. Since then I have had a hard fight with Satan, but God has always given me the power to conquer sin, which He will also give to all who will trust Him."

Rubbing a Man with Snow.—Signor Cushi, speaking at a meeting recently, remarked: "When some of our Italian workmen, in order to find employment, require to cross the Alps, they generally do so in small companies of four or five, and it often happens that one or two, being weaker than their companions, and the cold having consequently more effect on them, will say, 'I am very sleepy, drowsy! give me five minutes' sleep—just five minutes, and then I will be quite refreshed and able to proceed all right.' But their companions know better; they know if they went to sleep for five minutes they would go to sleep forever; so they take off their hats, and, filling them with snow, rub the man until the blood is once more in full circulation, his pulse going all right, and all sense of weariness gone. Now this rubbing restores the man rubbed, and strengthens him; but it also warms and gives new life to the rubber, and many a man crossing the Alps owes his life to the fact that he so energetically assisted in the restoring of his friend. As in the natural life so in the Christian life, the helping of our neighbors is often the helping of ourselves."

Convinced by One's Own Words.—Mr. Smart said that "one night he attended a Gospel meeting where he heard the following testimony: 'Fourteen years ago I was a highly moral young man, and was looked upon by my friends as an exemplary fellow. But only quite recently I found that that was not all that was needed. I was asked by the superintendent of a Sunday-school to take a class. I consented, but was far from realizing the fearful responsibility I had in those young souls intrusted to my care. I was a conscientious teacher, but I had no enthusiasm for the glorious work I had undertaken. I did my duty by my class as far as I knew. One Sunday I spoke to the children of Christ's Divine compassion for our lost and miserable state, of His blameless childhood, of His glorious manhood, and then of His cruel death and suffering that we might live. I concluded with an urgent appeal to the children to make no delay, but come to Jesus while yet the gate of mercy stood open. The lesson which I had prepared for my class came home to myself. Here I was suddenly startled by the thought, Had I yet gone to Jesus myself? No, I never had. I was deeply convicted of sin, and I threw all my good deeds aside and went to Jesus, simply trusting in His promise, and accepted Him as my own Saviour.'"

The Devil and his Crows.—Mr. Lakin said: "I have a farm under the Marquis of Anglesea, and it is bounded on the one side by a thick wood, in the trees of which many crows and other birds have made their nests. It is just about this time that my wagoner, who looks after my farm, sows a large sixteen-acre field that is adjacent to this rookery; and I have always to say to him, 'Now, John, you must put an extra shake of seed there, for you know, no matter how much or how little seed we sow, the rooks are sure to get a good share of it.' To save as much seed as possible from going to our good friends, the rooks, a man follows the sower and harrows the ground, first up and down, then across, and even after that the ground is rolled with a heavy iron roller, that the seed may be buried and not so easily got at. As soon as our backs are turned, however, the field becomes perfectly black with the crows in search of the seed; and, no matter with what care the ground has been harrowed and rolled, they always eat some, and of that I get no good—it does not help to pay the rent and taxes. Now, the Word of God shows that, just as the crows come to take away the seed sown on a farmer's land, so the devil and all his black crows from hell come to the hearts of those in whom the Word of God has been sown, and steal away the word, and then you get no good from it."

A Prodigal Daughter's Return.—Mr. G. Clarke remarked: "I heard of a young girl who left her home and wandered, like the prodigal, into the far country. A lady in Edinburgh came across her, and spoke to her of the life that she was leading. She put a bold face on it, and looked in a defiant way as the lady spoke to her, although down deep in her heart she was very miserable and wretched. The lady began to speak to her of her mother, and at the mention of the dear name tears started to the girl's eyes, and the lady asked her if she would not like to go back to that mother whom she had grieved so much. 'Ah! you do not know my mother,' she replied, 'she was such a good woman; she would never take me back.' 'I am sure she would gladly take you back,' replied the lady. 'Oh, could I again rest my head on mother's shoulder and get one kiss from her once more, I would like to go back, God knows I would,' sighed the poor girl. The lady at once sent off a telegram to her mother asking if she would take back her daughter, and an answer came at once, 'Send her immediately.' The girl was sent back to her home, and the mother, made worn and gray through the conduct of her daughter, was waiting with breathless anxiety for the arrival of her child, and when she did appear she was clasped tightly in her mother's arms. 'Let the wicked forsake his way and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord and He will have mercy upon him'" (Isa. 55: 7).

An Aged Man's Visions of Long Ago.—A home missionary observed: "One bright spring day, after the worshippers had dispersed, an old man knelt in the great cathedral, and called up the visions of days long past. He himself sung there the words he had just heard: 'O rest in the Lord, wait patiently for Him, and He shall give thee thy heart's desire.' He thought of what had been his heart's desire at different periods of a long life. As a youth his first heart's desire was to be a great musician. To attain this he deemed no toil too hard if it but led him to such an end. Another picture rose before the old man's mind. Ten years had passed. With a smile, half scornful, the youth remembered his boyhood's aspirations. He knew better than to desire such a thing now. His heart's desire was now to attain to power and renown. Time passed; fifteen years had slipped away. With a sigh he recalled his former longings. He had not obtained them, nor did he now regret them. No; that desire, too, had been a mistake. He felt that he was alone in the world, and longed for some one to fill up the void in his life. Yes, that might well be his heart's desire. A pure, true love that might enter into his joys and sympathize with his griefs. Again, twenty years passed. And that last dream, that too was vain. Yet he seemed to perceive that the boon might have been withheld from him in mercy. Then, thought he, 'What I most need is true wisdom.' So the old man prayed, 'Gracious Master, Thou hast been showing how vain were my heart's desires. Be Thou my heart's desire.' This desire was fulfilled. For when the vergers came round to close the gates of the cathedral that night the silvery head was still bowed, but the soul had winged its flight to God."

THE THREE CROSSES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Nov. 14, 1886.

"And when they were come to the place, which is called Calvary, there they crucified Him, and the malefactors, one on the right hand and the other on the left."—LUKE 23 : 33.

The Crowd at the Execution—The Fruit on the Crosses—I. The Right-Hand Cross—The Victim Malignant—A Type of Modern Unbelief—Voltaire's Death—A Plunge into Darkness—A Cross on which Thousands have Perished—II. The Cross on the Left—Aloes Grow on It—A Repenting Cross—The Victim's Appeal—The Mightiest Felony of the Universe—The Cavern of the Heart—A Believing Cross—A Pardoning Cross—III. The Middle Cross—A Suffering Cross—A Vicarious Cross—A Swiss Patriot's Death—Trophies for Jesus.

JUST outside of Jerusalem is a swell of ground, toward which a crowd are ascending; for it is the day of execution. What a mighty assemblage! Some for curiosity to hear what the malefactors will say, and to see how they will act. The three persons to be executed are already there. Some of the spectators are vile of lip and bloated of cheek. Some look up with revenge, hardly able to keep their hands off the sufferers. Some tear their own hair in a frenzy of grief. Some stand in silent horror. Some break out into uncontrollable weeping. Some slap their hands in delight that the offenders are to be punished at last. The soldiers with drawn swords drive back the mob, which presses on so hard. There is fear that the proceedings may be interrupted. Let the German Legion, now stationed at Jerusalem, on horseback dash along the line, and force back the surging multitude. "Back with you," is the cry. "Have you never seen a man die before?"

Three crosses in a row. An upright piece, and two transverse pieces—one on the top, on which the hands are nailed, and one at the middle, on which the victim sat. Three trees just planted, yet bearing fruit—the one at the right bearing poison, and the one at the left bitter aloes; the one in the middle, apples of love. Norway pine, and tropical orange, and Lebanon cedar would not make so strange a grove as this orchard of Calvary. Stand and give a look at the three crosses.

I. Just look at

THE CROSS ON THE RIGHT.

Its victim dies scoffing. More tremendous than his physical anguish is his scorn and hatred of Him on the middle cross. This one on the right turns half around on the spikes to hiss at the One in the middle. If the scoffer could get one hand loose, and He were within reach, he would smite the middle sufferer in the face. He hates Him with a perfect hatred. I think he wishes he were down on the ground, that he might spear Him. He envies the mechanics who, with their nails, have nailed him fast. Amid the settling darkness, and louder than the crash of the rocks, hear him jeer out these words: "Ah! ah! you poor wretch, I knew you were an impostor! You pretended to be a God, and yet you let these legions master you." It was in some such hate that because he thought he saw Christ in his bedroom, got up on his elbow, and cried out: "Crush that wretch!" What had the middle cross done to arouse up this right-hand cross? Nothing. Oh, the enmity of the natural heart against Christ! The world likes a sentimental Christ, or a philanthropic Christ, but a Christ who comes to snatch men away from their sins—away with Him! On this right-hand cross to-day, I see typified the unbelief of the world. Men say: "Back with Him from the heart, I will not let Him take my sins. If He will die, let Him die for Himself, not for me." There has always been a war between this right-hand cross and the middle cross, and wherever there is an unbelieving heart, thus the fight goes on. Oh, if, when that dying malefactor perished, the faithlessness of man had perished, then that tree which yields poison would have budded and blossomed with life for all the world!

Look up into that disturbed countenance of the sufferer, and see what a ghastly thing it is to reject Christ. Behold in that awful face, in that pitiful look, in that unblessed death hour, the stings of the sinner's departure. What

A PLUNGE INTO DARKNESS!

Standing high upon the cross on the top of the hill, so that all the world may look at him, he says: "Here I go out of a miserable life, into a wretched eternity!" One! Two! Three! Listen to the crash of the fall, all ye ages! So Hobbes, dying after he had seventy years in which to prepare for eternity, said: "Were I master of all the world, I would give it all to live one day longer." Sir Francis Newport, hovering over the brink, cried out: "Wretch that I am, whither shall I fly from this breast? What will become of me? Oh, that I were to lie upon the fire that never is quenched a thousand years, to purchase the favor of God and to be reconciled to Him again! O eternity! O eternity! Who can discover the abyss of eternity? Who can paraphrase upon these words: 'Forever and forever'?" That right-hand cross—in worse agonies. For what is physical pain compared to remorse, at the last, that life has been wasted, and only a fleeting moment stands between the soul and its everlasting overthrow? O God! let me die anywhere rather than at the foot of that right-hand cross. Let not one drop of that blood fall upon my cheek. Read not my ear with that cry. I see it now as never before—the loathsomeness and horror of my unbelief. That dying malefactor was not so much to blame as I. Christianity was not established, and perhaps not until that day had that man heard the Christ. But after Christ has stood almost nineteen centuries, working the wonders of His grace, you reject Him. That right-hand cross, with its long beam, overshadows all the earth. It is planted in the heart of the race. When will the time come when the Spirit of God shall, with its axe, hew down that right-hand cross, until it shall fall at the foot of that middle cross, and unbelief, the railing malefactor of the world, shall perish from all our hearts? Away from me, thou spirit of unbelief! I hate thee! With this sword of God I thrust thee back and thrust thee through. Down to hell; down, most accursed monster of the earth, and talk to the millions thou hast already damned! Talk no longer to these sons of God, these heirs of heaven.

THOUSANDS HAVE PERISHED ON IT,

THE VENOMOUS "IF."

"If Thou be the Son of God." Was there any "if" about it? Tell me, thou star, that in robe of light did run to point out His birthplace. Tell me, thou sea, that didst put thy hand over thy lip when He bid thee be still. Tell me, ye dead, who got up to see Him die. Tell me, thou sun in mid-heaven, who for Him didst pull down over thy face thy veil of darkness. Tell me, ye lepers who were cleansed, ye dead who were raised, is He the Son of God? Aye! aye! responds the universe. The flowers breathe it; the stars chime it; the redeemed celebrate it; the angels raise up on their thrones to announce it. And yet on that miserable malefactor's "if" how many shall be wrecked for all eternity! That little "if" has enough venom in its sting to cause the death of the soul. No "if" about it. I know it. Ecce Deus! I feel it thoroughly—through every muscle of the body, and through every faculty of my mind, and through every energy of my soul. Living, I will preach it; dying, I will pillow my head before its consolations—Jesus the God.

Away, then, from this right-hand cross. The red berries of the forest are apt to be poisonous, and around this tree of carnage grow the red, poisonous berries of which many have tasted and died. I can see no use for this right-hand cross, except it be used as a lever with which to upturn the unbelief of the world.

II. Here, from the right-hand cross, I go to the left. Pass clear to the other side. That victim also twists himself upon the nails to look at the centre cross—yet not to scoff. It is to worship. He, too, would like to get his hand loose; not to smite, but to deliver the sufferer of the middle cross. He cries to the railer cursing on the other side: "Silence! between us is innocence, is agony. We suffer for our crimes. Silence!" Gather around this left-hand cross, oh, ye people! be not afraid. Bitter herbs are sometimes a tonic for the body, and the bitter aloes that grow on this tree shall give strength and life to thy soul. This left-hand cross is

A REPENTING CROSS.

As men who have been nearly drowned tell us that in one moment, while they were under the water, their whole life passed before them, so I suppose in one moment the dying malefactor thought over all his past life: Of that night when he went into an unguarded door and took all the silver, the gold, the jewels, and as the sleeper stirred, he put a knife through his heart. Of that day when, in the lonely pass, he met the wayfarer, and regardless of the cries, and prayers, and tears, and struggles of his victim, he flung the mangled corpse into the dust of the highway or heaped upon it the stones. He says: "Oh, I am a guilty wretch; I deserve this! There is no need of my cursing. That will not stop the pain. There is no need of blaspheming Christ, for He has done me no wrong; and yet I cannot die so. The tortures of my body are outdone by the tortures of my soul. The past is a scene of misdoing. The present a crucifixion. The future an everlasting undoing. Come back, thou hiding mid day sun! Kiss my cheek with one bright ray of comfort. What, no help from above—no help from beneath? Then I must turn to my companion in sorrow, the One on the middle cross. I have heard that He knows how to help a man when he is in trouble. I have heard that He can cure the wounded. I have heard that the sinner. Surely, in all His wanderings up and down the earth, He never saw one more in need of His forgiveness. Blessed One! I turn to Thee! Wilt Thou look for the moment away from Thy own pang to pity me? Lord, it is not to have my hands relieved or my feet taken from the torture. I can stand all this; but oh, my sins! my sins! my sins! they pierce me through and through. They tell me I must die forever. They will push me out into the darkness unless Thou wilt help me. I confess it all. Hear the cry of the dying thief: Lord, remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom. I ask no great things. I seek for no throne in heaven, no chariot to take me to the skies; but just think of me when this day's horrors have passed. Think of me a little—of me, the one now hanging at Thy side—when the shout of heavenly welcome takes Thee back into Thy glory. Thou wilt not forget me, wilt Thou? Lord, remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom. Only just remember me."

Likewise must we repent. You say: "I have stolen nothing." I reply: "We have all been guilty of

of the universe, for we have robbed God—robbed Him of our time, robbed Him of our talent, robbed Him of our services. Suppose you send a man West as an agent of your firm, and every month you pay him his salary, and at the end of ten years you find out that he has been serving another firm, but taking your salary; would you not at once condemn him as dishonest? God sent us into this world to serve Him. He has given us wages all the time. One half of us have been serving another master. When a man is convicted of treason, he is brought out; a regiment surround him, and the command is given: "Attention, company! Take aim! Fire!" And the man falls with a hundred bullets through his heart. There comes a time in a man's history when the Lord calls up the troop of his iniquities, and at God's command they pour into him a concentrated volley of torture."

You say: "I don't feel myself to be a sinner." That may be. Walk along by the cliffs, and you see sunlight and flowers at but take a torch and go in, and before you have gone far, you see the flashing eye of a wild beast, or hear the hiss of a serpent. So the world seems in the sunlight of worldliness; but as I wave the torch of God's truth, and go down into the deep cavern of the heart—alas! for the bristling horrors and the rattling fangs. Have you ever noticed the climax in this passage of Scripture: "The heart is deceitful." That seems enough. But the passage goes on and says: "The heart is deceitful above all things." Will you not say that is enough? But the passage goes on further and says: "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." If we could see the true condition of the unpardoned before God, what wringing of hands there would be! What a thousand-voiced shriek of supplication and despair! But you are a sinner, a sinner. I speak not to the person who sits next to you, but to you. You are a sinner. All the transgressions of a lifetime have been gathered up into an avalanche. At any moment it may slip from the cliffs and crush you forever. May the Lord Almighty, by His grace, help us to repent of our sins while repentance is possible.

There was no guess-work in that prayer; no "if" in that supplication. The left-hand cross flung itself at the foot of the middle cross, expecting mercy. Faith is only just opening the hand to take what Christ offers us. The work is all done, the bridge is built strong enough for us all to walk over. Tap not at the door of God's mercy with the tip of your fingers, but as a warrior with gauntleted fists beats at the castle gate, so, with all the aroused energies of our souls, let us pound at the gate of heaven. That gate is locked. You go to it with a bunch of keys. You try philosophy. That will not open it. A large door generally has a ponderous key. I take the cross and place the foot of it in the lock, and by the two arms of the cross I turn the lock, and the door opens.

The crosses were only two or three yards apart. It did not take long for Christ to hear. Christ might have turned away and said: "How darest thou speak to Me? I am the Lord of heaven and earth. I have seen your violence. When you struck down that man in the darkness, I saw you. You are getting a just reward. Die in darkness—die forever." But Jesus said not so, but rather: "This day thou shalt be with Me in Paradise;" as much as to say: "I see you there; don't worry. I will not only bear My cross, but help you with yours."

Forthwith the left-hand cross becomes the abode of contentment. The pillow of the malefactor, soaked in blood, becomes like the crimson upholstery of a king's couch. When the body became still, and the surgeons feeling the pulse said one to another: "He is dead," the last mark of pain had gone from his face. Peace had smoothed his forehead. Peace closed his eyes. Peace closed his lips. Now you see why there were two transverse pieces on the cross, for it has become a ladder into the skies. That dying head is easy which has under it the promise: "This day thou shalt be with Me in Paradise." Ye whose lips have been filled with blasphemy, ye whose hands for many years have wrought unrighteousness, ye who have companioned with the unclean, ye who have scaled every height of transgression, and lathomed every depth, and passed every extreme of iniquity—mercy! mercy!

"The dying thief rejoiced to see

That fountain in his day;

And there may I, though vile as he,

Wash all my sins away."

III. I have shown you the right-hand cross and the left-hand cross; now come to

THE MIDDLE CROSS.

We stood at the one, and found it yielded poison. We stood at the other, and found it yielded bitter aloes. Come now to the middle cross, and shake down apples of love. Uncover your head. You never saw so tender a scene as this. You may have seen father, or mother, or companion, or child die, but never so affecting a scene as this. The railing thief looked from one way, and saw only the right side of Christ's face. The penitent thief looked from the other way, and saw the left side of Christ's face. But from where you sit to-day, in the full blaze of Gospel light, you see Christ's full face. It was

A SUFFERING CROSS.

If the weapons of torture had gone only through the fatty portions of the body, the torture would not have been so great, but they went through the hands, and feet, and temples; the most sensitive portions. It was not only the spear that went into His side, but the sins of all the race—a thousand spears—plunge after plunge, deeper and deeper, until the silence and composure that before characterized Him gave way into a groan, through which rumbled the sorrows of time and the woes of eternity. Human hate had done its worst, and hell had hurled its sharpest javelin, and devils had vented their hottest rage, when, with every nerve of His body in torture, and every fibre of his heart in excruciation, He cried out: "My God, My God! why hast Thou forsaken Me?" It was —the right-hand cross suffered for itself, the left-hand cross for itself; but the middle cross for you. When a king was dying a young man cried: "Pour my blood into his veins, that he die not." The veins of the young man were tapped, and the blood transferred; so that the king lived, but the young man died. Christ saw the race perishing. He cried: "Pour My blood into their veins, that they die not." My hand is free now, because Christ's was crushed. My brow is painless now, because Christ's was torn. My soul escapes, because Christ's was bound. I gain heaven, because Christ for me endured the horrors of hell.

A VICARIOUS CROSS

When the Swiss were many years ago contending against their enemies, they saw these enemies arrayed in solid phalanx, and knew not how to break their ranks; but one of their heroes rushed out in front of his regiment and shouted: "Make way for liberty." The weapons of the enemy were plunged into his heart, but while they were slaying him, of course their ranks were broken, and through that gap in the ranks the Swiss marched to victory. Christ saw all the powers of darkness assailing men. He cried out: "Make way for the redemption of the world." All the weapons of infernal wrath struck Him, but as they struck Him our race marched out free.

To this middle cross, my dying hearers, look, that your souls may live. I showed you the right-hand cross in order that you might see what an awful thing it is to be unbelieving. I showed you the left-hand cross that you might see what it is to repent. Now I show you the middle cross that you may see to save your soul. Poets have sung its praise, and sculptors have attempted to commemorate it in marble, and martyrs have clung to it in the fire, and Christians dying quietly in their beds have leaned their heads against it. This hour may all our souls embrace it with an ecstasy of affection. Lay hold of that cross, sinner! Everything else will fail you. Without a strong grip on that you perish. Put your hand on that and you are safe, though a world swing from beneath your feet.

Oh, that I might engrave on your souls ineffaceably the three crosses, and that if in your waking moments you will not heed, then that in your dream this coming night, you might see on the hill back of Jerusalem the three spectacles —the right-hand cross showing unbelief, dying without Christ; the left hand, showing what it is to be pardoned, while the central cross pours upon your soul the sunburst of heaven as it says: "By all these wounds I plead for thy heart. I have loved thee with an everlasting love. Rivers cannot quench it. Floods cannot drown it." And while you look, the right-hand cross will fade out of sight, and then the left will be gone; nothing will remain but the middle cross, and even that in your dream will begin to change, until it becomes a throne; and the worn face of Calvary will become radiant with gladness; and instead of the mad mob at the foot of the cross will be a multitude kneeling. And you and I will be among them.

But no! we will not wait for such a dream. In this our most aroused mood we throw down sin, sorrow, life, death, everything. We are slaves; Christ gives deliverance to the captive. We are thirsty; Christ is the river of salvation to slake our thirst. We are hungry; Jesus says: "I am the bread of life." We are condemned to die; Christ says: "Save that man from going down to the pit; I am the ransom." We are tossed on a sea of trouble; Jesus comes over it, saying: "It is I, be not afraid." We are in darkness; Jesus says: "I am the bright and morning star." We are sick; Jesus is the "balm of Gilead." We are dead; hear the shrouds rend and the grave hillocks heave, as He cries: "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." We want justification: "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." We want to exercise faith: "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." I want to get from under condemnation: "There is now, therefore, no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus." The cross—He carried it. The flames of hell—He suffered them. The shame—He endured it. The crown—He won it. Heights of heaven sing it, and worlds of light to worlds of light all round the heavens cry: "Glory! Glory!" Let us go forth and gather the

AT THE FOOT OF THAT MIDDLE CROSS

TROPHIES FOR JESUS.

From Golconda mines we gather the diamonds, from Ceylon banks we gather the pearls, from all lands and kingdoms we gather precious stones, and we bring the glittering burdens and put them down at the feet of Jesus and say: "All these are thine. Thou art worthy." We go forth again for more trophies, and into one sheaf we gather all the sceptres of the Cæsars, and the Alexanders, and the Czars, and the Sultans, and of all royalties and dominions, and then we bring the sheaf of sceptres and put it down at the feet of Jesus and say: "Thou art King of kings, and these Thou hast conquered." And then we go forth again to gather more trophies, and we bid the redeemed of ages, the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty, to come. And the hosts of heaven bring crown, and palm, and sceptre, and here by these bleeding feet and this riven side, and by this wounded heart, cry: "Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power unto the Lamb, forever and ever."

The President's Thanksgiving Proclamation was issued last week. In designating Thursday, November 25th, as Thanksgiving Day, the President says: "On that day let all our people forego their accustomed employments, and assemble in their usual places of worship, to give thanks to the Ruler of the Universe for our continued enjoyment of the blessings of a free Government, for a renewal of business prosperity throughout our land, for the return which has rewarded the labor of those who till the soil, and for our progress as a people in all that makes a nation great. And while we contemplate the infinite power of God in earthquake, blood, and storm, let the grateful hearts of those who have been shielded from harm through His mercy be turned in sympathy and kindness toward those who have suffered through His visitations."

A BLASPHEMER'S INTERRUPTED PRAYER.

THE following incident is sent to us by a subscriber, who states that the facts are strictly true as described, and are vouched for by a relative of the youth who, to spare the feelings of the family, is here styled "James Jackson":

James Jackson, a youth of more than ordinary intelligence, returned after graduation to his father's home in Lincoln to spend the summer. While there he attended a series of special services, professed religion, and united with the church. Soon afterward he left home to commence the study of medicine. While attending lectures in a distant city he formed the acquaintance of some sceptical young men and imbibed their opinions, soon becoming an avowed unbeliever.

He returned to his father's home, where his change of principles occasioned much distress. While he had been absent, a Young Men's Christian Association had been organized in the town, and one of its members, meeting Jackson shortly after his return, and not knowing that he had abjured religion, invited him to a prayer-meeting there. Jackson in a scoffing mood agreed to go providing he might be allowed to pray. That was promised, and Jackson attended the meeting and was invited to pray. Kneeling down, he took from his pocket a paper and read: "O Thou unknown and unknowable God"—there was a pause. The meeting waited in silence for a time, and then one went to the young man, who was still kneeling, and found him unconscious. Medical assistance was summoned, but it was of no avail. Jackson was dead. The medical certificate mentioned heart disease as the cause of death. Whether it was really heart disease, or whether it was that disease of the heart which Satan plants there that occasioned the death, it was an awful thing to go into the presence of Him whom he had just addressed in contempt of His revelation as "the Unknown and Unknowable God."

AN ISRAELITISH ROMANCE.

IN a notice of a meeting held in Calcutta recently, the Indian Witness refers to a remarkable community of Jews living in Bombay. Mr. Justice Scott, who presided at the meeting, said that the story of the devoted little band of the children of Israel who, sixteen hundred years ago, preferred the faith of Jehovah to all things, and left home and friends and all their past behind them for the sake of their religion, is a grand story. They were, he continued, shipwrecked off Bombay, only seven men and seven women surviving, and their long struggle for existence through the dark centuries of Hindoo and Mohammedan rule, the retention among idolatrous millions of their grand, pure faith in Jehovah as the one and only God, and their survival to the present day with their monotheistic faith intact, and a prosperity of some thousands of souls, is one of the romances of history which is not as well known to the world as it deserves to be.

They are at present, as a rule, a well-to-do race, and they have increased in the Presidency considerably in the last ten or twelve years. The total number of Jews, nearly all of whom are Beni-Israels, was 5929 in 1871, and in 1881, 7952. In the Kolaba district alone there are considerably more than two thousand of them, belonging to two classes, the white or gore, and the black or kale. The white are supposed to be the descendants of the original immigrants, the seven men and seven women, and the black of converts. The customs of the two sections are identical; they eat and drink together, but do not intermarry. The men have a great reputation as artisans, and as soldiers are well known for their discipline and bravery. Here again, as elsewhere, there are no beggars in the community. They are chiefly soldiers, husbandmen, and oilmen, but some of them are schoolmasters, hospital assistants, shopkeepers, and cart-drivers.

They worship one God and use no images. In their synagogues they have manuscript copies of the Old Testament which they regard as of divine authority. They kiss a wooden box as they enter, and in a cupboard-like frame, which they call the ark, they keep the manuscripts of the laws of Moses written on pieces of parchment. They are vigorous and hard-working, and, though somewhat addicted to strong liquors, they are, as a rule, comfortably off. Dr. Wilson, who almost discovered their existence in Bombay, took a great interest in the Beni-Israels, and is said to have done much to assist them to a proper comprehension of the faith of their forefathers.

A TESTIMONY.

IN a letter addressed to the editor of this journal, Mrs. Nora Lankford, of Mayview, Mo., says: "In reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some time ago I noticed an account of a lady who had a wonderful cure effected through faith. I prayed that I might have such faith. I think my prayer has been answered. I believe through the mercies of the Lord alone I have been relieved of one of the worst of maladies—the asthma—and I think it but a poor return to acknowledge it."

THE GOSPEL IN THE TORTURE-ROOM.

IN the course of conversation with the Rev. W. C. Van Meter, who is now on a visit to this country in a brief interval of his mission work in Italy, he informed us that he has been enabled to print a large number of copies of the Gospel according to John in Italian for use in the Sunday-schools of Rome. The children there are following the International Course, the subjects of which just now are in that Gospel. A singular coincidence, which shows the changes which God has worked, is that the Gospel was actually printed in the room formerly used as the torture-chamber of the Inquisition. The printer who had undertaken the work was obliged to leave his former business premises and, looking around for a new location, selected rooms in an ancient edifice that appeared suitable. There he set up his presses and compositors' cases. A strange-looking iron ring in the ceiling arrested his attention, and on making inquiries about it he learned that he was actually in the old Inquisition, and that the room he occupied had served as a torture-chamber. There, within the walls that have resounded with the cries of men and women suffering for conscience' sake, he set up and printed the Gospel of John.

AN AWAKENING IN SYRIA.

AT a meeting of the American missionaries in Syria, a report of which is published in the Foreign Missionary, it was announced that welcome signs of a change of attitude toward Christianity is noted in the Druses of Mount Lebanon. "There is now a desire," says one of the missionaries, "for education, a turning toward the American missionaries with cordial feelings and friendly advances, earnest commendation of our work, and appeals for help in the education of their children. Some few Druse young men who have been educated by us, and until recently were maligned and persecuted by their sect for their Protestantism, are now accepted and honored by the whole Druse sect as young leaders among them, while their loyalty to our religious teachings is not regarded as a barrier to their influence and position in the Druse nation."

"It looks like a deliberate sinking of the religious test, while they are pushing for a national advance. Hitherto no compromise has been tolerated. A Druse who left his religion was no longer a Druse in his nationality. Now the point seems to be yielded that a change of religion does not necessarily involve a change of political and social ties. This may seem a minor concession to one trained in the school of religious liberty, but it is not so in the eyes of the Druses. It is a most significant advance in the direction of enlightenment and liberty, and indicates a profound conviction that their past course is a mistake, and that hope and prosperity for them as a people are to be found in adopting the principles and following the lead of the Protestant missionaries.

"We commissioned one of our stations (Abeih) to give special attention to this matter, and meet their friendly overtures with all needed courtesy and cordiality. There was also an appeal from a large number of influential Druses to open a boys' boarding-school."

THE MILLENNIAL ERA.

By Rev. A. C. Tris.*

The Pacific Ocean of the Millennium—The New Jerusalem a Millennial City—Christ as the Second Adam—The Focal Nation—The Time of the New Heavens—Christ to Reign in the City—Kings to Enter it—The Coming of the Nations.

WHEN Vasco Nunez De Balboa, in 1513, stood on the mountain-land of the narrow neck of the Isthmus of Panama, he saw spread before him the boisterous Atlantic on the one hand, and for the first time the quiet Pacific on the other. It was a joyful and magnificent sight for the Spanish discoverer, and very little did he surmise that more than three centuries would elapse before that grand Pacific would be thoroughly examined and be known in its physical condition. To-day, we stand on another neck of mountain-land; we also have experienced the boisterous voyage on the Atlantic Ocean of the present dispensation, and are looking "with earnest expectation" (Rom. 8: 19) for the coming of the Pacific waves of the Millennium period; and, indeed, how very little do we as yet know of the depths and deep caverns "of the wisdom and knowledge of God" (Rom. 11: 33).

Depending on the help of the Holy Spirit, and acknowledging our own short-sightedness, we desire for the last time to contemplate the following

QUESTION:

Will the New Jerusalem descend in the Millennium on this earth, or, will it descend at a later period—the time of the end—"when Christ shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even to the Father"? (1 Cor. 15: 24).

After carefully weighing the arguments pro and con concerning this interesting question, we have come to the conclusion that the New Jerusalem will belong especially to the period called the millennial reign of Christ, and we adduce the following reasons for our conclusion:

CHRIST THE SECOND ADAM.

It is an undeniable fact that the Book of the Revelation is the centre and the echo, and also the end of all that has been spoken in time past by the fathers and by the prophets and apostles. It is, as it were, a point of concentration in which ends the history of a race commenced with the first Adam, whose prerogative it was to represent Elohim and to reign on the earth. Adam's greatest Son (Luke 3: 38; Ps. 8: 5, 6) will, as the God-man (John 1: 14), bring out the great design, and prove for what end man was created with such great and noble powers of mind, and that he is capable of serving his Creator on earth (Acts 2: 18), and that it is yet his prerogative "to reign with Christ, the Priest-King, upon His throne" (Zech. 6: 13). When the new song will be heard: "Thou hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign (as kings) on the earth" (Rev. 5: 10). In the reign of the Father: "The kingdom is delivered up" (1 Cor. 15: 24). The Lord of glory belongs, as a son of Adam, Abraham, and David, to the Adamic race, and as the Firstborn (Col. 1: 15; Heb. 1: 6) He has the primitive right to that dominion on earth (Ezek. 21: 27).

THE NATIONS.

It is another fact that the Book of the Revelation is pre-eminently Israelitish in all its visions and expressions. It has the tone of, and expresses the same ideas as are found in the proph-

* It is only fair to Mr. Tris that this article should be placed before our readers. In our issue of June 24th, we commented on an article from his pen advancing some reasons for the belief that the heavenly Jerusalem would be a city suspended in the air. The article now published is a reply to those comments with which, as will be seen, Mr. Tris does not agree.—Ed.

ecies, in the Psalms, and in the Song of Solomon. It speaks of the pre-eminence of Israel, and places the Gentile nations in the same position as the prophets have done. The nations will come to Jerusalem, which at that time will be called the throne of Jehovah (Jer. 3 : 17; Zech. 14 : 16; Isa. 66 : 22, 23). The nations and the kings of the earth come also in Rev. 21 : 24 (to the Jewish nation) to the holy or New Jerusalem. In the reign of the Father Israel as a nation will have not any pre-eminence more. At the very moment that Christ, the second Adam, "delivers up the kingdom to God, even the Father," the distinction of nations and their kings will have passed by; "all rule and all authority and power is put down" (I Cor. 15 : 24); and consequently the coming of nations and kings to the New Jerusalem must belong to the Messianic Millennial reign of Christ on earth.

THE NEW HEAVENS.

It is a fact that the Holy Scriptures only make mention in the following four places (Isa. 65 : 17; 66 : 22; II Peter 3 : 13; and in Rev. 21 : 1) "of the formation or creation of the new heavens and the new earth." It is without cavil that new heavens and a new earth belong, and must belong, to a new dispensation, and also that Isaiah speaks of an event which has the closest relation to the restoration of Israel in Canaan. The Apostles Peter and John, being by birth Israelites, must have had cognate ideas with the prophets of old, and speaking of the same fact could not have excluded their own nation and their glory (Luke 2 : 32); and, if so, the new heavens and the new earth must especially belong to the Millennial reign of Christ. The Spirit of Christ spoke the same and in the same manner by His apostles as He spoke by His prophets.

THE NEW JERUSALEM.

The Holy Scriptures speak of the New Jerusalem in Rev. 3 : 12; 21 : 2, 10, and make reference to it in Gal. 4 : 26; Heb. 12 : 22; Isa. 2 : 2; Zech. 14 : 16; and, as far as we can see, in connection with the Millennial era. In Rev. 21 : 9, 10 is said: "Come hither; I will show thee the bride, the Lamb's wife . . . and he showed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God." This statement of the angel corroborates the prophecy of Isa. 54 : 5 to Israel restored: "For thy Maker is thine Husband. . . . The God of the whole earth shall He be called." Jehovah declares Himself to Israel: "To be betrothed to Him," and also that the house of Jacob "At that day shall call Him Tshi"—that is, my husband—(Hos. 2 : 16, 19, 20). In Jer. 31 : 3 is spoken of "a love, an everlasting love," and therefore Christ calls the Jews "His own" (John 1 : 11). Christ has a bride out of the Gentiles, and a wife called the Lamb's wife; and in Rev. 19 : 7 is said: "Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor to Him; for the marriage of the Lamb is come and His wife hath made herself ready." All those texts bring us in close contact with: "Israel restored and the regeneration (in the new age, or being), when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of His glory, and the apostles also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. 19 : 28); and that the New Jerusalem of John is fully mentioned in the writings of the prophets of old is without any reasonable doubt. We read in Rev. 22 : 6: "These sayings are faithful and true. The Lord God of the holy prophets sent His angel to show unto His servants the things which must shortly be done."

The angel Gabriel sent from the throne of God has told us a truth for all the ages to come: "His name shall be Jesus . . . and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of his father David, and He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever (unto the ages), and of His kingdom there shall be no end" (Luke 1 : 32, 33). The king of Israel must rule in the city of David (II Sam. 5 : 7), and "the name of the city (Jerusalem) from that day shall be Jehovah-Shammah. The Lord is there" (Ezek. 48 : 35).

That there will be communication and intercourse between the nations and the New Jerusalem is stated in Rev. 21 : 24, and that it will be daily is without doubt: "The gates of it shall not be shut at all by day."

That this intercourse will be corporeal is plainly stated in Rev. 21 : 24, 25 and in Rev. 22 : 14. It is said that the nations and the kings of the earth not only will see the light of the New Jerusalem, but they shall enter its gates and walk on its "broad place," called street, and, being there, shall have an optical view of its wealth, and contemplate that "no temple is found therein" (Rev. 21 : 22, 23). They shall see the glory of God and be partakers of a light, joy, and glory as yet incomprehensible to us in this present dispensation of suffering.

The vision of Jacob (Gen. 28 : 13) cannot be a type of that great event to come (John 1 : 51). Jacob had only a divine intellectual sight, or vision of the triune Jehovah, and consequently not a corporeal intercourse and exercise, as is said, that nations and kings will experience. It must draw our close attention that the words: "Walk in the light of it" refer every Bible-reader to Ps. 89 : 15; Isa. 2 : 5; Isa. 60 : 1, 3, 19, 20; Zech. 14 : 16, 17.

Let us keep always before our minds that "nations" are bodies in the flesh. Gentile communities, as the word is used everywhere in the Old and New Testaments, in comparison with Israel; those nations and kings will have no distinction more in the reign of the Father, called "the end." Then "God shall be all in all," and consequently the communication spoken of above must belong to the period called in Zech. 14 : 16 "the feast of tabernacles."

(To be concluded next week.)

IN THE BATTLE-FIELD.

From a Sermon Preached at Toronto, by Rev. Sam Jones.

BRETHREN, in all the ages of this world sin was never more blatant, the powers of darkness never wore such an effrontery as to-day. The devil has mighty near got this country.

THE DEVIL'S GETTING IN HIS WORK every day in this town. And oh, my sister, if there is a being on earth that ought to fight the devil from year to year, it is you. The devil is trying to ruin your husband, to ruin your children. And I know if the devil ever puts his foot upon a woman once she never gets up any more. My good woman, do fight the devil with all your ransomed powers. When I fight the devil I feel that I am fighting in the interest of my precious mother and my precious daughters every stroke I make at the devil. I tell you it is not the ragged, dirty, scum sin of Toronto that is hurting it, but it is that is doing the death-work. Your boy abhors that ragged drunkard and that filthy, lost woman. But I tell you the gilded sin of this town influences and attracts your boy, and the guns of every Christian father and mother ought to be turned upon the gilded sin in the highest quarters of this city. You can't reform a city from the bottom upward. You have got to begin at the top and work down.

A harness-maker in our town walked up to a Baptist minister and said: "Whiskey is cursing our town, and you preachers are to blame for it. You preachers have got more influence in this town than anybody else. All the voters in this town go to your churches. If you will come out square on this issue you can vote whiskey out any day you want to." That preacher went to the Methodist preacher and the Presbyterian preacher and the Episcopal preacher and the colored preacher, and they all agreed: "Next Sunday we will turn our guns straight upon the bar-rooms," and in less than six months whiskey was run out of that town forever. I say every preacher in Toronto is to blame for every bar-room in this town until he has done his best to put it out.

We have got some preachers in America that love "the creature" themselves. God save us from a debauched ministry. God save us from the curse of being under the dominion of a ministry that is not delivered from this worst curse that ever blighted this world. There ain't enough money in Toronto to hire me to take a drink of whiskey, wine, brandy, lager beer, or anything else that a thousand gallons of it at once would make a fellow drunk. I know that these things are God's worst enemy and

THE DEVIL'S BEST FRIEND.

I was preaching in Baltimore, and I lammed in a few hard licks right along this line, and I put them to a vote, and two preachers didn't get up. I found out afterward those two preachers were taking a little wine for their often infirmities and for their stomachs' sake too. Brethren, the truth that we don't touch it at all is the proof that it is wrong, and let us fight it till we die. Speak out! Speak out! Courage! It takes more grit, and I speak from experience, to fight whiskey than to do anything else this side of perdition. I turned my guns loose on it in my own town. We had prohibition, but they were selling liquor clandestinely, and were causing trouble in our town, and I said to the liquor men: "I'll see every man of you go to the chain-gang, or I'll go there myself."

was placed under my buggy house and it was blown up. The next day on the street they were saying: "If he opens his mouth again we will put dynamite under his dwelling and blow his wife and children into eternity." That is like them. You may say what you like about bar-keepers being gentlemen, but if I wanted to muster an army of the lowest-down minions that ever disgraced the world I would beat the long roll in the bar-rooms of this country, and I could muster an army that the devil himself wouldn't let in hell unless they disorganized and came in one at a time. There was not enough dynamite put at Hell Gate out in the ocean there to blow my mouth shut. They may blow me into eternity, but I will die fighting, and denounce it till I'm dead. I will.

I went to my home and told my wife what they said. I saw my wife's color rise to her face. Her memory went back to thirteen years before, when and my home was desolate, and with a devotion born of her love she said: "Husband, speak out, speak out. If they blow us into eternity, I'd as soon go to heaven by the dynamite route as any other."

We have got one of these fellows in the penitentiary for ten years, and four more are in jail, so you see we are getting along. We are having some fun to-day, to say the least of it. When you see Toronto lay her hand on these bar-rooms, and say: "You shan't sell whiskey from Saturday night to Monday morning," she can lay her hand on them and wipe them out altogether.

TALK ABOUT HIGH LICENSE.

If you get a cur where you can cut its legs off, why don't you cut its head off and be done with it. Whenever your public officer signs a license, before God he puts the name of every voter to that license. If I was going to sell whiskey—I am not going to—I would come right here to this nicest town in the world and get these nice people to license me—Methodists and Baptists and so on. I would get their names to my license, and when I came to die I would say to my wife: "Put my license in the coffin with me," and, when the judgment day came, and I was accused of selling liquor, I would say: "I didn't know there was any harm in it. Here is my license, signed by the best people in Toronto." And God will put the whole shebang in hell together.

Liquor men don't understand me. They think my fight is against them. There is not a liquor man in Toronto I would not get down on my knees for and pray to God to give him as good a home in heaven as I would ask for my wife. Liquor men, I love you, but I am mad at whiskey.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President Appears More Desirous than do other prominent politicians that the more highly educated class of citizens should take an interest in politics. The leaders of his own party, equally with those of the Republican Party, have for many years spoken disparagingly of the men whom they have sneeringly described as "the silk-stocking element," and have represented them as unfit to guide the councils of the nation. President Cleveland, however, speaking at Harvard on November 8th, said: "Surely the splendid destiny which awaits a patriotic effort in behalf of our country will be sooner reached if the best of our thinkers and educated men shall deem it a solemn duty of citizenship to actively and practically engage in political affairs, and if the force and power of their thought and learning shall be, willingly or unwillingly, acknowledged in party management." The present condition of politics, we may add, is largely due to the fact that Christians have been deterred from taking a prominent part in political affairs by a very natural fear that their characters might be compromised by the doings of unscrupulous associates.

The Extraordinary Growth of the Prohibition Party was the most conspicuous feature of the recent elections. An estimate based partially on official figures was published in the Voice of last Thursday, which gives the total Prohibition vote cast in all the States on November 2d as 324,786. These figures, though not absolutely accurate, are given "in confidence that the official returns will show very slight changes in the figures." The vote cast for Mr. St. John in 1884 was 150,369; if, therefore, the number now estimated is near the truth, the vote has more than doubled in the two years. The gains are chiefly in the West and South. In Massachusetts there was a slight decrease. The largest increase was in Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Texas.

A Testimony in Favor of the Results of Civil service reform was published last week from an unexpected quarter. The second auditor, who has been noted as one of the most implacable opponents of the new system, in making his annual report to Secretary Manning, says: "I have had to recommend the removal of a number of clerks of the classified service, and have selected new men from among those certified for appointment under the civil service rules,

It is but just to say that the civil service appointees generally, appear to be men of intelligence and capacity, who will undoubtedly make excellent clerks as soon as they have acquired the technical knowledge and expertness which can be gained only by experience and practice. The clerks as a body are entitled to commendation for faithfulness and industry." The significance of this testimony will be understood by all who remember the gloomy predictions made respecting the character of the men who would be selected by the Civil Service Commission.

The Famous Telephone Suit has at the Out-set involved defeat for the Government. The United States Circuit Court at Cincinnati rendered a decision on Thursday last against the Government on every point raised. The decision was based on technical grounds, and the suit may therefore be renewed. The judges decided that they had no jurisdiction, as the Bell Telephone Company, whose patent the Government is trying to vacate, does business in Ohio by licensees and not by its agents. If the court is right the suit will have to be tried in Massachusetts. The decision arouses new antagonism to the Attorney-General, whose conduct of the case is now arraigned on legal as well as on moral grounds.

The Great Strike at Chicago Assumed a New phase last week through the action of Mr. Powderly, the chief of the Knights of Labor. It was hinted, soon after the strike commenced, that he was opposed to it, and would bring it to a speedy close. The local assembly appears to have managed the whole affair, and it is now stated that it assumed the responsibility of temporarily suppressing one of Mr. Powderly's orders. On Tuesday, November 9th, he directed the strikers to return to work, yet it was not until Saturday that the order was publicly known. Even then there was a disposition manifested to disobey. Both the Knights and those who do not belong to the order were averse to returning to work, but at the meetings held on Sunday a more tractable spirit was manifested, and hopes are entertained that the strike may be considered at an end. Fully twenty-five thousand men were out, and as the packers were filling their places at the rate of five hundred a day, every day rendered the difficulty more serious. Mr. Powderly's course is considered arbitrary and dictatorial, but there is reason to hope that eventually the men will not only obey it, but admit that it was right and wise.

The Speech Delivered by Lord Salisbury at the Lord Mayor's banquet on November 9th produced a marked sensation throughout Europe. It distinctly intimated that England was prepared to take her part in resisting Russian aggression in Bulgaria, and was an explicit condemnation of her past proceedings. The Premier said that Bulgaria's struggle for independence had aroused the sympathies of the English people, and that the language of diplomatic menace used toward Bulgaria by a European State had caused the deepest regret. A midnight conspiracy, led by men debauched by foreign gold, had hunted Prince Alexander from the throne of Bulgaria and outraged the conscience and sentiment of Europe. The injustice of this deed was aggravated by foreign diplomacy saving the conspirators, an act of interference which caused the most earnest reprobation throughout Europe. Bulgarian rights were assured by the Berlin Treaty, on which the salvation of Europe depended. English interest in that treaty was not an isolated interest. Other Powers also were interested in the vindication of the treaty. He was sure that if a majority of the signatory Powers recognized the fact that it was their duty to enforce the treaty England would not be found backward in co-operating with them. If England's individual interests only were affected England would ask no counsel and would seek no assistance, but would defend her interests with her own arm. But in this instance she would not accept the responsibility of isolated action. The Government's policy was shaped in harmony with that of Austria. He trusted that the peace would not be disturbed, and that, under the influence of public opinion, the infant liberties of Bulgaria would not be impaired. Austria, Italy, Turkey, and England form a majority of the Powers to which Lord Salisbury alluded, Russia, France, and Germany being the other three. As at the time of the Crimean War, it would be possible for peace to be assured if Germany took a decisive attitude.

The Menaces of France on the Question of the occupation of Egypt do not appear to have scared the British Cabinet. On this subject Lord Salisbury in the course of his speech explicitly stated the intention of the Government to continue to hold possession not only till its task was accomplished but until Egypt was safe from foreign interference. As no government but that of France proposes to interfere there could be no question as to whom the words were designed to inform. Lord Salisbury said: "The stay of the English in Egypt had been upheld by politicians of all parties as one of limited duration. That limit was not a time limit, but a limit of work, which England was bound to accomplish by pledges so distinct and so often repeated that she could not retreat. The English could not leave Egypt until that country was secure from foreign oppression, and until order had been restored in domestic affairs. The Government was encouraged in this task by growing proofs of advancing prosperity in Egypt. Her finances were more promising than they had ever been, although they had not reached a point that would enable the Government to declare its task fulfilled. Further, England could not leave Egypt until the latter's independence of foreign interference had been secured."

The Threatened Demonstration of London Socialists on the occasion of the Lord Mayor's procession on November 9th passed off peaceably. Preparations were made all along the route for a riot. Tradesmen closed their iron shutters where they had them, and boarded up their windows and barricaded their premises where they had not, and a large force of cavalry was collected to repress any disturbance there might be. The procession, however, passed without molestation. At some points the Lord Mayor was hooted, but the crowd, as a rule, was orderly and peaceable. The Socialists held a meeting after the procession had passed in Trafalgar Square, the scene of the former riot. Red flags in profusion were flourished, and Williams and others of the recognized leaders delivered speeches. The police did not interfere with the meeting, but promptly checked a few ugly rushes of men supposed to be contemplating raids on the stores. The day which had been expected with dread closed tranquilly.

The Bulgarian Throne was Formally Offered by the Sobranje, on November 10th, to Prince Waldemar, the youngest son of the King of Denmark. The choice was not made with enthusiasm, but with an apparent desire to conciliate Russia. The Prince is the brother of the Czarina, and it was supposed that the Czar would not in honor object to his own brother-in-law. As he is also the brother of the Princess of Wales and the King of Greece the choice was deemed one likely to be approved by all parties concerned, and it was also understood that at one time he was the Czar's own candidate for the throne. The Prince referred his decision to his father, the King of Denmark, who, in a courteous telegram, declined the offer on his son's behalf. There is little doubt that the refusal was prompted by Russia.

Rev. M. Baxter gave Three Second Advent discourses last Sunday in a church in Cleveland, Ohio, and during the preceding week in Oshawa and Toronto in Canada.

The Death of Professor A. A. Hodge, D.D., of Princeton, occurred on Thursday last. He occupied the Chair of Didactic and Polemic Theology in the Theological Seminary, but was widely known and much respected far beyond the college walls. He was over sixty-three years of age, having been born at Princeton on July 18th, 1823. He spent three years soon after his ordination as a missionary in India. After his return he devoted himself to ministerial labor for a few years, but in 1864 he accepted a professorship in the Western Theological Seminary of Allegheny City, Pa. He remained there until 1879, when he resigned to go to Princeton. Dr. Hodge's best-known literary works are "Outlines of Theology," "the Atonement," and "The Comment on the Confession of Faith"—all of which have had a large circulation.

The Chicago Avenue Church, better known as Mr. Moody's church, was almost entirely destroyed by fire on Friday last. The fire began in the basement, and had already reached the lecture-room when the flames were discovered. There was a prompt response from the fire department, but the seats and cushions in the church had by that time become ignited and filled the place with smoke and flame. Before the fire was got under, the interior of the building was consumed, and the beautiful stained-glass windows destroyed. It is stated that the loss will be largely covered by the insurance.

The Bowery Mission and Young Men's Home celebrated its sixth anniversary last week. Testimonies were given by men who have been saved through the influence of the mission. James Wilkie, the first case the mission ever had to deal with, and George H. Devine, now Superintendent of the Twenty-sixth Street Mission, told how they had been reclaimed and made useful and self-supporting members of society. The report for the year just closing shows that thirty thousand men attended the services, and that there had been two thousand inquirers. The mission is in the same building where Tom Hyer ran his gambling-house fifteen years ago. Services are held nightly, and a cheap lodging-house which is run in connection with the mission has proved a very efficient adjunct. Many men who desire to reform have no home in the city, and need to be removed from the reach of evil influences. The home provided for them by the mission is cleaner than others of the same type, and they appreciate its sanitary and moral advantages. The mission is undenominational, and it costs $2500 annually to maintain it.

The Congregational Conference at Hartford, Conn., on November 11th, made a formal response to the overtures for union emanating from the recent convention of the Protestant-Episcopal Church. After a lengthy debate the Conference acknowledged the fraternal resolutions of the Episcopal Convention, and declared that on three of the four principles of unity set forth in the Episcopal message as the basis for a common union of churches, the Congregational Church is now in substantial agreement, and that only a difference in the fourth, which it is hoped some way may be found to overcome, prevents a complete restoration of unity. The three principles upon which the Congregational Church now announces that it is in unity with the Episcopal are: The Holy Scripture as the revealed Word of God; the Nicene Creed as a sufficient statement of faith; sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper. The Congregational Church cannot agree with the Episcopal on the fourth principle, the doctrine of the historic Episcopate, though it does not despair of sufficient reconciliation on this point. This report and acknowledgment will be sent to the bishops of the Episcopal Church.

The Ownership of a Share in a Valuable Iron mine has been for a long time the subject of litigation in Michigan, and a decision has now been reached, which will be submitted for final review to the United States Supreme Court. It appears that some years ago the defendant in this suit located the Colby Iron Mine, which has now become enormously valuable. For his services then and in organizing a company to work it, he was guaranteed one third of the profits, but it is alleged that before receiving any part of the profits he sold half his interest to a money-lender for two hundred and fifty dollars down. When the richness of the mine was proved, the money-lender pressed for completion of the contract, but failed to obtain it. He is now dead, but his heirs have pressed the suit, and the United States Circuit Court in Detroit has given judgment in their favor. If the higher court does not reverse the decision the defendant will have the chagrin of knowing that he sold away many thousand dollars for a pitiful sum. Stupendous as was the folly of making such a bargain, it was wisdom compared with that displayed by thousands of men in every land, who, for the sake of present gain, barter their hope of eternal riches (Matt. 16: 26).

How to Get Rid of Punched Coins has been a question with many persons since business men have declined to receive them. It appears that a solution of a discreditable character has been found by some church-goers. A gentleman travelling a few days ago from Connecticut to New York met a friend who was carrying a bag, the contents of which jingled as he moved it. On inquiring what he was carrying, his friend said: "This bag contains punched, clipped, and abased coins, and I am going to New York to sell the lot for what they will fetch. Oh, no, I didn't take them in my business, but in another way, in which I couldn't refuse them! You see I am treasurer of our church, and these dimes and nickels and other coin were put from time to time in the contribution-box. When clipped and punched coin began to be refused, they began to make their appearance in our boxes when the collections were taken up. I suppose we have taken in a hundred dollars' worth of this coin at its face value." The practice is not confined to Connecticut. Treasurers of churches in other States make similar complaints, and some have actually found among the coin buttons the size and color, but not the value of quarter dollars. These contributions are made by persons who are morally and spiritually the descendants of men of whom Christ spoke in solemn warning (Matt. 6: 1).

A Man Who Lived Ten Months with a broken neck died at Norfolk, Va., on November 2d. Two eminent physicians who attended him, say that the case is without precedent in medical annals. On December 15th, 1885, the man, who was a machinist, fell while at his work a distance of about six feet, striking his neck against a railing. He was carried home in a semi-unconscious state, where he remained confined until the latter part of January, when he got up and returned to his work. He continued to work until last March, when he came home complaining of feeling unwell. This attack resulted in a partial paralysis, which continued up to his death two weeks ago. The post-mortem examination was conducted by Professor W. T. Councilman, Professor of the College of Physicians. It showed that the third cervical vertebra was fractured with an oblique triangular fracture. The marvel is that the man did not die on the spot; but he lived, because, though the bone was broken, it did not press on the spinal cord. During all the ten months that followed, a sharp turn of the head or sudden movement of the shoulders would have caused death at any moment. Probably the man did not realize how slight a thing would kill him, or he would have lived in constant apprehension, and, if a prudent man, in a state of readiness for the great change. No man can be sure that in his own case there is not as urgent a need of preparation. Ordinary diseases often make insidious progress of which the subject is unconscious, and men live carelessly, unaware that they have the sentence of death in themselves (II Cor. 1: 9, 10).

A Domestic Strike, in Consequence of One word, is reported by the Boston Herald, as having occurred in an aristocratic mansion of that city. It says: "A resident in one of the finest streets in town alluded, incidentally, at dinner the other night to her 'servants,' and was overwhelmed the next day to receive warning from the whole crowd! What did it mean? Weren't they in receipt of the highest wages? Didn't they have 'afternoons' and 'evenings' and 'privileges' without end? Yes, but they couldn't live with people who called them 'servants' to their faces! 'Help' was the proper word, and they wouldn't be servants to no lady in this country! They all departed." It may be hoped that the same spirit will not enter the Church. In Christ's household, servants are needed, and their title is honorable (Mark 10: 44).

A Key Attached to the Wrist of a Dead Man has been buried with him at Durham, Me. The Lewiston Journal says that the deceased was a very determined man, and very penurious. He died at an advanced age. On his death-bed he kept his right hand closely clutched. As he drew his last breath he tightened his hold. Everybody there knew what he held. It was the key to the chest in which he kept his gold. As his nerveless hands unclosed, the key dropped from them and clattered against the bedside. As if to hold it even after his soul had passed away, the miser had tied the key about his wrist by a strong cord, and had grasped it as long as life remained. He had wanted to take his gold with him. They buried him as he was, with the key to his money-chest dangling about his wrist, and the key is laid in his grave to turn to rust. "And what became of the gold?" "Oh, the heirs have taken care of that just the same! They split open the chest with an axe, and divided the gold, and let the miser keep the key about his wrist." There was grim irony in leaving the key to the broken chest on the body; it was a symbol of the vain passion of the dead man's life. The key is not more useless to him now than the treasure would be if he had it (Ezek. 7: 19).

A Lady's Reason for Leaving a Hotel in Philadelphia was typical of a common disposition. There is a law in that city compelling hotel proprietors to have some sort of fire escape in every upper-story room in their house. In one of the hotels the style of escape used consists of a rope, with hooks to grasp the window-ledge, and a sliding arrangement by which the guest may lower himself safely. One of these is placed in every apartment ready for use. The other day a lady who wished a room was shown to one of the most elegantly furnished in the hotel. As soon as her eye rested on the fire escape she turned to the clerk: "I will not have that thing here," she said; "it is hideous." "But it is required by law," he replied. "Well, then," concluded the lady, "I won't take the room. I'll go where they don't have fire escapes—where the law is evaded—rather than have that ugly thing there to remind me all the time that I may have to swing myself out of the window to save my life." And she departed in disgust. The time may come when that lady would give all she has in the world to have such an ugly thing in her room. The same aversion to being reminded of a painful subject often causes persons to turn from religion, which they regard as a gloomy, depressing thing associated with a death-bed; but there is less excuse for them, because, while a fire is but a possibility, death is a certainty, and religion, so far from being a gloomy thing, is a source of joy and happiness in life, as well as a preparation for death (1 Tim. 4: 8).

LOVE'S COMPLAINING.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Nevertheless I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love. Remember therefore from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do the first works; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of his place, except thou repent."—REVELATION 2: 4, 5.

Christ's Work Among the Lamps—Constant—Careful—Tender—I. He Perceives—Beauties and Deformities—A Great Desideratum—A Grievous Fault—Love Declining—The First to Notice It—II. What He Prescribes—Recollection—Repentance—Return—Will Involve a Struggle—III. How He Persuades—With a Warning—The Removal of the Candlestick—The Persuasive Promise.

It was the work of the priest to go into the holy place and to trim the seven-branched lamp of gold; see how our Great High Priest walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks; His work is not occasional, but constant. Wearing robes which are at once royal and priestly, He is seen lighting pouring in the sacred oil, and removing impurities which would dim the light.

Hence our Lord's fitness to deal with the churches, which are these golden lamp-stands, for no one knows so much about the lamps as the person whose constant work it is to watch them and trim them. We sometimes judge the condition of religion too leniently, or else we err on the other side, and judge too severely. Our eyes are dim with the world's smoke; but His eyes are as a flame of fire. He sees the churches through and through, and knows their true condition much better than they know themselves. The Lord Jesus Christ is a most careful observer of churches and of individuals; nothing is hid from His observant eye.

As He is the most careful observer, so He is the most candid. He is ever "the faithful and true Witness." He loves much, and therefore He never judges harshly. He loves much, and therefore He always judges jealously. Jealousy is the sure attendant of such love as His. He will neither speak smooth words nor bitter words; but He will speak the truth—the truth in love, the truth as He Himself perceives it, and as He would have us perceive it. Well may he say, "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches," since His sayings are so true, so just, so weighty.

Certainly no observer can be so tender as the Son of God. Those lamps are very precious to Him; it cost Him His life to light them. "Christ loved the Church, and gave Himself for it." Every church is to our Lord a more sublime thing than a constellation in the heavens; as He is precious to His saints, so are they precious to Him. He has completed the redemption of His bride, but He continues her preservation. I therefore feel at this time that we may well join in a prayer to our Lord Jesus to come into our midst and

PUT OUR LIGHT IN ORDER.

Oh for a visit from Himself such as He paid in vision to the seven churches of Asia! Oh for His presence now, to search us and to sanctify us; to cause us to shine forth to His Father's praise! We would pray this morning, "Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts; and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting." All things are naked and open to the eyes of Him with whom we have to do; and we delight to have it so. We invite thee, O great High Priest, to come into this Thy sanctuary, and look to this Thy lamp this morning.

In the text, as it is addressed to the Church at Ephesus and to us, we note three things. First, we note that Christ perceives: "I know thy works . . . nevertheless I have somewhat against thee." Secondly, Christ prescribes: "Remember, therefore, from whence thou art fallen, and repent," and so forth. Thirdly, Christ persuades—persuades with a threatening; "I will remove thy candlestick out of His place;" persuades, also, with a promise: "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God."

I. First, then, we notice that

HE PERCEIVES.

Our Lord sorrowfully perceives the faults of His Church—"Nevertheless I have somewhat against thee;" but He does not so perceive those faults as to be forgetful of that which He can admire and accept; for He begins His letter with commendations, "I know thy works, and thy labor, and thy patience, and how thou canst not bear them which are evil." Do not think, my brethren, that our Beloved is blind to the beauties of His Church. On the contrary, He delights to observe them. He can see beauties where she herself cannot see them. Our Lord has a keen eye for all that is good. When he searches our hearts He never passes by the faintest longing, or desire, or faith, or love, of any of His people. He says to each and all, "I know thy works."

But this is our point at this time, that while Jesus can see all that is good, yet in very faithfulness He sees all that is evil. His love is not blind. He does not say, "As many as I love I commend;" but, "As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten." It is more necessary for us that we should make a discovery of our faults than of our virtues. So notice in this text that Christ perceiveth the flaw in His Church, even in the midst of her earnest service. The Church at Ephesus was full of work. "I know thy works and thy labor, and for My name's sake thou hast labored, and hast not fainted." It was such a laborious Church that it pushed on and on with diligent perseverance, and never seemed to flag in its divine mission. Oh that we could say as much of all our churches! I have lived to see many brilliant projects lighted and left to die out in smoke. I have heard of schemes which were to illuminate the world; but not a spark remains. Holy perseverance is

A GREAT DESIDERATUM.

In these three and thirty years we thank God he has enabled us to labor and not to faint. There has been a continuance of everything attempted, and no drawing back from anything. "This is the work, this is the labor," to hold out even to the end. Oh how I have dreaded lest we should have to give up any hold enterprise or cut short any gracious effort! Hitherto the Lord has helped us. With men and means, liberality and zeal, He has supplied us. In this case the angel of the church has been very little of an angel from heaven, but very much of a human angel; for in the weakness of my flesh and in the heaviness of my spirit have I pursued my calling; but I have pursued it. By the help of God I continue to this day, and this church with equal footsteps is at my side; for which the whole praise is due to the Lord, who fainteth not, neither is weary. Having put my hand to the plough I have not looked back, but have steadily pressed forward, making straight furrows; but it has been by the grace of God alone. Alas! under all the laboring the Lord Jesus perceived that the Ephesians had left their first love; and this was

A GRIEVOUS FAULT.

So it may be in this church; every wheel may continue to revolve, and the whole machinery of ministry may be kept going at its normal rate, and yet there may be a great secret evil which Jesus perceives, and this may be marring all.

The Ephesian Church excelled in something else, namely, in its discipline, its soundness in the faith, and fidelity toward heretics; for the Lord says of it, "how thou canst not bear them which are evil." They would not have it; they would not tolerate false doctrine, they would not put up with unclean living. This Church was not honeycombed with doubt; it laid no claim to breadth of thought and liberality of view; it was honest to its Lord. For this her Lord commended her; and yet He says, "I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love." When love dies orthodox doctrine becomes a corpse, a powerless formalism. Adhesion to the truth sours into bigotry when the sweetness and light of love to Jesus depart. Love Jesus, and then it is well to hate the deeds of the Nicolaitanes; but mere hate of evil will tend to evil if love of Jesus be not there to sanctify it. I need not make a personal application; but that which is spoken to Ephesus may be spoken at this hour to ourselves.

So, next, this evil was a very serious one; it was

LOVE DECLINING:

"Thou hast left thy first love." "Is that serious?" saith one. It is the most serious ill of all; for the Church is the bride of Christ, and for a bride to fail in love is to fail in all things. It is idle for the wife to say that she is obedient, and so forth; if love to her husband has evaporated, her wifely duty cannot be fulfilled, she has lost the very life and soul of the marriage state. So, my brethren, this is a most important matter, our love to Christ, because it touches the very heart of that communion with Him which is the crown and essence of our spiritual life. As a church we must love Jesus, or else we have lost our reason for existence. Lose love; lose all. Leave our first love, we have left strength and peace and joy and holiness.

I call your attention, however, to this point, that it was He that found it out. "I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love." Jesus Himself found it out! I do not know how it strikes you; but as I thought it over, this fact brought the tears to my eyes. When I begin to leave off loving Christ, or love Him less than I do, I would like to find it out myself; and if I did so, there would soon be a cure for it. But for Him to find it out, oh, it seems so hard, so sad a thing! That we should keep on growing cold, and cold, and cold, and never care about it till the Beloved points it out to us. Why, even the angel of the church did not find it out; the minister did not know it; but He saw it who loves us so well, that He delights in our love. How good of Him to care one jot about our love! This is no complaint of an enemy, but of a dear wounded friend.

The Saviour, having thus seen this with pain, now points it out. As I read this passage over to myself, I noticed that the Saviour had nothing to say about the sins of the heathen among whom the Ephesians dwelt; they are alluded to because it must have been the heathen who persecuted the Church, and caused it to endure, and exhibit patience. The Saviour, however, has nothing to say against the heathen; and He does not say much more than a word about those who were evil. He leaves the ungodly in their own condemnation. But what He has to say is against His own beloved: "I have somewhat against thee." It seems as if the Master might pass over sin in a thousand others, but He cannot wink at failure of love in His own espoused one.

The Master evidently counts this decline of love to be done to Himself. "I have somewhat against thee." It is not an offence against the king, nor against the judge, but against the Lord Jesus as the husband of the Church; an offence against the very heart of Christ Himself. "I have somewhat against thee." He does not say, "Thy neighbor has somewhat against thee, thy child has somewhat against thee, thy God has somewhat against thee," but, "I, I thy hope, thy joy, thy delight, thy Saviour, I have this against thee." The word somewhat is an intruder here. Our translators put it in it, and well they might, for it is a bad word, since it seems to make a small thing of a very grave change. The Lord has this against us, and it is no mere "somewhat." Come, brothers and sisters, if we have not broken any law, nor offended in any way so as to grieve anybody else, this is sorrow enough, if our love has grown in the least degree chill toward Him; for we have done a terrible wrong to our best friend.

II. And now, secondly, let us note what THE SAVIOUR PRESCRIBES.

The Saviour's prescription is couched in these three words: "Remember," "Repent," "Return." The first word is Remember. "Thou hast left thy first love." Remember, then, what thy first love was, and compare thy present condition with it. At first nothing diverted thee from thy Lord. He was thy life, thy love, thy joy. Now thou lookest for recreation somewhere else, and other charms and other beauties win thy heart. Art thou not ashamed of this? Once thou wast never wearied with hearing of Him and serving Him. Thou wouldst have gone after thy Lord anywhere in those days; across the sea, or through the fire, thou wouldst have pursued Him; nothing would have been too hot or too heavy for thee then. Is it so now? Remember! Remember from whence thou art fallen. Remember the vows, the tears, the communings, the happy raptures of those days; remember and compare with them thy present state.

Remember and consider, that when thou wast in thy first love, that love was none too warm. Even then, when thou didst live to Him, and for Him, and with Him, thou wast none too holy, none too consecrated, none too zealous. If thou wast not too forward then, now that thou hast come down even from that poor attainment? Remember the past with sad forebodings of the future.

The next word of the prescription is Repent. Repent as thou didst at first. The word so suitable to sinners is suitable to thee, for thou hast grievously sinned. Repent of the wrong thou hast done thy Lord by leaving thy first love of Him. Couldst thou have lived a seraphic life, only breathing His love, only existing for Him, thou hadst done little enough; but to quit thy first love, how grievously hast thou wronged Him! Repent of much good that thou hast left undone through want of love. Oh, if thou hadst always loved thy Lord at thy best, what mightest thou not have known of Him by this time! What good deeds thou mightest have done by force of His love! How many hearts mightest thou have won for thy Lord if thine own heart had been fuller of love, if thine own soul had been more on fire! Thou hast lived a poor beggarly life because thou hast allowed such poverty of love.

But then he says in effect, Return. The third word is this—"Repent, and do the first works." Notice, that He does not say, "Repent, and get back thy first love." This seems rather singular; but then love is and, moreover, the first works can only come of the first love. There must be in every declining Christian a practical repentance. Do not be satisfied with regrets and resolves. Do the first works; do not strain after the first emotions, but do the first works. No renewal is so valuable as the practical cleansing of our way. If the life be made right, it will prove that the love is so. In doing the first works you will prove that you have come back to your first love.

We are to get back to these first works at once. How sweet for the Lord to put us back again at once into the old place, back again in a moment! My prayer is that it may be so this morning with any declining one. May you so repent as not merely to feel the old feelings, but instantly to do the first works, and be once more as eager, as zealous, as generous, as prayerful, as you used to be! If we should again see you breaking the alabaster box, we should know that the old love had returned. May the good Master help us to do as well as ever, yea, much better than before!

Notice, however, that this will require much of effort and warfare; for the promise which is made is "to him that overcometh." Overcoming implies conflict. Depend upon it, if you conquer a wandering heart, you will have to fight for it. "To him that overcometh," saith He, "will I give to eat of the tree of life." You must fight your way back to the garden of the Lord. You will have to fight against lethargy, against an evil heart of unbelief, against the benumbing influence of the world. In the name and power of Him who bids you repent, you must wrestle and struggle till you get the mastery over self, and yield your whole nature to your Lord.

III. Now, see, brethren,

HE PERSUADES.

This is the third point; the Lord Jesus persuades His erring one to repent. First, He persuades with a warning; "I will come unto thee;" "quickly" is not in the original; the Revised Version has left it out. Our Lord is generally very slow at the work of judgment: "I will come unto thee, and will remove thy candlestick out of its place, except thou repent."

Our Lord means, first, I will take away the comfort of the Word. He raises up certain ministers, and makes them burning and shining lights in the midst of His Church, and when the people gather together they are cheered and enlightened by their shining. A ministry blessed of the Lord is a singular comfort to the Church of God. The Lord can easily take away that light which has brought comfort to so many; He can remove the good man to another sphere, or He can call him home to his rest. The extinguisher of death can put out the candle which now gladdens the house.

But the candlestick also symbolizes usefulness; it is that by which a church shines.

THE USE OF A CHURCH

is to preserve the truth, wherewith to illuminate the neighborhood, to illuminate the world. God can soon cut short our usefulness, and He will do so if we cut short our love. If the Lord be withdrawn, we can go on with our work as we used to do, but nothing will come of it; we can go on with Sunday-schools, mission-stations, branch churches, and yet accomplish nothing. Brethren, we can go on with the Orphanage, the College, the Colportage, the Evangelistic Society, the Book Fund, and all else, and yet nothing will be effected if the arm of the Lord be not made bare.

He can, if He wills, even take away from the Church her very existence as a church. Ephesus is gone; nothing but ruins can be found. Rome once held a noble Church of Christ, but has not her name become the symbol of anti-christ? The Lord can soon take away candlesticks out of their places if the Church uses her light for her own glory, and is not filled with His love. God forbid that we should fall under this condemnation! How can I persuade you, then, better than with the warning words of my Master? My beloved, I persuade you from my very soul not to encounter these dangers, not to run these terrible risks; for as you would not wish to see either the Church or your own self left without the light of God, to pine in darkness, it is needful that you abide in Christ, and go on to love Him more and more.

The Saviour holds out a promise as

HIS OTHER PERSUASIVE.

Upon this I can only dwell for a minute. It seems a very wonderful promise to me: "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God." Observe, those who lose their first love fall, but those who abide in love are made to stand. Life proved true by love shall be nourished on the best of food; it shall be sustained by fruit from the garden of the Lord Himself, gathered by the Saviour's own hand.

We shall know as we are known when we love as we are loved. We shall live the life of God when we are wholly taken up with the love of God. The love of Jesus answered by our love to Jesus makes the sweetest music the heart can know. No joy on earth is equal to the bliss of being all taken up with love to Christ. Heaven on earth is abounding love to Jesus. This is the first and last of true delight—to love Him who is the first and the last. To love Jesus is another name for paradise. Lord, let me know this by continual experience. See the heights, the glittering heights, the glorious heights, the everlasting hills to which the Lord of life will conduct all those who are faithful to Him through the power of His Holy Spirit. See, oh love, thine ultimate abode! I pray that what I have said may be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the bringing of us all nearer to the Bridegroom of our souls. Amen.

INCIDENTS OF RUSSIAN RULE.*

JUSTICE is administered under laws the issue of the sovereign will, and liable to be repealed at his pleasure. Trial by jury is of recent introduction, and may be considered as an experiment. In the court-room I inquired of an intelligent gentleman how it was working. He said: "Quite well," and then related the following incident to show how the royal will comes in, even to the smallest affairs of private citizens:

An officer under the Government promised to give a certain place of profit to a man, who was soon surprised to find that it was given to another. Such mishaps are not unknown under milder governments, I believe. But the disappointed office-seeker sought the man who had promised it to him, and slapped his face in open court, charging him with a breach of faith. He was arraigned and tried by jury for the assault and battery, and the jury brought in a verdict of not guilty, or, more accurately—"served him right." The verdict was received with great applause. The emperor gave the office-seeker and the office-holder also, the striker and the struck, appointments in distant parts of the empire, where neither of them wanted to go or to stay, and thus he punished them both—one for breaking his word and the other for breaking the peace. There is a vein of humor in such administration of justice.

The book-keeper of a mercantile house in Thorn was arrested in the Russian town of Rieszawa by the burgomaster of that place on a perfectly unfounded charge of an intention to smuggle. Although the book-keeper succeeded in establishing his respectability, he was thrown into a dirty prison cell and kept there twenty-four hours. His principal, of course, complained of this most unjustifiable treatment, and has lately received an official communication that the burgomaster has also been imprisoned twenty-four hours, and in the same prison in which he had shut up the unhappy book-keeper.

M. Andreoli, a Russian writer, who was exiled some years ago to Siberia, is now contributing to the Revue Moderne, under the title of "Souvenirs de Siberie," his recollections not only of Siberian, but also of Russian life. In the last number of the review he tells a story, the end of which belongs to the reign of the Emperor Alexander II., the beginning to the reign of Paul, of whose period it is strikingly characteristic. The emperor's favorite was at that time a young French actress, of whom he was madly jealous. One evening at a ball he noticed that a young man named Labanoff was paying her a great deal of attention. He did not lose his temper, but at the end of the ball gave orders that Labanoff should be arrested and thrown into the citadel. He intended to keep him there only a few days, to "make him more serious," after which he proposed to reprimand him and to appoint him to an office which had been solicited for him. Labanoff, however, was forgotten. At the death of the Emperor Nicholas, Alexander II., then full of magnanimity, liberated all the prisoners in the citadel, without exception. In a vaulted tomb in which it was impossible to stand upright, and which was not more than two yards long, an old man was found, bent almost double, and incapable of answering when he was spoken to. This was Labanoff. The Emperor Paul had been succeeded by the Emperor Alexander I., and afterward by the Emperor Nicholas, and now by the Emperor Alexander II., while Labanoff had remained in prison forgotten in his dungeon for more than fifty years. When he was taken out he could not bear the light, and, by a strange phenomenon, his movements had become automatic. He could hardly hold himself up, and he had become so accustomed to move about within the limits of his narrow cell that he could not take more than two steps forward without turning round, as though he had struck against a wall, and taking two steps backward, and so on alternately. He lived but one week after being liberated.

A SCENE IN AN ENGLISH POOR-HOUSE.

(See Illustration.)

How does a nation treat its paupers? Especially, how does it treat the aged and infirm whom the evening of life finds unprepared to maintain themselves? The answer in every case will be an infallible index to the spiritual state of the nation. In proportion to the desire manifested by Christian men to follow in the footsteps of their divine Lord, will the poor, the aged, and the helpless in their midst be cared for. Christ made them His representatives on earth, specifically appointing them to receive the gifts that gratitude and love to Him might call forth.

A century ago in England, and, indeed, at a later date the poor in the poor-houses were fed and clothed by contract. Bids were invited at the beginning of the year, and a contract was made with the lowest bidder to feed and clothe the poor of the county for a year. The contractor could only approximately estimate the number that he would have to provide for, and when competition was keen, he ran the risk of loss. In those cases he would endeavor to save himself by curtailing the provisions, and often the experiment of finding on how small a support life could be maintained was carried to dangerous limits. Still later, when the contract system was abolished, the "guardians of the poor" in many localities were really guardians of the rate-payers, and directed their efforts rather to the object of reducing the cost of the poor-house than to guarding the inmates from starvation.

Happily, a marked change is now observed in these institutions. More kindness is manifested to the poor, they are better lodged and better fed than ever before, and now and again benevolent Christian persons have subscribed together and provided funds for giving them extra indulgences, which could not justly be paid for from the rates. In many an English poor-house now groups of elderly people may be seen spending their last days in peace and comfort, as happy and cheerful as it is possible for external circumstances to make them.

It was baby's bed-time, and Hetty, aged twelve, and Mary, aged ten, baby's sisters, were engaged in preparing him for his night's rest. It was not altogether a new occupation to them, but there was a sense of responsibility upon them that was new. That was due to the fact that when they had put baby to bed before they could appeal to their mother if any difficulty arose, whereas now they would have to overcome it themselves; for mother was dead, and had that day been laid in the cemetery. The two children felt a terrible desolation in their hearts, but baby did not seem to mind. He crowed and kicked as usual, tugged at Mary's hair when she bent over him, and was as merry and bright as if the most crushing misfortune that could have befallen him had not occurred. He seemed to think it was a joke to have the children undress him and tuck him up in bed, and wanted to play instead of going to sleep; but he submitted at last, and slept peacefully.

"Hetty," said Mary, in a whisper, as the two stood watching him, "did you hear what Aunt Miriam said this morning?"

"I heard her talking, but I did not hear anything special."

"Well, I did. She said we should have to be taken care of separately. I heard her say she would have baby, and Aunt Jane might have me, and she asked Uncle Luke if he would not have you."

"What for? I'm not going to Uncle Luke's. I'd be miserable, and what would father do? Did he hear what Aunt Miriam said?"

"No; he wasn't there then. Aunt Miriam was going on about him, said he wasn't fit to take care of us, 'cause he drinks, and we must be took care of by them as was fit or else go to the poor-house."

"I think Aunt Miriam ought to mind her own business. She have baby, indeed! What's she know about a baby? She's an old maid; that's what she is. Father would never trust baby to her, I know."

"Aunt Miriam said he would. She said, 'You leave him to me; I know how to manage him. I'll talk him over.'"

"I don't believe she could talk him into that. Why, he thinks the world of baby, and he's good to us when he's sober. I believe he loves us, Mary. He kissed me last night like he used."

"And me, too," said Mary. "He ain't thought o' parting with us, and he wouldn't if Aunt Miriam didn't put it in his head. Don't you think we could manage for him, Hetty?"

"Of course we could manage; Mrs. Holt said she would come in every morning and show us how to wash baby and put things right. There's nothing else, and, if there was, why Mrs. Holt's next door, and we could ask her."

"Then let us speak to father before Aunt Miriam gets at him, and make him promise to let us try."

"It's the drink that'll be the trouble, Mary."

"Think he'll always be like that, Hetty? He hadn't used to be so."

"I'm afraid he will. He'll be more lonesome now, and very like go to the saloon oftener. But we'll ask him anyhow. I don't believe he'll hurt us, Mary, even when he is drunk. I'd sooner risk it than go away."

So it was settled that when the father came home the conspiracy against the family should be revealed to him, and his promise to give the little aspirants to the place of housekeepers a trial should be obtained. That was, of course, on the supposition that he came sober, which, unhappily, in Dodd's case, was not by any means sure. The children hurried around, making everything tidy, put the lamp where it shone on baby's bed, and giving one last careful look to see that all was right, went down to await the critical interview. They talked together in whispers, listening to every footstep, until at last father's step was recognized, and the door was opened. One glance told the anxious little creatures that it was all right. Father's face was sad enough, but it had not the bleared, half-fierce look on it that they dreaded seeing. His supper was ready for him—Mrs. Holt had seen to that—and Hetty found his slippers, and put them ready by his chair.

"Won't you come up and look at baby, father?" said Hetty, after supper. "He looks so pretty to-night, and he's sound asleep."

Dodd sighed heavily as he thought of the motherless little fellow, but he went up to please the children. It was a pretty sight, and, in spite of his trouble, the father could not but be proud of the bright little face resting in peaceful slumber on the pillow. He bent over him, smoothed the scanty hair with his rough finger, and kissed the little forehead. The girls watched him approvingly; that was a good sign.

"You won't ever give baby away, will you, father?" Hetty asked.

"Give him away, my girl! What are you thinking of? Who ever put that in your head?"

"Aunt Miriam said she would have you give him to her, and Mary was to go to Aunt Jane, and I to Uncle Luke. You won't let 'em do it, will you, father?"

"What's that for? I never agreed to nothing o' the sort. Did your aunt say I did? What's the meaning of it?" Dodd knew the meaning of it very well. He knew that he was not fit to have charge of the little family, but this cool settlement of the matter independent of him, as if he were a lunatic, piqued him. "Well, maybe they're right," he said to himself; "I ain't fit to take care of 'em; but it's hard on me."

"Aunt Miriam thought we couldn't get on, I guess; but you try us, father. Mary and I know how to do pretty near everything. Mother showed us how, and Mrs. Holt's promised to help us. Do try us, father; we couldn't bear to leave you."

"Fond o' your father still, are you, my dears? Maybe you'd be happier away. I'm a poor good-for-nothing now."

"Oh, no; we shouldn't, father!" said both girls together. "And you are good to us—generally. We'd a deal rather stay with you."

The fidelity of the little creatures whom Dodd knew he had neglected, and sometimes ill-treated, touched the man. He looked at them a moment with a world of love in his eyes, and then the tears came. He fell on his knees there, and the children nestled to him, and he put an arm around each. Bending his head silently, he registered a solemn vow that if God would give him strength he would prove worthy of the love thus pathetically clinging around him; and as the children, in spite of his evil ways, were anxious to trust him, he would not put them to shame, but for their sake would put away from him the enemy to their peace and his own.

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leander S. Keyser.*

The Disciple.

ONLY a few short weeks before that memorable Sunday Leroy Ransom would have laughed contemptuously at any one who ventured to predict that such a cry as that of the Publican would ever come from his lips. Yet he uttered it with all sincerity, and with a passionate desire for acceptance. He had travelled by a way that he knew not, and had been brought to submission by means that he had never understood. For him, as for so many sceptics, there was no gate to the kingdom open but the one that must be entered on the knees—the gate of self-abasement and docility. It is a very strait gate for the wise and the learned, and it is still more so for those who, like Leroy, imagine that they are more learned than they really are. His learning had never been more than second-hand; he was not an original thinker, and even the knowledge he had acquired had for the greater part been unassimilated. With a quick perception, a retentive memory, and a parrot-like facility of repetition, it was natural that he should gain the respect of slower and duller minds, and come to be regarded as a brilliant and promising genius. And it was very natural that he should come to entertain the same opinion. So long as he had books to refer to, it was easy to maintain the reputation; for there are few so dull that they cannot "read-up," a subject and reproduce other men's thoughts. Not a few go through life shining in society on this borrowed capital, and are spoken of as brilliant and profound thinkers, though they have never had an original thought in their lives. Scepticism is very attractive to such men, because it causes them to be talked of and renders them objects of interest. They are consequently more tenacious of their opinions and more difficult to convince than are men of greater mental power. When, in the exercise of His boundless mercy, God does bring such a man to a knowledge of the truth, the process is sure to begin with the destruction of his conceit. "God resisteth the proud, but He giveth grace to the humble."

Little as he recognized it then, Leroy had really taken the most hopeful step in his life, and had through the help of God won the greatest victory over himself when he abandoned his attitude of resistance and cried for mercy. His pride and conceit were gone before he could do that, and, after all, those were the real obstacles. Nothing had occurred to remove his intellectual difficulties. He simply cast them aside when they were of no further use to him. They, or some equivalent, had been necessary to him as a conceited man; but now they were necessary no longer. Having changed his moral attitude, he was ready to believe whatever God had revealed, and to exercise faith when reason failed or protested. He now desired to be taught, not any longer to be convinced. The opponent became the disciple.

Sudden as the change was, it was not more sudden than such changes usually are. Saul, the persecutor, was not changed into Paul the Apostle by elaborate argument. The change was instantaneous, and was worked by revelation, not conviction. Something more than an intellectual conviction was needed before the man who had sat at the feet of Gamaliel could be ready to learn from Ananias; and that is the case with every man converted after attaining manhood. Objectively and subjectively it is not by might nor by power, but the Spirit of the Lord that victory is achieved.

It was by no miraculous vision that Leroy had been subdued, but it was as surely by miraculous power—the power that operates on every soul that is brought to God. It was no longer a question of moment to him whether the first chapter of Genesis was scientifically true; the more momentous question which concerned him was whether God would forgive his sin. For this boon he cried with all the force of his nature, and with the intensity with which a condemned man would plead for his life. There was no reserve, no attempt at self-justification in his prayer; nothing but confession and self-abasement. Thus he prayed for nearly an hour:

"Help me to be humble, O God; put down all my pride of intellect and aid me to submit every faculty to Thee. Open my mind to all Thy truth. If there is prejudice in my heart, give me the disposition and strength to eradicate it. O Son of God, I am willing to do anything in my power if Thou wilt vouchsafe me the truth! Here, take my unbelief—I hate it, I loathe it, I abhor it. Nothing but grief has it wrought in my life. O God, remove my doubts, for the sake of Thy crucified Son."

He remained silent awhile, in amazement at the wonderful estimations that were agitating his soul. He could not analyze his emotions. Then while he still remained in the kneeling posture, he opened his Bible, hoping it would prove a light for guidance in the darkness. He opened the book at the fifty-first psalm—that wonderful penitential cry of David's—and found that it had been marked by some one, probably his mother. As he read through the psalm all the confessions of sin, the desires for contriteness of heart, the intense aspirations for moral renovation seemed to be the breathings of his own deepest desires.

"Oh, I see now," he cried; "I have transgressed God's laws. My unbelief has been my sin against Him; for it is wrong to doubt a kind, compassionate God, and thus make Him a liar. Oh, I see! I see! I need salvation from sin, as well as assurance of truth. Kind Father," he continued in prayer, "I acknowledge my unbelief as sin. I have reviled thee, I have, perhaps, led others astray by my God-defying expressions. But I will give up all my unbelief, I will abandon all my favorite sins, if Thou wilt but remove this crushing weight of guilt from my soul. God, be merciful to me, a sinner. Lord, save me or I perish."

He ceased a while and waited for an answer. He knew now that the dawn was beginning to break. A reflection came to him with sweet, radiating intensity:

"Did not He come into the world to save sinners, to seek the lost, to rescue the perishing? The Gospel says: 'Thou shalt call His name Jesus; for He shall save His people from their sins.' Yes, yes, glorious truth!"

Oh, there was such a mellow radiance in his soul, as he made this exultant acknowledgment, and gradually the heaviness of his heart departed, and a sacred, pervasive joy took its place. He could not believe it. For a time he oscillated between doubt and belief. Could it be possible that the great revolution of life and character, which his friends had so often described, was actually taking place in him? It had seemed that he never could experience it. Yes, he could not deny that something more than a human energy had touched and quickened powers hitherto dormant within him into life. "I see! I see!" He had a spiritual perception that was new to him; and lifting his hands joyfully toward heaven, he cried:

"Thou crucified and risen Christ, I take Thee now, now as my Saviour and my Guide!"

All the burden of guilt which had crushed his being so long was gone. He knew that God had touched his soul and had put His Spirit of truth into his inmost consciousness, giving him an assurance that was clear and unmistakable. Yes, he had come at last to the foot of the cross; he had pushed his researches to that radiant centre of all history, and lo! here was the fountain of salvation and truth pouring forth its translucent stream to make glad the desert of his soul, as well as the city of God.

He rose calm and serene. There was no disordered frenzy in his experience, he knew that. No, it was not excitement; it was not mental reaction. It was solid fact. It was revelation. "I know now that there is a God," he said to himself; "for I have heard His voice in my heart. I know, too, that Christ is the Son of God, because it was through Him that God revealed Himself to me. Oh, blind, blind! that I did not see this before; that I refused so long to apply to the only One who could break the fetters of sin and unbelief. But, thank God! at last I have found the way out."

Then he fell down upon his knees again, and in a few fervent words he poured out his gratitude to God: "I thank Thee, dear Lord, that Thou hast borne so patiently with me during the days of my waywardness, and that now, though I deserve nothing but rejection, yet Thou hast granted me this wonderful revelation."

When he again arose nature seemed to have put on a new face. Why, he could see God in everything. "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth His handiwork!" he said, reverently. "David was right. And Thales was right, too, when he said: 'All things are full of God.' God transcendent and God immanent—that is the truth. It is all very plain now. When God is within we can easily see Him without."

There was a great revolution of his whole nature. And yet he felt that he needed instruction, some kindly voice to encourage, some guiding hand to point out the way still more clearly. There was a light in his soul, and he knew it was the true light, but it was still too feeble and flickering, and he feared that some temptation or doubt might extinguish it and leave him again in the blackness of darkness. As he expressed it, not being able as yet to get away from the representations of heathen mythology, he had been long enough in Lake Avernus, with its black, slimy waters and poisonous vapors, and he had a horror of returning to it.

He would go and have an interview with Mr. Philliput. No sooner had he made this resolution than, suiting the action to the thought, he was on his way to the clergyman's house, where he was received cordially.

"My dear Ransom," began the clergyman, as soon as Leroy entered the library, "you must have had good news that you look so happy."

"Good news from heaven!" replied Leroy, in a voice tremulous with joy.

The old man looked at him for a moment in undisguised wonder, not comprehending his meaning; and then, as the truth flashed upon him, he exclaimed: "Thank God! Have you found the infallible remedy for your unbelief at last? Tell me all about it!"

The colloquy that followed was one of strange, almost weird interest. When Leroy had finished the recital of his experience in the woods he humbly asked his kind counsellor to give him further instruction. Mr. Philliput was rejoiced to do so, and saying, "The Holy Ghost regenerates and sanctifies by means of the truth," he opened his Bible and proceeded to unfold the Scriptures to the anxious seeker after truth. Leroy's heart burned within as passage after passage was read and explained. Were all those mines of truth in the Bible? He had not known it. They flashed upon his mind with new radiance. They corroborated his new-found experience. Why had he never known before that there were such stirring, thrilling, startling truths in the Scriptures?

"Because," replied the preacher, "you sceptics never look for the gems; you pick and choose here and there for fragmentary facts to cavil at."

"I see, I see," assented Leroy, humbly.

Then at the preacher's suggestion they kneeled and prayed together, simple, child-like prayers of trust; and when they rose Leroy knew that there was a star in his heart.

When Leroy reached his room, his thoughts reverted to Carrie; for who does not want to tell a new-found joy to those he loves most dearly? Suddenly her words: "If ever you meet with some great happiness, let me know," were recalled to his memory. And then by the association of ideas another revelation was borne in upon his mind. The red surges rolled to his temples, and momentarily his heart almost stood still. At last he found expression for the thought that had come, though at first in an indefinite form, to him like an intuition.

"I understand now why Carrie could not consent to be my wife. It was because I was an infidel. And—she—was right. I should have made her life miserable by my jeers. Even now I could not myself endure to hear any one scoff at the pure, sacred, divine religion of Christ, and only a few days ago I was a scoffer myself."

"But why did she not tell me of the deterrent obstacle? Ah, I see, poor, ignorant, purblind creature that I have been. She feared that I would try to change my attitude toward religion by my own efforts, and for her sake instead of for truth's sake. And, of course, the change would not have been a real one. Man cannot bring about this revolution himself; God only can effect it. Ah, Carrie, Carrie, you were wiser than I!"

A new world burst upon Leroy's vision. Not only did nature whisper new secrets to him, but the Bible—the Book he had flouted as "obsolete," as "in its dotage"—brought him new surprises every day. It had a wonderful vitality in spite of his previous sneers. It was at the same time the most modern and most antique volume in existence. Passages that he could not understand in his unilluminated state now flashed with celestial meanings. Truly, spiritual things are spiritually discerned.

So also many of the intellectual difficulties which had previously embarrassed him were now satisfactorily settled, or he could humbly wait for more light upon them. One of his chief difficulties had been that there is so much variance among Christians as to the interpretation of the Scriptures. But this was all plain now. He saw that when God converts a man He does not flash all knowledge and all truth into his mind at once, but, giving him assurance of his personal salvation and of the essential truthfulness of Christianity, He then leaves him to develop in knowledge and grace according to the laws of spiritual growth under His guidance and help.

The great questions of the divine existence, of the immortality of the soul, of the realities of eternity, of the veracity of the Bible, of the divinity of Christ, of the true relation between faith and reason—all these were now settled as a finality for Leroy, and hence there was a brightness and solidity in his life that he had never known before. These truths afforded him a solid basis for activity.

With what animation he could now prosecute his labors in the school-room among the young. No longer handicapped by a vicious, enervating philosophy, he could plainly see the benefits of intellectual culture; how it would increase a man's power for good if consecrated to that end; how it would give him so much greater intellectual and moral surface from which to radiate ennobling influences upon the world. A man might be a small star and still be useful. But if he could become a sun, of how much more service to his fellow-men! And then when he addressed his pupils on his favorite topic, the beauties of moral and spiritual character, he often spoke with a force, a positiveness, and enthusiasm that made them listen to him with amazement; he seemed to be a transformed being. Culture did not enhance our woes, as he once declared; it increased our capacities for enjoying God and His truth.

And as to carrying out his philanthropic desires he now found it his greatest delight to help those about him in the most practical ways. He could try to lead them to the truth, to make their lives brighter, to point them forward and upward. If he could not inaugurate some world-wide plan of reformation, he could make individual lives more radiant and redolent with truth.

Not long after his conversion he was induced by Mr. Philliput and some of his co-laborers to take charge of a class of young men in the Sabbath-school; and in this way he had the most practical opportunity to mould plastic character into forms divine. Oh, what an exhilaration he felt in the work!

Yes, he could now engage in the work of reform with confidence. There was now no questioning as to the truth of his doctrines. Once he trembled to invite his fellow-men to accept his perilous beliefs, but now he could invite the whole world to take its stand on the Rock of the Ages. There was sure footing there. And was life worth living now? Yes. In view of its potency for good and of the immortal destiny to which it was the portal, how it was fraught with significance!

However, it must not be supposed that there were no trials to endure, or temptations to resist, or at times dark questionings in his soul. So long had he been in doubt that it required time to overcome the habits of his mind. And the very fact that now his conscience had been aroused to activity made him more sensitive to every sin that touched him, and in a manner he had difficulties he had never previously encountered. When God converts a man He does not bestow perfection of character upon him at once. He lifts him to his feet and helps him to walk, but He does not carry him. There is always plenty of room left for self-development.

JOHN'S VISION OF CHRIST.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 28, Rev. 1: 4-18. Golden Text, ver. 18.

John Absorbed in God—Permitted to See Christ in the Future—The Universal Centre—Jesus as a Witness—John's Point of View—The Godward Side—The Conception of the Kingdom—Loyal Acquiescence—Interruption Preceding Revelation—Jesus Seen in the Churches—His Voice—His Portrait and Signature.

THE apostle John was a man truly swallowed up in God. While the other three evangelists commence their Gospels, one with His genealogy, one with a short summary of the circumstances of His birth and that of John the Baptist, and another with a fuller account of the same, John begins in the past eternity of God. Far back, before time began, the inspired apostle sees Him who is the First and the Last of all things to him. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God" (John 1). While the writers of the epistles almost uniformly commence with their own names—"Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ," or "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ," "James, a servant of God," "Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ," "Jude, the servant of Jesus Christ"—John goes back beyond himself, beyond history, beyond time, "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the Word of life" (1 John 1: 1). No wonder that this apostle, although the youngest of the twelve, should have been permitted to see Jesus in the future as in the past, and have been called to bear "record of the Word of God, and of the testimony of Jesus Christ, and of all things that he saw" (Rev. 1: 2). John's was like the eye of a diver for that which other men cannot see, like the eye of a naturalist for the works of God, so was John's eye for Jesus. When Peter had seen in the sepulchre nothing of Jesus but grave clothes, John "saw and believed." When the other disciples wondered at the Stranger whom they met by the Sea of Galilee, John said, "It is the Lord." It is the one who sees and knows Jesus in the present, always with us, who can look back into the past, and see Him there, and look forward into the future and see Him there.

John begins the Book of Revelation with the name of Jesus, "the Revelation of Jesus Christ," and only later on introduces his own name, "John to the seven churches which are in Asia: Grace be unto you, and peace." But as the magnet reverts to the pole so John reverts to Jesus, and he adds, "From Him which is, and which was, and which cometh (R. V. margin); and from the seven spirits which are before His throne; and from Jesus Christ." The apostle is full of his subject. There is one "He," one "Him" who fills past, present, and future to John; he sees that "of Him, and through Him, and to Him are all things" (Rom. 11: 36); "He is before all things, and by Him all things consist" (Col. 1: 17). In John's conception He is the universe, heaven, earth, all things are nothing but as they stand in relation to Him. "Jesus Christ, who is the Faithful Witness," God's Witness to man, and man's Witness to God that sin is put away; a Witness for His believing ones, His blood "speaketh better things than that of Abel" (Heb. 12: 24); a Witness against sinners, "I will be a swift Witness against the sorcerers, and against the adulterers, and against false swearers, and against those that oppress the hireling in his wages, the widow and the fatherless, and that turn aside the stranger from his right, and fear not Me, saith the Lord of hosts" (Mal. 3: 5). As "the first begotten of the dead," the first risen one whom death could never claim again, and "Ruler of the kings of the earth" (R. V.) John sees Jesus greater than all the powers that be, perfect Master of them all, and he knew that nothing could happen without His permission. The old apostle has an overflowing heart: how can he speak of Jesus and not praise Him? He breaks out, "Unto Him that loveth us, and loosed (or washed) us from our sins by His blood, and He made us a kingdom, priests unto His God and Father; to Him the glory and the dominion forever and ever" (R. V.). The very element in which John lived was God's love to him, not his love to God. Through John's Gospel we are taught, "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life" (John 3: 16); and in his first epistle, he writes, "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent His Son to be the Propitiation for our sins . . . God is love, and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him" (1 John 4: 10, 16). "Unto Him that loveth us" meant to John all that a heart could offer of praise for a forgiven past, a present hid with Christ in God, and lived in closest union with Him, a future in which every step, whether on earth or in heaven was a step of victory. John did not look where he could see the trials, persecutions, sufferings, temptations which were his daily lot at this very time while he was a prisoner in Patmos "for the Word of God and for the testimony of Jesus Christ." He looked to

of all this, and saw the disciples, himself included, "a kingdom of which Christ is the reigning King, and, therefore, although 'tribulation' was a present experience with him, he calls it 'the tribulation and kingdom and patience in Jesus'" (R. V.). Whatever might happen, the government was on safe shoulders, the reins were in the right hands, and instead of fretting at all the wrong and evil things which were abroad, John was in "patience." And he recognized that in every event of life he, in common with every disciple, was a priest unto God, "to offer up spiritual sacrifices" (1 Pet. 2: 5), privileged at all times to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus (Heb. 10: 19), never, on God's side, shut off from communion with Him. Thus John lived always with Jesus in sight, and no wonder he cried, "To Him be glory and dominion forever and ever." To this, His own song of praise, the apostle says, "Amen," i.e., "Verily," "Truly," as though to say with authority, "It shall be so." And then, having praised Him for the past, he speaks of Him as the coming One, "Behold He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him: and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him." And once again he says "Amen." There are many who will follow John as far as the first Amen, but who are put out at the thought that Jesus may come and upset their plans and their organizations and do a work of world-wide evangelization independently of them (Rev. 14: 6, 7). There are others who see that no human power can accomplish the conversion of the world, and while they are ready to do all which God trusts to their hands, yet they cry with the apostle, "Even so, Come, Lord Jesus" (Rev. 22: 20). It is just when we are speaking of and speaking to Jesus that and this occurs just here, as though to indorse all that the apostle had said. "I am the Alpha and the Omega (the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet), the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord God, which is, and which was, and which cometh, the Almighty" (R. V. margin).

John, having thus introduced his subject, "the Revelation of Jesus Christ," relates a revelation to himself personally, "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and heard behind me a great voice as of a trumpet, saying, I am Alpha and Omega, the First and the Last: and, What thou seest, write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches which are in Asia; unto Ephesus, and unto Smyrna, and unto Pergamos, and unto Thyatira, and unto Sardis, and unto Philadelphia, and unto Laodicea. And I turned to see the voice that spake with me." Many a time has Jesus spoken to us, but in order to hear Him it has been necessary to stop and turn round, and this we have been unwilling to do. "What! stop in this blessed work which I am doing? That cannot be the Lord's will." And yet if Philip had not stopped, the Ethiopian eunuch might never have been converted and sent as a witness to his own country. God has a right to interrupt our work; He is the rightful King of His kingdom. John continues, "Being turned, I saw seven golden candlesticks (or lampstands); and in the midst of the seven candlesticks, one like unto the Son of Man, clothed with a garment down to the foot, and girt about at the breasts with a golden girdle" (R. V.). The first thing John had to write to the churches was but of the last words Jesus uttered upon earth, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world" (Matt. 28: 20). Jesus was in the midst of the churches, equi-near, equi-distant from them all. "The seven candlesticks which thou sawest are the seven churches." How many there are who see Satan among the churches, who see man, see evil, and are so taken up with the evil that they fail to see Jesus. They get under depression because they see the wrong and do not as clearly see Him who puts the wrong things right.

John saw Jesus with the head and hair of brilliant white, token of greatest purity, and "His eyes as a flame of fire." Had John thought of how he saw evil, he might well have sat down under the burden of it, but when he took in that nothing could escape those eyes of Jesus, the All-seeing One, John could be at rest. "All things are naked and opened unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do" (Heb. 4: 13). Once in sight of God's omniscience and omnipotence, and a steady, quiet confidence in Him succeeds to the agony of distress which would otherwise uselessly wear out our lives. "His feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace." When the furnace is tapped and the molten metal runs out, the effect is like a blaze of glory. "Thou wilt make the place of His feet glorious." Where Jesus comes light and glory come. "And His voice as the sound of many waters"—no danger of John mistaking it. To Elijah in his wilful flight, it was but a still small voice (1 Kings 19: 12), but in John's life it

DROWNED ALL OTHER VOICES.

"And He had in His right hand seven stars"—the angels, or messengers, of the seven churches, so held as to be used by Him. "And out of His mouth went a sharp, two-edged sword"—that Word which is as a fire, a hammer which breaketh the rock in pieces (Jer. 23: 29), which "is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit;" and yet that Word says to John, "Fear not." His countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength." And where is John? "At His feet as one dead," the very man who had been most familiar with Him on earth shrunk into nothingness before such glory. As Christ dawns upon us, we shrink and shrivel into nothingness. But that right hand which holds His stars is laid upon John, and the voice says, "Fear not. I am the First and the Last, and the Living One, and I became dead, and behold, I am alive forevermore, and I have the keys of death and of Hades." Thus, before any distinct message is given him for the churches, John shows the portrait and the signature of Jesus. The Lord teach us so to take it in and to consider it, that all our life and work may, as John's did, take their color from this revelation of Jesus.

WORSHIPPING GOD AND THE LAMB. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Rev. GEORGE C. NEEDHAM and Mrs. NEEDHAM, the Eminent Evangelists.

EVANGELIST GEORGE C. NEEDHAM.

Arrival in America in 1867—His Bagster's Bible—Summoned by Mr. Moody to Chicago—Halcyon Days—Secret of his Success—Born in Ireland in 1846—Mother's Death—Business Life—Mr. Spurgeon's Advice—Evangelistic Tour in Ireland—A Startling Dream—Prayer for Clothing—His Methods—The Needham Family.

WHILE the Christian Church is rejoicing in the impetus which the great Bible and Prophetic Conference held last week in Chicago has given to the study of neglected portions of God's Word, the portrait and life of the man to whose efforts and labors much of the success of that conference is due will have an additional interest for our readers. The Christian community does not need to be introduced to Mr. and Mrs. Needham. Their labors have been so extensive that there are few of God's people in any of our great cities who have not at some time had the privilege of hearing them. But they have so thoroughly succeeded in keeping themselves in the background and have done their work so quietly that it is only at a time like this, when a great movement forces them into prominence, that their personality attracts general interest. Mr. Needham, in accepting the office of Hon. Secretary to the Conference, proved his capacity for arduous and unremunerative labor. He knew something of what he was undertaking. The Prophetic Conference held in New York in 1878 was first proposed by him, and though in that case his intimate friend, Major Whittle, acted as secretary, Mr. Needham was associated with him and aided him in the work. In arranging this Conference in Chicago he has thrown all his energy into the enterprise, and its issue is largely due to his untiring effort.

In the year 1867 two young evangelists in Great Britain had agreed together to visit America. These young men were George C. Needham and the late Henry Moorhouse. Mr. Needham having been detained by the sickness of a sister, who afterward accompanied him on the voyage, did not reach the States until three months later than his friend Moorhouse. He landed at Boston, and on the next day gave a brief address at the noon meeting of the Y. M. C. A. Invitations to preach began immediately to pour in upon him. Mr. Spurgeon had introduced him by letter to the churches of America, hence the confidence readily bestowed on the young stranger.

Moorhouse had already reached the public ear in Chicago through D. L. Moody, then President of the Y. M. C. A. of that city. Through these young evangelists as they are now more popularly called, were first introduced similarly in New England and the great West. Bagster's Bibles were then comparatively unknown among the American people, but the Bagster's carried by the strange preachers, well thumbed and well marked, were regarded as a curiosity, and immediately the work of importation began. Pastors, missionaries, Sunday-school workers, and others must study a Bagster's Bible! Some, indeed, made excellent use of them, while others, not diligent in the pursuit of Bible knowledge, found the talismanic copy very ordinary after all. Rev. S. H. Pratt, of Salem, Mass., had invited Needham to his church. He, too, was struck with the marked Bible used by the evangelist, and at once ordered a copy. This was probably the first imported of that immense number which thereafter found purchasers on this side the sea. Mr. Pratt made excellent use of his book, having since then entered upon the work of evangelism, and is now well known as a faithful teacher of God's Word.

"BIBLE READINGS,"

After Moorhouse left Chicago Mr. Moody urged Needham to visit him, he having previously met with him in London. These were a nucleus of whole-souled young men had already stamped the city with religious zeal. Bible study received an added impulse when

Mr. and Mrs. Needham (who had been recently married) joined that vigorous band. Moody, Whittle, Jacobs, Morton, and others, are still, thank God, with the Church on earth, and ripening for the home of heaven.

A recent critic has tersely remarked: "Mr. Needham emphasizes, elucidates, preaches the Word." The same testimony is given wherever Mr. Needham has gone, and there is no doubt that it reveals the secret of his success. God will bless His own Word. Preachers and evangelists may depend upon that. If they desire God's blessing, let them make their hearers know and understand the Bible. If their object is to be known as eloquent or gifted preachers, then they may deliver an oration with a verse of Scripture used for form's sake as a peg to hang it on. "They have their reward." It is the Word of God that is "quick and powerful" for the conversion of sinners. Mr. Needham believes this, and he has made it his rule of conduct.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

Mr. Needham was born a little over forty years ago on the shore of the Kenmare Bay, not far from the far-famed Lakes of Killarney in the South of Ireland. His parents were Irish Protestants, and he, with nine brothers and sisters, enjoyed a religious training. When George was five years old he is said to have received a decided religious impression from hearing an older sister recite a sermon which she had heard on the Second Coming of Christ. But it was not until his eighteenth year, when the great revival wave swept over Ireland that he became fully assured of salvation. The mother of the Needham family, with her ten children surrounding her bedside, passed away when George was nine years of age. The mother's dying prayer was for the spiritual welfare of her children. It has been abundantly answered.

When nineteen years old young Needham entered business in Dublin. He soon won the high regard of his employers by detecting a system of fraud which had for some time been practised against them. At the end, however, of his first year in business, against the protest of his employers, who made him flattering offers, and of some of his friends, who thought him rash, he relinquished his position and set forth as

AN EVANGELIST.

His labors in the first few years of his ministry succeeded so well in Ireland that he was invited to England, where a successful work in the vicinity of Mr. Spurgeon's birthplace threw him into contact with that great preacher. It is said that he proposed at this time to enter Mr. Spurgeon's college, then in its incipency, but that the latter, seeing the work he was doing, advised him to continue, like Saul of Tarsus, "straightway to preach Christ." In 1866, Mr. Needham, in company with Henry Grattan Guinness, made an evangelistic tour of Ireland with the most marked results. "Thousands flocked to their preaching, and strong men fell to the ground. Conversions were numerous."

When he entered upon his life-work it was with the reservation that, if not supported, he would return to his former home and aid his father, who for years had filled several public offices. George had heard nothing of the theory of living by faith, although he was practically living that life. When his first trial came through lack of funds he determined to revisit his father. That night he had a troubled sleep, and three times had

that his father and himself were net-fishing, and every time they threw the net the father fell overboard and became entangled in the meshes. The morning found him feverish, dejected, and on the border of despair. He sought relief in protracted prayer and arose strengthened, when a telegram reached him. He surmised evil tidings, and, before opening it, again sought the help which cometh from God only. A strange peace came over him, and he was somewhat ready for the terrible news: "Your father was drowned yesterday. Come home immediately." Soon after the settlement of family affairs, with the added burden of younger brothers and a delicate sister, for whom temporary arrangements had been made with relatives, the young evangelist, strong in purpose to win souls, started out on a tour of preaching throughout Ireland and England.

AN ANONYMOUS GIFT.

Observing one day the shabby condition of his clothing, he ventured to pray especially for a new suit. He had not heard of any one before doing this. In a very brief space of time he received an anonymous letter, in which he was asked to call on certain shop-keepers. On doing so he found they had been commissioned to renew his wardrobe, even to hat and boots. The great packages came to his room, when, spreading them open, he challenged the devil to look at his Father's gifts, and never again to tempt him on the score that he would either starve or go ragged if he continued evangelizing. George had many such lessons taught him by great trials and extraordinary deliverances. Herein lies the secret of his refusal to bargain for preaching or stipulate for his services, knowing that the Lord does provide.

An article from Galveston calls attention to

of exalting the Scriptures: "He says the best commentary on the New Testament is the Old Testament, and vice versa; the Scriptures explain themselves. The listener is profoundly impressed with the importance of studying the Word of God, and he goes home with at least a mental resolution to be a closer Bible student. One thing is very apparent—it is that people will go to hear the Bible explained when it is well done."

Mr. and Mrs. Needham have both written largely on Bible themes. Mr. Needham has also prepared a voluminous life of Mr. Spurgeon, and a large book on "Street Arabs," besides a life of his friend, Henry Moorhouse. The evangelist has been the hardest sort of a worker all his life. He preaches nightly almost the whole year around. He gives Bible-readings nearly every afternoon, sometimes conducts a morning prayer-meeting, preaches frequently four or five times a Sunday, carries on a voluminous correspondence, and contributes to a large number of magazines and papers.

A PLAIN MAN.

Mr. Needham is an evangelist pure and simple. Though he is in constant movement from one part of the field to another, and though he has carefully kept himself free from ties which would confine his labors to any one location, he is not a professional revivalist. The distinction may appear trivial, but it is very important. Some idea of its character may be formed from an answer he once sent to a member of a committee in a large city, who wrote to him for suggestions about the style of advertisement which should be issued announcing his meetings. "By no means advertise me," he wrote, "as being sensational, or magnetic, or eloquent, or scholarly, or smart, or any such thing, but only as a plain man, telling a plain story, in a plain manner."

He generally avoids great denominational gatherings and popular assemblies, and refuses to deliver addresses on any subject which does not immediately relate to the Gospel of Christ. He has labored with leading evangelists both in Great Britain and the States, and has co-operated for many years with his attached brethren, Moody and Sankey.

His three younger brothers have been influenced by his example, though never urged by his appeal, to give themselves to the work of the ministry. Thomas is a well-known and highly successful evangelist, whose career for ten years previous to his conversion among the Patagonians and Uruguayans of South America is packed with startling incidents. Benjamin and William are pastors, the latter an artist of no mean merit, whose rapid crayon sketching before an audience is as remarkable as Beard's.

MRS. GEORGE C. NEEDHAM.

Native Town—Early Interest in Prophecy—Education—Literary Proficiency—Afternoon Services—Her Faith—Penniless in a Western City.

THIS gifted lady is a native of the town of Manchester, Mass., now popularly known as Manchester-by-the-Sea. It is one of the oldest towns of New England, having been incorporated in 1645, soon after Salem had been settled, by a party of English colonists, and until recent years, before health-seekers took possession of its hills and shores, it had continued rural and puritanic. Nevertheless, the quaint town has had a history of its own, and has been the scene more than once of great theological and ecclesiastical battles. In this orthodox town, in rigidly orthodox times, before the "new departure" had been hatched in heterodox brains, the subject of this sketch first saw the light of day. She was descended from unmixed Puritan stock.

As the child grew she became personally interested in the subject of Christ's personal return to the earth. Like many others of whom we have heard, she raised her window nightly and watched for the coming King. No doubt the power of this hope had its characteristic influence upon her young life. But what was then real to her young heart has become more intensely real to her matured judgment. As a child she loved to study her Bible amid the wild solitudes of her grandfather's estate, with its deep and shady woods, its towering hills, its sandy beach and rocky shore. She managed to elude the companionship of school-mates and hide away in some familiar nest, where alone she communed with God. Such a life very naturally took on that coloring of quiet seriousness and earnest gravity which has always been characteristic of her.

EDUCATION.

Very early in life Mrs. Needham showed great aptitude in nearly every branch of secular study. She had been for some years under the careful tuition of Master Deacon Price, now a veteran and still an officer of the Church, whose honest piety strengthened her faith, while his skilful training rapidly developed her quick intellect. The rudiments of the sciences, including mental and moral philosophy, wore no dreamy and dismal aspect to the youthful scholar. She literally revelled in such studies, but it was in the study of language that she took most delight. Both in oral address and written composition Mrs. Needham excels in a chaste and classic style. Had she applied her mental powers to literature as a profession, no doubt she would rank high among writers. But while yet a girl with stern and unflinching purpose she devoted her best powers to the pursuit of what she considers alone worthy of a life—viz., the interpretation and presentation of Bible truth.

Mrs. Needham is known to readers and Bible students on both sides of the sea as a faithful exegete, and more especially as a prophetic student. Her published expositions in the Truth, the Watchword, and other journals devoted to Bible exegesis have thrown a flood of light on many obscure passages. Her "helps for hard places" have proved helpful to many. She has also given an exposition of "Woman's Ministry," which has been reviewed by extremists and conservatives, each allowing that the Scriptures were treated honestly and reverently, bearing on this vexed question. While her writings wear the charm of simplicity and directness, they are naturally more adapted to cultured minds, yet through others her teaching reaches the multitude.

When travelling with her husband she invariably takes charge of his

for Bible study. Usually the buildings are crowded, the ministers of every denomination being generally the best satisfied. A few months ago, when Mr. and Mrs. Needham were laboring in Virginia, a clergyman, writing in a New York religious weekly, thus referred to her work: "We attended the meeting conducted by Mrs. Needham in the Methodist church. Every seat was full, and extra seats had to be provided for the aisles. The rather unusual spectacle of a woman speaking from the pulpit was, of course, an attraction; but we confess that we had no idea of being so much impressed with its entire propriety, if all women speakers were as forceful and eloquent as Mrs. Needham. She has undoubtedly captivated the ladies of our city, and all of her meetings have been largely attended. The quiet, modest, scholarly, scripturally instructive Bible readings she gives are well suited to destroy the dislike which many Christians have to a woman exercising such a gift."

Although this humble Christian lady has devoted much time to Bible study and public testimony, she has never been neglectful of her duties

AS WIFE AND MOTHER.

Her home and her children have received unflinching attention. Probably inferior to none in feminine ingenuity, her own ready hands have always fashioned each article of raiment. She is her own milliner, tailor, and dress-maker, and is not forgetful to do like office for others. Mrs. Needham is known by her more intimate friends as a woman of in God. When her husband explained to her before marriage the plan of his life, never to contract a debt, and that he had gone without food in his evangelistic work rather than borrow a dollar, she heartily commended the plan and rejoiced in his purpose. When soon after he suggested a delay in their marriage owing to his lack of funds for the honeymoon trip, she quietly remarked that God was sufficient for each day, and He would make all grace abound in the exact time of need.

On one occasion, arriving

after the journey, she would not consent to enter a hotel till funds or friends would come to their relief. This step, she said, would involve a veritable debt to order food and shelter without present means of payment. Taking her husband's arm, they walked the street praying and expecting that somehow the Lord would provide. And He did provide, as within half an hour they were comfortably seated in the dining-room of a hotel, having been invited there by a gentleman who heard Mr. Needham preach in a distant town three months previously, and who recognized him on the street. This man had no knowledge of their circumstances; he supposed they were out for a walk, and urged them to accept of his hospitality and spend the night with him at the hotel, as he would leave the city early next day. Nor did he ever learn from their lips how he became the instrument of this wonderful answer to prayer. But, best of all, their acceptance of his proffered hospitality led to his immediate conversion. He was truly an anxious soul crying out for peace. Had they acted otherwise they would have lost the rich experience of God's care for them, and the opportunity of leading that soul to Christ.

Thus, in humble confidence in God her life has been spent in unobtrusive, quiet helpfulness, serving Him, aiding His people to know more of Him and to win souls for her Saviour. And He who won her heart in childhood, by whose grace she had been converted, and through whose strength alone she has sought to witness for Him, is the same Lord over all, and rich toward all who call upon Him. In the language of one of the beautiful hymns, of which Mrs. Needham has written very many, let each reader

"Praise Him who gives the Spring its power
To open leaf and blossom flower;
Who sends the Summer's golden days,
The Autumn's fruit and purple haze;
Who gives the Winter wrapp'd in snow
And in each season makes us know,
The blessings of that mighty hand
By which supported all things stand."

A JAPANESE INQUIRY MEETING.

A CURIOUS mode of conducting an inquiry-meeting obtains in Japan. The following is from a description of it sent by Mr. Allchin, of Osaka, to the Missionary Herald:

The meeting begins in the morning, lasts all day, and sometimes through part of the night. It does not follow a large meeting, as in America, nor does the missionary go among the inquirers, putting questions to them. Just the opposite is done, as in many other matters in Japan. The inquirer goes to the missionary and questions him. These questions are not always about religion, but cover a wide range of subjects in political and social science, philosophy, history, etc. And an answer must be attempted, for, if the missionary shows total ignorance on these matters, he loses some influence as an enlightened man. It requires often some tact to turn the question of the inquirer in upon himself to show him his need of a deeper knowledge. Here are some samples of questions put to Mr. Atkinson and myself on our recent tour:

Before breakfast is fairly over, a party of six or seven students come to our lodging-place and want to see the teacher. We admit them, and a few commonplace remarks pass between us; then one of them, more eager than the others to let off his gun, asks: "Ought not a person to approach the study of Christianity with doubt and suspicion?" He thinks that because there are so many false religions in the world, when a new religion is brought to them, the only sure way to get at what is likely to be true in it is to be doubtful about the whole. He also thinks that the unbeliever, by reason of his doubt, occupies a more advanced position intellectually than the believer whose mind, by reason of his faith, becomes restful and contented concerning these questions. I thought while he was speaking that this heathen idea is not peculiar to Japan.

Student Number 2 wants to know if the doctrine of overcoming evil with good does not lead to an absurdity. No one by this teaching, he thinks, could resist an assassin or a robber; and all good people would be killed off if they practised such a teaching. Nor could men in war act on the defensive any more than on the offensive. Of course considerable time is consumed in dealing with these inquiries, and the other students, fearing that they may have to depart without a word, put in their questions in a volley. "Is not liberty of the will an evil? Because God made man with the power to sin is not God responsible for man's sin? Why has God given a man a conscience that becomes a source of trouble to him? Was the American Revolution according to the will of God?"

The next inquirer is a young man who was baptized a year ago. He had, however, fallen deeply into sin and had thereby done a great deal of injustice to his young wife. His associations also were among drinking men. He wanted to know if there were any positive commands in the Bible against wine-drinking.

The next inquirer is an elderly Shinto priest. He was greatly interested in Mr. Atkinson's speech on the Judgment at the theatre meeting on the previous day, and had come to ask a few questions: "The soul being a pure, white substance (a ball), how can it be judged?" True enough, how can a thing be judged? Every Shinto shrine has a number of strips of white paper hanging before it, which represent the spirit of the god. On this white paper the soul of the departed Shintoist alights, like a bird on a twig, and so comes into contact with the spirit of the god. The soul being white and the paper white, of course the soul is invisible. So this priest reasoned.

These are but samples of questions which the missionary in Japan is required to answer on almost every tour that he makes. You can discover in them not only the low estimate which the people put upon moral purity, but also the influence of sceptical books over the minds of the student class.

THE PERILS OF THE CHILDREN.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.*

"Seeing that his life is bound up in the lad's life."
—GEN. 44:30.

Parents Responsible—A Shipwrecked Mother's Cry—The Parents' Anxiety—Conscious Imperfection—Unwise Discipline—Nagging Parents—Ruinous Laxity—The Morning-Glories of the Nursery—The Tempter and the Traitor—Graduated Temptations—The Fifth Avenue and the Dive—At the Drawing-Room Door—The Desolator of the Home—How to Alleviate Anxiety—Begin Early—Byron's Mother—The Power of Example—The Family Altar—Are the Children Safe?

THESE words were spoken by Judah, as descriptive of the tenderness and affection which Jacob felt toward Benjamin, the youngest son of that patriarchal family; but they are words just as appropriate to many a parent in this house—since "his life is bound up in the lad's life." I have known parents that seemed to have but little interest in their children. A father says, "My son must look out for himself. If he comes up well, all right; if he turns out badly, I cannot help it. I am not responsible for his behavior. He must take the same risk in life that I took." As well might the shepherd throw a lamb into a den of lions and then say, "Little lamb, look out for yourself!"

It is generally the case, that even the beast looks after its young. I have gone through the woods on a summer's day, and I have heard a great outcry in a bird's nest, and I have climbed up to see what was the matter. I found out that the birds were starving, and that the mother bird had gone off, not to come back again. But that is an exception. It is generally the case that the old bird will pick your eyes out rather than let you come nigh its brood. The lion will rend you in twain if you approach too nearly the whelps; the fowl in the barnyard, clumsy-footed and heavy-winged, flies fiercely at you if you come too near the little group, and God intended every father and mother to be the protection and

THE HELP OF THE CHILD.

Jesus comes into every dwelling and says to the father or mother, "You have been looking after this child's body and mind; the time has come when you ought to be looking after its immortal soul." I stand before hundreds of people with whom the question morning, noon, and night, is, "What is to become of the child? What will be its history? Will it choose paths of virtue or vice? Where will it spend eternity?"

I read of a vessel that foundered. The boats were launched; many of the passengers were struggling in the water. A mother with one hand beat the waves, and with the other hand lifted up her little child toward the life-boat, crying, "Save my child! Save my child!" The impassioned outcry of that mother is the prayer of hundreds of Christian people who sit listening this morning while I speak. I propose to show some of the causes of parental anxiety, and then how that anxiety may be alleviated.

I find the first cause of parental anxiety in the inefficiency and themselves. We have a slight hope, all of us, that our children may escape our faults. We hide our imperfections, and think they will steer clear of them. Alas, there is a poor prospect of that! There is more probability that they will choose our vices than choose our virtues. There is something like sacredness in parental imperfections when the child looks upon them. The folly of the parents is not so repulsive when the child looks at it. He says, "Father indulges in it; mother indulges in it; it can't be so bad." Your boy, ten years of age, goes up a back street smoking his cigar—an old stump that he found in the street—and a neighbor accosts him and says, "What are you doing this for? What would your father say if he knew it?" The boy says, "Oh, father does that himself!" There is not one of us this morning that would deliberately choose that his children should in all things follow his example, and it is the consciousness of imperfection on our part as parents, that makes us most anxious for our children.

We are also distressed on account of the

and instruction. It requires a great deal of ingenuity to build a house or fashion a ship; but more ingenuity to build the temple of a child's character, and launch it on the great ocean of time and eternity. Where there is one parent that seems qualified for the work, there seem to be twenty parents who miserably fail. Here is a father who says, "My child shall know nothing but religion; he shall hear nothing but religion; he shall see nothing but religion." The boy is aroused at six o'clock in the morning to recite the Ten Commandments. He is awakened off the sofa on Sunday night to see how much he knows of the Westminster Catechism. It is religion morning, noon, and night. Passages of Scripture are plastered on the bedroom wall. He looks for the day of the month in a religious almanac. Every minister that comes to the house is told to take the boy aside, and talk to him, and tell him what a great sinner he is.

After a while the boy comes to that period of life when he is too old for chastisement, and too young to know and feel the force of moral principle. Father and mother are sitting up for the boy to come home. It is nine o'clock at night—ten o'clock—it is twelve o'clock—it is half-past twelve, and they hear the night-key jingle in the door. They say he is coming. George goes very softly through the hall, hoping to get upstairs before he is accosted. The father says, "George, where have you been?" "Been out!" Yes, he has been out, and he has been down, and he is on the broad road to destruction, for this life and the life to come.

Father says, "There is no use in the Ten Commandments; the catechism seems to me to be an utter failure." Ah, my friend, you make a very great mistake. You stuffed that child with religion until he could not digest it; you made that which is a joy in many households an abhorrence in yours. A man in mid-life said to me, "I can't become a Christian. In my father's house I got such a prejudice against religion, I don't want any of it. My father was one of the best men that ever lived, but he had such severe notions about things, and he jammed religion down my throat, until I don't want any of it, sir." There have been some who have erred in that direction. In some families it is all with the child; from Monday morning to Saturday night it is that style of culture. The boy is picked at and picked at and picked at. Now you might better give one sound chastisement and have done with it, than to indulge in the perpetual scolding and fretfulness. There is more health in one good thunderstorm, than in three or four days of cold drizzle.

FATAL LAXITY.

Here is a parent who says, "I will not err on the side that parent has erred, in being too strict with his children. I will let mine do as they please. If they want to come in to prayers they can; if they want to play at cards, they can; they can do anything they please—there shall be no hindrance. Go it! Here are tickets for the opera and theatre, son. Take your friends with you. Do whatever you desire." One day a gentleman comes in from the bank to his father's office and says, "They want to see you over at the bank a minute." Father goes into the bank. The cashier says, "Is that your cheque?" Father looks at it and says, "No, I never gave that cheque; I never cross a 't' in that way; I never make the curl to a 'y' in that way. It is not my cheque; that's a forgery. Send for the police!" "Ah," says the cashier, "don't be so quick; your son did that!" The fact was that the boy had been out in dissipating circles, and ten and fifty dollars went in that direction, and he had been treated and he had to treat others, and the boy felt he must have five hundred dollars to keep himself in that circle.

That night the father sits up for the son to come home. It is one o'clock before he comes into the hall. He comes in very much flushed, his eye glaring and his breath offensive. Father says, "My son, how can you do so? I have given you everything you wanted and everything to make you comfortable and happy, and now I find, in my old age, that you are a spendthrift, a libertine, and a drunkard." The son says, "Now, father, what's the use of your talking in that way? You told me I might have a good time and to go it. I have been acting on your suggestion, that's all."

And so one parent errs on one side, and another parent errs on the other, and how to strike between severity and too great leniency, and train our sons and daughters for usefulness on earth and bliss in heaven, is a question which agitates every Christian household in my congregation. Where so many good men and women have failed, it is not strange that we should sometimes doubt the propriety of our theory and the accuracy of our kind of government.

Again, parental anxiety often arises from an early exhibition of sinfulness in the child. The morning-glories bloom for a little while under the sun, and then they shut up as the heat comes on; but there are flowers along the Amazon that blaze their beauty for weeks at a time; but the short-lived morning-glory fulfils its mission as well as the Victoria Regia. There are some people who take forty, fifty, or sixty years to develop. Then there are little children who fling their beauty on the vision and vanish.

THEY ARE MORNING-GLORIES

that cannot stand the glare of the hot noon sun of trial. You have all known such little children. They were pale; they were ethereal; there was something very wonderfully deep in the eye; they had a gentle foot and soft hand, and something almost supernatural in their behavior—ready to be wafted away. You had such a one in your household. Gone now! It was too delicate a plant for this rough world. The heavenly gardener saw it and took it in. We make splendid Sunday-school books out of such children, but they almost always die. I have noticed that for the most part, the children that live sometimes get cross, and pick up bad words in the street, and quarrel with brother and sister, and prove unmistakably that they are wicked—as the Bible says, going astray from the womb, speaking lies.

Anxiety on the part of parents also arises from the consciousness that there are so many temptations thrown all around our young people. It may be almost impossible to take a castle by siege—straightforward siege—but suppose in the night there is and he goes down and draws the bolt and swings open the great door, and then the castle falls immediately. That is the trouble with the hearts of the young; they have foes without and foes within. There are a great many who try to make our young people believe that it is a sign of weakness to be pure. The man will toss his head and take dramatic attitudes and tell of his own indiscretions, and ask the young man if he would not like to do the same. And they call him verdant, and they say he is green and unsophisticated, and wonder how he can bear the Puritanical strait-jacket. They tell him he ought to break from his mother's apron-strings, and they say, "I will show you all about town. Come with me. You ought to see the world. It won't hurt you. Do as you please, it will be the making of you." After a while the young man says, "I don't want to be odd, nor can I afford to sacrifice these friends, and I'll go and see for myself." From the gates of hell there goes a shout of victory. Farewell to all innocence—farewell to all early restraints favorable to that innocence which once gone, never comes back.

* Dr. Talmage did not preach last Sunday morning. He was suffering from cold and hoarseness.

How many traps there are set for our young people! That is what makes parents so anxious. Here are temptations for and every stage of it. The young man, when he first goes into dissipation, is very particular where he goes. It must be a fashionable hotel. He could not be tempted into these corner nuisances, with red-stained glass and a mug of beer painted on the sign-board. You ask the young man to go into that place and he would say: "Do you mean to insult me?" No; it must be a marble-floored bar-room. There must be no lustful pictures behind the counter; there must be no drunkard hiccupping while he takes his glass. It must be a place where elegant gentlemen come in and click their cut glass and drink to the announcement of flattering sentiment. But the young man cannot always find that kind of a place; yet he has a thirst and it must be gratified. The down-grade is steeper now, and he is almost at the bottom. Here they sit in an oyster cellar around a card-table, wheezing, bloated, and bloodshot, with cards so greasy you can hardly tell who has the best hand. But never mind; they are only playing for drink. Shuffle away! shuffle away! The landlord stands in his shirt-sleeves with hands on his hips, watching the game and waiting for another call to fill up the glasses.

It is the hot breath of eternal woe that flushes that young man's cheek. In the jets of gaslight I see the shooting out of the fiery tongue of the worm that never dies. The clock strikes twelve; it is the tolling of the bell of eternity at the burial of a soul. Two hours pass on, and they are all sound asleep in their chairs. Landlord says, "Come, now, wake up; it's time to shut up." They look up and say, "What?" "It's time to shut up." Push them out into the air. They are going home. Let the wife crouch in the corner, and the children hide under the bed. They are going home! What is the history of that young man? He began his dissipation at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, and completed his damnation in the worst grog-shop in Navy Street.

But sin even does not stop here. It comes to

THE DOOR OF THE DRAWING-ROOM.

There are men of leprous hearts that go into the very best classes of society. They are so fascinating—they have such a bewitching way of offering their arm. Yet the poison of asps is under the tongue, and their heart is hell. At first their sinful devices are hidden, but after a while they begin to put forth their talons of death. Now they begin to show really what they are. Suddenly—although you could not have expected it, they were so charming in their manner, so fascinating in their address—suddenly a cloud, blacker than was ever woven of midnight or hurricane, drops upon some domestic circle. There is agony in the parental bosom that none but the Lord God Almighty can measure—an agony that wishes that the children of the household had been swallowed by the grave, when it would be only a loss of body instead of a loss of soul.

What is the matter with that household? They have not had the front windows open in six months or a year. The mother's hair suddenly turned white; father, hollow-cheeked and bent over prematurely, goes down the street. There has been no death in that family—no loss of property. Has madness seized upon them? No! no! A villain, kid-gloved, patent-leathered, with gold chain and graceful manner, took that cup of domestic bliss, elevated it high in the air until the sunlight struck it, and all the rainbows danced about the brim, and then dashed it down in desolation and woe, until all the harpies of darkness clapped their hands with glee, and all the voices of hell uttered a loud ha! ha! Oh, there are scores and hundreds of homes that have been blasted, and if the awful statistics could be fully set before you, your blood would freeze into a solid cake of ice at the heart. Do you wonder that fathers and mothers are anxious about their children, and that they ask themselves the questions day and night, What is to become of them? what will be their destiny?

I shall devote the rest of my remarks to alleviation of parental anxiety. Let me say to you, as parents, that a great deal of that anxiety will be lifted if you will with your children. Tom Paine said, "The first five years of my life I became an infidel." A vessel goes out to sea; it has been five days out. A storm comes on it; it springs a leak; the helm will not work; everything is out of order. What is the matter? The ship is not seaworthy, and never was. It is a poor time to find it out now. Under the fury of the storm the vessel goes down, with two hundred and fifty passengers, to a watery grave. The time to make the ship seaworthy was in the dry dock, before it started. Alas for us, if we wait until our children get out into the world before we try to bring upon them the influence of Christ's religion!

I stood in a house in one of the Long Island villages, and I saw a beautiful tree, and I said to the owner, "That is a very fine tree, but what a curious crook there is in it!" "Yes," said he, "I planted that tree, and when it was a year old I went to New York and worked as a mechanic for a year or two, and when I came back I found that they had allowed something to stand against the tree; so it has always had that crook." And so I thought it was with the influence upon children. If you allow anything to stand in the way of moral influence against a child on this side or that side, to the latest day of its life on earth and through all eternity it will show the pressure. No wonder Lord Byron was bad. Do you know his mother said to him, when she saw him one day limping across the floor with his unsound foot: "Get out of my way, you lame brat!" What chance for a boy like that?

TWO YOUNG MEN

come to the door of sin. They consult whether they will go in. The one young man goes in and the other retreats. Oh, you say, the last had better resolution. No, that was not it. The first young man had no early good influence; the last had been piously trained, and when he stood at the door of sin discussing the matter, he looked around as if to see some one, and he felt an invisible hand on his shoulder, saying, "Don't go in! don't go in!" Whose hand was it? A mother's hand, fifteen years ago gone to dust. A gentleman was telling me of the fact that some years ago there were two young men who stopped at the door of a well-known theatre in New York. The question was whether they should go in. That night there was to be a very immoral play enacted in that theatre. One man went in; the other stayed out. The young man who went in, went on from sin to sin, and through a crowd of iniquities, and died in the hospital, of delirium tremens. The other young man who retreated, chose Christ, went into the Gospel, and is now one of the most eminent ministers of Christ in this country. And the man who retreated gave as his reason for turning back from that theatre that night, that there was an early voice within him, saying, "Don't go in! don't go in!"

THE EXAMPLE.

But I want you to remember, oh father! oh mother! that it is what you do that is going to affect your children, and not what you say. You tell your children to become Christians while you are not, and they will not. Do you think Noah's family would have gone into the ark if he had not gone in? They would say, "No, there is something about that boat that is not right; father has not gone in." You cannot push children into the kingdom of God; you have got to pull them in. There has been many a general in a tower or castle looking at his army fighting, but that is not the kind of a man to arouse enthusiasm among his troops. It is a Garibaldi or Napoleon I. who leaps into the stirrups, and dashes into the conflict, and has his troops following him with wild huzza. So you cannot stand off in your impenitent state, and tell your children to go ahead into the Christian life, and have them go. You must yourself dash into the Christian conflict;

YOU MUST LEAD

them and not tell them to go. Do you know that all the instruction you give to your children in a religious direction goes for nothing unless you illustrate it in your own life? It is what you are, not so much what you teach.

HAVE A FAMILY ALTAR.

Let it be a cheerful place, the brightest room in your house. Do not wear your children's knees out with long prayers. Have the whole exercise spirited. If you have a melodeon, or an organ, or a piano, in the house, have it open. Then lead in prayers. If you cannot make a prayer of your own, take Matthew Henry's prayers or the Episcopal Prayer-book. None better than that. Kneel down with your little ones morning and night, and commend them to God. Do you think they will ever get over it? Never! After you are under the sod a good many years, there will be some powerful temptation around that son, but the memory of father and mother at morning and evening prayers will have its effect upon him; it will bring him back from the path of sin and death.

ARE YOUR CHILDREN SAFE

for heaven? You can tell better than any one else. I put to you the question, "Are your children safe for heaven?" I heard of a mother who, when the house was afire, in the excitement of the occasion, got out a great many of the valuable things—many choice articles of furniture—but did not think to ask until too late, "Is my child safe?" It was too late then. The flames had encircled all; the child was gone! Oh, my dear friend, when sea and land shall burn in the final conflagration, will your children be safe?

"BESIDE ALL WATERS."

A CITY clerk, an active Christian worker, fell sick. His employers said it was his own fault. They declared that if he had taken rest he would have been as well as the others, but every night when he ought to have been enjoying himself he was in little rooms where there was sickness, or in mission-halls crowded with people of the lowest kind, whose fetid breath made the atmosphere poisonous. But he was a valuable clerk, trustworthy and reliable in every way. They could not afford to lose him, so they made him a present and sent him to the sea to recuperate.

After he had been there a week or two they sent one of their clerks down to see how he was getting on. The clerk went to his hotel as soon as he arrived and learned that he was out. "Goes out regularly every evening," said one of the waiters, "and does not come home till late." The clerk was surprised. "I suppose, now he is where no one knows him," he said to himself, "he has taken to going to the theatre and enjoying himself."

He sauntered off to the pier, and just as he reached its entrance he saw a crowd under a gas lamp. Going up to it to see what was the subject of interest, he recognized his fellow-clerk in the centre. A hand-bag was on the pavement before him, and out of this he was taking tracts and handing them out to the throng, talking to them all the while about Christ and His salvation. He waited until the bag was empty and the crowd dispersed, then he saluted the convalescent:

"This is a pretty way to be spending your time. The firm selected this place for you because there is not a mission hall nor a church in it. They thought you would be safe here."

"Ah!" said the clerk. "God guided them; I thought He had. It is a dark place. There was need for a Christian man here. I have been enabled to do a good work. Tell the firm I am very grateful to them. I am much better. God has filled my soul with joy, and there is no medicine like that."

TWO OCTOGENARIAN CONVERTS.

A VERY remarkable incident of mission work reported by Mr. S. W. Howland, who is laboring in Ceylon, is published in the Missionary Herald. In the course of a letter home he says:

"Last Sabbath I was invited to go to South Elaly and administer the communion. I had the privilege of baptizing an aged couple of about eighty years, giving them the names of Abraham and Sarah. The names they have borne up to this time were hardly adapted to be recognized in Christian baptism, as they might be translated 'Lord Rama' and 'she-devil.' Special interest was given to the occasion by the presence of five of their children and six grandchildren, all church members. When the oldest son became a Christian forty years ago, this father came and cursed him. The Christian teacher of the school then said to him: 'We shall see whether your curse or God's blessing is the stronger; you will yet be brought in yourself.' And now, after so many years, he comes into the church, almost a patriarch to the village, yet a child to his grandchildren. There was present another old man who remembers the advent of the English in Ceylon in the last century—1795. He desired to join the church, but his grandson, on whom he is dependent, opposed so strongly that he will wait."

WOMAN'S WORK IN JAPAN.

THE indirect method of reaching the people appears to hold out promise of fruit in Japan. The Rev. E. R. Woodman, in a letter to the Spirit of Missions complains of the small results of his own work, but reports that an opening of an encouraging character has been found by his wife. He says: "Within the last year a wonderful change has come over the women of Japan. They are now coming forward, very anxious for foreign education. All over the land girls' schools are being started. Recently a lady, the wife of an official, came to Mrs. Woodman for instruction in English. We have known the lady for years. After coming a few times she asked permission to bring others. One more has since commenced, and they say that there are more who desire to come than Mrs. Woodman will care to teach. This is encouraging, and Mrs. Woodman is only too happy to undertake such work, combining with her English instruction the teaching of plain sewing (not fancy work). There is a great call for this, as Japanese ladies are now wearing clothes of foreign fashion to such an extent that there is a dearth of tailors.

"My present plan is to thoroughly clean the school-room, and use it for the ladies who wish Mrs. Woodman to instruct them. Those who already come say that there are numbers of ladies who will gladly pay one dollar a month for the instruction. Thus I shall not draw on the mission for money."

TOOK UP HIS BED AND WALKED.

A REMARKABLE incident, so like the miracles in the Gospels as to be related, in words almost identical, is reported in Thy Healer. Mr. W. J. Cook, an evangelist who has been holding services among the miners in Staffordshire, England, says: One of the men had been severely hurt in a coal mine. He had been very badly wounded. Some friends said to him: "Now, Bill, if the Lord will get you into the hall, you will be healed there." "Won't they come here, and won't the Lord heal me here?" he asked. "Yes," they answered, "but you had better come to the hall, and, if you will come, we will dress you and carry you there." He agreed, and they dressed him, and then brought him on a piece of canvas, which reminded me of the one who was brought to Jesus by his friends, and was let down into the house through the roof. Well, they had to lay this man down full-length on the platform. After the meeting was over, I said to him: "I cannot do you any good, but the Lord can. Can you trust the Lord to do it now?" His answer was, "I don't know." I then submitted some passages of Scripture, and left them to him. Soon after he believed. I then anointed him, and, praise the Lord, he got up, rolled up his canvas, and carried it home under his arm. He afterward rose in one of the meetings and testified. I may tell you also that he had been visited by an infidel doctor until then; but, after he was healed, he went to the doctor and said: "I have come to you for a certificate to go to work again, for the Lord has healed me." "What is your name?" asked the doctor. "William ——" "Oh," said the doctor, "I expected to see you dead before now." "But the Lord has healed me," he said, "and you may examine me." The doctor did so, and found that the large wound he had was not only healing, but the skin was forming over it. On Saturday the doctor had said there was no hope for him, but he was able to go to work on Wednesday.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Down in a Coal Mine.—Mr. G. Clarke Related at a recent meeting: "Down in the Northumberland and Durham coal mines, the men, when they want to know in what direction the current of air is flowing, have to lie with their faces to the earth and keep very still, scarcely daring to breathe, so slight is the current down in the earth. And if we want to hear the voice of God we must keep very still and silent, because it is a still small voice, and can only be heard by those who listen attentively for it. God has something to say to all of us, but we must get down in the dust before Him, and see or hear nothing but Jesus."

A Choice Bit of Tarred Rope.—The Rev. Mr. Simpson observed: "I went to visit one of my congregation in the North. He was but a poor fisherman; and, on entering his house, one of the first things I noticed was a small piece of tarred rope, only about three inches in length, used and dirty, and so useless looking that, had it been lying on the street, the poorest passer-by would have taken no notice of it; yet to this family it was very dear. And why was it so precious? I went to the window-sill where it lay, covered by a glass shade, and there I learned the secret. Within, on a small slip of paper were the words: 'A piece of the rope by which the father of this family and his two sons were saved from being drowned out in the bay.' Does not this beautifully illustrate what Jesus should be to every child of His own? Precious indeed is our Saviour who, by the rope of His Gospel, saves us from eternal death and gives to us everlasting life."

A Sailor's Familiarity Repulsed.—Captain Hatfield remarked: "Not long ago a sailor belonging to a ship in the port of New York went for a stroll through that city. He had not gone far when he met a young girl, whom he accosted in a most unbecoming manner. She did not look up at him angrily, but pitifully, and said: 'Do you know you will have to meet me before the throne of God, and there give an account of your words?' That was all she said, and walked on. The sailor turned right there, and went back to the ship, and going to his berth in the fore-castle, fell down on his knees and asked the Lord to pardon his sin, and he was pardoned then and there. That sailor had been brought up by God-fearing parents, but had long since forgotten all his early lessons, until suddenly brought face to face with God by the words of that young woman. Next day that sailor went to a prayer-meeting and publicly gave his testimony for Christ."

The Bad Example of Two Sisters.—Mr. Clarke said: "A great deal of blame is to be laid to the account of Christians that there are so many unconverted among us. Last night, during the address, I noticed a young man, and at the close of the meeting I asked him if he were converted. He looked me in the face, and answered: 'That is a question which I do not think I should answer; that is too delicate a subject to be lightly spoken of.' After a little talk I discovered that the reason of his silence was this: His three sisters had all professed to be converted, but after a week or so, two of them had gone back to their old style of life—partly for Christ and partly for this world, though still nominally Christians, while the other had come out and out for Christ. Now, he knew that to be a Christian was the right thing, and if he could be a Christian like his two sisters, having peace with Christ and enjoying the world, then he would be so at once; but he felt instinctively that that was not Christianity, and unless he was prepared to give up the world and live like his one sister, then he might as well stay as he was. The bad example of these two sisters was hindering their brother's salvation."

"Safe Behind the Blood."—The Same Speaker observed: "A story is handed down to us from the time that the first-born was slain in Egypt. A little Jewish girl, the eldest of the family, was lying ill in bed, and when she heard that the blood on the door-posts would save her from death, she called her father, and said: 'Father, is the blood on the lintel and the side-posts?' 'Yes, my daughter,' replied the father, 'I commanded the servants to put it on.' 'But are you sure, father?' anxiously inquired the girl. He again assured her that it was done, for he had commanded it. But she was still dissatisfied and said: 'Father, will you carry me to the door that I may see it for myself?' The father carried the child to the door, and to his dismay found that his command had not been obeyed. Through the neglect of a careless servant the blood had not been sprinkled. By her own earnestness and her determination the girl was soon safe behind the blood."

An Aged Dying Man's Gift.—Mr. Stewart, speaking at a Christian Institute, said: "Not long ago there were given away at a church in Scotland sixty little Testaments, in the hope that the Lord would use them to bring some poor wanderers home to Himself; and that they were so used we soon had ample proof. A doctor belonging to the district, on visiting his patients, came across an old man who lay upon his bed, ill without hope of recovery. The aged invalid said to the doctor as he bent over him: 'Please put your hand into my vest pocket, and there you will find five shillings. Take it, and give it to the evangelists, that they may buy more Testaments, for it was by one of these that I was brought to Christ.' The doctor did as he was desired, and came and gave the money to us. When he was giving it, another worker who was standing by said: 'I'll give another five shillings; so we bought ten shillings' instead of five shillings' worth, and soon we had reason to believe that the Lord was blessing that old man's gift, and making it return a hundred-fold."

A True Friend in Deep Need.—Mr. C. King related: "After my conversion I worked at the docks, but had to give it up as my strength gave way. We were in great straits, but my wife held on to God with calm faith even though we had to boil our tea-leaves four times over to wash down the dry bread, which was all we had to eat. At last a day came when we had neither bread nor tea, and this at a time when I was addressing meetings of eight hundred people. My wife prayed, not for food, but that I might be sustained by the Lord. I prayed that I might get one shilling or half a crown to get bread for my wife and children. At night I went out, and when wandering about, the Rev. M. Baxter, editor of the London Christian Herald, approached me. He stopped and asked me the way to a certain mission hall; I knew it, and guided him and his companions to the place. On the way Mr. Baxter asked me who I was. I told him, and also informed him about the state of my home. On parting he put into my hand a gold coin. Since that time we have never wanted; God has often answered our prayers, but never in a more needy time."

Adrift on a Smack.—At a Worker's Meeting, the Rev. Mr. Calder, when speaking of our utter helplessness to save ourselves, remarked: "Not long ago a young lad was alone upon a smack, which was anchored at some distance from the bank in the estuary of an Irish river. The lad unfastened the chain of the anchor which kept the smack in safety, and it fell to the bottom of the river, and the small vessel with its helpless inmate drifted far out toward the channel. When the boy saw his danger he became greatly alarmed. He shouted, but his voice did not reach the shore, and finally he seized an iron pot, and with a poker he beat upon it with all his strength. Soon his father, who had some time before left the smack, heard the sound, and came running, only to see his boy drifting far out into the channel. He procured a small boat, and with it he rowed to the vessel's side, and was at the helm in a few moments steering it shoreward. Now, mark how helpless the boy was; he could do nothing to guide the smack, all he could do was to shout and make a noise for help. When his father was at the helm guiding the vessel aright how safe he was, and how free from fear he felt. Such is our helpless condition; we can do nothing to save ourselves, but the moment we call to our heavenly Father He comes, and stands by the helm, saves us from death, and guides our bark aright."

THE MILLENNIAL ERA.

By Rev. A. C. Tris, of Howard, Kan.

The Trees of Life—The Tabernacle With Men—The Magnificence of the City—The Precious Foundations—The Pearl of the Gates—The Size of the City.

IN the beginning of this century the question of distance was indeed a question of grave difficulty. Intercourse among nations was a matter of great concern. Now, that barrier is taken out of the way, so that nations may assemble at most any centre of the globe, and, admitting all that can be said in favor of the annihilation of time and distance, yet there are natural difficulties which belong to our corporeal organization, and which are not favorable to the advocacy of the idea that the New Jerusalem shall be a suspended city in the air during the Millennial period, and that the city—fifteen hundred miles high!—suspended above the world will be seen daily in turn by the revolution of the earth on its axis.

Suppose such a dazzling refulgence, such a panorama as never the world saw before, will appear, and the nations will see its light. The great question is, What benefit will the nations derive for it? Indeed, they cannot walk in its light, in a scriptural sense of the word. They may view its glory afar off, but it is an impossibility for their natural eyes and for their present weak bodily organization to investigate the formation of the gates, and the nature of the materials used on the foundations of a city separated thousands of miles away!

• THE TREES OF LIFE.

In Rev. 22 : 2 it is said : "That in the midst of the street (lit., broad place of it), and of the river, on this and on that side, is a tree of life producing twelve fruits, giving forth each one its fruit every month, and the leaves of the tree are for the curing of the nations" (Young's companion to the New Testament).

Dr. Adam Clarke comments on this verse : "Tree must here be an enallage of the singular for the plural, trees of life or trees which yielded fruit by which life was preserved." The account in Ezekiel is this : "And by the river upon the banks thereof, on this side and on that side shall grow all trees for meat, whose leaf shall not fade; it shall bring forth new fruit according to his months . . . and the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for medicine" (Ezek. 47 : 12). Bengel in loco observes that the Greek word translated "healing" has an inceptive signification (a beginning of health); so the Dutch translation, 1636, has also "curing."

We desire to direct the attention of those who advocate the idea that the New Jerusalem will be a city suspended in the air to some facts which are very hard to explain in the verse under consideration. There it is said that a river is proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb, that trees are growing, and that there is a cure for the restoration of decaying physical and spiritual strength of the Gentile nations. To spiritualize these statements is virtually to contradict Rev. 22 : 6 : "And he said unto me, These sayings are faithful and true," and if so, we look upon it as the antitype of the tree of life mentioned in Gen. 2 : 9, and that the second Adam will have indeed His Messianic Millennial reign on earth.

TABERNACLE WITH MEN.

We desire in this connection to direct attention to the curious and most significant words found in Rev. 21 : 3 : "Behold, the tabernacle of God is with the men, and He will dwell [tabernacle] with them." This word "tabernacle" is the same word in Greek that we find in John 1 : 14 : That Christ "tabernacled" with us, and also that the Greek preposition used in Rev. 21 : 3 is stronger in expression than that which is found in John 1 : 14 : "In the midst—among" (Liddell and Scott, Rud.). The Man of sorrow, Jesus the Christ of God, was literally "incarnate." The God-man dwelt with men. Why shall He not have the same glorious indwelling in the New Jerusalem in the Millennial age, being the Lord of glory and King of Israel upon the throne of David? We cannot find sufficient reasons for the contrary.

THE COSTLINESS OF THE CITY.

It might be said that the description of the New Jerusalem is so unique, grand, and refulgent of glory, that it reaches above our comprehension, and cannot be brought to this mundane world. We admit fully our admiration, and also our inability to give an explanation of the great panorama which is set before us, and if we did not find in the Word of God similar representations and expressions, we would proceed no further; but let us pause and contemplate the words of Isaiah : "The light of the sun shall be sevenfold as the light of seven days, in the day that the Lord bindeth up the breach of His people and healeth the stroke of their wound" (Isa. 30 : 26). What a refulgence of light and glory will that be! And yet it is a sure promise made to Israel, the Jews, when restored in Canaan in the Millennial age. It may be argued that Rev. 21 : 21 speaks of "twelve gates, twelve pearls, every several gate was of one pearl, and the street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass." In former articles we have already said a few words about those gates and of the materials of which the walls were built, and therefore we refer the reader to them; here we will only add a few remarks on the subject.

The observant Bible-reader can find many of the expressions about the gates and walls mentioned in Ezekiel's visions (Ezek. 48 : 31-34) and in Isa. 54 : 11, 12, and also that it is worth observation : "That the foundations were garnished [adorned] with all manner of precious stones" (Rev. 21 : 19), and not that they were built of gems. We must not overlook the fact that in 1 Kings 5 : 17 ; 7 : 9, 10 we find the same description, "costly or precious stones," used in the building of the foundation of the temple of Solomon, and also that the Hebrew word translated "costly or precious stones" is used in 1 Kings 10 : 1-10 ; 1 Chron. 20 : 2, and many other places, as precious gems. Josephus (Lib. 8, ch. 2) calls the color of the stones of the temple "white stones," and Rabbi Juda Leo (Lib. 1, ch. 5) says : "That the whole building of the temple consisted of pure white marble, shining as sapphires, yea, that it was like the color of the heaven." Indeed, we ask with Dr. A. Clarke, "Does not this imply that the walls were made of some beautiful yellow stones highly polished?" (Rev. 21 : 18, in loco); and so Grotius, Vitranga, Eichhorn, and a host of eminent scholars have such expression about this matter.

Yet the great question is about the pearls.

Every one knows that a pearl is the peculiar product of certain marine and fresh-water mollusks or shell-fish. In another article we have already called attention to the fact that pearls and precious stones were synonymous words among many of the ancients. To use the substance of pearls as building materials for twelve gates made so high and wide that in each one a messenger can be placed in attendance, and to guide the kings and the nations of the earth, who will bring their glory and honor in the New Jerusalem, is far above our comprehension, and recalls to our mind the Jewish legend taught by Rabbi Jochanan, who related to his disciples : "That he being at sea, he saw angels cutting gems and pearls for the gates of the temple of Jerusalem, each measuring thirty cubits;" but his disciples could not fathom that problem (Bava Batra, fol. 25, 77, and Sanhandrin, fol. 100, 1 p. 393).

Further, let us remark, that in regard to the street or broad place it is said that it was pure gold, as it were transparent glass. The verb "was" is not found in the original. But let us suppose that the broad place was overlaid with gold, as we read of some parts of the temple, which were overlaid with pure gold (11 Chron. 3 : 8); it could not be, very well, a street of solid gold, and then, having the tree of life, or a tree of life growing in it (Rev. 22 : 2), examining the words found in the Song of Solomon ch. 5 : 11, 14, 15), we have nearly the same expressions : "His head was 'pure gold,' fine gold; his hand-rings of gold set with beryl; his belly 'inwards' bright ivory covered with sapphires." In the vision of Nebuchadnezzar "the head was of fine gold" (Dan. 2 : 32). By the Prophet Isaiah : "Babylon is called the golden city" (Isa. 14 : 4), and in Jer. 51 : 7 : "Babylon, a golden cup in the Lord's hand."

DIMENSIONS.

The New Jerusalem "lieth foursquare," and is computed to be in height and length fifteen hundred miles, an area of nearly one quarter of the United States.* Studying the subject closely, we are told that the length is as large as the breadth—"twelve thousand furlongs." "The length and the breadth and the height of it are equal" (Rev. 21 : 16); and yet in the verse following is said : "And he measured the wall thereof, an hundred and forty and four cubits," or two hundred and sixteen feet. What explanation is the right and true one? If the walls should have a thickness of two hundred and sixteen feet, the gates of pearl must have the same dimensions to have an entrance and passage through them. If it means the height of the walls, in such a case there is a conflict with the height of the city! We have another instance of the same nature recorded in Rev. 14 : 20 : "That blood came out of the wine-press, even unto the horses' bridles, by the space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs," a distance of two hundred miles.

In regard to the measurement of the New Jerusalem, perhaps the idea and description ought to lead us to the camp of Israel in the wilderness, which did lie four square; or perhaps it has reference to the cities of the priests and Levites (Num. 35 : 5) : "And ye shall measure from without the city on the east side . . . and the city shall be in the midst; this shall be to them the suburbs of the cities." We only mention those two last suggestions for our consideration. Indeed, the dimensions of the New Jerusalem shall be above all our expectation and comprehension; in truth, now we see only the western shores of this Pacific Ocean of light and joy. We earnestly long for the day when we shall see face to face and not as at present "in a riddle." To give glory to the Lamb, world without end.

* [Mr. Tris underestimates the size. If the city is to be foursquare, as we are told, and each side measures fifteen hundred miles, the area would be two million and a quarter square miles. The area of the United States is about 3,596,521 square miles. We wonder that this fact alone has not convinced Mr. Tris of the fact that it will not be on the earth. When, too, the height of the city, also fifteen hundred miles, is taken into account, the expectation that it will be suspended in the air is confirmed.—E.D.]

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Death of Ex-President Arthur, on Thursday last has called forth a general expression of sorrow. Journals of all parties speak of it with regret. He had won the respect of the public, and even his most vigorous political opponents had learned to esteem him. When he became the twenty-first President of the United States he was placed in a very delicate position at a time when men were disposed to be critical and censorious. He was reminded on all hands that every Vice-President who had been called to the Presidency had failed, and that his own relations with a section of his party were such as to insure his own failure. In the midst of discouragement he undertook the duties of the Executive with a sense of responsibility to the nation, and he never lost sight of that responsibility. His administration was characterized by magnanimity, wisdom, and patriotism, and the nation passed safely through the dangerous crisis under his leadership. He has gone to his grave followed by the respect and gratitude of the whole people. (His portrait and a brief sketch of his life appears on page 749 of this issue.)

A Definition of the Phrase, "Pernicious Activity," which has now become so familiar to politicians, was given by the President last week in a letter to Hon. M. E. Benton revoking his suspension from the office of District Attorney. Mr. Cleveland said: "I did not intend to condemn the making of a political speech by a Federal official to his neighbors and friends, nor at any time and place where it was merely incidental, if the speech itself was decent and fair. But I do not think that such an official can enter as a business a political campaign, and, consenting to a long list of engagements to address political meetings, widely separated and of daily recurrence, fill such engagements without neglecting his duty, if he holds an office worth having, nor without taking with him in the canvass his official power and influence. Therefore this course is condemned. The number of speeches that can be properly made cannot be specified, nor the time when, the place where, nor the circumstances in which they are proper; nor can their character be prescribed. But a correct line of conduct can be determined on without difficulty, I believe, in the light of a desire to follow the spirit of the admonition given by divorcing the conduct of a citizen from the use of official influence in political campaigns, illustrating at all times the truth that official duty is paramount to partisan service, maintaining the dignity of office-holding, avoiding any pretence of control over the political action of others by reason of official place, and teaching the lesson to the people that public positions are not bestowed or held under a pledge of active partisan service." This explanation is doubtless intended to benefit other persons beside the one directly addressed. When new lessons are being taught it is a trying time for those who learn and those who teach.

The Police Difficulty in Washington, D. C., is discreditable from every standpoint. The story as Lieutenant Arnold tells it is that the Chief of Police wanted larger appropriations. He desired to have Congress add at least one hundred men to the force. He therefore suggested to his subordinates that disreputable resorts in the city should be watched, and if any Congressmen visited them their names should be reported to him. Information thus gained was to be used to bring pressure on the Congressmen, who might be expected to vote for the increased appropriations lest their misdeeds should be exposed. The Chief of Police denies the story, and Lieutenant Arnold has been tried for circulating it. It may be hoped there is no truth in the accusation. A chief of police who would engage in a blackmailing operation, and Congressmen who would vote public money to cover their own iniquity, form a combination of the most discreditable kind.

A Shameful Confession was Made in the Court of General Sessions of New York on Friday last. Ex-Alderman Fullgraff appeared as State's evidence in the trial of Alderman McQuade, who was charged with having received a bribe during his term of office. Fullgraff deposed that when the question of granting a franchise for a horse-car route in Broadway was under consideration in the Board of Aldermen a private meeting of thirteen members was held. At that meeting two offers were considered. One was of a bribe of $750,000, half in cash and half in bonds, and the other of $500,000 in cash. It was decided to accept the latter as being the safer, and a man was appointed to receive the money. The aldermen expected to get $22,000 each, but when it became necessary to over-ride the Mayor's veto more votes were bought, which reduced the respective amounts finally received. Something of this kind was known to have taken place before Fullgraff made his confession. The astonishing feature of the affair is that, notwithstanding this fact, no more care is displayed in the selection of aldermen than before.

An Attempt to Poison the Family of Mr. P. D. Armour, the Chicago packer who was the employer most obnoxious to the men in the recent strike, was made on November 15th. A package of buckwheat marked as "a sample" was left at his house with his cook. Warning was given to Mr. Armour by a man who saw the package sent, and overheard the men who sent it say that it contained poison. He therefore had the buckwheat analyzed and learned that it was mixed with strychnine. It is believed that the plot was designed to alarm Mr. Armour rather than to do serious mischief, or the men would not have spoken of it so incautiously. It is nevertheless a matter that should not go unpunished, and the Knights of Labor ought to aid in the search for the guilty parties, who are probably enemies of their own and are trying to bring the organization into disrepute.

The Appointment of Two Ladies as Commissioners of Common Schools in New York was made last week by Mayor Grace. They were Mrs. Mary Nash Agnew, wife of Dr. Agnew, the oculist, and Miss Grace H. Dodge, daughter of William E. Dodge. Both ladies have stated that they will accept. The appointment is an innovation from which much good may be expected. The most successful teachers in the schools are ladies, and it is certain that in passing upon the questions that will come before the commissioners the two new members of the board will be able to give wise counsel. It may be hoped that in this matter other cities will follow the example of New York.

Russia Severed Diplomatic Relations With Bulgaria last week by recalling General Kaulbars and all the Russian consuls in Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia. The pretext for the act was evidently sought by the Czar. It was occasioned by the arrest of an employé of the Russian Consulate for riotous behavior. The man was arrested by the order of the commandant of Philippopolis, General Mutkuroff, the leader of the patriotic party, and the prime mover in the counter revolution which brought Prince Alexander back after his deposition. The Czar ordered Kaulbars to demand the release of the prisoner and the dismissal of the commandant. It was, as the Czar knew, impossible for the Bulgarian Government to comply, as General Mutkuroff is a popular leader whose degradation would lead to a rising of the people. The demand, therefore, was merely a pretext for a rupture. The departure of the Russians will be a relief to the Bulgarian Government if it is not followed by a declaration of war. Their intrigues were a constant source of embarrassment, and their arrogance was intolerable. But war is the only logical sequence of the recall of the Russian representatives. There is, however, some hope that peace may be maintained. The decided stand taken by England, and the probability that she would be allied with Austria, Italy, and Turkey, will render an attack on Bulgaria a serious undertaking for Russia, which not even the Czar would lightly enter upon. The next step on the part of Russia is awaited with intense anxiety, and it is thought that in a few days the question of peace or war will be finally decided. It is reported that the Czar's mental condition is becoming unsound.

Prince Nicholas of Mingrelia is the Czar's candidate for the throne of Bulgaria. A rumor was in circulation last week that the European Powers had indorsed the nomination, but it was contradicted. But little is known of the man. He is about forty years of age, says a cable dispatch to the New York Herald, and is a colonel in the Russian army. The province from which his title is derived is in Russian Trans-Caucasia, and contains not more than seventy-five thousand inhabitants all told. His nomination by Russia and his dependence upon that Power may be supposed to indicate that the Czar sees in him qualities which will render him a supple tool of his own. Whether he will be acceptable to the other Powers or can be forced upon the Bulgarians does not yet appear. The Bulgarians themselves are reported to be considering the question whether, as the Powers are unable to agree on a ruler for them, it would not be possible to solve the problem by declaring Bulgaria a republic.

A Government Measure for the Relief of Irish tenants has, it is stated, been prepared. A synopsis of its provisions was cabled to the New York press on Thursday last. According to that summary it permits tenants holding less than sixty acres to purchase their holdings with Government aid. If the commission sanctions the transfer the Imperial Treasury will advance the purchase money, the commission paying four fifths to the landlord and retaining the other fifth until the tenant's annual instalments amount to one fifth of the stipulated sum. The tenant's repayments are to extend over thirty-nine years, with interest at four per cent per annum. The total necessary to be guaranteed by the Treasury is estimated at $125,000,000. The sales under the Ashbourne act having already exhausted the Parliamentary grant of $25,000,000, it is reported that the Government, trusting to Parliament's sanction, has ordered the Treasury to continue to make advances. If this scheme has the approval of Lord Hartington and the other Liberal seceders it will pass the House.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers with this journal were received last week to the amount of $12. They were from Goshen, O., $4; Keene, N. H., $1; Pingree Grove, Ill., $1; Friend, Massachusetts, $5; Howard Lake, Minn., $1. This will enable us to restore twelve more names to the list. There are many others which we shall be glad to renew if funds are sent for the purpose. Our colored brethren may be assured that no name has been overlooked. It will give us as much pleasure to send them the journal for another year as it will give them to receive it. Let them lay their need before the Lord, who will surely answer their prayers.

A Paragraph Which a Correspondent Thinks is liable to be misunderstood appeared in our sketch of Dr. Henson's life in this journal on November 11th. He informs us that the real crisis of the First Baptist Church in Chicago occurred prior to Dr. Lorimer's settlement there. At that time there was a debt on the building of eighty thousand dollars, and the church was threatened with foreclosure. The current receipts did not cover the current expenditure, and the congregation had diminished to an alarming extent. During Dr. Lorimer's ministry four hundred and forty-eight members were received, mainly by baptisms, the debt was reduced from eighty thousand to eighteen thousand dollars, and the church was crowded. This prosperity, our friend states, has been gloriously maintained under Dr. Henson's ministry.

A Remarkable Revival is in Progress at Tuscaloosa, Ala., which has spread through all the churches. Daily services are being held, and there is a general interest manifested in all circles in the movement. At the hour appointed for the meetings business is suspended, the stores are closed, and even the doors of the saloons are shut. Two hundred conversions were reported at the close of last week. The ministers of the various denominations are all engaged in the work.

The Gift of a Quarter of a Million Dollars for the erection of a church in Philadelphia is reported by the Press of that city. It states that two ladies, who were lately parishioners of the Rev. Dr. J. D. Newlin, have given $250,000 for the erection of a Protestant Episcopal Memorial church at the northwest corner of Eighteenth and Diamond streets. The lot which has been bought is 170x200 feet, and at present contains an old brick house, originally a county seat, once a police station, then a school house, and now vacant for some time, which will be torn down to make way for the erection of church, chapel, rectory, and parish buildings, which will be begun in the spring.

A Convention of Young People's Associations of all the Protestant Evangelical churches of New York will be held on December 9th, and delegates from churches without such associations are invited, with the view of extending the movement. The convention will hold its evening session in the Collegiate Reformed Church, Fifth Avenue and Twenty-ninth Street, when several pastors interested in the work have promised to deliver addresses. A working session, for delegates only, will be held at one o'clock on the same day in the Church of the Strangers, Mercer Street, near Eighth Street. This will be a business meeting, when methods of organization and labor will be discussed.

Indictments for the Murder of Mr. Haddock, the martyred Prohibitionist, were returned by the Grand Jury of Sioux City on November 18th. Ten men are indicted for conspiracy and one for murder. There is also another indictment charging each of the ten with murder. Four of them have not yet been arrested. Two of the prisoners are prepared to give evidence for the State. They will swear that they saw Arensdorf, one of the men now in prison, fire the fatal shot. An important witness has been found who will swear that, shortly before the murder he was approached by a saloon-keeper in the city, who asked him to do the killing, and offered him, if he would, undertake it, a large sum down and to pay his expenses to California or to Europe. Evidence confirmatory of the allegation has been secured.

The Erection of Another Colossal Statue was proposed last week. On Thursday last, seventy prominent Englishmen, resident in this country, assembled in the Brunswick Hotel, New York, to consider the best way of celebrating the jubilee of Queen Victoria's accession to the throne of Great Britain. One enthusiastic gentleman was in favor of a statue of some such nature as that just erected on Bedlow's Island. He felt sure that there was enough spirit and generosity among Englishmen resident here and in the old country to raise a statue fully a hundred feet higher than of Liberty Enlightening the World. Another gentleman thought Staten Island would be a good place for it; the heights of Fort Wadsworth could not be surpassed in his mind. A committee of five was appointed to consider the suggestion and to take measures to carry it out, or to decide on some other mode, equally permanent and conspicuous, of celebrating the jubilee. Whatever may be the outcome of the project, it is worthy of notice as an evidence that the projectors, though living under republican institutions, have kept their loyalty to their sovereign unimpaired, and are even contemplating spending a large sum of money to demonstrate the fact. It is much to be wished that all who call themselves Christians were as eager to prove their loyalty to their King. Many seem anxious rather to identify themselves with the world (Mark 8 : 38).

A Bride and Bridegroom Passed their Wedding night in a Connecticut poorhouse recently. The bridegroom, an industrious, frugal young man was married at Bridgeport on November 16th. After the wedding ceremony he drove out with his wife to the country town some few miles away, where he had built and furnished a pretty cottage for their future home. They arrived in the evening only to find the cottage a heap of smouldering ruins, through the carelessness of the person employed to get the place in readiness for their reception. Very much discouraged, they turned the horse's head and drove back toward Bridgeport. They travelled on through the darkness until, when about halfway to their destination, one of the wheels broke in pieces, and the newly-married pair found themselves lying in the road. It was nearly eleven o'clock then, and they made their way to the only light visible. The bridegroom told his story and asked for shelter for the night. They were hospitably received, and a bedroom placed at their disposal. In the morning they were shocked to find that they had spent the first night of their married life in the county poor house. Their chagrin, though natural, was purely sentimental. They were not really disgraced by being driven by misfortune to share with others, still more unfortunate, a refuge established for the homeless. It may be hoped that the same feeling will never deter them from entering the narrow way in which the majority of the travellers are poor (James 2 : 5).

A Voting Machine is Suggested by a Texas journal as a means of saving time and trouble. It remarks that, as a large number of voters may be relied upon to vote the straight ticket of the party to which they belong, without caring what is the character of the men whose names are upon the ticket, a machine might be used to register their votes which would save them the trouble of repeating an act which they have pledged themselves to perform at the bidding of the party conventions. A machine to vote the straight ticket for every registered unalterable partisan would thus be simply a fair economy of time. The regular counting of registered straight party votes would go on simply until the citizen signified the transfer of his vote to the other party, or took it upon himself to select and vote according to his individual discretion. The editor, of course, makes the suggestion in a sarcastic mood, but if he mixes in religious circles he must have seen the principle in operation. There are many church members who seem to regard the church as a worshipping machine, and appear to imagine that if they pay for a seat and contribute to the church funds there is no necessity for attending regularly in person (Heb. 10 : 25).

Nine Years of Self-Inflicted Punishment terminated on November 17th in the death of an obstinate woman. In the year 1877, an inmate of the poorhouse of Pettis County, Mo., became almost crazed with anger one day over the conduct of the keeper of the poor farm. So wild was she in her rage that she was locked in her room alone, and left to meditate until the following morning. At that time the keeper of the place entered her apartment and found her in bed. She was not ill but she refused to arise. Days, weeks, and months passed, but never once did the woman leave her couch unless lifted from it. The medical fraternity visited her, and without exception pronounced her perfectly well, but, notwithstanding this fact, she remained in bed. Months grew into years without change, but last spring the woman was actually taken ill. She lingered until Wednesday of last week, when death came. She had remained in bed nine consecutive years because of a fit of anger. Doubtless in all that time she must often have felt a desire to arise and go about her work, but pride and anger and an obstinate spirit restrained her. None are so utterly enslaved as those who are ruled by their own evil passions (Job 5 : 2).

A Boy was Devoured by Wolves in Missouri last week, and it is feared that his companion shared his fate. On Monday, November 15th, two boys, aged respectively fifteen and sixteen years, residing near Dexter, Mo., left their homes to gather hickory nuts. They did not return Monday night, and on Tuesday a party was organized to search for the boys. Late at night the remains of one of them were discovered in a wild and lonely ravine. Nothing but his clothing and a few bones were found, and an investigation showed that he had been devoured by wolves. No trace of his companion could be discovered. Both Stoddard and Bollinger Counties are overrun with wolves, and it is believed that the lads were chased by a pack after dark and separated in their flight. A pack of wolves has been seen near Bloomfield, and they were very bold. Doubtless the news will cause parents in that neighborhood to take extra care that their children do not wander around after nightfall, and every child will be warned of his danger. If similar vigilance were exercised in respect to the great enemy of souls, who is more to be dreaded than a wolf, fewer children would fall victims to his wiles, and parents would not for the sake of gain expose their offspring to peril (1 Peter 5 : 8).

A Curious Will is the Subject of Litigation in the New York courts. The testator, who died thirty years ago, left fifty thousand dollars in trust, the proceeds to be applied to the support of his nephew. He directed that at the death of the nephew the principal should be given to some society, whose object was the dissemination of a knowledge of the arts and sciences and of agricultural and mechanical pursuits among the Jews of Jerusalem. If, on the death of the nephew, there should be in existence no society qualified to thus distribute the money, the will provided that the fifty thousand dollars should go to the nieces of a relative. The nephew is now dead, and the North American Relief Society for the Indigent Jews in Jerusalem, a local corporation, claims the money on the ground that it is qualified to do the work contemplated by the testator. The nieces insist that none of the corporate claimants are entitled to the money, and that it should go to themselves. It is probable that the nieces will win the suit. There is a certain pathos about the yearning the testator evidently had for the prosperity of the Jews in Jerusalem. It is a pity that a man capable of the fraternal and patriotic feeling should not have realized that it is not a knowledge of the arts and sciences that is most needed to promote their welfare, but of Jesus as their Messiah (Rom. 10 : 1).

OUR SYMPATHIZING HIGH PRIEST.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Who in the days of His flesh, when He had offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto Him that was able to save Him from death, and was heard in that He feared; though He were a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered; and being made perfect, He became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey Him; called of God an high priest after the order of Melchisedec."—HEBREWS 5: 7-10.

Christ's Mission—Its God-ward Aspect—Its Human Side—His Suitability for the Priestly Work—I. As a Suppliant—His Weakness—His Necessities—His Intensity—His Understanding—His Fear—His Success—II. As a Son—What it is to Obey—III. As a Saviour—Perfect and Eternal.

THE Holy Spirit in this chapter reminds us that two things were necessary in a high priest: first, he must be suitable for the men for whom he stood; and next, he must be acceptable with God. "Every high priest taken from among men is ordained for men in things pertaining to God." He must be fit from both points of view, both manward and God-ward. Our Lord Jesus Christ was ordained of God from of old, and did not of Himself assume the position of high priest. The prophets spake of Him as the Messiah of God, and Jehovah Himself declared: "Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec." When He came into the world the Holy Ghost bore witness to His being the Son of the Highest. At His baptism there came a voice from heaven saying: "Thou art My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," and that same voice was thrice heard declaring the same fact. The Father has given further testimony to

THE MISSION OF CHRIST,

"in that He hath raised Him from the dead," and hath caused Him to enter into the heavenly places on our behalf. Moreover, He has given Him a pledge that as Melchisedec, being both King and Priest, He shall sit at His right hand until He hath made His enemies His footstool. Our Lord Jesus has been chosen, ordained, and glorified as our "great High Priest, that has passed into the heavens." This is the groundwork of our comfort in our Lord Jesus, for we know that He is one with the Father, and that all things are done by Him as the Messenger of the covenant, the authorized Representative of Jehovah our God.

That is not the point to which I call your attention this morning; I would have you follow the text, and consider the pre-eminent suitability of our Lord Jesus to be a High Priest for us, viewed from the human side. A high priest must be one "who can have compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way; for that he himself also is compassed with infirmity." He must be one who has learned compassion in the school of suffering, so that he can succor the afflicted.

I. First, then, that we may see the suitability of our Lord to deal with us in our cares and sorrows, we shall view Him

AS A SUPPLIANT.

The text begins with a word which reveals His weakness: "Who in the days of His flesh." Our blessed Lord was in such a condition that He pleaded out of weakness with the God who was able to save. When our Lord was compassed with the weakness of flesh He was much in prayer. It would be an interesting exercise for the younger people to note all the times in which the Lord Jesus is said to have prayed. The occasions recorded are very numerous; but these are no doubt merely a few specimens of a far greater number. This is said to have been the case "in the days of His flesh." This term is used to distinguish His life on earth from His former estate in glory. "The days of His flesh" intend this mortal life—the days of His weakness, humiliation, labor, and suffering.

Among the days of His life on earth there were some which peculiarly deserved to be called "the days of His flesh"—days in which His feebleness pushed itself to the front. Then men saw less of His greatness as a teacher and more of His suffering as man. I should call that one of the days of His flesh when He went to Gethsemane, and "was exceeding sorrowful, even unto death." He was very heavy, because the shadow of His cross fell upon Him with a denser darkness as He drew nearer to His death upon it. When the dread desertion by God which was the centre of His grief began to startle Him; when men esteemed Him "stricken, smitten of God and afflicted," then were "the days of His flesh." Prostrate under the olives, pouring out His inmost soul in plaintive entreaties, even to a bloody sweat, you see your Lord a suppliant in weakness—"in the days of His flesh."

Brethren, I beseech you to think of our Lord's pleading "in the days of His flesh" as a matter of fact. Do not dream of Him as though He were a phantom, and of His prayers as if they were part of a mere show. He was a real man, and His prayers were as real as yours can be. Believe in Jesus as man. You would be indignant at any one who would diminish the glory of His Godhead; and most justly so; but oh, do not yourself take away from Him the truth of His humanity; He was in very deed made flesh and dwelt among us. This was the case even when His apostles beheld His glory, "the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth!" We must get a firm grip of the true humanity, or else we lose the sacrificial death, the resurrection, and all the rest; and the brotherhood of our Lord, which is a grand source of consolation, also disappears.

In the days of His flesh our divine Lord felt

HIS NECESSITIES.

The words: "He offered up prayers and supplications," prove that He had many needs. Men do not pray and supplicate unless they have greater need than this world can satisfy. Men work for what they can get by working, and pray for that which can by no other means be obtained. The Saviour offered no petitions by way of mere form; His supplications arose out of an urgent sense of His need of heavenly aid. It is difficult to realize it, but so it is, that our divine and innocent Saviour placed Himself in such a condition for our sakes that His needs were manifold. Specially in the garden He cried again and again: "If it be possible, let this cup pass from Me." He can have pity upon you in your loneliness, your distraction, your apparent desertion, your sinking of heart, your sorrowfulness even unto death. Look to Him, then, in your night of weeping, and be of good cheer.

Those of you who are only now beginning to pray, I would encourage you to remember Jesus as setting you the example of praying. If your prayers have but few words in them, and are mainly made up of crying and tears, yet in this they are like those of your Saviour, and so you may hope that they will be accepted. Jesus prayed under discouragements; what He did Himself He will help you to do. He knows what the agony of prayer means, and He will cast a brother's eye on you when in the bitterness of your repentance you seek the Lord. How clear it is that we have a suitable High Priest, of tender heart, and loving soul!

Further, let us see how like the Son of God was to us in

of prayer. When a man so courageous, so patient as Jesus, betakes Himself to cries and tears, we may be sure that the sorrow of His heart has passed all bounds. His soul within Him must have been bursting with grief. We know it was so by another sign; for the life-blood forgot to course in its usual channels, and overflowed its banks in a sweat of blood. I do not think, as some do, that it was merely a sweat such as is common to labor; but I believe it was a sweat of blood, or the expression would not have been used, "as it were great drops of blood." A sweat of blood has now and then been seen upon men in great and fatal alarm; but the Saviour's was more wonderful than any of these cases; for so profuse was this bloody sweat, that it was, as it were, great drops of it "falling down to the ground." This was prayer indeed; supplication which exhausted His whole manhood. Body, soul, and spirit were now upon the rack of anguish, and upon the strain of agony. He pleaded with God after a more piteous, painful, terrible, and powerful sort than you and I have yet attained to. But, brethren, here is the point: if it comes to your case to be in a dark, dark hour, and to be praying with the heavens like brass above your head, and if you are obliged to cry aloud, and weep your soul away, then remember Jesus in the days of His flesh.

Still, to proceed with the text: we have seen our Lord's needs, and the intensity of His prayer; now note in prayer. He prayed "unto Him that was able to save Him from death." The expression is startling; the Saviour prayed to be saved. This passage may be read in two ways: it may mean that He would be saved from actually dying if it could be done consistently with the glorifying of the Father; or it may mean that He pleaded to be saved out of death, though He actually descended into it. The word may be rendered either from or out of. The Saviour viewed the great Father as able to preserve Him in death from the power of death, so that He should triumph on the cross; and also as able to bring Him up again from among the dead. He believed in the power of God to save Him from death, and even when cast down with fear He did not let go His hold on God. He pleaded just as you and I should plead, impelled by fear and encouraged by faith. Let us imitate His intensity, His intelligence, and His faith.

It will further help you if I now call your attention to

HIS FEAR.

Martyrs have died without the preceding dread which fell upon our Lord; but remember, that the help of God which sustained them was taken away from Jesus; and consider, also, that His death was special, and differed from that of all others of our race; for in that death there was condensed the penalty due to sin. To the righteous man death is not now a penalty, but a mode of going home; to Jesus it was in the fullest sense the penalty of death for human guilt. He saw before Him, as we do not, all the pains and torments of death; He knew what He had to bear, and foretasted in the garden the smart involved in being a surety for sinful man. His soul was "exceeding sorrowful, even unto death." So when you tremble after sipping your cup of bitterness, think of Jesus trembling too. When you, in entering into the valley of death's shade, feel yourself greatly disturbed at the prospect before you, think of Jesus who was heard in His fear. Come, you, that fear, and find help in one who also feared. Borrow courage from one who out of fear prayed Himself into victory.

But then notice another thing in the text—namely, in prayer, which also brings Him near to us. He was heard "in that He feared." Oh, my soul! to think that it should be said of thy Lord that He was heard, even as thou, a poor suppliant, art heard. Yet the cup did not pass from Him, neither was the bitterness thereof in the least abated. When we are compelled to bear our thorn in the flesh and receive no other answer than "My grace is sufficient for thee," let us see our fellowship with Jesus and Jesus' fellowship with us.

II. Let us now spend a few moments in beholding our Lord

AS A SON.

His prayers and pleadings were those of a son with a father: "Though He were a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered." The Sonship of our dear Saviour is well attested. Thrice did the voice out of the excellent glory proclaim this truth, and He was "declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead." Yes; He that cried, He that wept, He that pleaded until He came to a bloody sweat, and He from whom the cup could not pass till He had drained it to the dregs, was nevertheless the only begotten Son of God. So, my brother, when you are put to great grief do not doubt your sonship. What son is there whom the father chasteneth not? When you are in heaviness through manifold trials, do not listen to the insinuations of the enemy: "If thou be the Son of God," Yea, if you should have to ask: "Why hast Thou forsaken me?" do not doubt your sonship. You are as much a son when you walk in the dark as when you rejoice in the light of Jehovah's countenance.

Being a Son, the text goes on to tell us that He had to learn obedience. Is not that a wonderful thing? As man our Saviour had to learn. He was of a teachable spirit, and the Lord Himself instructed Him. All God's children go to school, for it is written: "All thy children shall be taught of the Lord." The lesson is practical—we learn to obey. Our Lord took kindly to this lesson; He did always the things which pleased the Father. This is our time of schooling and discipline, and we are learning to obey, which is the highest and best lesson of all. How near this brings our Lord to us, that He should be a Son and should have to learn! We go to school to Christ and with Christ, and so we feel His fitness to be our compassionate High Priest.

Jesus must needs learn by suffering. As swimming is only to be learned in the water, so is obedience only learned by actually doing and suffering the divine will. Obedience cannot be learned at the university, unless it be at the College of Experience. You must suffer the commandment to have its way with you, and then it will educate you. We think when we are first converted that we have learned obedience, and assuredly we have in a measure received the spirit by which we obey; but no man knows obedience till he has actually obeyed, both in an active and a passive sense. Even the Lord Jesus must come under the law, honor the law, and suffer the law, or else He cannot learn obedience. Who knows

WHAT IT IS TO OBEY

God to the full until he has had to lay aside his own will in the most tender and painful respects? To plead with God for the life of a beloved child, and yet to see that dear child die, and to kiss the rod—this is to learn obedience. To go alone and plead with God for the life of a husband or wife, and agonize with Him for the boon, and then to be compelled to weep at the new-made grave, and yet to say: "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord"—this is to learn obedience. A Son learning obedience: that is our Lord. May we not joyfully walk with Him in all the rough paths of duty? May we not safely lean on the arm of One who knows every inch of the way?

Our Lord learned by suffering mixed with prayer and supplication. His was no unsanctified sorrow, His griefs were baptized in prayer. It cost Him cries and tears to learn the lesson of His sufferings. The practical point I am trying to drive at in my poor way is this: let us trust ourselves with Him who as a Son knows the training and discipline of sons. Being yourself a son, look up and see what the elder brother endured, and know that "in that He hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succor them that are tempted." You who are afraid that you never will be the children of God, come and hear your Saviour cry as He rises from prayer: "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Sons of men, whither do you wander? Why not come to Him who is made like to yourselves? If you have never trusted Him before, I think that you should begin this morning, now that you see His fellowship with you, His sympathy with you. I do not at this time set Him forth to you in His power and glory—that I will do on another occasion; but I bring Him before you in His weakness and humiliation, hoping thereby to attract to Him the poor and needy who need such a helper.

III. Time fails me, and therefore we can do no more than spend a brief time in beholding the Lord Jesus

AS A SAVIOUR.

It is to this end that he pleaded as a Suppliant and learned obedience as a Son. As a Saviour He is perfect. Being made perfect through suffering, He is able fully to discharge His office. Nothing is wanting in the character and person of Christ in order to His being able to save to the uttermost. He is a Saviour, and a great one. You are wholly lost, but Jesus is perfectly able to save. You are sore sick, but Jesus is perfectly able to heal. You have gone, perhaps, to the extreme of sin; He has gone to the extreme of atonement. In every office essential to our salvation Jesus is perfect. Nothing is lacking in Him in any one point. However difficult your case may seem, He is equal to it. Made perfect by suffering, He is able to meet the intricacies of your trials, and to deliver you in the most complicated emergency.

Observe that it is eternal salvation: "the author of eternal salvation." Jesus does not save us to-day and leave us to perish to-morrow; He knows what is in man, and so He has prepared nothing less than eternal salvation for man. A salvation which was not eternal would turn out to be no salvation at all. Those whom Jesus saved are saved indeed. Man can be the author of temporary salvation; but only He who is "a High Priest forever" can bring in a salvation which endures forever. An eternal salvation is worth having, is it not? Jesus does not give a salvation which will let you fall from grace, and perish after all; but a salvation which will keep you to the end—though you should live to be as old as Methuselah. Salvation to eternity and through eternity is provided by Jesus.

Furthermore, inasmuch as He has learned obedience, and become a perfect High Priest, His salvation is wide in its range, for it is unto "all them that obey Him." Not to some few, not to a little select company here and there, but "unto all them that obey Him." One of his first commandments is "Repent." Will you obey Him in that, and quit your sin? Then He is the author of eternal salvation to you.

HIS GREAT COMMAND

is: "Believe and live." Will you trust Him, then? For if you do, He is the author of eternal salvation to you. He whom I have tried to describe with all my heart—this blessed sympathetic fellow-sufferer of ours—He is willing and able to save all of you who will obey Him at this moment by trusting Him.

Note, that He is all this forever, for He is "a priest forever." If you could have seen Him when He came from Gethsemane, you think you could have trusted Him. Oh, trust Him to-day, for He is "called of God to be an high priest after the order of Melchisedec," and that order of Melchisedec is an everlasting and perpetual priesthood! He is able to-day to plead for you, able to-day to put away your sins. Oh that God the Holy Spirit may lead many of you to come and obey Him at once!

A heavy atmosphere fills this Tabernacle this morning, making it difficult to speak and more difficult to hear; but yet if some sudden news came to you, as the burning of your house, or the death of a dear child, you would shake off all lethargy and wake up from all dulness and heaviness of spirit, and therefore I claim your liveliest thoughts for the solemn subject which I have introduced to you. Think much of the Son of God, the Lord of heaven and earth, who for our salvation loved and lived and served and suffered. He that made man was made man. As a suppliant, with cries and tears He pleaded with God, even He before whom the hosts of heaven bow adoringly. He has still that tenderness to which He was trained by His sufferings; He bids you now come to Him. Ye that love Him approach Him now, and read the love which is engraven on His heart. You who have not hitherto known Him, come boldly to Him and trust Him who has come so near to you. The Man is very near akin unto us. Behold how He loves us! He bends to us with eternal salvation in His hands. Believe in Him and live. God grant it! Amen.

THE CLERGY IN THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.*

[The part taken by the clergy of France in the excesses of the French Revolution of 1789, and the readiness with which they abjured religion altogether and avowed themselves infidels, has long seemed inexplicable. The following details about them show that their previous history prepared them to fall in a time of trial.]

The clerical elections to the States General are far more interesting than those of the noblesse, for in them first appeared the signs of what has been called the insurrection of the curés. The unequal division of the wealth of the Church in France is fairly shown by the fact that out of its income of two hundred and twenty-four millions of francs ($44,800,000), the curés received but thirty-six millions (little more than one seventh of the whole), and the dignitaries of the Church expected to have in the electoral assemblies an influence proportionate to their wealth and rank; but they were to be greatly disappointed, for, acting under the advice of the curés of Dauphiné, the inferior clergy in nearly every province utterly disregarded their spiritual chiefs. In this behavior they were encouraged by their numbers, for the règlement allowed every beneficed curé or vicaire—as long as he returned himself or could find a substitute to sing mass on Sunday, if a Sunday intervened during the course of the elections—to be present at the electoral assembly and to vote in person, while even the wealthiest monasteries and chapters might only send single representatives, and the bishops had only their own votes. Beside the insurrection of the curés against their bishops, a strong feeling of dislike toward the monks on the part of the curés is as clearly perceived in the course of the electoral period. This feeling had shown itself very early in the reign of Louis XVI., and may be attributed in part to the suppression of the Jesuits, whose place as teachers of the inferior clergy had been taken by the oratorians, who held distinctly Jansenist opinions. It was a result of their education also that the curés differed from their bishops in their leniency toward Protestantism, and even toward rationalism; for, while as recently as January, 1788, the bishops in conclave at Paris had solemnly and emphatically protested against the very moderate concessions made to the Protestants, and had always condemned Rousseau, the country curés lived on good terms with the Protestant pastors and knew by heart Rousseau's "Confessions of a Savoyard Vicar."

The character of the bishops and dignitaries of the Church, from the very mode of their appointment, could hardly be expected to be particularly moral, or their sentiments particularly liberal. They were usually younger sons of wealthy noblemen or ministers of State; for in order to maintain the family property undivided, it was the custom for only one son of a noble house to be allowed to marry, while the others either took orders or became knights of the Order of St. John of Malta. Such bishops, and so chosen, could not be expected to be in sympathy with either the curés or the people. They lived in Paris, and regarded their dignities merely as sources of income, and were incessantly mixed up in court intrigues in order to procure their translation to richer sees.

* From "A History of the French Revolution," by H. Morse Stephens, which, owing to the discovery of a large number of important documents the existence of which was unknown to previous historians, is more complete and lucid than any of the older histories, clearing up difficulties and explaining facts which have been mysteries from that time to this. Silas Epstein's Death-bed.

The unpopularity of monks and friars with the parochial clergy is easily accounted for by the fact that in nearly every parish the greater tithes, and even the greater portion of the lesser tithes, were exacted for the benefit of some distant monastery, which did nothing for the parish, while the curé had to do all the work for a mere pittance. Most of these monasteries were extremely wealthy, and as the number of monks had steadily declined for more than twenty-five years, it followed that the abbots and priors were richer than ever before. These appointments had fallen, like the bishoprics, under the control of the court, and were generally filled by cadets of noble families on their way to a bishopric, or held by them with a bishopric. The wealth, absenteeism, and superciliousness of the abbés and priors made monks in general unpopular, yet the individual monks who formed the communities had often as much reason to complain of their superiors as the curés or the people in general.

SILAS EPSTEIN'S DEATH.

(See Illustration.)

SILAS EPSTEIN was dying. There was no doubt about it, for Dr. Homer had declared there was no hope, and Dr. Rogers, who called him in, had said that if Homer could not save him no one in the world could. Beside this, Epstein himself felt that he was dying. He knew there was no hope of living, and what was worse there was no hope of eternal life. He was going out into the dark, and did not know what awaited him beyond. Christian ministers had warned him that eternal punishment awaited him, but Epstein did not believe them.

"If God is the Being you describe Him," he said, on one occasion, to a clergyman who had been more persistent than any one else in trying to get him to give attention to the things of God, "if God is my Father, as you say, He will not keep me in suffering through all eternity. You know no more about what lies beyond this life than I do. It is all a mystery. Maybe I shall not live again at all."

This was quite a long speech for the taciturn man to make. Usually, half a dozen words, spoken in a surly voice, were enough to shake off any one who worried him about religion, but that once he did speak out and showed how empty and barren was the soil within of any plant of hope. Yet now that he was dying he felt uncomfortable. He was not so easy in the thought of dying as he expected to be. He had a consciousness that, apart from his own condition—his own interests after death—he had not done right in neglecting God, and he was sure there was a God.

Epstein's wife and his two sons were like himself, utterly careless of religion, living for the world and oblivious of God and divine things. But his little daughter Jessie, the child of his old age, now about fourteen years old, was different from the others. To Epstein's great annoyance she had been taken by some of her school-fellows to Sunday-school, and when he attempted to prevent her going her distress was so great that Epstein, who loved the child intensely, gave way, and let her continue to go. She was away on a visit just now, but he had her sent for; he felt he must see her before he died. He counted the hours until she came, and when he heard her he sent every one out of the room that he might see her alone.

"Father! Dear father!" she said, as she threw her arms around him and was clasped in his embrace.

"Jessie, my child, I am going to leave you. Poor Jessie!" he said, looking at her lovingly.

Jessie's tears came into her eyes and welled over, and the father could not keep back his own. They were silent a few moments and then the father said,

"You've been a good daughter, Jessie; you love your father dearly?"

"Very dearly, father," said Jessie.

"I wish you would pray for me, Jessie. I believe there is no one in the house beside you who knows how. I have neglected it; I think I have been wrong now."

"Oh, father, let me fetch our minister to show you how to be saved. I am sure you can be saved if you will. Jesus will receive you."

"No, my child, I want no minister. I do not believe in these things at all, but I would like you to pray. There is no time now for anything more."

Full of sorrow, but afraid to cross him by urging him further, Jessie knelt down and prayed. She begged for her father's life, for time to be given him for repentance, for the Holy Spirit to show him the way of salvation. She held his hand in hers as she prayed, and she felt it twitch violently. She looked up, saw a spasm pass over the face of her father, and then the jaw fell. She rose and called her mother. They came to him quickly; but it was too late. Epstein was dead, and there was no hope.

THE LATE EX-PRESIDENT ARTHUR.

THE death of ex-President Arthur has come on the nation as a surprise. When he returned to his home a few weeks ago, very hopeful reports of his condition were sent out. It was stated that he had made so much progress during his sojourn at New London that he expected to be well enough soon to resume his law business. He remained quietly at home, however, and was evidently still suffering. On Wednesday morning, November 17th, his attendant, entering his bedroom to call him, at the usual hour, found him unconscious. Medical assistance was at once summoned, and it was found that he was suffering from cerebral apoplexy. He recovered consciousness under medical treatment, but was unable to speak. He lay in that condition until five o'clock on Thursday morning, when he quietly passed away.

Chester Alan Arthur was fifty-six years of age, having been born October 5th, 1830, in Franklin County, Vt. He was the eldest son of Rev. William Arthur, a Baptist clergyman, who emigrated to this country from the County Antrim, Ireland, in his eighteenth year, and died October 27th, 1875, in Newtonville, near Albany. General Arthur was educated at Union College, and afterward taught a country school during two years in Vermont, and then, having managed by rigid economy to save about $500, he started for New York, and entered the law office of ex-Judge E. D. Culver as a student. After being admitted to the Bar, he formed a partnership with his intimate friend and room-mate, Henry D. Gardiner, with the intention of practising in the West, and for three months they roamed about in the Western States in search of an eligible site, but in the end returned to New York, where they hung out their joint shingle, and entered upon a successful legal career. General Arthur soon afterward married the daughter of Lieutenant Herndon, United States Navy. Mrs. Arthur died in 1880, deeply lamented by her husband and children.

General Arthur was a delegate to the Convention at Saratoga that founded the Republican Party. Previous to the outbreak of the war he was Judge Advocate of the Second Brigade of the State Militia, and Governor Edwin D. Morgan, soon after his inauguration, selected him to fill the position of Engineer-in-Chief of his staff. In 1861 he held the post of Inspector-General, and soon afterward was advanced to that of Quartermaster-General, which he held until the expiration of Morgan's term of office.

At the expiration of Governor Morgan's term, General Arthur returned to his law practice, and for a short time held the position of counsel to the Board of Tax Commissioners of New York, at $10,000 per annum. That office he resigned when he discovered that he could hold it only on terms inconsistent with his standard of integrity. On November 20th, 1871, President Grant nominated General Arthur to the office of Collector of the Port of New York, and four years later, when his term expired, renominated him, an honor that had never been shown to any previous Collector in the history of the port. He was removed by President Hayes on July 12th, 1878, despite the fact that two special committees made searching investigation into his administration, and both reported themselves unable to find anything upon which to base a charge against him. In their pronouncements announcing the change, both President Hayes and Secretary Sherman bore official witness to the purity of his acts while in office. A petition for his retention was signed by every judge of every court in the city, by all the prominent members of the Bar, and by nearly every important merchant in the collection district, but this General Arthur suppressed.

After General Arthur's removal from the Custom House he engaged in the practice of the law, and in the direction of Republican political affairs in the State, being Chairman of the Republican State Committee. At the Chicago Convention of 1880 he was nominated to the second place on the Republican ticket, and elected. When President Garfield died on September 19th, 1881, General Arthur became his constitutional successor, and was duly sworn in as President of the United States. Many fears were entertained when he commenced his term lest his previous relations with partisan politics would render his course in the Presidential chair injurious to national interests; but his conduct throughout his term was singularly judicious, dignified, and patriotic. When he left the White House he stood higher in the estimation of the people than he did when he entered it—a record almost unique in the history of the Presidents. In person he was over six feet in height, broad-shouldered, athletic, and handsome. He was a member of the Episcopal Church.

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leander S. Keyser.*

Among Old Friends.

THE last day of school was now near at hand. No child in a boarding-school far away from a happy home, no prisoner serving a term in a penitentiary had ever looked forward to the day of release with more yearning than Leroy had anticipated this day. He could scarcely realize it when it came at last. He rose early, spent a long period in prayer, and then went out for a walk before commencing the duties of the day. He tried to shut out of his mind the thought of its significance, but it would force itself on his consciousness and caused the hours to pass in a dreamy, ecstatic manner altogether new to him. When the school was over, and the last of the children gone, he shut the doors and sat down to think it all over.

He went back in thought to the day when he first entered those doors. What was he then? A gloomy, discontented, disappointed man! First, there had been the vexatious fact that he was thrown back a whole year in his studies. True, the sacrifice had been voluntary, and there was the alleviating thought that his dear mother had been relieved by it of her embarrassment. The consciousness of having done right, of having sacrificed himself for another, and that other the one whom he loved to serve, had soothed him; but the annoyance, the irritation produced by the fact that the sacrifice had been required had been hard to bear.

Then there had been the heart-breaking disappointment that had resulted from Carrie's rejection of him. That was the worst of all. Carrie's conduct seemed capricious to him then; it appeared as if she had been playing with his love, letting it grow and develop without uttering a word to warn him that it could never come to fruition. He remembered well how he had felt about her when he commenced the drudgery now ended. Very bitterly had he felt toward her as of one who had wronged him deeply. It had been the bitterest drop in the cup that was full of bitterness.

But, looking back to that day now in his new life, he saw that the real essence of his misery was in his attitude toward God. The troubles would have been far less heavy if he had possessed faith. They had seemed to him the product of a destiny inimical to him. His load was piled up by some malignant fate which took satanic delight in laying burdens upon him, manacled his feet, and tripping him up in his efforts to rise and distinguish himself.

The survey of the year's events, the sharp and blessed contrast between the end and the beginning of his school-work could have but one result—that of overflowing thankfulness to God for bringing him to this better time and opening his blinded eyes. He rose and turned the key in the door of the school-house, and there, with the associations of his struggle, his trial, and his victory all around him, he poured out his heart in thanksgiving. Thus, the period that had commenced in darkness and discontent and fierce rebellion, ended in light and joy and thankfulness. He left the school-house for the last time, a graver, humbler man, but one far better and happier than he who entered it a few months before.

The scene in the Christian home on the first night of his return was one never to be forgotten. The joyful news that at last her prayers were answered filled the mother's heart with gladness too deep for utterance. She knew it would come, she said, but she feared she would not see it while she lived. Leroy, her own boy, the pride and joy of her life, the boy who had sacrificed himself for her, the boy for whom she had prayed without ceasing, the boy who had been lost, was found! The news was so delightful that she could say, like aged Simeon: "Now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation." Clinging to Leroy's hand as, seated in the old room hallowed by many varied associations, he spoke reverently of his faith and hope and love, her eyes filled with tears, the happiest she had ever shed. And Allan, too, was made happy. He could welcome Leroy as his brother in a double sense. Brotherhood in Christ is very close and very pleasant, but never does it draw two hearts together in a sweeter, holier bond than when it unites brethren according to the flesh. Allan was no longer the teacher in divine things. As a great cathedral which has been admired by the unlearned and has been an object of awe and veneration to those who have never seen other architectural triumphs becomes far more wonderful to them when a friend who has studied deeply and has travelled far explains its beauties to them, and shows wherein it surpasses other edifices, so the Christian religion became to Allan under Leroy's impassioned words a greater and a grander thing than he had ever supposed it to be. To Allan and his mother that summer vacation was a time of wondrous delight.

Leroy hesitated long before deciding to return to N. S. College. He realized that a return would necessarily involve pain to him. All its scenes and associations would speak to him of Carrie, and that was still a string of his harp that gave forth a moan when it was touched. True, she would not be there. The newspaper so obligingly sent to him had said that she would be married before the coming term, but still the walks, the church, and the college buildings would remind him of her at every turn, and he felt that only in forgetfulness of her was there a prospect of peace of mind. On the other hand, did not his duty lie there? In the very place where he had been most outspoken against Christianity was it not right that he should declare how great things God had done for him? He was known there as a sceptic, as an almost avowed infidel, had been accepted by the younger students as a leader in the anti-Christian campaign. Some of them probably had been helped along the bad way and encouraged by his example. It was due to them that they should witness the change. It might be that even now when Christianity was being advocated, or when there was a debate and the claims of Christ were being pressed, some might be saying: "Ah, if Ransom were here, these Christians would be confuted." Clearly there was no place where there was so bright a prospect of his doing good as at the N. S. College, and to Leroy, now, that was a weighty consideration. Yes; he would take up the cross of the pain which the old place with its associations of his lost love must give, and would go back to declare that he had been brought into the light.

The news of his return passed quickly through the rooms as the students gathered after the vacation in little groups to talk over the holiday, the coming term, and renew old friendships. It was welcome news to many, for in spite of his conceit and his impatience, Leroy had been popular in the college. He had quite an ovation when he met them all in his favorite haunt which had been the scene of his triumphs, the Franklin Society. The old friends crowded around him as he appeared at the first assembly, shaking his hand, and joining in giving him a hearty welcome. Yet all the congratulations and the pleasure the welcome gave him could not prevent a feeling of sadness as he seemed again to see the form of Carrie appear on the stage and read her essay and retire. He tried to brush the feeling aside, and soon was engrossed in an earnest conversation with his favorite tutor, Professor Rich.

He told him about the change that had taken place in his life. As he proceeded in the narrative the smiling professor wiped his nose, then quickly elevated his handkerchief to his eyes to brush away a tear, and tried hard to be unmoved; at last he took Leroy's hand, but was too full to utter a word. However, after suppressing his emotions, he said, quoting Leroy's puerile peroration to his famous speech: "Let them fight. Let them fight it out," and he made the biggest kind of an effort to laugh.

By some means the president of the society discovered that Leroy was converted from his unbelief, and he called him to the stage to open with prayer. The house was almost as quiet as the tomb as the young sceptic's voice rose softly in the room. It was a simple, earnest prayer—an acknowledgment of past sin, a supplication for forgiveness of past doubt and irreverence, an expression of gratitude for the convincing power of the unhindered truth, and a petition for the good Father's blessing upon the college and society at the beginning of the term. His voice trembled as he thanked God that old friends had been permitted to meet in those dear halls again.

All hearts were touched and thrilled by that simple, fervent prayer. Leroy took his seat in the audience, and the exercises began. Francis Train was there with his lively humor. He made the speech of welcome to the new students and to old students returned. It was a brilliant performance, and went even beyond the high expectations of his admirers.

During one of the performances Leroy turned and looked back over the audience; and there, with her beautiful black eyes bent full upon him, was Carrie West! What did it mean? He thought she was not coming back to college, and he did not know but that she was married by this time. How all his old love was revived again! But it would do no good, for he said: "She is engaged, she is engaged!"

The mystery of her presence perplexed him, but he would ask for no information. It was his cross, and he would bear it silently. But he must fight his battle in his own way, and he knew that in only one way could he hope for victory, and that was to shut her resolutely out of his life. Evidently something had arisen to postpone her marriage. Possibly Carrie herself with her own characteristic decision and firmness had insisted on finishing her college course before being married. It would be just like her to do that. Well, he would not interfere; he would do nothing dishonorable, and he would avoid temptation, for he well knew that if he came under the power of her fascination he might lose his self-control, and in a moment of weakness he might utter words that he ought not to speak to the affianced wife of another man. He resolved that he would never speak of her, would never meet her if he could help it, and would never trust himself to remain in her company. Yet suddenly it crossed his mind that they would necessarily be brought into close contact. When he was here before he was one term ahead of her, but now that he had lost a term she must have overtaken him, and this year they would be in the same class. Well, so it must be. It would make the struggle a little harder, that was all. He must exercise additional care, must be more upon his guard, and as the danger of seeing her more frequently had increased, he must be more than ever careful not to speak to her. He dreaded most of all things the weakness that he was conscious of which might lead him to dishonor.

During the next few days Leroy necessarily met her repeatedly, but, though her eyes were bent upon him with recognition, he only formally bowed when they met.

"I can do no more than bow to her," he said to Burt, who had also returned to college after a year's absence. "She is engaged, and I have no right to do anything to bring about an interview. I must bear it. But I love her more than ever. If I had known she would be here, I never would have come back to the N. S."

Thus several weeks passed, and every time Leroy met Carrie she seemed more beautiful, and he loved her more passionately; and yet he avoided her.

One day Professor Rich proposed a botanical excursion to the woods. It was agreed to with applause by the class, and on a bright afternoon thirty young men and women, led by Professor Rich, were making their way to the woods with tweezers, magnifying-glasses, microscopes, pressing chests, and other botanical apparatus. They were a gay crowd, and soon scores of flowers were dissected without mercy, and corolla, calyx, stamens, pistil, ovary, etc., were all subjected to close analysis, while "Professor Rich!" and "Oh, Professor!" were heard everywhere.

When the afternoon was about half passed Carrie wandered away from the crowd and sat down on the bank of a little purling brook at the edge of the woods. She seemed to be troubled. She leaned her forehead on her hand and was lost in meditation. The little brook seemed to whisper to her sad heart. Suddenly she heard some one jump from the fence on the other side of the stream at a little distance, and looking up, she saw Leroy with a bunch of beautiful flowers in his hand. She was directly in his way.

He started when he observed her, and would have passed her at some distance with a formal bow, but she rose and spoke to him.

"Mr. Ransom, may I speak with you?"

"Certainly," he said, freezingly, as he drew near.

"Leroy, what has happened? Tell me what has happened that you—" she hesitated and looked inquiringly into his face.

"Carrie, do you wish to stir up old memories? I have already suffered enough on your account. We had better never speak," he replied, bitterly; and it seemed he would tear himself away from her, but could not.

"Leroy," she said, speaking with a distressed look on her face, while her cheeks burned, and a struggle between maidenly reserve and affection seemed to be going on within, "I do not understand you. Do you bear resentment toward me? Why is it better that we should never speak? Have our relations so utterly changed since we parted?"

"No," he said, bitterly, "there is no change in them. I am still the rejected suitor and you are still the being I love best on earth. Oh, forgive me, Carrie, for saying so. I am very weak where you are concerned. You have tried me beyond my strength. It is the only safe way that I have chosen. We must avoid each other. I cannot be in your society and refrain from uttering words that no honorable man should speak to a lady engaged to another. I will do my duty to the utmost of my power, and you must help me for the sake of old times. You can help me in that way only by avoiding me. We may be friends some day; but while the wound is still unhealed we must be as strangers."

She smothered a cry that was just rising to her lips.

"Leroy, you are talking nonsense," she said. "I am engaged to no man."

"Engaged to no man?" he cried. "Who sent me a paper from your town with that paragraph marked with blue pencil?"

She went up close to him and looked him firmly in the eyes.

"I know nothing about it, Leroy. I never knew you received such a paper. I never saw such a paper—Oh, I remember now. There was a paragraph in one of our papers which seemed to refer to me, but I never dreamed that you had seen it. Besides, it was corrected afterward."

"But my brother Allan heard that you were to be married to one of the students."

"It is a mistake. I never thought of marrying any man but—" she could not finish that sentence. His heart went right out to her.

"Carrie, give me your blessed hand once again. Dear hand and dear girl. Once you said you could not be my wife on account of a certain obstacle. I know now what it was. Is the obstacle removed?"

"It is, Leroy," she answered, softly.

"Will you be mine, Carrie, for earth and for heaven?"

"I will," she said, just a little coyly, but sweetly.

"And I love you more than ever, Carrie dear. My own lost Atlantis girl found!" And the impulsive man took her face between both his hands and kissed her brow and cheeks and lips.

Just then they heard some crackling among the underbrush at a short distance in the woods, but on looking in that direction they could see nothing. It might have been but a squirrel or pheasant.

"Leroy, do you remember that I said, 'If ever you meet with some great happiness let me know?' You met with it, did you not?"

"I did, Carrie, and I knew what you meant as soon as it came. But I could not understand it before."

"But why did you not write?"

"Because I thought you were engaged. But you're not—yes you are, to me, thank God!"

"Well, let us sit down here on the green bank of this stream, and then tell me all about your great happiness."

And those two happy ones sat down by the singing brook, and he told her of all his woe and his great final victory, until the tears fell silently down her cheek into the stream babbling at their feet.

"And the sorrow is over now, and you and I are happy again. You have taught me that this is a glad world." And he pressed his lips upon her brow again.

"Who could have sent me that paper with the false paragraph?" Leroy said.

"I have no idea."

"It must have been a friend, or, perhaps, a foe."

"One or the other, I'm sure. But it doesn't matter now."

She said this last so sweetly that he kissed her again.

When they went back to Professor Rich he looked at them with a merry twinkie in his eye, and said, "You two seem to have found the finest botanical specimen of your lives to-day."

WORSHIPPING GOD AND THE LAMB.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 5, Rev. 5. Golden Text, ver. 12.

What Worship is—Services Which are Not Worship—God's Sample of Worship—John Invited to Witness—The Vision of Perfect Light—Of Christ's Fourfold Character—The Unceasing Proclamation of the Living Creatures—The Sealed Book—John Weeping—Praise for Him Who Opens It—Christ Holding the Key of the Future—The Great Choir—John Prepared for the Judgments.

WE are in the habit of calling an ordinary religious service in a church or chapel "the worship of God." It ought to be so, but generally it is not so at all. A service which consists chiefly of prayer to God, hymns about our own experience or hymns of prayer, and exhortations addressed to saints or sinners, is not worship; no element of worship lies in these things. To worship God is to adore, to revere, to praise Him for what He is, as well as for what He has done for us. Our need drives us to pray, the need of others drives us to exhortation; but the greatness, the goodness, the love, the holiness of God lead us to worship Him. An unsaved soul cannot worship God, for he does not know Him, and how can he appreciate One whom he knows not? The ordinary tone of our modern hymns is not that of worship; self, in its needs, its aspirations, its devotion, figures more largely in them than does God.

Let us turn to GOD'S SAMPLE OF WORSHIP.

A door is open in heaven, the thoughts of the Apostle John are raised above earth, and his attention is fixed on God, not in relation to himself, but on God as God, on God as He is in heaven. Thus occupied, John hears a voice saying to him: "Come up hither, and I will show thee things which must be hereafter." And immediately he is in the Spirit, and God dawns upon him. He sees a throne, and One fills it, One whose glory has already so shone upon him that when he saw Him, he fell at His feet as dead. He sees four and twenty crowned elders round about, not angels, but glorified men, close to the very throne of God. He sees and hears "lightnings and thunderings and voices," but he sees Him who controls them all. And he sees "seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, which are the seven Spirits of God." And he sees also "before the throne a glassy sea like unto crystal" (R. V.). And then he sees, in the very midst of the throne, another representation of glorified man. The substance of his vision is God and glorified man—glorified man one with God, and the blessed Spirit filling the same office for John in heaven as He does for us on earth—and making God manifest to us; and therefore He takes the form of seven lamps, to signify perfect light. The four living creatures represent Jesus in His fourfold character—as the lion, i.e., as King; as the calf, i.e., as Servant and Sacrifice; as the Man, and as the flying eagle, i.e., as God, just as Christ is set forth by the Apostle Matthew as King, by Mark as Servant, by Luke as Man, and by John as God.

SHEDDING LIGHT ON GOD,

No single Christian reflects the whole of Christ—we are parts which make up a whole—"that which every joint supplieth," members of one body, and members one of another (Rom. 12:4-8; 1 Cor. 12). It is as we are fitted together in Christ that we reflect Him upon the world. It is these four living creatures, perfectly united and yet so different the one from the other, who are in the midst of the throne of God—not merely round about the throne as the four and twenty elders are. "And they have no rest day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God, the Almighty, which was, and which is, and which cometh" (R. V. marg.). Just as in our present state we breathe day and night, so those holy ones in heaven worship day and night, are occupied day and night with what God is. And there is no more monotony in this to them than there is in breathing to us: we breathe in and breathe out the atmosphere; these breathe in and breathe out God. This is worship. Their example provokes the elders, who fall down and worship Him that sits upon the throne. And before the throne of God they cast down their crowns—their hearts acknowledge Him as the only One who has dominion, and they say, "Worthy art Thou, our Lord and our God, to receive the glory and the honor and the power; for Thou didst create all things, and because of Thy will they are, and were created." This, again, is worship.

OH, HOW MAN SEEKS GLORY!

How he likes to get credit for what he does! How he likes to hear some one remark, "What a fine voice you have!" "What intelligent children you have; how well they are managed!" "How tastefully your garden is laid out!" And children of God are often far from insensible to this kind of thing. "I do like to hear you speak in a meeting," "Your letters are such a help to me," "I always feel the presence of God when I am with you." "No one helps me as you do." These expressions are often welcome to a Christian worker. But who gets the glory? The instrument, or the hand which holds it? No one would venture to say: "Worthy am I to receive glory," and yet, in accepting from others that which attributes anything to us, we are taking to ourselves the glory of which God alone is worthy, for it is only as He uses us that we can be helpful to others at all. The glory and honor are His by right, because "the power" is His by right.

The apostle sees in the hand of Him that sat upon the throne a book, or roll, so fully written that the very cover had been used up, and yet "sealed with seven seals," so that none could read it. The question was raised in heaven, "Who is worthy to open the book, and to loose the seven seals thereof? And no one in the heaven, or on the earth, or under the earth, was able to open the book, or to look thereon." Was there, then, inability in heaven? John weeps; it is all he can do; but the inhabitants of heaven can do something more—they can look unto Jesus; and one of the elders says to John:

"WEEP NOT; BEHOLD

(Look up and see what Jesus can do), the Lion that is of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David, hath overcome, to open the book and the seven seals thereof." The language of Jesus on earth, the authoritative "Weep not" of Him who removes the cause for weeping, is the language of heaven. John looks up, and sees, in the midst of the living creatures and the elders, a Lamb standing as though it had been slain, having seven horns (perfect power) and seven eyes (perfect knowledge), which are the seven Spirits of God, sent forth into all the earth. John sees Him take the book, and this is the signal for one burst of praise and worship. These inhabitants of heaven have each a harp, and each a golden bowl full of the prayers of saints. The saints are upon the earth, but John sees their prayers treasured up in heaven as sweet incense. "And they sing a new song," but it is on an old theme—"Worthy art Thou to take the book, and to open the seals thereof; for Thou wast slain, and didst purchase unto God with Thy blood men of every tribe and tongue and people and nation and madest them to be unto our God a kingdom and priests; and they reign upon the earth" (R. V.).

Who can open the book of the future but He who has the key of the past? Jesus has conquered the past, has wrested the keys of death and of Hades from him who had the power of death, even the devil, and He, the Son of God, He, the Son of Man, Satan's conqueror, has too. These heavenly worshippers all sing redemption songs: "Thou wast slain, and didst purchase unto God with Thy blood," etc. Although the rendering of the Revised Version does not make this so clearly a song of personal redemption as does the Authorized Version, which reads: "Thou . . . hast redeemed us to God by Thy blood, . . . and hast made us unto our God Kings and Priests, and we shall reign on the earth," yet there is every reason to believe that the singers are redeemed souls.

Immediately after their song of worship, John sees and hears "a voice of many angels round about the throne," in addition to that of the living creatures and elders, who cannot therefore be themselves angels, and so must be glorified men. The number of the angels was "ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands." They formed an almost infinite choir, and were "Saying with a great voice, Worthy is the Lamb that hath been slain to receive the power, and riches, and wisdom, and might, and honor, and glory, and blessing." It was a wondrous awakening up to worship—beginning with the living creatures which were in the midst of the throne, spreading to the four and twenty elders, and from them to the countless angels. But it does not stop there. Having filled heaven, the song comes down to earth, and vibrates throughout the universe. "Every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." Praise begins in heaven; it cannot originate down here. Our praise and worship is, after all, but an echo, yet a blessed echo, of the praise of heaven created in our souls by the Holy Ghost. The apostle was about to see visions of destruction, of the powers and triumph, for the time, of the Antichrist and of Satan, and God showed him first this wondrous scene of the whole universe worshipping God, the end which should come after all the scenes of horror, when Christ comes to take "vengeance on those that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ."

GOD SEES THE END FROM THE BEGINNING, and He is letting John see a little of the end of His dealings that he may not be stumbled as one after another of the seven seals is broken, and he sees the terrible judgments which are coming upon the earth. Oh, how precious it is to know that when we are worshipping our God, even in our lame, ignorant way, we are joining with those around the throne, that when in every hour of our lives we are quietly but fully attributing all the power, honor, and glory of all we do to Him whose is the power and the glory, we are really exercising for a higher service yonder, when "we shall see Him as He is," and reciprocate His thoughts, His love, as we cannot in our finite life down here. Oh, let our lives be a true worship of God and of the Lamb, who alone is worthy!

DAILY VICTORY.

I want a present, living faith,
That I may prove each day, each hour,
Amid the toils and cares of life,
My precious Saviour's love and power;
I want, amid the petty cares
That daily worry and annoy,
To live by faith so near my God
That life shall be a constant joy.

I want a firm, unwavering faith,
That bringeth good from seeming ill;
That, e'en amid affliction's blast,
Rejoices in the Father's will;
That when long-cherished hope's denied,
Still sings a "glad triumphant song,"
Knowing that He who reigns on high—
A God of love—can do no wrong.

I want a faith that falters not,
Let skies be bright or tempest beat,
That 'mid earth's joys, and cares, and griefs
Victorious sits at Jesus' feet.
Give me such faith, and then I know
When I shall pass cold Jordan's wave,
The faith that kept me day by day
Will be triumphant o'er the grave.

THE NEW LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.

INCREASED interest attached this year to the inauguration of the Lord Mayor of London because of the social condition of the British metropolis and the threatened demonstration of the Socialists. It has been the custom for many years to make the procession, and the subsequent ceremonies, a most magnificent spectacle. Succeeding Lord Mayors have vied with their predecessors in costly display. They are usually wealthy merchants, seldom, if ever, aristocrats, and, as is common in such cases, they are apt to think that a lavish exhibition of their opulence is not vulgar, but commendable. It is gratifying to their pride to have it said by their fellow-citizens how large a sum was spent during their term of office, and how well they maintained the reputation of the Mansion House in their incumbency.

While a penurious Lord Mayor would certainly be unpopular, and would be despised even by the poor, there has grown up a strong feeling among all classes that on processions and feasts might be better employed. If the Lord Mayor desires to show how wealthy he is, and to celebrate his attainment of the highest dignity a citizen can reach by a lavish outlay, the citizens, especially those who read the New Testament, have thought that it would be better, instead of feasting aldermen, to give a good dinner to the poor and hungry, or to spend a little money in improving the wretched homes in which the London poor live. The cost of one or two feasts would do much for the permanent benefit of poor families if judiciously laid out. Five thousand dollars placed in the hands of half a dozen city missionaries for distribution or investment would be a wiser and more Christian thing for a Lord Mayor to do than to put the like amount before opulent citizens in the shape of costly viands and rare wines. But the Lord Mayors and the aldermen of London, like the civic officers of our great cities, seem to have forgotten the existence of the poor, and have flaunted their wealth in the faces of the starving with a provocation almost maddening. This year it was proposed by the Socialist clubs of London, which are doing the bad work of directing the discontented people to violent methods of equalizing social conditions, to remind the Lord Mayor of the prevailing want by sending a large deputation of starving men to take part in his procession.

THE PANIC.

A general panic spread through London when the threat was uttered, for it was not at all improbable that the excitement caused by such an exhibition of the contrast between the very rich and the very poor might lead to outrages, and a general raid on the stores and banks. Extensive preparations for quelling a riot were made by the authorities; police and soldiers were stationed at strategic points, and arrangements made to promptly check an outbreak in its first stage. The store-keepers also protected their premises by strong barricades. Whether better counsels prevailed with the Socialists or the extent of the preparations discouraged them is uncertain, but the threatened outbreak did not occur, and London breathed more easily as the day passed without trouble. Though that danger has passed, it may be hoped that the Lord Mayor, and people of his class, will not be lulled into a false security. They cannot rid themselves of responsibility. They may by the strong force of police and military at their command succeed in preserving order, but the time will come when the God of the poor will call them to account, and will require of them an answer to the question of why they disregarded His warning to men who, having this world's goods and seeing their brethren have need, shut up their bowels of compassion from them (1 John 3:17). They and the corresponding class on this side the Atlantic may be assured that the inquisition then made by the Almighty Avenger of the poor will be a searching one.

The new Lord Mayor of London, whose portrait appears on the preceding page, is the head of a firm of wholesale fruit dealers doing business in Botolph Lane. His family has been connected with the same locality for one hundred and forty-four years, and he himself was born in the same house in Botolph Lane as his father and grandfather were. He was born May 31st, 1840, and is therefore now forty-six years of age. He was educated at Rugby during Dean Goulbourn's head-mastership, and proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took the usual degrees of B.A. and M.A. The last old Rugbeian who was Lord Mayor was Sir W. Plomer, who filled the office in 1781.

After a visit to Australia he entered his father's business, and at the beginning of the volunteer movement he joined the London Rifle Brigade with twenty-five of his clerks. In this corps he remained till 1880. In 1873 he was elected a member of the Common Council, and has been Alderman since 1880; was Sheriff of London in 1881-82, and is honorary colonel of a battalion Royal Fusiliers, in which his second son is junior lieutenant, his elder being an officer in a battalion of infantry. He is a Justice of the Peace for Middlesex, and Deputy Lieutenant for the city of London and the Tower Hamlets. He was knighted, with his colleague, when the Queen visited Epping Forest. He is in politics a Conservative. In 1866 he married a daughter of Mr. C. Bingley, of Stanhope Park, Middlesex, and his family consists of the two sons above mentioned, and two daughters.

ANCIENT CEREMONIES.

On the morning of October 25th, Alderman Sir Reginald Hanson, attended by the Recorder of London, the sheriffs, and the other high officers of the corporation, together with Alderman Sir Robert Carden, Alderman Sir William M'Arthur, and Mr. Alderman Knill, went in state to the House of Lords to receive from the Lord Chancellor the customary expression of her Majesty's approval of the choice of the citizens of London in electing Sir Reginald Hanson to be the Lord Mayor for the year ensuing.

The Recorder, according to ancient custom, addressing the Lord Chancellor, said he had the honor to introduce Alderman Sir R. Hanson, elected by the Livery of London, and chosen by his brethren of the Court of Aldermen to be Lord Mayor for the year ensuing.

The Lord Chancellor, in reply, said: "My Lord Mayor elect, it is no wonder, from the distinguished career both of yourself and your family in the city, that your fellow-citizens have thought it right to confer upon you the highest honor which it is in their power to bestow. I can only say that it is to me a circumstance of great satisfaction that it is from my lips that you are to learn her Majesty's approval of the choice of the citizens. I was myself a pupil of Dr. Goulbourn, and I recognize with satisfaction that we were fellow-pupils of that distinguished man. Of course it is impossible not to be sensible of the circumstances under which you were chosen by your fellow-citizens, who have not omitted to consider that in conferring upon you the high honor they have done they are not unmindful of the fact that your year of office will be one in which the whole nation will be gathered together in rejoicing in of a reign such as has been permitted to few nations to enjoy. [This was a courtly figure of speech on the part of his lordship. A large part of 'the whole nation' are just now in no mood for rejoicing over a matter to which they are indifferent.] It is with peculiar satisfaction that I have to announce her Majesty's approval of the choice of the citizens in electing you to the high office of Lord Mayor for the ensuing year."

In the pageant which took place on November 9th, the day of inauguration, special prominence was given to the industries and enterprises of the colonial and Indian deputations now in London attending the exhibition. In compliment to them Sir Reginald arranged that in the procession there should be representations of the various arts, industries, and products of the Indian and colonial empire. This was a graceful tribute which he generously paid to the guests, and it was additionally welcome to the colonials inasmuch as he himself had been a guest of theirs.

As to the show itself, there is little that need be said. The set pieces representing Australia, Canada, the West Indies—which was curiously in the charge of North American Indians—South Africa, India, and the British Isles looked rather tawdry in the Scotch mist in which they were shrouded. The model steam-launch lent by the Shipwrights' Company, and having the band of the Royal Naval Hospital on board, and the Walmer lifeboat and crew, were among the chief features of the procession.

The Lord Mayor was detained for sixty minutes in the Royal Courts of Justice. The delay was due to the fact that the Lord Chief Justice saw fit to improve the occasion by warning the Lord Mayor that the corporation was doomed. The Lord Mayor heard the unpalatable remarks in silence, and then invited the Lord Chief Justice to dinner, possibly thinking as he did so, Let us eat and drink if to-morrow we die.

He then set out on his way through the city accompanied by his show, which reminded American spectators of a circus procession. In general the crowd remained absolutely silent as the cavalry escort and various city guilds passed. Several officials in carriages coming next were hooted. The model naval steam-launch with a crew aboard, a lifeboat and two elephants were the only parts of the procession that were cheered. Last of all came the Lord Mayor in his gilded state-coach. He passed amid storms of hisses and "Boos!" but got some cheers as he turned toward the Embankment. As the last coach turned into Northumberland Avenue a dozen red flags were instantly produced by Socialists on or near Nelson's Column and the leaders began to speak.

MR. H. A. ISAACS.

MR. ALDERMAN AND SHERIFF HENRY A. ISAACS, one of the new sheriffs, is, as his portrait on the preceding page clearly indicates, a Hebrew. He was born in the ward of Aldgate in 1830, and is now fifty-six years old. He is the son of the late Mr. Michael Isaacs, by Sarah, daughter of the late Señor de Mendoza, one of the family with which the late Lord Beaconsfield was related in the maternal line. In 1849 he was married to Eleanor, third daughter of Mr. Alexander McDonald Rowland, an officer of the British Army, who, while serving in India, on two occasions saved the life of his friend and brother officer, Sir Colin Campbell, afterward Lord Clyde. Alderman Isaacs is head of the firm of Messrs. M. Isaacs & Sons, fruit brokers, of London and Hull.

As a commercial man, Alderman Isaacs's reputation is considerable. Among other important offices, he occupies the post of Director of the General Steam Navigation Company, the London and Lancashire Life Assurance Company and Fire Insurance Association. To London citizens he is, perhaps, best known as a prominent and opulent corporator. It may be well to state that he stands high in the ranks of Freemasonry, having held the highest office in both Craft Lodges and Royal Arch Chapters. He is one of the Lieutenants of the City and a Past-Master of the Loriners' Company. It is more than twenty years since he was elected to municipal office. On the occasion of his election as sheriff his constituents presented him with the gold chain and badge of office, the latter a most beautiful example of the gold-workers' art.

LIEUT.-COLONEL KIRBY.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL KIRBY, who has also been elected as Sheriff of London and Middlesex, and whose portrait accompanies that of his brother sheriff, was born in Wood Street, Cheapside, in 1841, and is now forty-five years of age. He received his education at the City of London School. He is a wealthy distiller, and is sole proprietor of the Deptford Distillery, trading as Holland & Co., and is the largest single-handed rectifier in London.

Colonel Kirby comes of military stock. His paternal and maternal grandfathers both served in the Peninsular and at Waterloo; while other members of the family fought in the Crimea, one of them being among the "six hundred" in the Balaklava charge immortalized by Tennyson. Five and twenty years ago he was attached to a cavalry regiment, and he afterward filled the post of adjutant to a yeomanry regiment for upward of seven years. He has also been lieutenant-colonel in a regiment of engineers. It is now some seventeen years ago since Colonel Kirby retired from military life and went into business. Previously to entering into the distillery he had owned a number of large hotels in Essex, Bucks, and Berks. He married in 1869, and has a family of four sons and two daughters.

THE LORD MAYOR'S STATE-COACH.

(See Illustration.)

FORMERLY it was the custom of the Lord Mayor to ride on horseback in the annual procession from the city to Westminster. It appears that the last who did so was Sir Gilbert Heathcote, in 1711, after which a carriage, drawn by four horses, was used. It was not for nearly half a century subsequent to the above-named date that the present lumbering state-coach appeared upon the scene. It seems to have been built in 1757, and that six gaily caparisoned horses were then, as now, used to draw it. The coach was built upon the "co-operative" principle, each of the seven aldermen who had "passed the chair," that is, served as Lord Mayor, subscribing $300 toward its cost; and an agreement was made that each new alderman should pay the same sum on his admission for the same object, and when elected, Lord Mayor $500 more. It is now the property of the corporation, and has been kept in such preservation as is possible by a committee of that body.

Except on the one day of the year, when it makes its appearance in the streets, amid the more or less derisive cheers of the multitude, it is kept in an unromantic place called the City Green Yard. Its weight is nearly four tons, and the six horses which draw it are each encumbered with harness and trappings weighing one hundred and six pounds. The unwieldy vehicle sways backward and forward when it appears in procession on the 9th of November. The motion, which must be a good training for its occupants for a sea-voyage, is caused by the coach being hung upon thick leather straps instead of steel springs. Who built the imposing equipage or executed the florid carvings upon it, or the elaborate paintings, cannot be said with any degree of certainty.

A Burdened Christian's Request for Prayer was read a few days ago at the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting. Christian people given to the bad habit of repining may see in it a lesson of contentment and, what is still more important, an example of prayerfulness in heavy trial. The Christian lady wrote that her husband's mind has given way. She would fain see him restored in mind and led to Christ as his Saviour. To the request for prayer for him she adds this: "Pray also for my son and his wife; they are respectable and in their own eyes far better than those who profess religion; also for my daughter and her family. She once knew the Lord, but now she and her husband have turned to the world. My son, eighteen years old, has an offer of a place in a saloon. Do pray for an opening for him somewhere else to get work; it is a great temptation to him, for it is hard to get work. A neighbor of mine has three sons, all unsaved. Pray that all the above-named ones may be saved."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Singular Beginning of Family Worship.—"I was reading the other day of a worthy but poor and ignorant couple who went to a gospel meeting, and met with Christ. They returned home rejoicing that they had found Him, and the man said to his wife, 'We were told that we must have family worship, but we cannot read, we cannot sing, and we do not know how to pray.' But they went home resolved to do what they could, and kneeling down the man raised his hat from his head, and swinging it round his head several times, he cried, 'Hurrah for Jesus!' It was all he could say, poor fellow, but it was from his heart, and that was enough."

A Soldier's Brave Confession.—The Rev. Mr. Harding said: "I remember one night in our meeting at Plymouth we asked all those who were willing to accept Jesus to say so, when a young soldier in the gallery stood up, and said before a crowded meeting: 'I will go with Jesus, sir.' Then turning to his friends who were with him, he said: 'My old companions, fare ye well; I will not go with you to hell.' He stood firm, and was kept in the hour of temptation, because his first act at conversion was to confess his Lord. A man cannot be a true soldier of the cross of the Saviour without giving up a great deal, and it was something for him to give up all his old acquaintances, but he did so, and was satisfied with Christ himself."

A Student's Recipe for the Cure of Infidelity.—Mr. Downie said: "A friend of mine was studying for the ministry, and when he had about completed his college course, he was almost an infidel. He was startled to find how near infidelity he had come, he who had once been a true believer in Christ. With a feeling of deep regret he gave up all hope of preaching the Gospel of Christ. He was restless and unhappy, and became exceedingly anxious about his soul—so anxious that he again took up his Bible, which he had cast aside as a useless thing, and carefully cut out every verse that spoke about the way of salvation, and read them continuously as one chapter. This with God's blessing had the desired effect; he was enabled to cast his unbelief aside and come out a true preacher of the Gospel. He sought salvation with his whole heart, and so he found it."

A Young Man's Story.—"I Had Been Brought up to make light of Christ, and lead a very careless, wicked life. My wickedness brought me to a sick-bed, and I thought I was going to die; but I got a little better, and the first place I went to was the Wakes, and here I got into more sin than ever. Wakes Monday was very wet, but I went again. In order to get to the Wakes ground I had to go through a narrow opening; and as I passed, two gentlemen were giving tracts, and quoting passages of Scripture. I was much struck with what I heard, and took one of the tracts, headed 'But there is a hell.' I took it home and read it hundreds of times, till at last I began to pray, and then the light came; and now I am happy to tell you I am not afraid of hell, for God for Christ's sake has forgiven me my sins. I have lent that tract to everybody I could get to read it, and I have just parted with it to another friend about ten minutes ago."

A Spirit Merchant's Diary.—Mr. Stewart Observed: "Not long ago a young man, a spirit merchant, built a large house in the country, and was retiring from business. When he first told me of his intention I was much surprised, for he was very young, and I remarked to him: 'Surely the spirit traffic is a paying business when you are able to retire so soon.' 'No,' he answered, 'it is not that; I have retired from it through fear.' And then he went on to tell me that he was a wholesale merchant, and sold to many retail dealers. He kept a diary in which he entered all the names and ages of his customers, and when and how they died; and he said: 'I watched, with deep regret, many of those who came into this business gradually slipping downward. When I called on some before eleven o'clock in the morning they were so stupefied by drink that they were scarcely able to conduct business. One morning on looking through my diary I was struck with the number of names I had entered there as having died suddenly through the effect of strong drink. From that moment I shut the book and resolved that I would be done with this demon that was bringing so many promising young men suddenly and early to fill drunkards' graves."

Out of "the Wrong Box" at Last.—An Evangelist observed: "In a place where we had been holding a series of meetings, and which were just about over, I met a man who had attended them very regularly for some time, but without any result. I met him in the street as he was coming from his work, and said to him: 'How are you getting on now?' 'I'm just in the same box,' he answered, 'just the same as before these meetings commenced.' 'Well,' I said, 'I'll tell you what you're like, and then you'll see why you are in the same box. You are like a man who cannot swim, and who has fallen into deep water, and he is struggling and kicking but still sinking, when up comes a strong swimmer, and he cries to the drowning man: 'I am strong and able and willing to save you; but you must stop struggling and kicking. Take a long breath, put your hands straight by your sides, and trust me to save you; but if you will not, if you persist in trying to save yourself, I'll leave you and you'll sink.' That was all I said to him, and I left him, after asking him to our meeting at night, our last in that place. He came to the meeting, and as he was going out I shook his hand and said: 'I am sorry to think of your going away in this manner.' 'Ah! but I am saved,' he said. 'How did it happen?' I inquired. 'It was that simple story you told me. I saw I was the struggling man, and that my struggles were doing nothing but keeping Christ from saving me. So I resolved to stop my own efforts and trust in Him.'"

A Lady's Hand in Molten Lead.—Mr. Thompson related that "there was a great chemist who, as he stood in his laboratory one day, had on one side of him a jar containing a certain solution, and on the other a jar of molten lead. By thrusting his bare arm into the solution first, he was enabled to put his arm into the jar of lead quite unharmed. Three ladies whom he knew well came in to see him, and as he was showing them over his laboratory he stopped at those two jars, and explained the properties of their contents. After he had shown them the experiment, he said to one of the ladies: 'You believe that what I have told you and shown you is true, and that you yourself could do it with equal safety. Now, will you not do it?' The lady said: 'Oh, I know it is all right, and that I should come to no harm, but I would rather be excused!' She believed with her head, but she did not want to risk herself. But the professor said: 'You saw me do it unharmed; why, then, will you not try it also?' But while the ladies admitted the possibility and safety, they refused to attempt it themselves. But by and by one of the ladies, taking more courage, plunged her arm into the first preparation, and taking it out, put it into the lead and withdrew it unharmed. She then turned to the other two and asked them to follow her example, but they still declined. All these three ladies believed in the perfect safety of the experiment, but the one had a very different kind of belief from the other two. The one had a practical knowledge; she had risked something upon the truth of her belief; while the other two had only a theoretical knowledge; they had risked nothing, and simply accepted it as a fact, as shown by other people's experience. These are the ways people believe the Gospel—the head belief as a fact that has no personal interest to them, and the heart belief, the practical belief that has risked its all upon Christ. The Bible does not say if you believe with your head thou shalt be saved, but if you believe with your heart."

A FAMILY PROBLEM.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Nov. 28, 1886.

"Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen. Is not the whole land before thee?" Gen. 13:8.

UNCLE and nephew, Abram and Lot, both pious, both millionaires, and with such large flocks of bleating sheep and lowing cattle that their herdmen got into a fight, perhaps about the best pasture, or about the best water privilege, or because the cow of one got hooked by the horns of the other. Not their poverty of opportunity, but their wealth, was between these two men. To Abram, the glorious old Bedouin sheik, such controversy seemed absurd. It was like two ships quarrelling for sea room in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean. There was a vast reach of country, corn-fields, vineyards, harvests, and plenty of room in illimitable acreage. "Now," says Abram, "let us agree to differ. Here are the mountain districts, swept by the tonic sea breeze, and with wide-reaching prospect, or there is the plain of the Jordan, with tropical luxuriance. You may have either."

Lot, who was not as rich as Abram, and might have been expected to take the second choice, made the first selection, and with a modesty that must have made Abram smile, said to him: "You may have the rocks and the fine prospect; I will take the valley of the Jordan, with all its luxuriance of corn-fields, and the river to water the flocks, and the genial climate, and the wealth immeasurable." So the controversy was forever settled, and great-souled Abram carried out the suggestion of the text: "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen. Is not the whole land before thee?"

Well, in this, the last quarter of the nineteenth century, and in this beautiful land, which was called America, after Americus Vespucius, but ought to have been called Columbia, after its discoverer, Columbus, we have a and opportunity that is positively bewildering. Churches of all styles of creeds, and of all styles of government, and all styles of worship, and all styles of architecture. What opulence of ecclesiastical opportunity! Now, while in desolate regions there may be only one church, and it must be that or nothing, in the opulent districts of this country there is such a profusion that there ought to be no difficulty in making a selection. No fight about vestments, or between liturgical or non-liturgical adherents, or as to baptismal modes, or a handful of water as compared with a riverful. If Abram prefers to dwell in the heights, where he can only get a sprinkling from the clouds, let him consent that Lot have all the Jordan in which to immerse himself. "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between thee and me, and between thy herdmen and my herdmen. Is not the whole land before thee?"

Especially is it unfortunate when families allow angry

or dining, or tea-table, as to which is the best church or denomination, one at one end of the table saying he could never endure the rigid doctrines of Presbyterianism, one at the other end responding that she never could stand the forms of Episcopacy, and one at one side of the table saying he did not understand how anybody could bear the noise in the Methodist Church, and another declaring all the Baptists bigots. There are hundreds of

on ecclesiasticism, and in the middle of every discussion on such subjects there is a kindling of indignation, and it needs some old father Abram to come and put his foot on the loaded fuse before the explosion takes place, and say: "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen. Is not the whole land before thee?"

I undertake a subject never before undertaken in any pulpit, for it is an exceedingly delicate subject, and if not rightly handled might give serious offence; but I approach it without the slightest trepidation, for I am sure I have the divine direction in the matters I propose to present. It is asked all over Christendom, often asked with tears, and sobs, and heart breaks, and involving the peace of families, the eternal happiness of many souls: In matters of church attendance should the wife go with the husband, or the husband go with the wife?

First, remember that all the evangelical churches have enough truth in them to save the soul, and prepare us for happiness on earth and in heaven. I will go with you into any well-selected theological library, and I will show you sermons from ministers in all denominations that set forth man as a sinner and Christ as a deliverer from sin and sorrow. That is the whole Gospel. Get that into your soul and you are fitted for the here and the hereafter. The world has twenty six letters in its alphabet, and there are only two letters in

THE GOSPEL ALPHABET

—S and C; S standing for our sin, C standing for Christ, our Rescue, blessed be His glorious name forever! In any church where you can thoroughly learn these two letters, and all they stand for, you ought to be edified and happy. There are differences, we admit, and some denominations we like better than others.

But suppose three or four of us make solemn agreement to meet each other a week from now in Chicago on important business, and one goes by the New York Central Railroad, another by the Erie Railroad, another by the Pennsylvania Railroad, another by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. One goes this way because the mountains are grander; another takes this because the cars are more luxurious; another that because the speed is greater; another takes the other because he has long been accustomed to that route, and all the employés are familiar. So far as our engagement to meet is concerned, it makes no difference if we only get there. Now, any one of the innumerable evangelical denominations, if you practise its teaching—although some of their trains run on a broad gauge and some on a narrow gauge—will bring you out at the city of the New Jerusalem.

It being evident that you will be safe in any of the evangelical denominations, I proceed to remark, first, if one of the married couple be a Christian and the other not, the one a Christian is bound to go anywhere to a church where the unconverted companion is willing to go, if he or she will go to no other. You of the connubial partnership are a Christian. You are safe for the skies. Then it is to secure the eternal safety of your lifetime associate. Is not the everlasting welfare of your wife impenitent, or your husband impenitent, of more importance than your church relationship? Is not the residence of your companion for the next quadrillion of years a mightier consideration to you than the gratification of your ecclesiastical taste for forty or fifty years? A man or a woman that would stop half a minute to weigh preferences as to whether he or she had better go with the unconverted companion to this or that church or denomination, has no religion at all, and never has had, and I fear never will have. You are loaded up with what you suppose to be religion, but you are like Captain Frobisher, who brought back from his voyage of discovery a shipload of what he supposed valuable minerals, yet, instead of being silver and gold, were nothing but common stones of the field, to be hurled out finally as useless.

Mighty God! In all Thy realm is there one man or woman professing religion, yet so stolid, so unfitted, so far gone unto death that there would be any hesitancy in before such an opportunity of salvation and heavenly reunion? If you, a Christian wife, are an attendant upon this Brooklyn Tabernacle, and your unconverted husband does not come here because he does not like its preacher, or its music, or its architecture, or its uncomfortable crowding, and goes not to any house of worship, but would go if you would accompany him somewhere else, change your church relations. Take your hymn-book home with you to-day. Say good-by to your friends in the neighboring pews, and go with him to any one of a hundred churches till his soul is saved and he joins you in the march to heaven. More important than that ring on the third finger of your left hand it is that your Heavenly Father command the angel of mercy concerning your husband at his conversion, as in the parable of old: "Put a ring on his hand."

No letter of more importance ever came to the great city of Corinth, situated on what was called the "Bridge of the Sea," and glistening with sculpture, and gated with a style of brass the magnificence of which the following ages have not been able successfully to imitate, and overshadowed by the Acro-Corinthus, a fortress of rock two thousand feet high—I say no letter ever came to that great city of more importance than that letter in which Paul puts the

TWO STARTLING QUESTIONS:

"What knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? Or how knowest thou, O man, whether thou shalt save thy wife?" The dearest sacrifice on the part of the one is cheap if it rescue the other. Better go to the smallest, weakest, most insignificant church on earth, and be co-partners in eternal bliss, than pass your earthly membership in most gorgeously attractive church while your companion stays outside of evangelical privilege. Better have the drowning saved by a scow or a sloop than let him or her go down while you sail by in the gilded cabins of a Britannic or a Great Eastern.

Second remark: If both of the married couple be Christians, but one is so naturally constructed that it is impossible to enjoy the services of a particular denomination, and the other is not so sectarian or punctilious, let the one less particular go with the other who is very particular. As for myself, I feel as much at home in one denomination of evangelical Christians as another, and I think I must have been

BORN VERY NEAR THE LINE.

I like the solemn roll of the Episcopal liturgy, and I like the spontaneity of the Methodists, and I like the importance given to the ordinance of baptism by the Baptists, and I like the freedom of the Congregationalists, and I like the government and the sublime doctrine of the Presbyterians, and I like many of the others just as good as any I have mentioned, and I could happily live, and preach, and die, and be buried from any of them. But others are so stout, and unbending, and inexorable for some denomination, that it is a positive necessity they have the advantage of that one. What they were intended to be in ecclesiasticism was written in the sides of their cradle, if the father and mother had eyes keen enough to see it. They would not stop crying until they had put in their hands as plaything a Westminster Catechism or the Thirty-nine Articles. The whole current of their temperament, and thought, and character runs into one sect of religionists as naturally as the James River into the Chesapeake.

peake. It would be a torture to such persons to be anything outside of that one church.

Now, let the wife or husband who is not so constructed sacrifice the milder preference for the one more inflexible and rigorous. Let the grape vine follow the rugosities and sinuosities of the oak or hickory. Abram, the richer in flocks of Christian grace, should say to Lot, who is built on a smaller scale: "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen. Is not the whole land before thee?" As you can be edified and happy anywhere, go with your companion to the church to which he or she must go or be miserable.

Remark the third: If both the married couple are very strong in their sectarianisms, let them attend the different churches preferred. It is not necessary that you attend the same church. Religion is between your conscience and your God. Like Abram and Lot,

AGREE TO DIFFER.

When on Sabbath morning you come out of the door of your home together, and one goes one way and the other the other, heartily wish each other a good sermon and a time of profitable devotion, and when you meet again at the noonday repast, let it be evident, each to each, and to your children, and to the hired help, that you have both been on the Mount of Transfiguration, although you went up by different paths, and that you have both been fed by the bread of life, though kneaded by different hands in different trays, and baked in different ovens.

"BUT HOW ABOUT THE CHILDREN?"

I am often asked by hundreds of parents. Let them also make their choice. They will grow up with reverence for both the denominations represented by father and mother if you, by holy lives, commend those denominations. If the father lives the better life, they will have the more favorable opinion of his denomination. If the mother lives the better life, they will have the more favorable opinion of her denomination. And some day both the parents will, for at least one service, go to the same church. The neighbors will say: "I wonder what is going on to-day, for I saw our neighbor and his wife, who always go to different churches, going arm in arm to the same sanctuary." Well, I will tell you

WHAT HAS BROUGHT THEM TOGETHER, arm in arm, to the same altar. Something very important has happened. Their son is to-day uniting with the church. He is standing in the aisle, taking the vows of a Christian. He had been somewhat wayward, and gave father and mother a good deal of anxiety, but their prayers have been answered in his conversion, and as he stands in the aisle and the minister of religion says: "Do you consecrate yourself to the God who made and redeemed you, and do you promise to serve him all your days?" and with manly voice he answers, "I do," there is an April shower in the pew where father and mother sit, and a rainbow of joy which arches both their souls, that makes all differences of creed infinitesimal. And the daughter who had been very worldly, and gay, and thoughtless, puts her life on the altar of consecration, and as the sunlight of that Sabbath streams through the church window and falls upon her brow and cheek, she looks like their other daughter, whose face was luminized with the brightness of another world on the day when the Lord took her into His heavenly keeping years ago.

I should not wonder if, after all, these parents pass the evening of their life in the same church, all differences of church preference overcome by the joy of being in the house of God where their children were prepared for usefulness and heaven.

But I can give you

A RECIPE FOR RUINING YOUR CHILDREN.

Angrily contend in the household that your church is right and the church of your companion is wrong. Bring sneer and caricature to emphasize your opinions, and your children will make up their minds that religion is a sham, and they will have none of it. In the north-east storm of domestic controversy the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valley will not grow. Fight about apostolic succession, fight about election and free agency, fight about baptism, fight about the bishopric, fight about gown and surplice, and the religious prospects of your children will be left dead on the field. You will be as unfortunate as Charles, Duke of Burgundy, who in battle lost a diamond the value of a nation, for in your fight you will lose the jewel of salvation for your entire household. This is nothing against the advocacy of your own religious theories. Use all forcible argument, bring all telling illustration, array all demonstrative facts, but let there be no acerbity, no stinging retort, no mean insinuation, no superciliousness, as though all others were wrong and you infallibly right. Take

A HINT FROM ASTRONOMY.

The Ptolemaic system made the earth the centre of the solar system, and everything was thought to turn round the earth. But the Copernican system came, and made the sun the centre around which the planets revolved. The bigot makes his little belief the centre of everything, but the large-souled Christian makes the Sun of Righteousness the centre, and all denominations, without any clashing and each at its own light and in its own sphere, revolving around it. Over the tomb of Dean Stanley in Westminster Abbey is the passage of Scripture: "Thy commandments are exceeding broad." Let no man crowd us on to a path like the bridge Al Sirat, which the Mohammedan thinks leads from this world over the abyss of hell into Paradise, the breadth of the bridge less than the web of a starved spider or the edge of a sword or razor, off the edges of which many fall. No; while the way is not wide enough to take with us any of our sins, it is wide enough for all Christian believers to pass without peril into everlasting safety.

But do not any of you depend upon what you call a sound creed for salvation. A man may own all the statutes of the State of New York and yet not be a lawyer, and a man may own all the best medical treatises and not be a physician, and a man may own all the best works on painting and architecture and not be either painter or architect, and a man may own all the sound creeds in the world and yet not be a Christian. Not what you have in your head and on your tongue, but in your heart and in your life, will decide everything.

In olden times in England before the modern street lamps were invented every householder was expected to have a lantern suspended in front of his house, and in London as they went along at eventide was: "Hang out your lights." Instead of disputing in your home about the different kinds of lantern, as a watchman on the walls of Zion I cry: "Let your light so shine before men that they, seeing your good works, may glorify your Father which is in heaven." Hang out your lights! You may have a thousand ideas about religion, and yet not the great idea of pardoning mercy. It is not the number of your ideas but the greatness of them. A mouse hath ten offspring in her nest, while the lioness hath one in her lair. All ideas about forms, and ceremonies, and church government put together are not worth the one idea of getting to heaven yourself and taking your family with you.

But do not reject Christianity, as many do, because there are so many sects. Standing in Westminster Hotel, London, I looked out of the window and saw three clocks, as near as I can remember, one on the Parliament House, another on St. Margaret's Chapel, another on Westminster Abbey, and they were all different. One said twelve o'clock at noon, another said five minutes before twelve, another said five minutes after twelve. I might as well have concluded that there is no such thing as time, because the three timepieces were different, as for you to conclude that there is no such thing as pure Christianity because the churches differ in their statement of it.

But let us all rejoice that, although part of our family may worship on earth in one church and part in another church, or, bowed at the same altars, it must be in a compromise of preferences, we are, if redeemed, on the way to where all our preferences will be fully gratified. Great cathedral of eternity, with arches of amethysts, and pillars of sapphire, and floors of emerald, and windows aglow with the sunrise of Heaven! What stupendous towers, with chimes angel-hoisted and angel-rung! What myriads of worshippers, white-robed and coroneted! What an officiator at the altar, even "the great High Priest of our profession"! What walls, hung with the captured shields and flags, by the church militant passed up to be church triumphant! What doxologies of all nations! Coronet to coronet, cymbal to cymbal, harp to harp, organ to organ! Pull out the tremulant stop to recall the sufferings past! Pull out the trumpet stop to celebrate the victory!

"When shall these eyes thy heaven-built walls

And pearly gates behold?

Thy bulwarks with salvation strong,

And streets of shining gold."

BILLINGSGATE FISH MARKET.

ONE of the most interesting sights of the British metropolis is the early morning delivery of fish for the Billingsgate Fish Market. The enormous consumption of fish in and around London necessitates an organized system of delivery and distribution which is perfect of its kind. The great bulk of it is brought to Billingsgate from the fishermen of the North Sea.

There are twelve fleets engaged in the work, each fleet controlled by an admiral, and each manned by about one thousand men. Each fleet has also steamers belonging to it, one of which leaves the fleet every day with the proceeds of the night's catch for Billingsgate. Every evening, unless there is a gale, the trawl is thrown out and remains overboard until the watch on deck sees at midnight the admiral's rocket. Then every man in the fleet must rouse, and lend a hand in making the haul. The fish secured, overboard goes the gear a second time, a fresh watch is set, and the drenched, half-frozen smacksmen snatch such rest and sleep as may be allowed by the capricious weather. At early dawn they must turn out again to help in making the haul.

Then all is activity and bustle, for the fish taken in both the midnight and morning hauls must be cleaned, sorted, packed, and, no matter how rough the weather, ferried to the attendant steamer for conveyance to market. It may be mid-day before this is done and the decks cleared.

There are conditions of the smacksmen's life which philanthropy cannot alter; but something has been done by Christian men to carry to them the Gospel that robs death of its terrors. The Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen has now five vessels cruising in the North Sea, each fitted up with the design of promoting the spiritual, moral, and mental welfare of the men. Each of the five vessels is known—(1) As a Church, where Christian smacksmen may gather for worship and for the Holy Communion, and the unsaved may have the Gospel preached to them. (2) As a Hospital, where cases of sickness and injury (which formerly necessitated the dispatch of the patient to hospital, with the chance of death during the two days' voyage home) receive prompt and skilful treatment. (3) As a Temperance Hall, where a flourishing temperance work is carried on. And (4) as a Library and Club, where bags of books may be obtained to suspend in the cabins, and where every man in the fleet may go, with the certainty of finding a hearty welcome and a helping hand. Much good has already been done through God's blessing on these floating churches.

PROGRESS IN LAOS.

A LETTER from Rev. D. McGilvary, D.D., who is laboring in Laos, on the borders of Burmah, which is published in the Foreign Missionary, contains the following incidents:

Our most interesting or successful work was at Maa Kon, twelve miles south of Chiengrai. Since Nan Ta's first visit, in March, the temple had been broken up. The only two priests had left because their patrons had deserted them, and their pupils had doffed the yellow robes and returned to their families. The priests' dormitories are now used as a sala, and I saw over thirty oxen sheltered from the rain in the real temple. Noi Taliya, the former teacher of the village, is one of the best Buddhist scholars in our church, and the report of his conversion has spread far and near. It was from this village that Tow Tapasing had come one hundred miles to secure a visit from a missionary.

At the town of Chiengrai I will mention only the changed attitude of the governor, which was formerly antagonistic to all Christian influences. This time he and his only wife listened with interest, and at her request we had worship in their new house. We sang, "What is the thing of greatest price?" and Nan Ta and I each led in prayer, to which the whole family listened attentively and expressed their pleasure. Nan Ta has a brother, Saan Kat, who is an officer in the governor's household. He had his son put off the priest's robes while we were there, and return with Nan Ta to study our Scriptures, and the father and mother are only awaiting further instructions to be baptized.

IN HELL'S KITCHEN.

OLD New Yorkers do not need to be told the locality or character of Hell's Kitchen. No neighborhood in the city has found so much employment for the police and the courts, and even for the hangman. All that we read of the character of the prince of darkness indicates that in that spot he would have found himself in congenial society. On a recent evening, however, had he been there, he would have seen and heard things by no means to his taste. In a large frame building near the corner of Ninth Avenue an anniversary service was being held. It was to celebrate the opening a year ago of the Berachah Gospel Mission.

Last year Mr. and Mrs. Naylor, of the Rev. A. B. Simpson's church, acquired possession of the building and opened it for mission work. A few big boys attended the first night, and the prospect of good being done was not hopeful. But the mission was opened in faith, and the servants of God were not easily discouraged. With a few friends they went to the corner of Tenth Avenue and sang Gospel hymns, and when a crowd gathered, as it was sure to do at hearing such music in such a locality, invitations were given to the mission close at hand, and were accepted. A congregation was soon formed, a Sunday-school established, and much good has been done.

At the anniversary meeting testimonies were given of such a character as proved that, if no more had been accomplished than was there described, the labor had been well repaid and God's blessing had been freely bestowed. One fine-looking man rose when an opportunity was given for testimonies. "I came in here," said he, "last January, a poor lost drunkard and outcast. I was drunk at the time, but notwithstanding this I was asked to come up and pray. I was saved then and there, and the dear Lord has been helping me ever since." This is a fair sample. Probably a dozen other testimonies were given. Most of the men were picked up from the very gutter. Among the testimonies were those of a man, his wife, and his two children, who had all been saved there.

In a report of the work the superintendent said that during the year there had been a total attendance of 43,867. That the mission has been a blessing to the neighborhood is evident. Nor have the temporal wants of the people been overlooked. Last winter there were given away at the mission 3315 pints of soup, 1500 pounds of bread, $322 for rents, groceries, and meats, and 510 lodging tickets. Also a supper last Christmas to 400 poor children of the neighborhood. Beside this have been articles of clothing, and flowers for the rooms of the sick. The cost of this blessed and wonderful work has been $3500. Some $235 of this amount has been received from friends, many of whom were converts of the mission. The balance, amounting to over three thousand dollars, has been defrayed by Mr. and Mrs. Naylor, who established the work and are thankful that God has given it His blessing.

A NOVEL DEMAND.

IN describing the valuable work Dr. Jacob Chamberlain has been the means of doing in India in his Medical Missionary Record, Dr. Dowkontt mentions an incident which would surprise a tax-gatherer if it occurred here. He says that while Dr. Chamberlain was laboring in India, in 1869, two men came to him, one blind. When returning home they asked for copies of the Testament, which had been read from and explained to them in the hospital. "But you cannot read?" queried the doctor. "No," they replied, "but when a peddler comes round we'll get him to read before we buy anything, and when the tax man comes we won't pay our taxes till he reads to us." Four years after this the doctor visited a town some miles away, and found these men, who brought their whole village to him to be baptized. On asking the people if they were willing to give up their idols they said they were, and brought them all out into a wagon and offered them to the doctor, who selected some and sent one to the mission-room of his society at 34 Vesey Street, New York, where it remains.

MEDICAL MISSION WORK IN INDIA.

IN a letter from Miss Swain, M.D., published by Dr. Dowkontt in his Medical Missionary Record, she says, in the course of an account of her work in India: "A native gentleman called on me to know if I would visit his wife. He said she had been quite poorly for three months, that he had consulted the native physician, but, according to their customs she could not receive the medical aid she needed from him. After making some inquiries concerning her, we decided to go at once. This man speaks English well, and said to me: 'We need lady physicians in India very much, and I have often spoken of it to my friends. But we did not know where to look for them, as our women are uneducated, and could not study medicine. But it seems the people of the West have thought of us, and helped to meet our necessity by sending you.'

"After passing through the bazaar and several winding lanes, we came to his house. He showed us the way in through the dark passages, the second opening into an open court, on three sides of which were cells or stables for cows, horses, and human beings. They all seemed to be on the same level. A dozen or more women and children were peeping out at us as we passed through to the opposite side of the court, when we ascended a flight of steps, which brought us to the apartments of this gentleman. His wife was lying on a bed in the open air on the house-top, with several servants around her. Her mother sat beside her, and began at once to weep and to implore me to cure her daughter. I told her I saw no symptoms of immediate danger, that I would examine her case, and if I thought I could help her I would gladly do all in my power for her recovery. I visited her several times and she improved very much."

In another letter Miss Swain says: "We still continue to visit this family. Mrs. Thomas (the missionary's wife) has three of the women under instruction. The woman who was sick reads very nicely, and one evening she asked us to bring her a Bible in her own language. We asked her if her husband would not object. She said: 'Why should he when he reads it himself in English?'"

MODERN DELUSIONS.

By Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D.

FROM HIS ADDRESS AT THE PROPHETIC CONFERENCE AT CHICAGO.

The Sunlight and the Shadow—The Spiritual Shadow of the Age—The Characteristic Delusions of our Time—Satan not an Avowed Infidel—The Signs of the End—An Influx of Superstition—Its Three Forms—1. Spiritualism—2. Ritualism—3. Theosophy or Buddhism—Spiritualism Revived Sorcery—Its Insidious Progress—Ritualism's Estimable Dupes—Its Fascination—Theosophy the Latest Development—All Doctrines of Demons.

THE consideration of this subject will occupy me exclusively with a shadowy and sombre aspect of the present age. But I must avow at the outset my belief that this is by no means the only or principal aspect. It is the fault of post-millennarians that, looking for the millennium instead of looking for the coming of Christ, they magnify present successes and anticipate the speedy conversion of the whole world, when the Scriptures authorize us simply to look for the preaching of the Gospel among all nations for a witness and the gathering out of an elect people for the Lord. It is the fault of many premillennarians, on the contrary, that, looking for the coming of Antichrist instead of looking for the coming of Christ, they exaggerate the magnifying each shade into a shadow, and every shadow into a sign of the son of perdition, and so predict the speedy triumph of the Man of Sin. "Watchman, what of the night?" And the watchman said: "The morning cometh, and also the night." Also the night, because the morning cometh. For the sunlight always casts a shadow, and the brighter the light the deeper the shadow.

To use a household illustration, what progress has there been made in lighting our homes within a single century? From the rude tallow candle of our forefathers, through the sperm-oil wick and the rock-oil lamp and the jet of burning gas, till we have reached the electric light—so surpassingly brilliant that I cannot see it without beholding a startling emblem of "that light unto which no man can approach." But look at the shadows which this electric light throws upon the pavement at night! Was there ever such blackness of darkness—such a dire and almost tangible

CONCENTRATION OF NIGHT?

Now, I make bold to say that the Church of Jesus Christ to whom He said: "Ye are the light of the world," never since the apostolic age has shed a purer and more widely diffused light upon the world than she is doing to-day. But the shadow is correspondingly black. The ship that carries the missionary carries rum and opium, whereby so-called Christian nations are destroying a hundred souls among the heathen where the Church saves one. The printing-press which scatters the Bible is flooding the world with infidel and obscene literature, and the Prince of Darkness is on hand to caricature any miracle of mercy with some dazzling miracle of perdition.

THE CHARACTERISTIC DELUSION.

Now let us ask, What Satanic delusion especially and peculiarly characterizes the present age? My reply is not with some: Infidelity foreshadowing an approaching atheistical Antichrist. Infidelity is characteristic of our age, no doubt, but not more so than of some other ages. Indeed, if we may credit the best authorities the unbelief of the last half of the eighteenth century was far more widespread and paralyzing in Christian countries than that of the last half of the nineteenth century. The fact is, that open infidelity is not especially in Satan's line. After figuring for ages as an "angel of light," it would be an entirely new departure in his administration for him to propose for himself an open coronation as the prince of darkness. His way has ever been to dishonor Christ by a feigned allegiance and betray Him by a deceitful kiss.

Now I open the Scriptures for the

of the age and of the coming of Christ, and what on this darker side do I find? Not atheism so much as demonism and delusion. In the first epistle to Timothy and the fourth chapter it is written: "Now the Spirit speaketh that in the latter times some shall apostatize from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of demons; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats," etc. Then I turn for a single glance at the Apocalypse, and the same thing confronts me there. In the sixteenth chapter, after the successive outpouring of the vials and just before the seventh there is a sudden startling note of warning: "Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments." But what is the event mentioned just previously to this note of warning? It is this: "The spirits of demons working miracles which go forth into the kings of the earth and of the whole world to gather them to the fanes of this great day of God Almighty." Seducing spirits, doctrines of demons, Satanic miracles—these are the manifestations which Scripture predicts of the latter day, and these are the appalling characteristics of our own times.

The source from which the unclean spirits proceed are declared in the Apocalypse to be three—"out of the mouth of the dragon and out of the mouth of the beast and out of the mouth of the false prophet." I will not dogmatize concerning the system thus indicated. I will simply point out the fact that the present influx of superstition is in these three forms and from these three principal sources:

1. Spiritualism proceeding from the pit.
2. Ritualism proceeding from the papacy.
3. Theosophy proceeding from paganism.

Spiritualism without doubt is ancient sorcery, reappearing under a different name, but with totally unchanged characteristics. And when I tell you that in the city of Boston, where Cotton Mather, that eminent withstander of witchcraft, once lived and labored, there is now a magnificent temple for the worship of Spiritualism, which, being interpreted, means for the

and witchcraft—when I remind you that the dark system claims from ten to twenty millions of devotees, who have been disciplined within less than fifty years of its modern manifestation, and when I repeat its proud boast that it has gone forth unto the kings of the earth and has royal apostles in many of the thrones and palaces of the Old World, you will see that it is no mere insignificant superstition, utterly unworthy of notice. The theory that spiritualism is a system of sheer imposition is not the one now held by the most candid Christian investigators, nor is it the one most accordant with Scripture.

The Bible explicitly forbids intercourse with spirits of the other world, and it would not forbid what is impossible. And not only is the reality of fallen spirits distinctly taught in Scripture, but their power to produce startling miracles. In Thessalonians we are told that "the working of Satan" is "with all power and signs and lying wonders," and in the Apocalypse we have the prediction of "the spirits of

DEMONS WORKING MIRACLES."

The man who supposes that Satan would undermine the belief in the supernatural is utterly ignorant of his devices. He has a creed to inculcate and a code of infernal morality to propagate, and he would employ miracles to authenticate his doctrines. Let us remember, indeed, that in the emergency of modern spiritualism Satan actually comes on the stage as a defender of the faith. "This generation has fallen into doubt concerning the immortality of the soul," say his ministers, the mediums, or soothsayers; "and we propose to demonstrate this doctrine to you by calling up your dead and letting them speak to you." Thousands of once professing Christians who are now in the coils of this delusion were first seduced by the plea of larger knowledge and firmer faith concerning the unseen. The ear having been thus gained for the communications of the departed, the instruction has gone on—no rude denials at first but the most soothing platitudes and the most subtle counterfeits, till little by little the whole system of evangelical fact has been supplemented by that soul-destroying creed, "the doctrine of demons." I say "of demons," for I have no question that what are supposed to be departed friends speaking from beyond the veil are in reality fallen spirits, foul, malignant, and seducing, sent to beguile me into the allegiance and worship of Satan.

ought not to be mentioned in the same volume with spiritualism, considering that it is an ecclesiastical eccentricity into which men of unquestionable piety and consecration have fallen, while spiritualism is utterly godless. But at the risk of a seeming breach of Christian charity I must classify it where its origin and history place it among the strong delusions which have come in to corrupt the Church and despoil it of the simplicity that is in Christ.

Is ritualism an innocent ecclesiastical pastime, a harmless freak of

RELIGIOUS ÆSTHETICISM?

So it seems to many, even of those who have no affiliation with it. But look at it just as it is. Trace the history of the ceremonies piece by piece back to their original source, till you find that true of almost every one of them which Newman admits of a part of them, that they were "the very instruments and appendages of demon worship," and then imagine the exaltation among these demons as they see Christian priests, clothed in their paraphernalia, marching in their idolatrous processions and preaching their delusive doctrines. And how must their joy be enhanced by the anticipation of the two greater triumphs still to come in the culmination of idolatry and man-worship.

But I ask you to look not at what may be possible, but at what has actually been accomplished along the line which we are considering, and this, too, not merely in the first centuries of the papacy, but in our own day and generation. It is hardly more than fifty years since the tractarian movement began in Oxford. From among the company of its originators we may select two, Newman and Manning, as noble and sincere souls, so far as we can judge, as any age of the Church has produced. But they came under of ritualism; and it threw its spell little by little over their minds. Watch their course from the beginning to the present day. Observe the mental struggles, the ill-concealed reluctances, as fold after fold of mediæval delusion closes about them. Almost can we hear cries of pain here and there as the process of branding the conscience with a hot iron goes on. But at last the work is complete; they have reached old age, and with it the dotage of superstition. And where do we find them now? Prostrate on their faces before a deified man; all the ascriptions which could be claimed by a god on earth they yield without reluctance to the Pope.

Here is the goal which the advance couriers of ritualism have reached in half a century; is it unlikely that the thousands of clergymen and laymen who have within a few years entered upon the same path will fail to arrive at the same destination?

All this is hard to say, for one who prefers the charity which covers a multitude of faults to the criticism which lays them bare. And in dwelling on this subject we are not insensible to the perversions of another kind which have crept into our non-liturgical bodies. For, so far as we know, the liturgical churches have not fallen into which is turning so many of our church basements into places of feasting; nor have they been ensnared with the entertainment heresy which sets up all sorts of shows and exhibitions for amusing the unchurched masses into an interest in the Gospel. We deplore these things, and here and now lift up our warning against them as another device of the enemy for corrupting and enervating the Church of God.

is the latest religion of transcendentalists. In it the attenuated unbelief of our times is seeking to find relief from the ennui of denial. How to describe that which takes for itself the name of "Occultism;" how to give an idea of doctrines which claim to be hidden from all but the initiated we do not know. It is enough to say that substantially it is Buddhism seeking conquests in Christian lands; "the light of Asia," offering itself to those who have turned away from "the light of Christ." It has its circles in many of our great cities, where its occult philosophy is diligently studied; though its following is small compared with that of spiritualism, it being the religion of the literary élite, as the other is of the common people. If we question it in regard to its doctrines, it tells us that they are the same as those of "the sacred mysteries of antiquity." It inculcates a very attenuated philosophy of evolution; it teaches the pre-existence and the transmigration of souls, and instructs its disciples how by a rigid asceticism they may cultivate what is called

"THE INTUITIONED MEMORY"

by which they can enter into profound recollection of what they knew in far distant ages. In a couplet which it is fond of repeating it declares that "Descending spirits have conversed with man

And told him secrets of the world unknown."

And these words give the most reasonable hint of its origin. For its creed is "the doctrines of demons from beginning to end."

Now, if we compare these three systems, counting ritualism as incipient Popery, we find them agreeing remarkably to fill the outlines of

THE PREDICTED APOSTASY.

The "forbidding to marry" realized in the celibacy of Romanism; the enforced continence of theosophy and the anti-marriage doctrine of spiritualism; the "commanding to abstain from meat" appearing in the superstitious fasts of ritualism, and the rigid abstinence from flesh enjoined on the initials of esoteric Buddhism; the doctrines of demons manifested in the magic idolatry which ritualism substitutes for the chaste and simple doctrines of ordinance of Christ, and which in many particulars hold a common ancestry with those of theosophy and spiritualism, and the fantastic miracle-working which characterize them all.

What, now, is the prophetic significance of all that we have said? Thus it seems to me that, according to the predictions of Scripture, we are witnessing who are again working powerfully along their favorite lines—ritualism, superstition, and "philosophy." "And now the devil is come down with great wrath because he knoweth that he hath but a short time." He is putting forth the energy of despair. He is sending his legions to work along various lines, which all centre, visibly or invisibly, in one head. On the line of sacerdotalism he is seeking to thwart the work of the Reformation by again insinuating popish worship into its churches; on the line of superstition he is aiming to bewitch the godless and curious multitudes through the energy of unclean spirits; on the line of culture he is moving to foist upon the literary élite a diluted paganism as an extra fine religion. But these things cheer us rather than sadden us, for all the shadows point to the dawn. The Church's salvation means Antichrist's destruction, and the same Scripture which speaks to us so powerfully to-day in the light of passing evils: "Yet a little while and He that shall come will come and will not tarry," says also: "And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly." The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Another Definition of "Pernicious Activity" was issued by the President last week. It was called forth by an application from Mr. William A. Stone, another suspended District Attorney, who, seeing that Mr. Benton had been reinstated, put in his claim for similar treatment, alleging that his activity had been no greater than Benton's and his absence from his office much less. Mr. Cleveland declined to reinstate him, and in doing so enlarged the scope of his previous dictum on the subject. Though the word is not used, Mr. Cleveland intimates that ingratitude was the fatal fault in this latter case. He stated that Mr. Stone, being a Republican, his remaining in office under a Democratic administration "involved not only the proper performance of official duty, but a certain good faith and fidelity, which, while not exacting the least sacrifice of political principle, forbade active participation in purely partisan demonstrations of a pronounced type, undertaken for the purpose of advancing partisan interests, and conducted upon the avowed theory that the administration of the Government was not entitled to the confidence and respect of the people." This decision has alienated some of Mr. Cleveland's most strenuous supporters among the Independent Republicans. It concedes the principle against which they have been most earnestly contending. It does not cause much surprise, however, both the political parties have acted on that principle hitherto.

The Business of the Post-Office Department during the past year has been of a very gratifying character. The report of Postmaster-General Vilas, published last week, shows that the deficiency, which was expected to be over nine million dollars, was less than seven millions, and the deficiency for the current year is expected to be little over four millions. This is a remarkable showing in view of the fact that the unit of domestic letter postage was raised to one ounce, and the bulk rate on newspapers reduced to one cent. Some interesting details are furnished by Mr. Vilas in his report. Among them is the statement that the mileage of our mail transportation last year exceeded by more than 125,000,000 miles the service rendered to any other Government, and of post-offices no other nation has one third of our number. On October 1st, the total number of post-offices in the country was 54,157, of which 51,886 were of the fourth class, and 181 were free delivery offices. The cost of transporting the mails was $27,728,238. The mileage on railroad routes was increased 2901. During the year the department enforced the statute providing that land grant railroads should receive but eighty per cent of the compensation paid to other roads. The Postmaster-General declares that the present method of measuring the compensation to railroads for mail transportation is clumsy, unequal, and by no means fixed on a true basis, and that the subject deserves early consideration.

Many Facts of Interest in Connection with the national banking system are recorded in the report of the Hon. William L. Trenholm, Controller of the Currency, issued on Thursday last. Among others is the fact that the aggregate deposits in the banks have increased from $522,000,000 in January, 1866, to $1,173,000,000 in October, 1886. Three thousand five hundred and eighty national banks have organized in all since the beginning of the system in 1863, of which 2858 are now in operation; of these 174 have been organized during the past year. Only 112 national banks have failed. Of these 30 have paid their creditors in full and 20 have paid interest besides, 15 in full and 5 in part. It is understood that Mr. Trenholm makes several important suggestions for the amendment of the national bank laws, including the contingent liability of shareholders, requirements as to reserve, the limit on loans to individuals, more thorough examination of banks, and their protection against unequal State taxation.

A Hopeful Commencement of the Project to supply the United States with a navy was made last week. Of the five new vessels to be built, offers were made for the construction of four at prices within the limit fixed by Congress. One was from contractors at San Francisco, one from contractors at Baltimore, and two from Cramp & Sons, of Philadelphia. The fifth may be built in the Government navy-yards, or Congress may be induced to extend the limit of cost. The stipulations as to speed and power are of a very stringent character, and are expected to secure a much higher order of vessels than those now constituting the navy. The need of this departure is proved by the announcement made last week that the Atlanta's machinery has again broken down and has not yet reached the limit of speed guaranteed by her constructor of fourteen knots.

A Reprieve of the Chicago Anarchists, Six of whom were to have been hanged on December 3d, has been issued. On November 25th Chief-Justice Scott, of the Supreme Court of Illinois, granted a writ of error, which suspends all proceedings in their case for the present. It does not reverse Judge Gary's sentence, but gives an opportunity for the court to decide whether the proceedings at the trial were regular and the judge's rulings strictly legal. The next term of the Supreme Court will be held in March, at which time both the prosecution and the defence will present their views upon the record, and upon the decision of the full court at that time will depend whether the six condemned Anarchists are to have a new trial or to be hanged, and the seventh kept in prison for fifteen years.

The Trial of the New York Alderman charged with accepting a bribe in the case of the Broadway Railroad franchise ended in a disagreement of the jury on November 24th. After being locked up thirty-nine hours, and having made no progress toward agreement, they were discharged. It appears they stood nine for acquittal and three for conviction. The reason given for their extraordinary conduct by the men who voted for acquittal was that the evidence given by the two aldermen who admitted that they had themselves been bribed had not been corroborated, and, standing alone, was unworthy of credence. The result has astonished the city, as it was evident that Fullgraff and Duffy could have no adequate motive in perjuring themselves by evidence which branded them with shame. The Recorder's opinion may be inferred from the fact that he ordered a new trial without delay, and refused to admit McQuade to bail. He was right, too, in declaring the case one of paramount importance; an impression prevails that not only McQuade, but the administration of justice is on trial.

A New Conflict Between the Irish People and the Government was inaugurated last week. The Conservatives have been putting pressure on the landlords to induce them voluntarily to reduce rents. In some cases they have been successful, but in many others they have met with a firm refusal. The Nationalists have now proposed that the tenants should pay half a year's rent into the hands of Nationalist leaders to form a fund with which to fight the landlords. This proposal has apparently exasperated the Government, and United Ireland, in which the proposal was published, has received warning to moderate its tone or prepare for suppression. Mr. Dillon, also, who was one of the leaders in the new Nationalist movement, has been required to find sureties for good behavior. This sudden movement on the part of the Government has produced a panic throughout Ireland, and the wildest rumors of coming conflicts are being circulated. It was hoped that during the winter Ireland would suffer from nothing worse than distress, which private charity and American benevolence might alleviate. Now it would appear that a fierce and desperate peasantry will be confronted by a large military force, with the constant danger that some attempt to make wholesale ejections will involve bloodshed and a widespread rising.

The Proposal to Send English Mails to America in German ships is a curious one to emanate from a Conservative administration. Yet it is stated that such an arrangement is in contemplation, if not already effected. The Conservatives have hitherto favored protection in opposition to free trade, so that it is extraordinary that their accession to power has been signalized by a change which the Liberals would scarcely dare to venture upon. The apologists for the Government assert that the Cunard and White Star Steamship lines demanded a monopoly of the mail-carrying business, while offering a service of two despatches a week. This being deemed insufficient, and the companies refusing to share with their foreign competitors, the entire mail will be carried by the German steamers. A storm of protests has been evoked from all classes, not only from Conservatives, who consistently denounce the change on principle, but from Liberals, who hold the selfish principle that it is right to buy in the cheapest market. The popularity of the Government has sensibly decreased, and even the London Times ventures to remonstrate. It says: "The Cabinet would do well to look at the patriotic, as well as at the economic, side of the question. Its decision on the subject will have no little effect upon the popularity of the Government, especially in these times of depressed trade."

A Government Crisis has Arisen in France. The Chambers refused by a large majority to grant an appropriation required by the Finance Minister. The reproof administered in any other European legislative assembly would have involved the downfall of the Cabinet. M. de Freycinet, however, appears to understand the situation and proposes to accept the reproof in patience. The fact is, that in France, there has been a long period of agricultural and commercial depression, while the public debt and it is burden of interest is enormous. The Republicans, who for nine years have had control of the government, have shown no consideration for the tax-payers but have spent with a lavish hand. The Chambers appear to have lost patience with them and deemed the time appropriate for administering a warning.

The Rev. M. Baxter Preached on the Approaching Second Advent of Christ in the First Methodist Church, Elgin, Ill., on Sunday last. Next Sunday he expects to preach on the same subject in Milwaukee, Wis.

An Appeal to Ministers has been Issued by Mr. J. C. Lanphier, the veteran leader of the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting. He asks them to preach upon "the all-important subject of prayer," on the first Sunday of December, or as soon thereafter as possible. He begs the ministers at the same time to urge their people to avail themselves of the privilege of attending the down-town meetings, where united prayer is daily offered, viz., Fulton Street, John Street, Greenwich Street, Broome Street, and others. During December, the noon hour at Fulton Street is to be given to prayer for a fresh baptism from on high. By such means it is hoped to be the better prepared for the Week of Prayer now near at hand.

The Rev. W. Re Qua Writes that He is setting out for his new sphere of labor among the Indians. It appears that there is a small chapel at MacAlister, the settlement to which he is going, but there is no house to live in. Houses are very scarce there, and none can be hired at present; but a brother at the next settlement has offered him temporary accommodation until better arrangements can be made. At a farewell meeting of Re Qua's church at Aurora, Ill., a resolution was passed expressing the sorrow with which the church learned of their pastor's approaching departure, and adding: "We have learned to love him for his high Christian character, for his ardent devotion to the Master's cause, for his faithful preaching of the Word, for the example of a pure and holy life. And we believe by being among us we have as a church been greatly benefited, both spiritually and otherwise, and our ardent prayer is that God will bless and sustain him in whatever field he may be called to labor, and as it is God's will that we separate, believing He doeth all things well, we bow in submission."

The List of Sunday-School Lessons for the year 1888 has been issued by the International Lesson Committee. The first six months are given to a continuation of Matthew's gospel and the last six months to Old Testament lessons, running to the Book of Ruth inclusive. Texts for temperance and missionary lessons are suggested for the last Sunday of each quarter, in addition to the ordinary suggestion for review.

Mr. Moody's Letter to the Prophetic Conference was a characteristic epistle, expressing his sympathy with the object of the gathering. He wrote: "Dear Brethren: The pressure of work and binding engagements will prevent my attending the Conference. I feel for the purpose of the Conference the greatest sympathy. May it result in a spiritual quickening in all the churches. The Coming of the Lord is to me a most precious truth, and a constant inspiration to work. There can be no better preparation for the Lord than breaking the bread of life to the perishing multitudes. My prayer is that the Conference may result in sending every minister out to evangelistic work this winter. Evangelists cannot do one tenth of the work called for. Pastors must assist each other. May the Spirit of the Lord for service come upon each one attending the Conference."

A Party of Recruits for Bishop Taylor's Self-supporting African Mission are to sail this day (December 2d), in the Adriatic. It consists of six men, one woman, and two boys. They are sent in response to Bishop Taylor's call for helpers of special vocations. This company comprises Mr. Hicks, carpenter, wife, and two sons, Massachusetts; Ellsworth Brown, carpenter, Miamisburg, Ohio; William O. White, superintendent schools, Lacota, Mich.; Henley Wright, miner, Silver City, New Mexico; Dr. D. Reed, physician, Manson, Iowa; Daniel Williams, physician and farmer, Irondale, Ontario, Canada. At Liverpool the company will be increased by the addition of Robert Shields, storekeeper, and Thomas Adams, shoemaker, of Newry, Ireland. The party will arrive at St. Paul de Loanda about February 1st, and will report to the Rev. A. E. Whitey, superintendent of Bishop Taylor's operations in Angola. The society having received word from Bishop Taylor that he imperatively needs a steamboat for operations on the tributaries of the Upper Congo, has asked estimates from three English firms, as to save expense the steamboat will have to be shipped in sections from that country.

A Curious Application by a Lunatic was made in Toronto last week. A woman about fifty years of age went into Police Headquarters and asked to be arrested and sent to England in order that she might be tried for the sins of her father. She was locked up and examined by a physician who pronounced her insane. There are many sane persons who entertain unscriptural views on the same subject, but they reverse the error of this demented woman. Instead of wishing to be punished for the sins of others, they hope that the responsibility for their own sins may rest on some one else. The Bible declaration as to individual responsibility is, however, unmistakable (II Cor. 5:10).

The Inhuman Treatment of a Drunken Man was investigated at a New York Police Court on November 7th. A terrible storm swept over the city on the previous Saturday, and while the rain was pouring down a policeman noticed one man sheltering another, who appeared to be intoxicated, under his umbrella, and gently guiding his uncertain footsteps. A few minutes later he saw the drunken man's friend return with a coat and overcoat over his arm. Suspecting that something was wrong, he went around the block, and there found the drunken man standing disconsolately in the rain in his shirt sleeves. He promptly followed the thief and arrested him, and restored the two coats to the helpless victim. The singular part of the affair was that the drunken man proved to be a liquor-dealer—a fact which cancelled his title to sympathy. In an extent very inconsiderable compared with what is to come, he was realizing the scriptural warning and eating of the fruit of his own doings (Prov. 1:31).

The Difference Between President Arthur and General Arthur was fully realized by the country, and appears to have been clearly seen by the statesman himself. Among the reminiscences which his death has called forth is one of a personal friend who, during his term, urged him to make a certain appointment. President Arthur declined, and then his friend reminded him that before his elevation to the Presidency he had been anxious that such an appointment should be made. The President admitted the fact, and added: "I determined when I entered this office that President Arthur should be one man and Chester A. Arthur another, and President Arthur has been obliged to do some things that C. A. Arthur didn't like, and to leave some things undone which C. A. Arthur would have been glad had he seen his way clear to do." Conscience and patriotism exercised greater power in him than personal inclination. So it is with the man who becomes the child of God. He is governed by higher motives than before and he learns to deny himself (Col. 3:1-8).

The Hoisting of the Stars and Stripes in the Samoan Islands appears to have been an effectual protection to the king. Consul Greenbaum, who arrived in San Francisco a few days ago, explained the circumstance which has caused no little sensation in European Cabinets. He said: "The cause of the trouble in Samoa was that a German man-of-war appeared in the harbor of Apia, and the admiral, instead of paying his respects to King Maliteoa, the recognized sovereign of the islands, after a few hours' stay steamed to the headquarters of the rebel chief, Temasesse, fifteen miles below Apia. The conduct of the admiral alarmed the king, and he came to me and desired to hold a consultation on the subject. I told him that if he transferred his business to the United States Government he would be protected until a settlement between the Powers could be effected. I further told him that if he would accept my proposition I would guarantee that Germany would not gobble him up. He agreed to my proposition, and I hoisted the American flag, after which the German admiral concluded that things were becoming serious and he immediately left. Since that time there has not been any trouble in Samoa." The king showed more sense than regal persons generally possess. He was not ashamed to admit his own weakness and place himself under the protection of a Power able to defend him. If when Christians are assailed by their great enemy they could be induced similarly to transfer their business to their Almighty Protector, there would be fewer falls and backslidings than there are (I Cor. 10:13).

The Naive Answer of a Sunday-School Girl occasioned some amusement in the Baptist Convention recently held at Wilmington, N. C. A Sunday-school mass meeting was held on the Sunday afternoon of the session of the Convention, and an address was given by a gentleman whose interest in Sunday-school work is well known. In speaking of the rare beauty and value of Christianity, he used as an illustration the lustre of diamonds and reminded the children how much they were prized as ornaments, and then asked: "What do young ladies most admire?" To which question a bright little girl promptly replied, "The young gentlemen." The answer was so entirely unexpected that, notwithstanding its apparent truthfulness, there was a commotion in the house. Whether the child's observation was at fault or the young ladies whom she knew were really so animated is not stated. Perhaps her opinion was not formed on the conduct of her teachers. It would be sad if any Sunday-school child believed that the teachers had no higher object of admiration (Rom. 13:14).

An Unavailing Crime was Committed at Burlington, Vt., by a young English lady, on November 19th. She had been engaged to be married to a gentleman to whom she was deeply attached. He died a year ago and her grief was intense. She was inconsolable, spending her time in fits of weeping and lamentation. It was hoped that time would assuage the acuteness of her woe, but it seemed to increase as weeks and months passed. November 19th was the first anniversary of her lover's death, and on the morning of that day she resolved to live no longer. She bought small quantities of strychnine which she put together and took at one dose. She left a letter behind stating that her object was to join her dead lover, and begging that she might be buried by his side. Even that request was refused, as the authorities at the cemetery where the body of her lover was interred would not permit a suicide to be buried in their ground. Disappointment must come also from her hope of a reunion in the spirit. In that abode to which self-murderers are doomed, reunion, if it took place, could bring no happiness (Rev. 21:8).

A Business Man's Self-Imposed Limit of wealth is mentioned among the reminiscences of a Boston merchant, published in the Dry Goods Chronicle. It states that Nathaniel Ripley Cobb, early in the days of his prosperity, made a resolution that he would never possess more than fifty thousand dollars. He also resolved that his benefactions should not be postponed until he had acquired that sum, but should be distributed as his property grew. Among his papers, found after his death, was one drawn up in November, 1821, in the following words: "By the grace of God, I will never be worth more than fifty thousand dollars. By the grace of God, I will give one fourth of the net profits of my business to charitable and religious uses. If I am ever worth twenty thousand dollars I will give one half my net profits, and if I am ever worth thirty thousand dollars I will give three fourths, and the whole after my fiftieth thousand. So help me God, or give to a more faithful steward and set me aside." He adhered to this resolution with the strictest fidelity. This was more remarkable than his making the resolution. It showed that grace was given him in circumstances which have often caused men to be unfaithful to their covenants (II Cor. 9:7).

DOGS IN THE MANGER.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And the Lord said unto Cain, Why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance fallen? If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door. And unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him."—GENESIS 4: 6, 7.

Men in Danger of Two Hells—Jealous of Converted People—Desiring the Privileges without the Conditions—God's Condescending Remonstrance—Persecution Unreasonable—I. Social Arrangements not Changed by Religion—Christianity not Inimical to Order—Good Christians are Good Citizens—Good in Family Relations—A Blessing to the Household—II. The Fault in the Persecutor—The Same Terms Offered Him—Acceptance Guaranteed—Sin in the Way—The Raw Material for a Devil—The Sin-Offering Accessible.

SINNERS are not all of the laughing sort; Cain's mind was angry, and his heart was heavy. The short life of the vicious is not always a merry one. See, here you have a man who is utterly without God, but he is not without sorrow. His countenance has fallen; his looks are sullen; he is a miserable man. There are many ungodly people still in the world who are not happy in the condition in which they find themselves. The present does not content them, and they have no future from which to borrow the light of hope. The service of sin is hard to them, and yet they do not quit it for the service of the Lord. They are

IN DANGER OF TWO HELLS

—one in this life and another in the world to come. They would like to have the enjoyments of religion very much, they would like to have peace of conscience, they would like to be uplifted beyond all fear of death, they would like to be as happy as Christian people are; but they do not want to pay the price—namely, obedience to God by faith in Jesus Christ. They would willingly bring an offering to God according to their own choice and taste; but they do not care to come with "the lamb" as their sacrifice; they cannot accept the atonement made by our Lord's laying down His life for us. They wish to have the reward of obedient faith while yet they have their own way. But as this cannot be, and never will be, they are full of bitter feeling. Since sin and sorrow are sure to be, sooner or later, married together, and since only by walking in the ways of God can we hope to find peace and rest, they quarrel with the divine arrangement, grow inwardly miserable, and show it by their sullen looks and growling words.

Now, I want to call attention to a very gracious fact connected with this text; and that is, that, although Cain was in such that he was very wroth, and his countenance fell, yet God, the infinitely gracious One, came and spoke with him, and reasoned with him patiently. "Why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance fallen? If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door." Yet this is no solitary instance of the condescension of God; it is the way of our God to expostulate with sinners, and to let them produce their strong reasons, and justify themselves if they can. It is His fashion to say: "Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die, O house of Israel?" for He willeth not the death of any, but that they should turn unto Him and live. He is greatly patient and waiteth to be gracious. God gives none up until they fatally resolve to give themselves up, and even then His good Spirit strives with them as long as it is possible to do so, consistently with His holiness.

Recollect that the case is that of a man who is angry, angry mainly because he cannot get the comforts of religion. He sees his brother enjoying them, and he grows wroth with him for that reason. With him, and all like him, I would reason with kind words.

I. I shall take the last sentence of the text first: "Unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him." In these words God argues with Cain, and answers

THE CHARGE OF FAVORITISM

which was lurking in his mind. He tells him, in effect, that no difference is made in the arrangement of social life because of the arrangements of grace. Notice that He says to him: "Unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him"—which I understand to mean just this: "Why are you so angry against Abel? It is true that I have accepted his offering; it is true that he is a righteous man, and you are not; but, for all that, you are his elder brother, and he looks up to you, his desire is toward you, and you shall rule over him. He has not acted otherwise than as a younger brother should act toward an elder brother, but he has admitted your seniority and priority. He has not revolted from you; you rule over him; you are his master. Why, then, are you so angry?"

Observe this, then—that if a man shall be angry with his wife because she is a Christian, we may well argue with him—Why are you thus provoked? Is she not a loving and obedient wife to you in all things, except in this matter touching her God? Is she not all the better for her religion? I have known a husband meet his wife at the Tabernacle door and call her foul names all the way home for no other reason than because she joined in the worship of God. Yet she was all the more loving, diligent, and patient because of that worship. For what cause are you thus sullen and wroth? Good sir, this is not like a reasonable man. Be persuaded to let better feelings sway you.

Now, this is an important thing to note, because first of all it takes away from governments their excuse for persecution. "In the early days of Christianity, multitudes of Christians were tormented to death because of their faith in Jesus. There was no excuse for it, for they had done no harm to the State. Christianity does not come into a nation to break up its arrangements, or to break down its fabric. All that is good in human society it preserves and establishes.

of the family; it dislocates no bonds of the body politic. There are theories of socialism and the like which lead to anarchy and riot; but it is not so with the mild and gentle teaching of Jesus Christ, whose every word is love and patience. He says: "Resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also." His apostle says: "Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands; husbands, love your wives; children, obey your parents in all things; servants, obey in all things your masters, not with eye service as men please; masters, give unto your servants that which is just and equal; knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven." Such precepts as these are no injury to government. Christians will cheerfully submit to all lawful rule and righteous authority. They hate tyranny, but they love order; they protest against oppression, but they uphold law and justice. Why, then, should they be persecuted?

That being so in the broad field of national life, it is just the same if you bring it down to the little sphere of home. If religion made men false in their dealings with others, if it made the servant careless and indifferent, if it made the husband a tyrant, if it made the wife a tattler and a slattern, if it turned all relationships upside down, there would be some little reasonableness in the opposition which you offer to it. But if it does nothing of the kind, why are you wroth? and why is your countenance fallen? Why, to me it seems to be a great blessing to a man to have his friends converted—a blessing to be desired and prized. Their conversion may do you good, even if you are not converted yourself. Laban learned by experience that the Lord blessed him for Jacob's sake. Look at Joseph. The Lord was with him, and we find that wherever Joseph went others were the better, because God blessed them through

Joseph. A good man in a house is good store to the family. A converted daughter, a praying son, a holy husband, a gracious wife—why, these are the pillars, the ornaments,

THE BUTTRESSES OF THE HOUSE.

Godly people roof in the mansion with their prayers. Who can tell what blessings God gives to unconverted men because of their converted relatives? I could hope, my angry friend, that God means to give a greater blessing still to you—that He means to entice you to heaven by showing your wife the way, or He means to lead you to Christ by that dear child of yours. I have known parents brought to repentance by the deaths of daughters or of sons who have died in the faith. I hope you will not have to lose those you love that you may be brought to Jesus by their dying words. But it may be so; it may be so. Oh, that the persecuted one may live to have the great joy of going to the house of God with father, or walking with brother in the ways of godliness, or bringing the thoughtless sister to seek and find the Saviour! Why should it not be so? Let us hope for it. At any rate, I do not see any cause to be angry because grace has visited your family. If you do not mean to serve Christ, at least stand out of the road and let other people serve Him.

II. Now let us advance farther into the text. There is for though the difference lies first with the grace of God, yet it lies also with the man's own self. "If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door." If you are not accepted, and you are angry because you are not accepted, is there not a just cause for it? If you do not enjoy the comforts of religion, and you grow envious because you do not, you should cool your wrathfulness by considering this question: "If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted?" That is to say, will you not be accepted on the same terms as Abel? You will be accepted in the same way as your brother, your sister, your child. How is it that the one you envy is full of peace? It is because he has come to Jesus and confessed his sin, and trusted his Redeemer. If thou doest this, shalt thou also be accepted? Has not the Lord said: "Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out"? If you, too, come and confess your sin, and trust the Saviour, you are as certain to be accepted as your friend. Put it to the test and see. Try Him. Try Him; and if He does refuse you, let me know it; for I am telling everybody that Jesus never casts out any that come to Him, and I must not do so any more if I find out that He does reject you or any one else. Try the Lord Jesus, I do beseech you; and I know what the result will be.

Now, is it not much wiser for a man, instead of being angry with another's enjoying the comforts of religion, to seek to enjoy them himself?

God's second word with Cain was, however: "If thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door." That is to say: "If religion does not yield thee joy as it does thy brother, what is the reason?" Surely sin stops the entrance, as

A STONE BLOCKING THE DOORWAY.

If you cannot gain an entrance to mercy, it is because sin, like a huge stone, has been rolled against it, and remains there. If the way to God and salvation is, indeed, blocked up, it is only blocked up by your own sin. The door is not locked by a divine decree, nor nailed up by any necessity of circumstances, nor barred by any peculiarity of your case. No, there is neither block, nor bar, nor lock except your sin. Your sin lies at the door, and makes you a prisoner, where else you might be free as air. I desire to press this point home upon any unconverted persons who are somewhat anxious, but yet cannot get peace. A secret something is keeping you from being accepted as Abel was accepted. I am sure it is sin in one shape or another. May I entreat you to see what that sin is!

Is it unbelief? In most cases unbelief is the damning sin. You will not believe God's Word. You reject the testimony of God concerning His Son Jesus, and thus you put away from you eternal life. You say: "I cannot believe." But that will not do, for you know that God is true; and if God be true, how dare you say that you cannot believe Him? If, when I stated solemnly a fact, you told me: "I cannot believe you," I should understand you to mean that I am a liar. And when you say: "I cannot believe God," do you not know that the English of such an expression is this—you make God a liar by refusing to believe on His Son? This unbelief is sin enough—sin enough to destroy you forever. May God help you to roll it away, by saying: "I will believe; I must believe. God must be true; the blood of His dear Son must be able to wash away sin. I will trust in it now!"

Or, is it pride? Are you too big a man to become a Christian? Are you too respectable, too wealthy, too polite? Are you too deep a thinker? Do you know too much? You could not go and sit down with the humble people who, like little children, believe what God tells them. No, no; you have too much brain for that; have you? Now be honest, and own it! You read the reviews, and you like a little dash of scepticism in your literature. You could not possibly listen to Jesus when He says: "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." You do not care for such old-fashioned doctrine, for you are too much of a philosopher. I would not care to lose my soul to gratify my loftiness. Would you? One's pride may carry him far if he is a great fool; but let him not suffer his pride to carry him into hell, for it certainly will never carry him out again.

Alas! there are some who have another sin,
A HIDDEN SIN.

I cannot mention it; it is a shame even to speak of the things which are done of them in secret. I have been frequently puzzled to know why certain persons cannot attain peace. They have seemed to be in a fair way to salvation, and yet they have never reached it; they have been one day near and the next far off. In one or two instances I have not discovered the reason why the Gospel never succeeded with them, till they were dead. When they were gone the sad truth was revealed which accounted for all their uneasiness; but I will not tell you what it was. There was a secret which, if it had been known, would have made their character abhorrent to those who in ignorance respected them.

Does any man here carry about with him a guilty secret? Does he persevere in shameful acts which he labors to conceal? How can a man hope for peace while he wars with the laws of morality? What rest can there be while solemn vows are broken, and the purest of relationships are treated with despot? Nay, while there is any uncleanness about a man, or about a woman, there cannot be peace with God; such sins must be given up, or there cannot be acceptance with the Most High. Would you for a moment insinuate that the Lord Jesus died to allow you to sin and yet escape its penalty?

We have known persons practise dishonesty in business, and this has shut them out from acceptance. Not that they actually pilfer, but they have ways and means of calling things by wrong names, and taking fraudulent advantage. Cheating is called "custom of trade," and so on. My brethren, to be very plain with you, an honest heart and an honest hand must be found in every man who is to be justified at the last great day. Not a few harbor enmity in their hearts toward their brother or neighbor. Oh, angry hearer,

GOD CANNOT ACCEPT YOUR SACRIFICE

until you are at peace with your brother! It cannot be. Go home, and forgive your fellow-servant; for if you do not so forgive your little debts, the great Lord will not forgive you all your great debt. Before you can hope to have peace with God, you must be at peace with those who have offended you. Then there are some who keep evil company. They like to come to the Tabernacle, or to some other place where the Gospel is preached, and they hope that they may find Christ; but then they also like a lascivious song. They relish those silly, coarse, loathsome ditties which have a touch of "smut" about them. These are disgraceful things, and yet certain people roll them out as choice morsels. While that is the case, can a man hope that God will accept him? No; it is of no use pretending anything of the kind. You and your sins must part, or God and you cannot be friends.

I think this word of divine expostulation bears another meaning. "If thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door." That is to say, not only as a stone to block your way, but to pounce upon you. It is true that sin is hindering you from peace, but it is also true that a greater sin is lurking at the door ready to spring upon you. What a warning this word ought to have been to Cain! If you are doing ill and God is not accepting you, and that fact is making you angry, there is a worse sin lying like a couchant lion ready to devour you. It was so with Cain. Perhaps at that moment he had not seriously thought of killing his brother. He was angry, but he was not yet implacable and malicious. But God said: "There is a sin lying at your door that will come upon you to your destruction." May it not be the same with you, my hearer?

I am always fearful about those who are so near salvation and yet are not decided. Judas who can preach the Gospel, Judas who is an apostle, Judas who can say: "Lord, is it I?"—he is the man that at the last sells his Master; for though an apostle in appearance he was in heart a traitor, and a son of perdition. The raw material for a devil is an angel. The raw material for the son of perdition was an apostle; and the raw material for the most horrible of apostates is one who is almost a saint. I say no more than I mean, and than history can prove. There have usually been splendid traits of character about men who have been unfit to live. The question has been in their minds: "Which shall have the mastery?" and for a while the result has trembled in the balance; but when they have decided for evil it has been decision with a vengeance. Be thou warned, O man, to whom these words shall come, lest thy last end be worse than the first.

But there is yet another meaning which I must bring out here, and that is one which is held by many critics, though it is questioned by others. I am content to go with a considerable following, especially of the old divines, who say that the word here used may be rendered: "If thou doest ill, lieth at the door." And what a sweet meaning this gives us! God graciously declares to angry Cain: "Thou canst bring a sin-offering, as Abel has done, and all will be well. Thou canst present a bleeding sacrifice, typical of the great atonement; a sin-offering lies at the door." This should be an encouraging assurance to any one who is anxious, and at the same time greatly afraid that pardon is not possible. My dear friend, why needest thou grow despondent because another enters heaven? A sin-offering lies at thy door also. Thou canst have thy sin forgiven even as his has been forgiven; come and try for thyself.

A SIN-OFFERING

I do not know that I can say any more; I wish that I could have said it better. I would speak right into your heart. May the Spirit of God so speak! Do not be angry because another is saved, but turn your anger on yourself because you have not accepted salvation. Recollect, if you do what other sinners have done—namely, simply come to Christ, you shall be accepted as they have been; and if you are not accepted, it is your sin that is preventing it. A sin-offering is waiting to take away that sin. Oh, reject not the priceless boon! Trifle not with your soul and with your Saviour! Do not incur an eternity of misery! Do not lose an eternity of bliss! "Turn ye, turn ye; why will ye die, O house of Israel?" If I never should occupy this pulpit again, what should I wish to have preached? Nothing but the Gospel which I have now preached for so many years. I wish I had spoken better, but I do not know that I could have said more. If these kind pleadings do not touch angry hearts, neither would they be affected though martyrs rose from the dead.

CURIOUS SUPERSTITIONS IN CHINA.*

THE doctrine of metempsychosis is the great central principle of Buddhism. Just as the cross is the emblem of Christianity, so the wheel is the symbol of Buddhism; the wheel of the law turns in this world and the wheel of transmigration in hades. In this wheel there are six ranks—insects, fish, birds, animals, poor men, and mandarins. It is not necessary to go in order through the six paths, but one may go from the highest to the lowest, and from the lowest to the highest. All sentient creatures are bound to this revolving wheel.

There is a state of action and reaction between this world and hades, a system of rewards bestowed and vengeance taken. A wicked man returns as a beast, but if the beast is killed his sins are atoned for and the account settled, and he may the next time be a man. There is a state of enmity between the two worlds. If a man goes through life and he does not kill an ant or a fly, then there is no enmity in the other world. The common saying is, "If I am a hog and you a man, and you kill me, in the next life you will be a hog and I a man, and I will kill you."

An early transmigration is thought to be desirable. From ancient times it was the practice of the poor, some years after decease, to burn the coffin and gather up the bones for want of burial space. Afterward, as the priests practised cremation, it was said, "One day quicker burned, one day sooner returned;" so the custom became general in some parts of the land, though the mandarins issue proclamations forbidding it.

Metempsychosis is the faith of every man, woman, and child in China; all believe that they individually have in a previous existence been here upon this earth. They have a proverb that "the good has the good reward, and the evil the evil reward;" but they see that many honest men are poor, and that "the wicked flourish as the green bay tree," so they seek for a theory to cover these different conditions, and find it in the formula that the happiness and misery in this life are the result of good or bad deeds in a previous existence. Preach against this as the minister may, their minds still revolve around the hub of transmigration. It is not simply inlaid in their constitutions, it is so thoroughly interwoven that it is a part of the mental structure of all Buddhists. "Cruelty, covetousness, falsehood; lust, drunkenness, and other vices will heap up a stock of demerit, producing re-birth in some wretched condition of life on earth, while the opposite virtues will insure a desirable condition." All say they know of many instances. A sheep near Soochow was once born with a man's name branded on its side, and did it not have the soul of that man? Some years since a man of Hangchow dreamed that outside one of the gates a cow had a calf, which was his father returning. Rising early and going to a village, he found a young calf; purchasing the cow and calf he led them home, and honored the calf as his venerated father. A few nights afterward he dreamed that it was not the soul of his father, but that of an enemy, and its retention would bring untold calamities. On the morrow the calf was killed.

The greatest hope of a woman is that at her next birth she may be a man; of a poor man that he may be born rich; of the wealthy that in their next life upon the earth they may be mandarins. This is an old doctrine of the Brahmins, which Buddha remodelled, and made it the pivot of his system, and this was the sword the Indian prophet wielded with such frightful terror. What a fearful doctrine!

SIX CONVERSIONS FROM ONE TESTAMENT.

THE Spirit of Missions relates an incident of thrilling interest which has occurred in Japan. It says: After some English or American ships (it is not known which) had left the bay of Yedo, a Japanese gentleman of rank and highly esteemed for his wisdom saw a small object floating on the water, and he sent an attendant to bring it. When placed in his hands, he saw it was a book he could not read. Taking it to the Dutch trader at Kanagawa, he learned that it was a New Testament in English, and held by many persons to be the Word of the only true God; and also that it had been translated into Chinese and could be procured at Shanghai. He sent to China and obtained a copy, and at the court of his prince sat down with five or six companions to study it.

There was much he could not understand, and learning that a man who could speak Dutch had come to Nagasaki to explain this book, he sent his interpreter to the missionary with questions. Explanations and exhortations were returned to him. This Bible-class in the interior of the country, taught by a missionary at Nagasaki, continued a year or two. Then the chief scholar came to the missionary, and sought for baptism for himself and two of his friends who were with him. Having satisfied himself that they were truly Christians, the missionary administered the rite. Within a year three others of the same company were also baptized.

LITTLE CECIE'S ACCIDENT.

ONE night after ten o'clock a boy about twelve years old, poorly clad, was hurrying through the narrowest and worst-lighted streets of the city. He peered into every dark corner and under every overhanging doorway as if in quest of something, and having satisfied himself that what he was searching for was not there, he was off again at full speed.

"What's the matter, Chris? Come in here; it's a jolly place. Father drunk again?"

"No, Joe; I don't know, and I don't care. I can't find Cecie. I've looked everywhere for her."

"Hidin', p'raps," was Joe's suggestion.

"Mebbe waitin' for you somewheres. Guess she's scared if you ain't in when the old man comes home. You ain't asked him, I guess?"

"No, I'd get it if I did. But I'll tell the Society on him to-morrow if Cecie don't show up. They did warn him once when they see him a lickin' me, and come to our place. They said they'd take us both away if he didn't behave. I wish they had. Cecie cried or else they would. She said she'd promised mother to look arter him when she was dead, and she begged so hard they gave him another show."

"Well, I'll come and help you look; you ain't agoin' to give up, I guess."

"Do, Joe; I feel mighty dull and scared."

It was better then. Christopher felt brighter already for telling his trouble. The two boys went over the ground again, searching carefully for little Cecie. She was only ten years old and little of her age, but if she had been a great deal smaller she would not have escaped the search of boys who knew every good hiding-place in the ward. But they could not find her. They stood near the City Hall when they came to the conclusion that it was of no use looking any longer.

"You'll go home, Chris, won't you?" said Joe. "Not me," said Chris, emphatically. "Not if I know it. Father 'ud, kill me if he ain't had nuthin' to do with her g'jin'. He'd sure to ask when she went and who with, and I don't know. I oughter stayed home with her. I just ran out; she didn't want me to go, but I'd saved a nickel out o' the extra Telegrams, and me and some more went to Clark's to spend it. When I came back Cecie was gone."

"What made you go to Clark's? Should ha' thought you'd had enough o' them places wi' your father."

"I wish I hadn't now. I'll never go again if I can find her. She ain't got nobody but me, now mother's dead. Father ain't no good." Chris stopped a moment, and then added ruefully, "And I've got nobody but her." His boyish pride relaxed at the thought, and he had to apply his coat-cuff to his eyes.

"Here's the cop," said Joe. "Let's ask him."

"No, don't," said Chris. "He's bad, he is. He said he'd take me in last night for bein' around Clark's."

But the burly policeman did not wait to be asked. Recognizing Chris, he asked, "Here, you, boy. You looking for your sister?"

"Yes."

"Well, she was a-looking for you a spell ago. She asked me if I'd seen you. She's been run over now; I've just sent her to the hospital."

Chris was crying in earnest now, and didn't care who saw him. He ran down Chambers Street as fast as he could to the hospital and begged to see his sister. But they would not let him in. He must come to-morrow, they said. The girl was badly hurt. Chris and Joe found a corner to sleep in where they could see the hospital, and Chris looked hard at the lighted windows every time he woke and wondered which room Cecie was in. He did not wait to sell all his papers next morning, but hurried off to the hospital. He was told to come in the afternoon and then he should see his sister. He hung about the place listlessly until two o'clock, and then ventured to apply again. This time he was admitted with a caution to be very quiet.

Chris scarcely knew Cecie when they took him to the little cot. she was so clean and bright, and the bed-clothes were so white and comfortable. Poor child! her face was almost as white. Mindful of the caution, Chris just laid his hand on the edge of the cot and looked earnestly at the little face, which brightened up at the sight of the brother she loved so well. The nurse on the other side of the cot watched the two, and her eyes dimmed in sympathy.

"She must not speak," the nurse said. "Just kiss her and come again to-morrow."

Chris bent over and kissed her, and Cecie broke a flower off the bunch of lilac that kind friends had sent with other flowers to the patients, and held it up for him. Chris took it and went away very sorrowfully. The next day he was there again. He was not likely to forget! And Cecie whispered to him that she heard the doctor say she would never get well, but begged him not to cry, for she was going to heaven where mother was. "Be a good boy, Chris, and then you'll come to us. Shall I tell mother you will?"

"Oh, yes, yes," sobbed the boy. "Indeed I will. I'll never go near Clark's, never no more. If it hadn't been for that you wouldn't a been hurt."

They were both crying now, and the nurse had to hurry the boy away.

He came back next day looking very anxious. He did not need to ask how she was. The poor little pinched face on the pillow distorted by pain told the story. Cecie smiled at him, suffering as she was, and Chris stood silently and lovingly looking down at her.

"Kiss your sister now, my boy," said the nurse, after a few minutes. "Kiss her; she is dying now."

Chris leaned over and kissed her, and as he did so he whispered, "I won't forget, Cecie." A look of intelligence came into the face of the dying child, and then a smile of love and peace, and she was gone.

"I wish I was dead, too," sobbed the boy. "It ain't no use to live now."

But Chris learned better than that. His grief was noticed, as he passed out, by a Christian man on a visit to the hospital, and he was led to tell his sad story. He was anxious to learn how to be good, and he was taken to some who were as anxious to teach him. Chris learned the way of salvation, and hopes through Christ to meet mother and sister again in the better land.

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leander S. Keyser.*

Good-By.

THE time passed quickly for our friends with the various duties, engagements, and pleasures of student life. Leroy, besides his regular work in college, employed himself in other labor—a labor of love to his fellow-men. He accepted a position as teacher in the Sabbath-school, and prepared as diligently for that as for his regular studies. On Sabbath afternoon he went to a mission school. Many were won to a better life by the power of his kind words. This engagement was one of the most convincing proofs Leroy could have given of the sincerity and thoroughness of the change he had experienced. Carrie could recognize and appreciate it better than any one else. She knew how Leroy used to enjoy the Sunday afternoons of the old time, and when she saw him going off to the mission instead of strolling into the country or coming to sit and talk with her, she blessed God that the man to whom she had given her heart felt "the love of Christ which constraineth."

The most significant change, however, was the uniform gentleness and kindness which was noticed by every one who came in contact with the young man. Formerly there had been a certain arrogance and superciliousness in his manner which had often caused pain to a fellow-student. "Ransom must be taught to speak civilly and respectfully to his equals," had been said more than once in the rooms when some one had complained of a sneer, a sarcasm, or some expression of impatient contempt that had fallen from his lips. There were none of those complaints now. There was no need to keep Ransom in his place, for he was so humble that any place contented him, and no word ever left his lips that could cause pain or humiliation to another. Indeed, he was willing to exert himself or to deny himself pleasure if he could help any one in sickness or trouble. If there had been any doubt about the genuineness of his conversion any of his acquaintances must have been convinced if they applied the test of Christ

Himself: "By this shall all men know that ye are My disciples, if ye have love one to another."

Thus it gradually came about that any one in college that knew of a case of sickness or of some one in need of help would let Ransom know, and some kindness would be sure to follow. Perhaps the one effort of this kind that was most difficult to the young Christian trying to live the life of his Master was that of visiting Pendleton Sanderson.

One evening, about mid-winter, Leroy heard that Sanderson was seriously ill. If it had been any one else he would have set out immediately for the sick-room. But now he hesitated. It was only for a few minutes, for he saw that this was a case in which duty was made plain by Christ's explicit command. Sanderson had the claim of an enemy on his good offices. He therefore took up his hat and went to his room.

The sick man looked up in surprise as Ransom entered. Evidently his visitor was about the last person he expected to see. But Ransom was so kind and sympathetic that the other was touched and melted. The visit was a pleasant one on both sides, and was repeated from day to day. Sanderson was glad to see him, and as he grew worse and it became necessary for some one to watch all night with him, it was Leroy that undertook the office, to the sufferer's delight.

Leroy watched beside him until he fell into a heavy slumber, and then took up a book to read. It must have been about an hour later that Sanderson woke and called him. Leroy was at his side in a moment.

"What can I do for you?" he asked.

"I am going to ask you a favor, Ransom. You could not have granted it in the old days, but you can now, if you will. I want you to pray with me. I know you are a Christian. I have watched you closely since you came back, for I thought you were shamming for a purpose; but I soon saw you were sincere. I have been a bad fellow while believing the Bible—worse than you think, and I am afraid to die. I believe I am going to die, Ransom, and I want you to help me. Pray with me now, and another time when I am a little stronger we will talk."

Leroy kneeled, and poured out his soul in supplication for the poor sick young man. It was a solemn scene—only those two, the one pale and languid with sickness upon the bed with his poor hand over his face, and the other on his knees praying that God would give him peace and pardon.

The next night Leroy was with him again. He was worse. Leroy spoke with him and prayed with him, but it was evident that something disturbed his mind.

On the third night, as Leroy and several others stood by the bedside, the sick man said:

"Ransom, I shall soon pass over the stream. Death is very near. Send for Miss West."

She was sent for immediately, and when she stood before his bed the dying man spoke:

"Carrie, I have a secret that I must tell, a confession to make before I die. I was determined to win you for myself, Carrie, and I stooped to falsehood and trickery that I might succeed. I cannot take my secret to the grave. Listen; it was I, Ransom, who got that paragraph inserted about Carrie's marriage. I thought it would put an end to your love for her, and to make sure of its having that effect I sent you a marked paper and persuaded a friend of mine to see your brother and confirm the news. I see now how false and base it was, and I am glad now that it failed. I do not deserve to be forgiven, but if you can forgive me I shall be grateful."

"We do, we do," they said, as the tears fell silently.

"Heaven bless you! God has forgiven me too. I feel that He has. Leroy, I thank you for your prayers. They helped me to God. I shall soon go now. Carrie, give me your hand; and now, Ransom, take my other hand in yours. With God's forgiveness and yours, I die in peace. Good-by!" he whispered.

Holding the poor man's hands, upon which their tears fell fast, they stood over his bed as he breathed more softly, more softly. The clock ticked toward the midnight hour. That and the quick breathing from the dying couch were all the sounds they heard.

"Good-by, Carrie. Good-by, Ransom!" he whispered very softly, and then at ten minutes before twelve he drew one long breath, and that was the last. The stamp of death was upon his brow, and his soul sped to the bar of God. A smile of peace was left by the death-angel on his lips.

Carrie and Leroy walked back together from the chamber of death talking tenderly of the departed. "I am glad you were able to forgive him, Leroy," Carrie said. "You could not have done it once."

"There are many things I can do now, Carrie, that I never thought I could do. None but those who have given themselves up to Christ can know what power He gives to His servants. Have you not been surprised yourself at the things you do by His strength?"

"Yes, and they seem more wonderful as we come closer to Him." Carrie pressed his arm as she spoke, and both were conscious that their love was purer and stronger for the common bond that united them with their Lord. This sense of union grew clearer to them as the weeks passed, and seemed to sanctify and intensify their mutual love. Never had either of them known such happiness as in the remaining weeks of that term. Time seemed to fly, and it was almost with amazement that they awoke to the fact that Commencement Day was so near as it was.

It was to be one of the grandest days in the history of the N. S. College. The faculty was as proud of the graduating class as were the students. It included some whose whole course had been brilliant, and from whom great things were expected. Among them besides Ransom and Carrie were Leroy's friends, Burt and Train.

At last the day has come, and a vast concourse of people have gathered in the hall to hear the graduating speeches. There was a great profusion of floral decoration. Evergreen wreaths gave a mellowing relief to the brightness. Noble pictures hung here and there upon the walls. Dr. Lester walked to and fro talking here and there. Professor Rich was upon the platform laughing. The class were all upon the stage. Music soul-stirring from lips and instruments filled the room, and all was exultation and delight.

The preliminary exercises over, the audience settled down to listen to the speeches of those who were "going out" this year. Each had special friends there rejoicing in the triumph, and each treated the occasion in characteristic style. Leroy's chum, Burt, who, mainly through his friend's efforts, had been led to renounce scepticism and accept Christianity, entitled his speech "On Dizzy Heights," dwelling on the dangers that lie in the path of those who are fascinated by speculative thought and climb to heights from which all too many with reeling brain have fallen headlong. With a delicate touch understood by the students he alluded to the change in himself and his friend, and in tones of deep reverence gave glory to God.

Train, as was inevitable to one of his exuberant spirits and quick wit, spoke in lighter vein. His subject was "The Mediocre," and he captured the audience at the outset by apologizing for introducing a subject of so personal a character.

"No, no," was shouted from all quarters. "Don't disparage yourself, old man."

But Train went on with no notice of the compliment but a bow of exaggerated acknowledgment and a gesture of mock humility. He proceeded to claim for the mediocre man the highest distinctions, claiming that he was the most useful man on earth, and contending that he would be more missed than his more brilliant contemporaries. The speech kept the audience in a roar of laughter, and was the culminating triumph of Train's college course.

But how did Carrie succeed? Her subject was "Unwritten Poetry." "There is a prevailing sentiment," she said, "that the poet is an effeminate creature unfitted for the prose of daily life, and that he often dies because the false rhyme and metre of the world jar too harshly upon his soul. This is a false notion, and the error arises from the mistaken idea that the finer sentiments are incompatible with sturdiness of character. There is more poetry in strength than in weakness. The poet ought to be a man—a warrior, if need be. He must not be a pinner and a whimperer. He must have a brave heart and a strong right arm. The noblest poet is the manliest man, the womanliest woman. He must not be weak, effeminate, sensual. He must be true in life as well as in sentiment to the highest truths in the universe. Back of the verse which appears upon the printed page there must be the unwritten poetry of real strength and nobleness of soul.

"Lowell has caught this idea, for he says:

*'The epic of a man rehearse,
Be something better than thy verse;
—Make thyself rich, and then the Muse
Shall court thy precious interviews.'*

"Then, some of our rhymesters think that poetry consists in sickly sentimentalities. Away with such imbecility! True poetry is the noblest thought expressed in the noblest words. Genuine poesy is never childish. Our own Longfellow has said of the arrow he shot and the song he breathed into the air:

*'Long, long afterward in an oak
I found the arrow, still unbroke;
And the song, from beginning to end,
I found again in the heart of a friend.'*

"Yes, the poet's song, like the arrow, must have strength enough to pierce to the heart and yet remain unbroken.

"Some of our rhymesters whimper as if they had nothing to do but to mourn and nurse their woe, and then they want the great, sturdy, busy world to pity their petty sorrows. Let them go and do a noble deed; let them receive the smile of gratitude from those they have helped and lifted up, and soon their songs will be changed to rhapsodies of gladness. Whenever you read a poet who revels in his sorrows, who does nothing but groan, depend upon it, there is some flaw in his character. He is living a life of selfishness; he is nursing his own sorrow when he ought to be helping others. That is not the unwritten poem of a self-sacrificing life, devoted to the cause of Truth and humankind.

"When I see a man or woman living a life of devotion to the cause of Truth, sacrificing self for heaven's sake and for man's sake, I say that life is the truest of all poems. As Longfellow says in his 'Epimetheus':

*'Muse of all the Gifts and Graces!
Though the fields around us wither,
There are ampler realms and spaces,
Where no foot has left its traces;
Let us turn and wander thither!'*

She showed how the humblest backwoodsman was a poet if he had fine sentiment and noble thought; if he loved nature, the beautiful, the songs of birds, the emerald of field and wood, the rhythm of babbling brook, and if he loved the God over all. And then she exclaimed:

"Have I said 'unwritten poetry'? It is a misnomer. It is only unseen. It is written by the finger of God on every noble soul."

It was difficult to follow Carrie. The next speech had to be a great effort to sustain the interest of the audience. Dr. Lester announced: "The World's Conquerors," by Leroy T. Ransom.

He stepped forward and commenced calmly. He spoke of the great conquerors in battle, in the realms of science, intellect, morals, and religion. He said: "Alexander was not a true conqueror, because he could not control his appetites. Peter the Great was not a true victor, because, though he could govern his vast realm, he could not govern his tongue. Napoleon was not truly triumphant, because he could not subdue his inordinate ambition. Byron, Burns, Poe, were not true conquerors, because they were vanquished by their passions. The greatest conquest is the conquest of self."

But when he spoke of the Great Conqueror, he became truly sublime. Speaking of the victory on Calvary, he said:

"Ah! there was the mightiest conquest of the ages, a victory won without a blow struck or a sword unsheathed; a triumph gained by omnipotent defeat and submission. Those hands, nailed to the cross, cleft the hydra-head of sin and bore the standard that leads man to eternal victory. He is the Conqueror of sin and doubt, and He can fling them to the winds. I know it! I know it!"

"And the conquest is going on. The forests of Africa, the jungles of India, the cities of China, are shouting the battle-cry and the people are falling into the ranks. The islands of the sea are clapping their hands and shouting hosanna at the news of redemption, and soon the world will acknowledge the sovereign sway of the Victor of Calvary."

He bowed and took his seat. The stage was literally covered with flowers, which flew from every part of the audience, it being impossible for the little white-robed girls who fitted to and fro to gather them up.

Professor Rich made a short but magnificent address of farewell to the class, and as he spoke through his smiles and tears the class wept, and many in the audience could not restrain their emotions. Then Dr. Lester solemnly conferred the diplomas. Grand old man! how sad his heart was that his children were now going from their college home; and yet how glad that they were so well fitted for the battle of life!

Thus ended the college days of our friends. Good-bys were said on the morrow, and many separated never to meet again until they gathered around the throne. The hearts of the graduating class said: "Good-by, old familiar scenes; good-by, old classic halls; good-by, teachers and classmates; good-by, alma mater!"

One more scene and then we, too, who have followed our two young friends through their experience of sorrow and joy, trial and happiness, must say farewell. They are setting out on their voyage of life, and we may watch the launching of their ship and wish them a happy voyage, and then they pass out of our sight forever.

It is a wedding at the residence of the widow West. Who are there?

Well, first, there are Carrie and Leroy. There are Carrie's mother and friends, and Leroy's mother and brother Allan. There is Dr. Comstock, of the W— Theological Seminary, of whom you have heard Carrie speak. He will perform the marriage ceremony. There are also Dr. Lester and Professor Rich (smiling). There is Henry S. Burt, Leroy's old chum, the orator; and there is Francis Train, with a bright-eyed little lady as fair as a rose. Every face seemed to reflect the joy and happiness that shone from the countenances of Carrie and Leroy as they stood up to go through the simple ceremony that was to unite their lives. There was a solemn stillness while the vows were interchanged, and prayers were offered for their happiness and God's blessing on their union. Then, the ceremony being concluded, there was the usual tumult of congratulation, agitated smiles, and tears, and kisses, and general excitement.

When they were seated and the rest were talking gayly, Leroy whispered: "Carrie, think of all our trouble and how it has ended."

She looked at him with happy eyes—and only that.

"Well, Leroy," said Dr. Lester, "what do you think of the story of Adam and Eve in the garden now?"

"I believe it all, and I think it is just as romantic as it is true," he answered.

"Good, good!" they all cried, and Dr. Comstock came in at the last with a "Good!" of superlative strength.

Then it was that Professor Rich laughed right out.

"What are you laughing at, professor?" they cried.

"Well, I guess I must tell a secret to this crowd, but you must never tell. But I hate to tell it—I guess I won't."

"Tell it, tell it," they cried on every side.

"Dare I tell it, Carrie—that is, Mrs. Ransom?" asked the smiling professor.

"Yes, tell it, of course," she replied.

"Well, I saw the kissing episode in the grove on that botanical excursion; but I thought, 'Let them fight. Let them fight it out.'"

THE END.

THE SAINTS IN HEAVEN.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 12, Rev. 7: 9-17. Golden Text, ver. 15.

John's Citizenship—At Home in Heaven—Unmoved by the Great Convulsions—The Wonderful Prayer-Meetings—Caste Disregarded—Another Vision—The Innumerable Company—Their Ascription—The Angelic Host—The Throne Before the Throne—Slain in the Tribulation—A Mistaken View of Suffering.

THE door which John saw opened in heaven remained unclosed. The apostle had long ago learned that his citizenship was in heaven (Phil. 3: 20), and that the freedom of the heavenly city was his by right, that he had been raised up with Christ, and made "to sit with Him in the heavenly in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 2: 7, R. V.); and this was more than an intellectual doctrine to the Apostle John; he entered "into that which is within the veil" (Heb. 6: 19), and was

AT HOME IN HEAVEN.

Six seals of the sealed book had been broken, and the hidden future of judgment unfolded before his eyes. Under the sixth seal he had seen those signs which should follow the great tribulation which our Lord foretold to His disciples (Matt. 24: 29), and which is prophesied in so many Scriptures, "the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth" (Rev. 6: 1-12. See also Isa. 13: 10, 24: 23; Ezek. 32: 7; Joel 2: 31; Acts 2: 20). He had seen the heaven (no doubt the aerial heaven) "removed as a scroll when it is rolled up; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places" (R. V.). But all these convulsions did not move John as the presence of Jesus in glory had done. God was his "Refuge and Strength," therefore did he not fear though the earth was moved, and though the mountains were carried into the heart of the seas (Ps. 46); for John had a firmer footing on heaven than on earth; his heart, his life, and his all were in Jesus, and therefore John was at home where Jesus was.

But have not we who are God's children as much right to the heavenly as John had? Is not our citizenship also in heaven? Then, why do things of earth move, trouble, worry, vex us? They only do so when we voluntarily dwell in them instead of dwelling in the will and purpose of God which He is working out through them. Whether the Apostle John saw a door opened in heaven, and the glorified ones before the throne, or whether he saw the most vexatious things and persons in the Church of God on earth, John saw all in its relation to God; he dwelt in love and testified: "He that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him" (1 John 4: 16). Here he saw prayer-meetings such as no amount of advertising, invitation, or compulsion could bring together, but which God had brought about. "The kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bond man, and every free man, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains; and said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: for the great day of His wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?" He saw the DISTINCTIONS OF CASTE BROKEN DOWN, he saw prayer-meetings such as were held in the streets by the dear colored people of Charleston, in America, while the houses were falling around them at the time of the earthquake; he saw them attended by the richest and proudest, by just such as in their pitiful ignorance and unbelief had smiled cynically at the men and women in Charleston who looked above the laws of nature to the Maker and Founder of them all.

All this had passed in review before the apostle, and now another vision comes before him. He no longer looks upon scenes of carnage, pestilence, earthquake, and terror; he sees "a great multitude, which no man could number, out of every nation, and of tribes and peoples and tongues, standing before the throne and before the Lamb." Thank God that the company is innumerable. God will save all He can consistently with His own holiness and justice. They are all "clothed with white robes;" they had "not defiled their garments," so they could walk with Christ "in white," for they were "worthy" (Rev. 3: 4, 5). They had overcome "by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony; and they loved not their lives unto the death" (Rev. 12: 11). They had palms in their hands, just as in the feast of tabernacles, which was the type of rest and rejoicing in the presence of God it was commanded: "And ye shall take you on the first day the boughs of goodly trees, branches of palm trees, and the boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook; and ye shall rejoice before the Lord your God seven days" (Lev. 23: 40). And they cry with a loud voice: "The salvation unto our God, which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb" (Gr.). All these had been saved by the blood of the Lamb; they were fallen creatures,

REDEEMED BY THE SON OF GOD.

Their song awakened the song of the unfallen angels: "And all the angels were standing round about the throne, and about the elders and the four living creatures; and they fell before the throne on their faces, and worshipped God, saying, Amen (i.e., truly, verily); the blessing, and the glory, and the wisdom, and the thanksgiving, and the honor, and the power, and the might, be unto our God forever and ever." The redeemed can say "our God," the unfallen angels can say "our God." The angels cannot sing the redemption song, but they can see these blood-bought ones as spotless as themselves, and as supremely happy. Oh, how blessed; but all this blessing emanated from our God! They see glory. How far they have known the sin and sorrow, the anguish and suffering of these sons of men we know not, but they do know how Jesus suffered, and how the Son of Man was glorified in dying and rising again for them; they see in the redeemed the glory of their God. How far they have been able to follow the path by which God has led each one of these His children through this earth, how far they have known what trials have been permitted, what circumstances have been used in their education, we know not; but all they do know makes them trace the wisdom which has planned and carried out the purpose in each life back again to our God. They see "thanksgiving and honor" due to no son of Adam. Over the heads of the countless multitude, without distinguishing one from another, they raise the shout of adoration to Him who alone is worthy, and of whom it has been said (Ps. 62: 11):

"POWER BELONGETH UNTO GOD."

While the heart of the apostle must have been joining in the song, one of the elders addresses him, saying: "These which are arrayed in the white robes, who are they, and whence came they? And I say (Gr., have said) unto him, My lord, thou knowest. And he said to me, These are they which come out of the great tribulation, and they washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb" (R. V.). While some are calling upon the rocks to fall on them, and the hills to cover them, others, in the time of the tribulation, shall be safe in heaven, although probably slain on earth. The question will arise in the minds of many: "Are these, then, only those who are saved during the time of the great tribulation?" It seems so. But they are only a type of other redeemed ones who are washed from their sins in the blood of the Lamb (Rev. 1: 5; 3: 5, 18; 5: 9; 19: 14).

"Therefore are they before the throne of God," not "in the midst of the throne," like the living creatures, not "round about the throne," like the elders, but "before the throne," in full sight of God. And they "serve Him day and night in His temple;" they have priestly work like the others; but it is not said of them that they shall "reign with" Christ. It would seem that the bride of Christ must be gathered before this time of tribulation, and that those converted subsequently will perhaps not be made just equal to the bride. We cannot make a system of things which are only partially revealed, but we must LEARN ALL WHICH GOD DOES REVEAL TO US.

Oh, how blessed is this company! "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun strike upon them, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall be their Shepherd, and shall guide them unto fountains of waters of life; and God shall wipe away every tear from their eyes" (R. V.).

There are some who have the mistaken idea that those who suffer very much on earth from hunger or other privations, from sickness or from oppression, will not suffer in the next world—just as though God had such pleasure in giving us pain that, if we escaped it in this world, we should get it in the next! What a mistaken view of our loving Heavenly Father! But here we see that those who are blessed in heaven are those who "have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." No mention is made of their personal sufferings, but only of their personal claim in Jesus as their Saviour. His blood had ransomed them—they believed it, and so He saved them from their sins, and then, He who loves not to give hunger, but to satisfy it, not to give thirst, but to slake it, not to give sorrow, but to take it away, banishes hunger, thirst, and heat, and with His own hand of love dries away every tear. He, once the "Man of Sorrows," takes away the sorrows which He has borne, and leads His flock "to fountains of waters of life" (R. V.), "living fountains of eternal life."

FAITH.

BY CYRUS W. HOUGHION.

THE eye of faith, when clear and bright,
Can pierce the gloom of darkest night,
And draw from heaven a flood of light,
No false alarms,
Or suffering real, can then affright
The soul which by this inner sight,
Beholds itself encircled quite
Within the arms
Of everlasting love.
Since I have learned low faith thus saves
The truly wise,
I am content, although the waves
Of trouble rise
To mountain heights upon life's sea;
Because 'tis true
That they but serve to carry me
Still nearer to
The clear blue sky above.
Faith brings the answer to my prayers,
And gives release from anxious cares
Which vex the soul;
For He who numb'reth all my hairs,
And every sorrow kindly shares,
Hath bid me roll
My burden on the Lord.
With such a faith I feel secure
Amid earth's strife;
And resting on the promise sure,
I shall be strengthened to endure
Through all of life—
Until at last, when faith gives place
To sight, I shall behold the face
Of Him who saves me by His grace,
And gain faith's full reward.

FROM DAY TO DAY.

BY MRS. HELEN E. BROWN.

My days are stairs that lead to life's great end,
And one by one I steadily ascend;
Climbing with purpose true the upward road
That brings me to the city of my God.

Sometimes the step is bright with the full sun
That shines in cloudless radiance thereon;
Sometimes a shadow falls upon the way,
But, dark or light, I need not go astray.

One stair is rough, with thorn-points all bestrown,
But shoes of iron tread the nettles down;
And one, so steep, my weary, crippled feet
The painful ascent scarcely can complete.

Sometimes it is a slippery step I tread,
And fierce temptations make my soul afraid;
But, held in Christ's dear hands, so tender, strong,
The next I mount with courage and a song.

Each step in the long course a history has;
I make a mark as one by one I pass;
A glad record here, a tear-spot there.
A rescued soul, a struggle or a prayer.

And on life's mystic ladder to the skies,
Bright angels come and go to paradise;
And work grows dearer as the end draws near,
Until I reach at last the golden stair,

And enter through the open pearly gate;
Where, with our King, souls watch for me and wait;
There, at His feet I'll cast my trophies down,
And shout the victory which His love has won.

Senator JOHN SHERMAN of Ohio—The United States Senate.

THE UNITED STATES SENATE.

THE assembling of Congress this week renders the presentation of the picture on the first page of this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the most appropriate illustration it can offer to its readers. In spite of the criticism often uttered on the conduct of senators, there is no question about the dignity attaching to that office. It is an honor far exceeding that of the hereditary legislators of Europe that is conferred on the men who sit in the Senate Chamber of the United States. When we consider that each State, no matter how large its population, can be represented in that branch of the Federal Legislature by only two of its citizens, the position of those two, chosen from among its millions, is one truly honorable. In our imperfect state it is, as we know to our regret, possible that the honor may be conferred on men unworthy of it, and there are instances now, as in times past, of men securing it by strategy or skillful manipulation, who would not have gained it if the people of the State had held the power of themselves choosing the most able men for the post. So long as the Legislatures of the States elect our senators this evil will occur, but on the whole the Senate has suffered less from the system than it might have done, and is still, as it always has been, distinguished by general ability and statesmanship.

President of the Senate.

WITH the picture of the Senate on the first page we give the portrait of its President, the well-known senator from Ohio. Mr. Sherman's political record is known to every citizen of the United States. It is therefore unnecessary, and in a non-partisan journal it would be improper, to criticise it. A brief narrative of its facts is all that is required to accompany the portrait in these columns.

John Sherman was born in Lancaster, Ohio, on May 10th, 1823. He is now, therefore, in his sixty-fourth year. He is descended from a family famous in the county of Essex, England, where the name of Sherman is still numerously represented. Several members of the family came to America in the early days of the colonies and settled in New England. The first of them to attain eminence was Taylor Sherman, who was born in Connecticut. He was a man of considerable ability and sterling integrity. He studied law, gained an extensive practice, and at length secured a seat on the bench. He was the grandfather of Senator Sherman. He married Elizabeth Stoddard, a lineal descendant of Anthony Stoddard, also an Englishman, who emigrated to this country in 1639. Their son, Charles Robert, was born in Norwalk, Conn., was also a lawyer like his father, and studied in his office. He was admitted to the bar in 1810. He married and removed to Lancaster, Ohio, in the same year. Like his father, he was a hard student, and soon acquired a high position in the legal circles of his adopted State. So thoroughly did he win the confidence of his fellow-citizens, that in 1823 he was elected judge of the Supreme Court of Ohio. In that position his reputation as a judge of profound learning and remarkable sagacity was well established. His written decisions are still quoted as authoritative in the courts of his State, and are held in high respect in other States.

Judge Sherman had a large family, and it seemed that the children of a father so eminent occupied an enviable position. Heavy trouble, however, fell upon the family, darkening their future prospects. Suddenly, on June 24th, 1829,

Judge Sherman fell down dead, and his widow was left to face the world with eleven children dependent upon her. Providentially the judge had made many friends, who in the day of adversity came to the widow's assistance. But it was a trying time for her and her loved ones. The friends saw no way of helping her but in adopting her children, and so the family was scattered, only the younger ones remaining under her care. John, who was the eighth child, came at last to be the eldest one at home, all his elder brothers and sisters having been placed with friends and relatives. It was a sad home as the family circle grew smaller every year, but he and the three younger ones clung all the more closely to their mother and each other.

At last John's turn came, too, and he set out, AN ORPHAN BOY, to face the world. A cousin of his father, residing at Mount Vernon, offered him a home, and the mother gladly accepted it for him. The boy was only eight years old when he quitted his mother's roof. But he had grit, and was determined to make the best use of his advantages. His protector sent him to school, where he remained four years. He then entered an academy to prepare for college, and such progress did he make with his studies that at the age of fourteen he was ready to enter the sophomore class.

Many young men who have the privilege of entering college and all the educational advantages which our famous institutions of learning afford, spend their time in games and sports, making no use of the privileges which would be so highly prized by others to whom they are denied. It was so in John Sherman's case. Many were entering college then whose dulness, or incapacity, or idleness rendered the college course useless to them, while he who would have turned a college education to so excellent an account was unable to have it through lack of funds. A position was offered him as junior rod-man in the corps of engineers engaged on the Muskingum improvements, and instead of going to college he eagerly embraced the opportunity of

by arduous work. The lad, however, did not give his time to repining, but turned to with a will, and soon made himself master of his duties. His skill, intelligence, and industry won for him the good opinion of the superior officers, and though only fifteen years of age, he was, after being only a few months at the work, placed in charge of the section of the improvement at Beverly. During that period he discharged with credit to himself and with the satisfaction of his superiors the entire responsibility of measuring excavations, and embankments, the levelling of a dock for a canal, and the construction of a large dam. Political influence however, operated to his prejudice, and John Sherman, being a Whig, or, rather, owing his position to Whig influence, lost his appointment. Probably in later years when wielding such influence himself the thought of that early trouble crossed his mind, and those who have groaned under dismissal at John Sherman's hands have simply suffered as he suffered in his youth. His next employment was

IN A LAW OFFICE.

At the age of seventeen he began the study of law under his brother, Charles T. Sherman, who afterward became judge of the United States District Court. There he showed the same energy that had distinguished him in the engineers, and probably stimulated by the success of his father and grandfather in the same profession, he applied himself to the study of law with assiduity. On attaining his majority, in 1844, he was ready for admission to the bar, and it was accorded him. His brother offered him a partnership, which he accepted, and at once commenced practice in Mansfield, Ohio. Then followed ten years of indefatigable labor. The young lawyer put all his energy into his profession and soon rose to a position of honor and profit in the courts. During that period he laid the foundation of his fortune, which his early privations and hardships fitted him to appreciate.

HIS POLITICAL CAREER

may be said to have commenced in 1848, though he continued his law practice for nearly seven years afterward. But in that year he was sent as a delegate to the Whig Convention in Philadelphia, which nominated General Taylor for the Presidency. Four years later he was again a delegate to the National Convention, and took part in nominating General Scott for the same office. The prominent part which he took in both contests gave him a reputation for political ability throughout the State and familiarized him with political methods. He was known as a Conservative Whig, and was precisely the kind of man for whom the citizens of Ohio were looking in the excitement and alarm aroused by the proposal to repeal the Missouri Compromise. He was elected to the thirty-fourth Congress, and took his seat in the House on December 3d, 1855, being then thirty-two years old. His practice at the bar had made him a fluent and forcible speaker, and his familiarity with public affairs enabled him to take a prominent position from the first without waiting for the usual period of initiation and training which so wearies new members. In the councils of his party and in the debates of the House he became known as a shrewd and able politician. The period was a momentous one. The questions before Congress were: The repeal of the Missouri Compromise, the Dred Scott case, the admission of slavery into Kansas, the Fugitive Slave law, and other questions of the most weighty import. Speaker Banks appointed Mr. Sherman one of the committee to inquire into, and collect evidence about in Kansas, and, as may be imagined, that was one of the most difficult of his earlier public engagements. The duty brought him into prominence, owing to the fact that the chairman of the committee, Mr. Howard, of Michigan, was prostrated by sickness, and Mr. Sherman was in consequence obliged to draw up the report for the House. The report when presented was the occasion of fierce debates, and strongly developed the antagonism already existing. It was a document in which the skill of the advocate was conspicuous, for, although the facts were stated accurately and could not be controverted, they were so arranged as to present the case in the strongest light. It was the work of a partisan rather than of a judicial mind.

IN THE HOUSE

Mr. Sherman worked hard for the election of John C. Fremont, contending, at that time, for the limitation and curtailment of slavery, but not for its abolition. He took a prominent part in the debate in the House on the Submarine Telegraph question, and was the originator of the amendment to reduce the limit of the proposed contract from fifty to ten years. It must also be recorded to Mr. Sherman's credit that he labored unceasingly to stop the pernicious practice of making contracts in advance of appropriations, which at that time was the source of much extravagance and irregular expenditure.

In the Thirty-sixth Congress Mr. Sherman was so prominent a member that he was put forward for the Speakership, and in the protracted struggle that ensued he came within three votes of election. After eight weeks of fruitless effort Mr. Sherman retired, and Mr. Pennington, of New Jersey, was elected. Mr. Sherman was made chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and there gave proof of that eminent financial skill by which his place in the history of the nation will chiefly be assured. His first step was to check the practice of combining legislation with appropriation bills, and he declared in the House that the committee would not report favorably any bill of that character. The change was badly needed at the time, and Mr. Sherman deserves credit for effecting it.

In 1860 Mr. Sherman was again elected to Congress. The memorable session opened amid gloom and apprehension. Mr. Sherman, however, set himself to grapple with the financial problem rather than with the other ominous questions. The public indebtedness had risen from twenty millions, at which it stood at the commencement of President Buchanan's term, to nearly one hundred millions, and so tight was the stringency in the Treasury that the Government was at one time unable to pay the salaries of Congressmen and other claims. In this emergency Mr. Sherman introduced, and succeeded in getting passed, the famous bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes.

IN THE SENATE

Mr. Sherman made his first appearance in March, 1861, when he was appointed to fill the vacancy caused by the appointment of Senator Chase to the Secretaryship of the Treasury. He was re-elected in 1867 and in 1873. In 1877 he resigned to become Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Hayes, and when he quitted office at the close of Mr. Hayes's term he was again elected to the Senate, and has now been re-elected for a fifth term. His financial abilities have been recognized in that chamber as in the House, and he has held the chairmanship of the Committee on Finance in each Congress.

When Fort Sumter fell, Mr. Sherman offered his services in the field under President Lincoln's first call for seventy-five thousand men. He was attached to the staff of General Patterson as aide-de-camp without pay, and remained with the Ohio regiments until the meeting of Congress in July. After the close of the extra session he returned to Ohio, and with the approval of Governor Denison raised and equipped a brigade largely at his own cost. It comprised two regiments of infantry, a squadron of cavalry, and a battery of artillery. This brigade served throughout the war, and was known as the Sherman Brigade.

AS A FINANCIER.

It was, however, by his financial skill that Mr. Sherman rendered the most signal services to the country in its supreme crisis. The raising of funds to meet the stupendous expenses of the war was a task demanding ingenuity, patience, and extraordinary skill. The great struggle came with the suspension of specie payments, when the issue of United States notes became a necessity. The question was whether they should be made a legal tender, and for this Senator Sherman and Secretary Chase contended with unyielding pertinacity, and this cardinal feature of the bill passed the Senate mainly through Mr. Sherman's efforts. The National Bank scheme was also largely due to his skilful management. He made the only speech in its favor in the Senate, and secured its passage by personal appeals to his opponents, and by his vigorous eloquence on the floor.

RESUMPTION.

Another protracted struggle came from his endeavor to fix a day for the resumption of specie payments, and in this, too, he was successful. Probably the greatest day of triumph Mr. Sherman has known, or ever will know, came, when, on the day fixed by him, it was possible for any man to present the Government paper at the Treasury and receive gold for it. He stood almost alone in his belief that it would be possible for the Government to fulfil its pledges on the day, and it must have been with feelings of supreme joy that he saw his prediction abundantly verified.

Mr. Sherman has not concealed the fact that he is an aspirant for the Presidency. In 1880 he made a formidable candidate at the National Republican Convention, and by his arrangement with Mr. Blaine rendered General Garfield's nomination possible. He was also a candidate in 1884, but ranked only fifth on the list at the first ballot, and did not increase on the later ones. His present dignified position as President of the Senate he attained on December 7th, 1885, when, owing to the death of Vice-President Hendricks, it became necessary for the Senate to choose a presiding officer from its own body.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Man Robbed of Salvation.—Mr. Patterson said at a recent meeting: "There is a man whom I know, who tells that once in a solemn meeting, three years before, salvation seemed so near and so free, that he was on the very point of accepting; but suddenly the thought of the frowns and jeers of others crossed his mind, made him hesitate, and at length tempted him to delay. Since that unhappy hour his soul has never again come within sight of Christ so near and so free. He now is hard and cold, and has no desire for salvation, though he knows full well he is a sinner exposed to divine wrath."

Not Angels Wanted, but Jesus.—"We Need to know Jesus, and we shall never get acquainted with Him until we know His heart. I knew a boy who seemed to understand Jesus well. He was ill, and one day a lady called and saw that the poor boy was dying, and she told him that very soon the angels would come and take him home to be forever with the Lord. Through all that day he was very dull and depressed, which was a great change from his usual happy state. On being asked what was the matter, he said, 'They tell me that angels are coming to take me away, and I don't know the angels, but I know Jesus, and I was expecting Him to come and take me home.'"

Stoppage of Telegraphic Communication.—"When the Great Eastern steamship was engaged in laying the telegraph cable across the Atlantic, the communication was suddenly stopped between the ship and the shore. As soon as the interruption was discovered those on board made a search for the thing that hindered it, and eventually found that it had been a small piece of wire no longer than a man's finger that had been doing the mischief, and when it was removed all went well. And, similarly, a little thing standing between us and Christ stops our communion at once, and not until it be removed can the communion with Him begin again."

A Boy's Search for Christ.—"A Little Boy was sitting in a back seat at a Gospel meeting. At the close a gentleman was passing him, when the boy touched him and said, 'Please, sir, can you tell me where to find Jesus? I am very anxious about my soul.' The gentleman shook his head and said, 'No, I don't know where you can go to seek Him.' 'I think, sir, you misunderstand me; I am most anxious to know where to find the Lord.' 'You do not need to go anywhere, my boy,' said the gentleman, placing his hand upon the lad's shoulder, 'Jesus is beside you; just take Him.' And he realized for the first time that Jesus is near to every seeking soul. 'The Word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth.'"

Eclipsed in Tobacco Smoke.—Mr. Burns said: "Sometimes a very small matter lying between Christ and us stops our communion with Him, no matter how little or how simple it may seem in our eyes. One night in a meeting I noticed a young man looking most unhappy. I asked him if all was well with him, and he replied that he was very unhappy because his Christian life was not what it should be. 'Ah,' I said, 'you are letting something come between you and Christ, and thus stopping the joy that you might have.' 'That is just it. It may seem simple enough, but it has stopped my communion,' said the poor fellow, with moisture in his eyes, and he drew from his pocket a pipe, a piece of tobacco, and a box of matches. 'There it is,' he said; 'that is the thing that is doing all the mischief.' Thank God, that young man was enabled to give it up, and has now got back the joy which he feared he had lost."

Grief Turned into Gladness.—Mr. Miller remarked: "Years ago I saw a young girl deeply distressed about her soul; so convicted of sin was she that she was tearing her flesh in the agony of her spirit. When asked to be calm and listen to the kind invitation of her Saviour, she exclaimed, 'He has passed; He has passed; and there is no hope for me now. He was passing last Sunday night,' she continued, 'and, instead of accepting Him I rejected Him, and now, oh, what shall I do?' and then she burst into another paroxysm of grief. 'Listen,' I said, 'Jesus has not yet passed.' And with tear-stained face she listened as I read: 'If any man hear My voice and open the door, I will come in to him.' 'Is Jesus still waiting?' she eagerly inquired. 'Will He really come into my heart?' 'Yes,' I said, 'if you will let Him.' And she did let Him, and since then she has lived a beautiful and useful life for the Lord."

The Writing on the Window-Pane.—Captain Hatfield related: "Once when George Whitefield was preaching in London he resided with a large family who were all careless, worldly people; and although he was quite aware of the fact he could not make up his mind to speak to this family on the subject of religion, although at the same time he was leading hundreds to Christ. And the family wondered at his silence, for they fully expected that he would speak to them, and even mentioned it to him; but in the course of conversation he never once came upon the subject of personal conversion. His visit came to a close, but the night before he left he took a diamond ring, and with it wrote upon a pane of his bedroom window: 'One thing thou lackest.' The grandchild, who was first to see it, told me that these words written upon the window had such an effect upon the family that they all, without exception, immediately gave themselves to Christ."

A Ray of Light in the Darkness.—Mr. Patterson related the following incident: "An old man, over seventy years of age, told me the way he was brought to the Lord. He said that when he was a boy of thirteen his mother sent him to see an aged woman who was dying. When the boy arrived he found the poor woman in great distress. He tried to speak a few words of comfort, but she tossed wearily on her bed, and exclaimed, 'I do not know where I am going; all is dark; and I know no one over there!' Again the boy tried to speak a few words, but they gave the dying woman no relief, for she was fast slipping into the unknown without support. Again she moaned deeply in the agony of her soul. The boy lifted a Bible, and read aloud from it; and then he told her that the Lord takes care of them that trust in Him. 'A ray of hope penetrated the old woman's soul; she saw herself a lost sinner, and that Christ was her only refuge. And while she passed through the valley of the shadow of death, she was no longer afraid, for she had the Saviour to lean upon, and guide her through. But what an awful risk is a death-bed repentance! Oh, come over the threshold while you are in health and strength!'"

A Priceless Discovery at Sea.—Mr. Stewart related: "A young man in whom I was deeply interested was ordered to take a sea voyage for the benefit of his health. Though I pressed upon him the necessity of immediate decision for Christ, he refused to choose the Lord as his Saviour before sailing. His health did not improve; and when far out on the ocean the ship's doctor told him that never again would he see his mother and sister, nor the green fields of his native land, and that his feet could not tread the foreign land toward which the ship was hastening; but that in a few hours his body would be sent to its long resting-place under the deep sea. The doctor could give him no comfort, and there was only one man—the third mate—on the ship who could do so, and he was directed to attend the dying man, with the result that my friend wrote to his mother that very day: 'My dear mother: Though I never will see you and my sister again in this world, yet I am happy because I know that Jesus is with me. There is one good man on board this ship who has taught me to know and love Christ as my Saviour.' What a comfort these few words rendered to that sorrowing mother and sister. How they rejoiced and thanked God that that son and brother had found a refuge in Him."

DERAILED LIVES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached at Cleveland, Ohio, Last Sunday Morning, Dec. 5, 1886.

"When shall I awake? I will seek it yet again."

WITH an insight into human nature such as no other man ever reached, Solomon, in my text, sketches the mental operations of one who, having stepped of rectitude, desires to return. With a wish for something better he said, "When shall I awake? When shall I come out of this horrid nightmare of iniquity?" But, seized upon by uneducated habit, and forced down hill by his passions he cries out, "I will seek it yet again. I will try it once more."

Our libraries are adorned with an elegant literature addressed to young men, pointing out to them all the dangers and perils of life—complete maps of the voyage, showing all the rocks, the quicksands, the shoals. But suppose a man has already made shipwreck; suppose he is already off the track; suppose he has already gone astray,

HOW IS HE TO GET BACK?

That is a field comparatively untouched. I propose to address myself this morning to such. There are those in this audience who, with every passion of their agonized soul, are ready to hear such a discussion. They compare themselves with what they were ten years ago, and cry out from the bondage in which they are incarcerated. Now, if there be any in this house, come with an earnest purpose, yet feeling they are beyond the pale of Christian sympathy, and that the sermon can hardly be expected to address them, then, at this moment, I give them my right hand, and call them brother. Look up. There is glorious and triumphant hope for you yet. I sound the trumpet of Gospel deliverance. The Church is ready to spread a banquet at your return, and the hierarchs of heaven to fall into line of bannered procession at the news of your emancipation. So far as God may help me, I propose to show what are of your return, and then how you are to surmount those obstacles.

The first difficulty in the way of your return is the force of moral gravitation. Just as there is a natural law which brings down to the earth anything you throw into the air, so there is a corresponding moral gravitation. In other words, it is easier to go down than it is to go up; it is easier to do wrong than it is to do right. Call to mind the comrades of your boyhood days—some of them good, some of them bad—which most affected you? Call to mind the anecdotes that you have heard in the last five or ten years—some of them are pure and some of them impure. Which the more easily sticks to your memory? During the years of your life you have formed certain courses of conduct—some of them good, some of them bad. To which style of habit did you the more easily yield? Ah, my friends, we have to take but a moment of self-inspection to find out that there is in all our souls a force of moral gravitation! But that gravitation may be resisted. Just as you may pick up from the earth something and hold it in your hand toward heaven, just so, by the power of God's grace, a soul fallen may be lifted toward peace, toward pardon, toward heaven. Force of moral gravitation in every one of us, but power in God's grace to overcome that force of moral gravitation.

The next thing in the way of your return is the power of evil habit. I know there are those who say it is very easy for them to give up evil habits. I do not believe them. Here is a man given to intoxication. He knows it is disgracing his family, destroying his property, ruining him, body, mind, and soul. If that man, being an intelligent man, and loving his family, could easily give up that habit, would he not do so? The fact that he does not give it up proves it is hard to give it up. It is a very easy thing to sail down stream, the tide carrying you with great force; but suppose you turn is it so easy then to row it? As long as we yield to the evil inclinations in our hearts, and our bad habits, we are sailing down stream; but the moment we try to turn, we put our boat in the rapids just above Niagara, and try to row up stream. Take a man given to the habit of using tobacco, as most of you do, and let him resolve to stop, and he finds it very difficult. Twenty-one years ago I quitted that habit, and I would as soon dare to put my right hand in the fire as once to indulge in it. Why? Because it was such a terrific struggle to get over it. Now, let a man be advised by his physician to give up the use of tobacco. He goes around not knowing what to do with himself. He cannot add up a line of figures. He cannot sleep nights. It seems as if the world had turned upside down. He feels his business is going to ruin. Where he was kind and obliging he is scolding and fretful. The composure that characterized him has given way to a

and he has become a complete fidget. What power is it that has rolled a wave of woe over the earth and shaken a portent in the heavens? He has tried to stop smoking or chewing! After a while he says, "I am going to do as I please. The doctor doesn't understand my case. I'm going back to my old habit." And he returns. Everything assumes its usual composure. His business seems to brighten. The world becomes an attractive place to live in. His children, seeing the difference, hail the return of their father's genial disposition. What wave of color has dashed blue into the sky, and greenness into the mountain foliage, and the glow of sapphire into the sunset? What enchantment has lifted a world of beauty and joy on his soul? He has gone back to tobacco!

Oh, the fact is, as we all know in our own experience, that as long as we obey it, it does not chastise us; but let us resist and we find we are to be lashed with scorpion-whips and bound with ship-cable, and thrown into the track of bone-breaking Juggernauts! During the war of 1812 there was a ship set on fire just above Niagara Falls, and then, cut loose from its moorings, it came on down through the night and tossed over the Falls. It was said to have been a scene brilliant beyond all description. Well, there are thousands of men on fire of evil habit, coming down through the rapids and through the awful night of temptation toward the eternal plunge. Oh! how hard it is to arrest them. God only can arrest them.

Suppose a man after five, or ten, or twenty years of evil-doing, resolves to do right? Why, all the forces of darkness are allied against him. He cannot sleep nights. He gets down on his knees in the midnight and cries, "God help me!" He bites his lip. He grinds his teeth. He clenches his fist in a determination to keep his purpose. He dare not look at the bottles in the window of a wine-store. It was one long, bitter, exhaustive, hand-to-hand fight with inflamed, tantalizing and merciless habit. When he thinks he is entirely free, the old inclinations pounce upon him like a pack of hounds with their muzzles tearing away at the flanks of one poor reindeer. In Paris there is a sculptured representation of Bacchus, the god of revelry. He is riding on a panther at full leap. Oh, how suggestive! Let every one who is speeding on bad ways understand he is not riding a docile and well-broken steed, but he is riding a monster, wild and bloodthirsty, going at a death-leap.

How many there are who resolve on a better life and say, "When shall I awake?" but, seized on by their old habits, cry, "I will try it once more; I will seek it yet again!" Years ago there were some Princeton students who were skating, and the ice was very thin, and someone warned the company back from the air-hole, and finally warned them entirely to leave the place. But one young man with bravado, after all the rest had stopped, cried out, "One round more!" He swept around and went down, and was brought out a corpse. My friends, there are thousands and tens of thousands of men losing their souls in that way. It is the one round more.

I have also to say that if a man wants to return from evil practices

SOCIETY REPULSES HIM.

Desiring to reform, he says, "Now, I will shake off my old associates, and I will find Christian companionship." And he appears at the church-door some Sabbath day, and the usher greets him with a look, as much as to say, "Why, you here? You are the last man I ever expected to see at church! Come, take this seat right down by the door!" instead of saying, "Good-morning; I am glad you are here. Come; I will give you a first-rate seat, right up by the pulpit." Well, the prodigal, not yet discouraged, enters a prayer-meeting, and some Christian man, with more zeal than common-sense, says, "Glad to see you. The dying thief was saved, and I suppose there is mercy for you!" The young man, disgusted, chilled, throws himself back on his dignity, resolved he never will enter the house of God again. Perhaps not quite fully discouraged about reformation, he sides up by some highly respectable man he used to know, going down the street, and immediately the respectable man has an errand down some other street! Well, the prodigal, wishing to return, takes some member of a Christian association by the hand, or tries to. The Christian young man looks at him, looks at the faded apparel and the marks of dissipation, and instead of giving him a warm grip of the hand, offers him the tip-end of the long fingers of the left hand, which is equal to

STRIKING A MAN IN THE FACE.

Oh, how few Christian people understand how much force and Gospel there is in a good, honest hand-shaking! Sometimes, when you have felt the need of encouragement, and some Christian man has taken you heartily by the hand, have you not felt that thrilling through every fibre of your body, mind and soul, an encouragement that was just what you needed? You do not know anything at all about this unless you know when a man tries to return from evil courses of conduct he runs against repulsions innumerable. We say of some man, he lives a block or two from the church or half a mile from the church. There are people in our crowded cities who live a thousand miles from church. Vast deserts of indifference between them and the house of God. The fact is, we must keep our respectability, though thousands and tens of thousands perish. Christ sat with publicans and sinners. But if there came to the house of God a man with marks of dissipation upon him, people almost threw up their hands in horror, as much as to say, "Isn't it shocking?" How these in all our churches are going to get into heaven I don't know, unless they have an especial train of cars, cushioned and upholstered, each one a car to himself! They cannot go with the great herd of publicans and sinners. Oh, ye, who curl your lip of scorn at the fallen, I tell you plainly, if you had been surrounded by the same influences, instead of sitting to-day amid the cultured and the refined and the Christian, you would have been a crouching wretch in stable or ditch, covered with filth and abomination! It is not because you are naturally any better, but because the mercy of God has protected you. Who are you that, brought up in Christian circles, and watched by Christian parentage, you should be so hard on the fallen?

I think men also are often hindered from return by the fact that churches are too anxious about their membership, and too anxious about their denomination, and they rush out when they see a man about to give up his sin and return to God, and ask Him how he is going to be baptized, whether by sprinkling or immersion, and what kind of church he is going to join. Oh, my friends! it is about Presbyterian catechisms, and Episcopal liturgies, and Methodist love-feasts, and baptis-teries, to a man that is coming out of the darkness of sin into the glorious light of the Gospel. Why, it reminds me of a man drowning in the sea, and a life-boat puts out for him, and the man in the boat says to the man out of the boat, "Now, if I get you ashore, are you going to live in my street?" First get him ashore, and then talk about the non-essentials of religion. Who cares what church he joins, if he only joins Christ and starts for heaven? Oh, you ought to have, my brother, an illumined face, and a hearty grip for every one that tries to turn from his evil way! Take hold of the same book with him, though his dissipations shake the book, remembering that he that converteth a sinner from the error of his ways shall save a soul from death, and hide a multitude of sins.

Now, I have shown you these obstacles because I want you to understand I know all the difficulties in the way; but I am now to tell you how Hannibal may scale the Alps, and how and how the paths of virtue forsaken may be regained. First of all, my brother, throw yourself on God. Go to Him frankly and earnestly, and tell Him these habits you have, and ask Him if there is any help in all the resources of omnipotent love, to give it to you. Do not go with a long rigmarole people call prayer, made up of "ohs" and "ahs" and "forever and forever amens!" Go to God and cry for help! help! help! and if you cannot cry for help just look and live. I remember in the war I was at Antietam, and I went into the hospitals after the battle, and I said to a man, "Where are you hurt?" He made no answer, but held up his arm, swollen and splintered. I saw where he was hurt. The simple fact is, when a man has a wounded soul, all he has to do is to hold it up before a sympathetic Lord and get it healed. It does not take any long prayer. Just hold up the wound. Oh, it is no small thing when a man is nervous and weak and exhausted, coming from his evil ways, to feel that God puts two omnipotent arms around about him and says, "Young man,

I WILL STAND BY YOU!

The mountains may depart and the hills be removed, but I will never fail you." And then, as the soul thinks the news is too good to be true, and cannot believe it, and looks up in God's face, God lifts His right hand and takes an oath, an affidavit, saying, "As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth."

Blessed be God for such a Gospel as this! "Cut the slices thin," said the wife to the husband, "or there will not be enough to go all around for the children; cut the slices thin." Blessed be God there is a full loaf for every one that wants it; bread enough and to spare. No thin slices at the Lord's table. I remember when the Master Street Hospital, in Philadelphia, was opened during the war, a telegram came saying, "There will be three hundred wounded men to-night, be ready to take care of them;" and from my church there went in some twenty or thirty men and women to look after these poor wounded fellows. As they came, some from one part of the land, some from another, no one asked whether this man was from Oregon, or from Massachusetts, or from Minnesota, or from New York. There was a wounded soldier, and the only question was how to take off the rags most gently, and put on the bandage, and administer the cordial. And when a soul comes to God, He does not ask where you came from or what your ancestry was. Healing for all your wounds. Pardon for all your guilt. Comfort for all your troubles.

Then, also, I counsel you, if you want to get back, to quit all your bad associations.

ONE UNHOLY INTIMACY

will fill your soul with moral distemper. In all the ages of the Church there has not been an instance where a man kept one evil associate and was reformed. Among the fourteen hundred million of the race not one instance. Go home to-day, open your desk, take out letter paper, stamp, and envelope, and then write a letter something like this:

"My old companions: I start this day for heaven. Until I am persuaded you will join me in this, farewell."

Then sign your name, and send the letter with the first post. Give up your bad companions, or give up heaven. It is not ten bad companions that destroy a man, nor five bad companions, nor three bad companions, but one. What chance is there for that young man I saw along the street, four or five young men with him, halting in front of a grog-shop, urging him to go in, he resisting, violently resisting, until after a while they forced him to go in? It was a summer night, and the door was left open, and I saw the process. They held him fast, and they put the cup to his lips, and they forced down the strong drink. What chance is there for such a young man?

I counsel you also,

SEEK CHRISTIAN ADVICE.

Every Christian man is bound to help you. If you find no other human ear willing to listen to your story of struggle, come to me, and I will, by every sympathy of my heart, and every prayer and every toil of my hand, stand beside you in the struggle for reformation; and as I hope to have my own sins forgiven and hope to be acquitted at the judgment-seat of Christ, I will not betray you. First of all, seek God; then seek Christian counsel. Gather up all the energies of body, mind and soul, and, appealing to God for success, declare this day everlasting war against all drinking habits, all gaming practices, all houses of sin. Half-and-half work will amount to nothing; it must be a Waterloo. Shrink back now, and you are lost. Push on, and you are saved. A Spartan general fell at the very moment of victory, but he dipped his finger in his own blood and wrote on a rock near which he was dying, "Sparta has conquered." Though your struggle to get rid of sin may seem to be almost a death struggle, you can dip your finger in your own blood and write on the Rock of Ages, "Victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Oh, what glorious news it would be for some of these young men to send home to their parents in the country these holidays which are coming. They go to the post-office every day or two to see whether there are any letters from you. How anxious they are to hear. You might send them for this season, a book from one of our best publishing houses, or a complete wardrobe from the importer's palace, it would not please them half so much as the news you might send home tomorrow that you had given your heart to God. I know how it is in the country. The night comes on. The cattle stand under the rack through which burst the trusses of hay. The horses just having frisked up from the meadow at the nightfall, stand knee-deep in the bright straw that invites them to lie down and rest. The perch of the hovel is full of fowl, their feet warm under the feathers. In the old farmhouse at night no candle is lighted, for the flames clap their hands about the great back log, and shake the shadow of the group up and down the wall.

Father and mother sit there for half an hour, saying nothing. I wonder what they are thinking of. After awhile the father breaks the silence and says, "Well, I wonder where our boy is in town to-night?" and the mother answers, "In no bad place, I warrant you; we always could trust him when he was home, and since he has been away there have been so many prayers offered for him, we can trust him still." Then, at eight o'clock—for they retire early in the country—they kneel down and commend you to that God who watches in country and in town, on the land and on the sea.

Some one said to a Grecian general, "What was in your life?" He thought a moment, and said, "The proudest moment in my life was when I sent word home to my parents that I had gained the victory." And the proudest and most brilliant moment in your life will be the moment when you can send word to your parents that you have conquered your evil habits by the grace of God, and become eternal victor. Oh, despise not parental anxiety!

The time will come when you will have neither father nor mother, and you will go around the place where they used to watch you, and find them gone from the house, and gone from the field, and gone from the neighborhood. Cry as loud for forgiveness as you may over the mound in the churchyard, they will not answer.

DEAD! DEAD!

And then you will take out the white lock of hair that was cut from your mother's brow just before they buried her, and you will take the cane with which your father used to walk, and you will think and think and wish that you had done just as they wanted you to, and would give the world if you had never thrust a pang through their dear old hearts. God pity the young man who has brought disgrace on his father's name! God pity the young man who has broken his mother's heart! Better if he had never been born—better if, in the first hour of his life, instead of being laid against the warm bosom of maternal tenderness, he had been confined and sepulchred. There is no balm powerful enough to heal the heart of one who has brought parents to a sorrowful grave, and who wanders about through the dismal cemetery, rending the hair, and wringing the hands, and crying, "Mother! Mother!" Oh, that to-day by all the memories of the past, and by all the hopes of the future, you would yield your heart to God. May your father's God and your mother's God be your God forever!

A Valuable and Successful Work Among City Arabs has been in progress in Brooklyn, N. Y., for some time. It had its origin in disturbances of public meetings. Rough lads were in the habit of loafing into the Women's Christian Temperance Meetings with the object of annoying the ladies, and causing an uproar. The ordinary course would have been to call in the assistance of the police, but as the ladies in charge were Christians they preferred to apply Christian remedies. They organized a committee for special work among these lads, and hired a room for them. A band of young men were also enlisted for the purpose of assisting in keeping order. The room was soon crowded by the very lowest element of the Brooklyn gutters, and, to the surprise of all, the boys were persuaded by the ladies to wash themselves. Meetings were held regularly on Friday and Sunday evenings, and the audiences were clean, though ragged, and were very attentive. On other evenings of the week the room is open to the boys, and there are papers and books for those to read who can, and one of the ladies attends to read to the others and give instruction to any who will receive it. So successful has the effort been that one philanthropic gentleman, who visited the meeting, was so surprised and delighted with the work that he offered the ladies a thousand dollars as a commencement for a fund to build a hall.

A TRIPLE WEDDING IN AFRICA.

A GROTESQUE scene marking the transition period between heathenism and barbarism to Christianity and civilization is described in a letter from Rev. W. J. Underwood, a missionary in Swaziland. It shows the difficulties the natives have to encounter in giving up their old habits while surrounded by their unconverted relatives and friends. He writes:

"It has been a great festive day among our people, for we have had three weddings, which mark the progress of our work among these heathen people. All these persons had been living together previously, but having been brought to Christ, they wished for a Christian marriage, their former one having been a mere bargain. A near neighbor of mine, a Swazie heathen chief, has no less than thirty-five wives. Some things connected with these marriages highly amused me. Neither of the brides wore any shoes or stockings, and the only female wearing a hat in the chapel had donned a man's hard, white hat, and decorated it with loose ribbons. The brides wore print dresses made by our people here, and they looked quite respectable. Fully one half of the spectators, of both sexes, were nearly naked. Although there was no wedding breakfast, there was a wedding dinner, and plenty of food for all comers. One of the bridegrooms had killed 'the fatted calf' in honor of the occasion, another a sheep, another a goat. These were cooked with an immense quantity of mealies, so there was enough for all and to spare. Here again the refining influence of Christianity was very apparent. The native Christians, like decent folks, sat at tables and used plates, knives, and forks; but the heathens sat on the ground, and taking a large piece of hot boiled meat, one would have a bite, and then pass it on from one to the other; and in this way it disappeared with astonishing rapidity. After dinner the young people amused themselves by marching in procession, singing, accompanied by the incoherent strains of a time-worn concertina."

THE COBRA'S BITE.

THE American Mission Church in Bombay has sustained the loss of one of its members, who died under very melancholy circumstances in September last. The Indian Witness says that Mr. Ananda Balaji was employed as taxidermist in the Victoria Museum. On Wednesday, September 8th, while feeding a cobra, which he had supposed was harmless from previous extraction of the poison bag, it suddenly bit his hand. For a few minutes he was unalarmed, thinking the bite harmless, but pain and nausea soon began. Carbolic acid was applied to the bite, and as soon as possible he was carried to the Grant Road Hospital. Ligatures were bound around his arm, an incision made at the bite, and the blood in the arm entirely removed. Frequent hypodermic injections were made with ether and digitalis as stimulants, and permanganate of potash as antidote to the poison.

On arriving at the hospital he had lost the power of speech, and soon after every muscle seems to have become paralyzed, and his breathing entirely ceased. Artificial respiration was therefore resorted to, and this operation was unceasingly continued for nine hours, from seven in the evening until four o'clock in the morning. At a quarter past one a slight attempt on the patient's part to breathe was noticed, but it was not until 4 A.M. that he could breathe sufficiently to sustain life. He now apparently for the first time gained consciousness and, though with difficulty, made known his wants.

Under careful treatment he steadily improved, and on Friday astonished his friends by informing them that during the severe operation of Wednesday night he was conscious of all that was taking place, but was unable to make his feelings known, not having power over a single muscle. It would seem that the poison paralyzed the nerves of motion, but not the nerves of feeling; for he could see and hear and feel, although the physicians, even by touching the eye-ball, could get no response either of feeling or consciousness. His partial recovery was followed by a high fever and inflammation of the lungs. On Saturday he told a friend he expected to die and made known his wishes regarding his wife and children and his property, and on Sunday afternoon he peacefully passed away. He was buried at Shewaree on the next afternoon.

DARKNESS ON A CANAL-BOAT.

A CHRISTIAN worker who has interested himself in the spiritual welfare of the men and women who spend their lives on the barges that ply on the canals of England relates an incident exhibiting ignorance of God almost incredible in a land of Bibles and churches.

He boarded a craft known as a monkey-boat, and there found a man and woman who seemed densely ignorant. For some time he could discover no way of penetrating their dulness. At length, in order to test and if possible rouse them, he put a question in this fashion:

"Can you tell me how the Lord Jesus Christ died? Did He die on His bed, or was He put to death by men?"

The man looked at his wife; the wife looked at her husband. They appeared puzzled, and remained silent.

"Did you ever hear the name of Jesus?"

"Yes, we've heard tell of the name, but we can't tell who the gentleman were."

From time to time, as Mr. Bamber met this poor fellow, he sought to put before him the facts of the Gospel, and to instruct him in the things that make for his eternal peace. Gradually the man's mind seemed to open, and at last he became anxious. On returning home, after a long conversation, the man resolved to attend a place of worship, and there he found just the word that brought him to decision. Now for some considerable period he has been openly confessing Christ, has gained a great influence over his fellow-boatmen, and is really the means of greatly helping forward the work. In such a case, and remembering what the man was, one can only exclaim, What hath God wrought?

AN AMERICAN SAVED IN PARIS.

AN incident reported in the McAll Record, which chronicles the progress of the evangelistic work commenced in the French capital by Rev. R. W. McAll, will interest the American friends of the work. Mr. McAll writes:

Some months ago in one of our mission-rooms in a very dark and demoralized part of Paris, our esteemed colleague remarked in the meeting a man never seen there before. He proved to be unknown to all present. His aspect was gloomy and unprepossessing; he hung down his head, and never met the speaker's glance. At the close he seemed to resent the effort of our two friends to speak a kind word to him. They felt persuaded that they should see him no more, but he returned, and became a constant attendant. His demeanor was always the same, only that on several occasions when Christ's love in dying for the chief of sinners was specially emphasized, he would for a minute raise his head and fix his eyes on the speaker. At last he consented to enter into conversation, and it became evident that a work of the Divine Spirit was commencing.

Our friends ascertained that he was a French-speaking American, a man who had been in a better position but who had given himself to a reckless career, had left his wife and home, and come to Paris a desolate outcast. After a long struggle with dark and despairing views of his past life, he sought and found divine forgiveness. Near the close of last year his wife wrote from America as follows: "My husband by his evil conduct has been separated from me, but he writes me that by your instrumentality his heart has been changed," etc.

He had to leave Paris in order to return to his home. At parting he said, "Can I take with me my New Testament (in which he followed the Scripture reading during the meeting) and the hymn-book in remembrance of these meetings, in which I have got such a blessing?"

Here are some words translated from his own letter, written from America, which the esteemed director of the station has received: "May the divine blessing rest on you and on your family! I was plunged in the gulf, and you have extricated me. I have read over and over again the words of Jesus: 'Come unto Me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' I have come to Him. My suffering was dreadful, the burden was extreme. That suffering has passed away; that burden has ceased to exist. It is, indeed, an easy yoke. I find in it the possession of profound peace and an eternal hope in the promise of Christ."

THE THREE DESTINIES;

OR, FIRST-FRUIT, HARVEST, AND VINTAGE.
BEING AN EXPOSITION OF REV. 14.

By G. H. Pember, M.A.

[At my special request, a Secretary of the Chicago Prophetic Conference, Mr. G. H. Pember, of England, prepared the following expository paper. Mr. Pember is well known as a thoughtful and forcible writer, his books "Earth's Earliest Ages," and "The Great Prophecies," giving him foremost rank among students and expositors of Prophecy. The manuscript having been detained on its way to Chicago, it came to hand too late for use at the Conference. This detention, however, may have fallen out rather to its more extensive circulation through the courtesy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.]

Let me add, then, this word: The interpretation and teaching set forth in the essay are deeply moving. I have been strangely awed into profound solemnity by its graphic descriptions of coming judgments and contrasted glories. If the theory advanced be found scripturally correct it will harmonize conflicting views of the rapture and tribulation. May the Spirit of God sanctify the message to every reader.

GEO: C. NEEDHAM.

MANCHESTER-BY-THE-SEA, MASS.

Dec. 1, 1886.]

The Prayer of the Church—What it Implies—The Solemnity of the Time—Three Momentous Scenes—The First Great Clue to Prophetic Interpretation—The Two Divisions of Time—The Church Period—The Judgment Period—The Latter a Transitional Epoch—Its Sign the Rapture and First Resurrection—Three Classes of Men—The Symbol of the Tree.

It is a great privilege, dear American friends, to address you on this solemn occasion; to feel that the long-rolling billows of the Atlantic do not hinder obedience to the command which bids us exhort one another so much the more as we see the day approaching. In response to that command, I gladly send you these few and feeble words, written in necessary haste, and am looking forward to the fulfilment of your part in the reciprocation when I shall read the teachings and exhortations delivered at your Conference.

May the Lord grant many such interchanges between His people in our intimately connected countries, that we may be knit together in closer bonds, as becomes the "members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones;" and that we may be stimulated to long for the time when He shall "gather together into one the children of God that are scattered abroad," yea, and for that hour of even greater glory when it shall please God to "gather together into one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth." For the Saviour Himself bade us hasten the coming of those days of the Son of Man by frequently presenting the two petitions which He has put into our mouths:

"THY KINGDOM COME!"

Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven! But the kingdom cannot come before the arrival of the King; therefore, the first petition means nothing less than, Come, Lord Jesus; come quickly! And when shall the prayer be granted? No man can tell with precision; but the King has given us many signs by which we can get an approximation to the time; and I do not hesitate to express the conviction that all these signs, when studied in connection with prophecy already fulfilled, and compared with the characteristics of this our age, agree in warning us that He is at hand, yea, even

AT THE DOOR.

How solemn, then, are the days in which we live, and with what diligence should we search every part of God's Word for information respecting the great event with which we must shortly be confronted in order that, like the children of Issachar, we may have "understanding of the times, to know what Israel ought to do!" For be well assured of this, that God has revealed nothing which we do not need, and that the wilful neglect of any passage will certainly entail loss upon us in the future, though we may not yet be able to comprehend in what way.

Impelled by such thoughts, I propose to enter upon a brief investigation of the fourteenth chapter of the Apocalypse, in which are made to pass before us, revealing, as I believe, the fate of those who shall be alive in Christendom at the close of the Church-period. What is meant by the last expression can only be stated now; but my proof of the statement is already before the public; and there are, doubtless, many also among yourselves who hold similar views.

THE FIRST GREAT CLUE

to the intricacies of prophetic interpretation is found in the ninth chapter of Daniel, where the interpreting angel divides into three portions the whole stretch of time from the edict which permitted Nehemiah to rebuild the street and wall of Jerusalem to the Second Coming of the Lord. Of these portions, the first comprises four hundred and eighty-three years, ending with the appearance of Messiah the Prince; the length of the second is not revealed; but it is a time of Jewish dispersion and Gentile election, and its close will be marked by the ratification of a covenant for seven years between the majority of the Jewish nation and the Antichrist; the third will be a short season of judgment exactly occupying the seven years of the covenant.

So much we obtain from Daniel; but when John saw the Apocalyptic visions the first of the three periods had already gone by, and the second, which is the Church-period, had commenced. Consequently his prophecy is divided, so far as time is concerned, into two portions only, and he is bidden to write "the things which are and the things which shall be after these things" (μετὰ ταῦτα); that is to say, the things of the Church-period and of the short season of judgment which shall follow it. And we have no difficulty in discovering the point at which he begins to treat of the latter period; for his fourth chapter commences with the words: "Come up hither, and I will show thee the things that must be after these things" (μετὰ ταῦτα).

Now the seven years of judgment will form similar to that which extended from the preaching of John the Baptist to the Pentecostal descent of the Spirit. The old order will be breaking up, and the new will be in course of organization; the Church, as an institution upon earth, will be disappearing, and the Jew coming to the front. At the commencement of this period the Lord will descend from the high heavens, and His Parousia, or Presence, in the heaven of our earth will begin.

ITS SIGN,

as He tells us, is to be that those who are watching for Him will be suddenly caught up, together with the raised dead, to meet Him in the air, and so to be ever with Him; while the remaining members of the Church, who are alive at the time, must tarry still on earth for a season, that their sanctification may be perfected amid troubles and judgments. At the sound of the seventh or last trumpet they also will be caught up, together with all who have died in Christ during the interval; and then the Church will be complete in heaven, and ready for manifestation with her Lord. Upon earth the fearful plagues of the vials will follow, after which the Lord will appear, and all the saints with Him, to deliver His earthly people, the Jews, and to smite with death every surviving soul in Christendom which still persists in rebellion.

Thus it will be seen that, apart from the children of Abraham, there will be of human beings in the so-called Christian parts of the world when the Lord descends into the air. In the chapter before us they are described as first-fruits, harvest, and vintage; while a few connecting sentences show, among other things, that the great persecution to be carried on by the Antichrist and the False Prophet will take place in the interval between the presentation of the first-fruits and the reaping of the harvest.

For the order of nature in the figure must be preserved in the interpretation; that is to say, the harvest must be understood to follow the offering of the first-fruits, while the vintage comes last of all.

Again, the first-fruits of the harvest are closely connected, because they are of the same kind—the only difference between them being that the one is removed from the field, which is the world, a little earlier than the other. But the case of the fruit plucked from a tree is quite distinct from that of grain; for the tree remains in its place, firmly rooted in the ground, and may produce many subsequent crops. Hence, in a tree represents Jewish or Gentile power, which belongs to earth, and remains upon it—if things take their natural course. And as instances of this we may cite the tree of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, the vine which God brought out of Egypt, the spreading vine of low stature (1), the fir-tree which is bidden to howl because the cedar has fallen (2), the fig-tree and all the trees of which our Lord speaks (3), and, finally, the vine of the earth mentioned in the chapter which we are considering (4).

But the true Church, in her earthly relations, is never represented by a tree; for she does not remain here. Her members are but strangers and sojourners in this world; the Jerusalem which is above is their metropolis; their abiding city is in heaven. Therefore, the Church is most appropriately prefigured by wheat.

Now, wheat does not root itself firmly in the earth and continue, from the same stalk, to bear fruit for years. No; it does, indeed, spring out of the ground, and for some time swells and grows by the juices which it extracts therefrom. But as it approaches perfection, the sun, shining from heaven, draws those juices out of it, and at the same time the root begins to shrink, and ceases to provide nourishment from below, so that the whole plant dries up under the celestial influence. And only when it is fully dry is it ready for the harvest. One comes with the sickle and cuts it down, then it is carried away out of the field in which it grew, and conveyed to another place where the garner has been prepared.

It is impossible to conceive a more of the believer's life and destiny than this. For the Lord's elect, like all other men, are compelled, owing to their fallen nature and its necessarily attendant circumstances, to begin their existence in the flesh. But, as time rolls on, they gradually, from the moment of conversion, cease to draw their supplies from this world, and become sanctified in spirit, soul, and body by the influences which descend from on high. And when the work of God is completed in them they are not left upon earth to show the full perfection of their fruit, but are cut down by death and borne away to another sphere.

As a final illustration of the symbolism of wheat and trees, we may point to the vigorous address in which John the Baptist announces the close of one dispensation and the beginning of another. For in it he likens the Jewish system to a tree with the axe laid at its root, while professing Christendom is regarded as the Lord's threshing floor which He will thoroughly purge.

It may, however, occur to some that the distinction is, to say the least, not always maintained. For, it may be urged, although the Church is often compared to wheat, it is also likened to a vine, which is a tree, which does take root in the ground, and does go on bearing fruit in the same place year after year. But this difficulty when examined is found to rest upon for the Church never is actually likened to a vine. Her members are, indeed, compared to the branches of a vine, but that is quite another thing, and obliges us, if we would come to the end of the matter, to make further inquiry. For as to the branches, they may run over the wall, like the fruitful bough of Joseph, and become exposed, so that the archers may sorely trouble them and shoot at them; but if we would know of the tree we must find out the place where its stock is.

Now, the Lord says, "I am the Vine; ye are the branches." But He has ascended into the heavens, and, therefore, although the branches may appear elsewhere, it is only there that the root and stock of the vine may be found. Too often the branches hang downward; only at rare intervals can believers feel that they are sitting in the heavenly places with Christ. Nevertheless, in Him are all their springs; from Him flows the life-giving sap which enables them to bear much fruit.

It is only, then, in its earthly and present-age relations that the Church cannot be compared to a tree. God has not said that we are to be homeless wanderers forever. No; it is only here that we have no abiding city; but we are bidden to show plainly by our life and behavior that we seek one to come. And soon we shall find it, when the great prayer shall be answered: "Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am, that they may behold My glory."

But, it may be again objected, there is the mustard-tree; surely that represents the Church in its PRESENT-AGE RELATIONS.

Yes; it represents the professing Church, but not the true body of Christ. For the key to that parable is the Lord's remark that the mustard-plant becomes "greater than all the class of pot-herbs" (τῶν λαχάνων)—such is the exact meaning of the Greek of Matt. 13: 32—and so grows into a tree, being not the only annual in Palestine which sometimes becomes perennial. But in so doing it breaks the great creation law of the third day, which commands that every seed should develop according to its kind. And the result of its unnatural growth into a tree is that the fowls of the air are able to lodge in its branches, which they could not have done if it had remained in its natural condition as a lowly herb.

So was it with the nominal Church. The Lord commands His little flock to dwell in humility until He comes, when they shall shine forth fair as the moon and terrible as an army with banners. But the professing Church struck her roots deeply into the earth and grew mighty in worldly wealth and influence. Then she shot forth great branches of lordship over men. And so the Spirit of God departed from her, and the spiritual hosts of wickedness—such is the Lord's own interpretation of the fowls of the air which devour the world—found shelter in her and could use her for their own purposes. It was in this way that the vast professing body became unawares a church of Satan, as it quickly showed by its deeds and doctrines.

We shall now be able to comprehend the teaching of the chapter under our consideration. The wheat represents the Church; the vintage the fate of the unsaved of Christendom.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Arrangements for Celebrating the Centenary of the Constitution were made on Thursday last at a meeting held in Philadelphia. The Governors of eighteen States and Territories sent delegates to the meeting in accordance with the plan drawn up last September by the Governors of the original thirteen States, who met in Philadelphia for the purpose. The seventeenth day of September is the time fixed upon for the celebration, that being the day mentioned in the Constitution, though it was not finally ratified by the States until May 29th, 1790. On September 17th, 1787, the Convention, after four months of labor, arrived at an agreement, and the Constitution was formally adopted, and Congress notified of the fact. It is proposed to celebrate the centenary anniversary of the event by a grand military display, an oration, a poem, and the erection of some permanent memorial. A committee of thirteen was appointed to make detailed arrangements.

The Annual Report of the Secretary of the Navy, which was issued last week, is not a satisfactory document, though it gives ground for hope. The condition of the navy, in spite of the vast sums spent upon it, is lamentable. The Atlanta, one of the last new vessels constructed, seems, according to Mr. Whitney's report, to be a failure. The only way in which a vessel of its class can render efficient service is by superior speed, as its armament is not of sufficient strength to cope with ironclads. But the Atlanta does not in this quality compare favorably with vessels of the same class belonging to other powers. While the Atlanta under the best conditions could attain a speed of only fifteen knots, and that for but a short time, similar vessels in the English and Italian navies ran seventeen and eighteen knots. Besides this her machinery is continually breaking down. Mr. Whitney calls attention to a statement made by the Chief Constructor of the navy to the effect that in six years only three of the cruisers now on the list will be fit for service, and that at the expiration of that time, unless a new navy is produced, the country will be practically without a navy at all. Meanwhile, if the people want to know what has become of their money, Mr. Whitney's report will enlighten them. The department has stores and supplies on hand worth $20,000,000. Of some articles it has more than can be used in fifty years. Some of them, valued at $4,000,000, have been in stock so long that they have become obsolete and useless, but they are kept in good condition, and men are paid to keep them oiled or painted as they may require, and watchmen are employed to prevent their being stolen. The department has secured the appropriation of $17,000,000 for the current year, and Mr. Whitney asks for $25,000,000 for next year.

The State Convention of Anti-Saloon Republicans held at Cortland, N. Y., on November 30th, indicated that the movement has not grown since the Binghamton conference in September. No prominent Republican leader of the State attended it or wrote to express sympathy with it. General Conway presided and stated that twenty thousand members had been enrolled, and that Senators Evarts and Miller approved of the movement and that Levi P. Morton, who is expected to succeed Miller, is also in its favor. The constitution adopted makes the name of the organization the New York State Temperance Republican League, and states that "the aim and purpose of this league is to secure the suppression of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage; and as the most feasible and speedy means to this end to induce the Republican Party to undertake to secure this result. Until such suppression can be accomplished in the State at large we will labor for the enactment of the most effective form of local option, and, where local prohibition is impossible, the enactment and enforcement of the most stringent restrictive legislation." The Prohibitionists will doubtless be glad to have the assistance of their new allies, and will cordially wish them success. The great object both have in view is to overcome the liquor traffic. The difference between them is that the anti-saloon men think they can enlist the Republican Party in the fight, while the Prohibitionists despair of enlisting either of the great political parties.

The Chicago Anarchists have Reason to Beg that they may be saved from their friends. The Arbeiter Zeitung, the Anarchist organ, has published an editorial of a character that must arouse public feeling against them and produce an opinion that, with respect to them, mercy would be out of place. It says: "Right here it may be plainly said that we consider the bomb throwing justified. It was a necessary act. The police committed high treason in attempting to break up in violent fashion a peaceful meeting of citizens. Had not the bomb been thrown, today, in place of eight police, hundreds of useful citizens, women and children would be lying dead. What will become of the rights of the citizens of this land when the latter fall and leave them unprotected, to be tyrannized and abused by a horde of hirelings? What will become of the right of assembly, of free speech, and personal security? The bomb-thrower bears no responsibility, and far less the condemned Anarchists." The friends of the Anarchists, anxious to save them from execution, can effect that purpose only in one way, that of convincing the public that the men are sorry for the Haymarket outrage, and will behave in future.

An Attempt to Enforce the Sunday Law is being made in New York. As it requires but a very modified observance of the Lord's Day, it should not be a difficult undertaking; but all who know how extensively it is violated will realize that the police will have a busy time in enforcing it. The law forbids public amusements and sports, labor, trades, manufactures and agricultural or mechanical employments, and traffic or sales. Articles of food may be sold before ten in the morning, and tobacco, cigars, fruit, confectionery, newspapers, and drugs at any hour of the day. Labor and trade occupations are permitted when they are works of necessity or charity. What is to be considered a work of necessity or charity is a question on which courts have often differed. The Penal Code expressly provides that such works are to include "whatever is needful during the day for the good order, health, or comfort, of the community." It will be an important and valuable reform if nothing more is done than to stop the so-called "sacred concerts," which are a disgrace to the city.

The Resignation of the French Cabinet was tendered to President Grévy on Friday last. It was caused by a vote of the Legislature abolishing the office of sub-prefects. M. de Freycinet consented, when the proposal to abolish the office was made, to reduce the number as far as was compatible with the transaction of public business, but the Chamber would not accept the offer, and cut off the whole number at once. There are three hundred and sixty of them in all France, and M. de Freycinet would probably have arranged to dispense with one half. The decisive vote was passed by a majority of thirteen. Efforts are being made to induce M. de Freycinet to withdraw his resignation and form a new Cabinet.

The Action of the German Government in proposing to increase the army is regarded as ominous. It will raise the force in a time of peace to one per cent of the population. An impression prevails both in Germany and other countries that such a proposal would not have been made if the Government did not regard war as inevitable, and it is believed that it has been caused by the knowledge that France and Russia are in alliance. The geographical position of Germany between those two countries would render resistance to a combined attack a struggle for existence. The words in which the war minister introduced the measure were significant. He said: "The bill is of the most urgent character. The Reichstag must pass this measure before Christmas if the purpose of the Government is to be attained. Let any one who regards the additional burdens upon the people as unbearable acquaint himself with the state of affairs on the other side of the Vosges. The Government is in earnest. It does not ask for more than it intends to accept." These remarks were emphasized by the veteran General Von Moltke, when he rose to speak. Referring to France, he said: "So long as public opinion there clamors with unvarying and stiff-necked bitterness for the restitution of the provinces regained with so much bloodshed, so long must Germany repeat that she will shed her last drop of blood in holding and defending her conquests." The old soldier's manner implied that he thought the attempt of France to regain the provinces would not be long delayed.

The Trans-Atlantic Mail Question Continues to excite public opinion in England. Not even the announcement that sending the mail by German ships will save the public money reconciles the English people to the humiliation of employing foreign ships on public service. What makes the thing the more objectionable is that the reason the German steamship companies are able to carry the mails at a lower rate than the English companies is, that they receive a large annual subsidy from the German Government. The Chairman of the Cunard Company has publicly contradicted the statement of the Postmaster General that the English companies demanded a monopoly of the business. The London Times protests against the new arrangement on the ground that a cheaper mail service was not needed, while an improved service was. Even the London News, a Radical journal, and the organ of men accustomed to regard the saving of money as the supreme good, condemns the unpatriotic conduct of the Government. It says that the defence of the Postmaster General is entitled to little consideration; that he has taken the mails from the swiftest vessels, offering an apology for so doing which conceals material facts and shows that he is either ignorant or unable to appreciate their importance. It would appear that the Government has lost a great deal of popularity in an attempt to save a very little money. It is stated at the Post Office that though the Postmaster General is nominally the responsible person in the affair, the peculiar "reform" was initiated and executed by Mr. S. A. Blackwood, the General Secretary.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying Colored ministers with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $5.50. They are: From Syracuse, N. Y., $2.50; Chambersburg, Pa., $1; Pittsburgh, Pa., $2. We are thankful for the smallest contributions to this fund, as every dollar not only assists some minister, but through him is a benefit to his congregation.

The Rev. George C. Needham, whose Portrait and life appeared in this journal on November 25th, is conducting a series of Evangelistic Services this week in New York. The meetings are being held in Gospel Hall, in West Thirty-fifth Street, between Eighth and Ninth avenues, each evening except Saturday, commencing at eight o'clock. All who can arrange to attend these services should not miss the opportunity of hearing this eminent evangelist, and should endeavor to get their unconverted friends to go. Mr. Needham's teaching is wonderfully powerful and lucid, and even experienced Christians gain new light on the Bible from his method of comparing Scripture with Scripture. We pray that much good may result from God's blessing on these special services.

The Convention of Young People's Associations to be held this day in New York, as announced here two weeks ago, promises to be an assembly of much interest. The afternoon meeting is called for one o'clock in the Church of the Strangers, and the evening meeting at eight in the Collegiate Reformed Church on Twentyninth Street and Fifth Avenue. Among the speakers who have promised to take part in the exercises are Drs. William Ormiston, R. S. McArthur, S. H. Virgin, A. E. Kittredge, and Charles F. Deems.

At the Monthly Meeting of the Institute of Christian Philosophy held on Thursday last under the Presidency of Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., it was announced that Elliott F. Shepard, Esq., had presented two hundred dollars to the Endowment Fund of the Institute. A number of new members have been added to the roll, which is now a lengthy one. Professor George B. Stevens, of Yale College, read an able paper on "Reason as a Basis for Theistic Belief," showing that, even admitting the contention of the infidel that the existence of God cannot be proved in the strict sense of logic, the very consciousness of reason involves a presupposition of a Deity. The paper, which was deeply interesting, is to be published in the next number of Christian Thought.

An Interesting Gift Has Been Received by Rev. Jacob Freshman, the indefatigable missionary among the Jews of New York. A lady who has witnessed some results of his work, and takes a deep interest in God's ancient people and the efforts being made to bring them to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, has presented Mr. Freshman with a handsome diamond ring worth one hundred dollars. This is intended, as may be supposed, not for his personal decoration, but to be sold, and the proceeds devoted to the cause he has at heart. The lady was anxious that he should gain the financial aid he requires to extend the work, and not having money at her disposal, thought of her ring, which she has thus consecrated to the Lord's service.

The Detailed Report of the Hospital Saturday and Sunday Association of New York for last year now published shows a steady increase in this valuable work. The total contributions of the two days last year amounted to $46,085.38, which exceeds the total of the previous year by $9542.63. Of this amount $29,490.56 was given in the churches and $16,594.82 by the various exchanges and trades. The largest gift was from the dry-goods trade, and amounted to $4350. The tobacco trade contributed $1893.68. No other trade and no secular society reached the sum of $1000. Of religious incorporations, St. Bartholomew's Church sent in $3193.52; St. Thomas' Church, $2609.30; the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, $2001.34; Grace Church, $1474.19; St. George's, $1321.38. No other religious body collected as much as $1000, the Broadway Tabernacle coming nearest to that amount in an offering of $988.76. Of the denominations the Protestant Episcopal stands at the head, and the Presbyterian next on the list.

A Custom House Collector's Quiet Life has, it is stated, been secured by a very simple method. A New York journal which is an enthusiastic admirer of the new Collector of the Port says that Mr. Magone is not harassed by disputes as his predecessors were. He has had all the books regulating the customs service placed within his reach, and when appealed to for a decision his clear gray eyes snap as he replies: "The law says so and so about that question, does it not?" He is generally answered in the affirmative, and without more ado he dismisses his visitor, saying: "The law on the subject was made for me to follow, and follow it I shall." The principle may be commended to the notice of ministers and Christian teachers who are worried by persons anxious that religious teaching should be brought more into accord with worldly thought and practice. There can be no question as to what the law is that was made for them to follow, and the Bible is at least as unambiguous as the United States statutes (II Tim. 2:15, 23).

Needless Distress Drove a Man to Suicide in New York recently. On November 27th the employés in a hotel in this city found one of the guests hanging in his room, quite dead. As the man had been apparently cheerful, and was known to belong to a wealthy family, there was no clue to the reason of his wicked act. When, however, the papers in his room were examined, it was found that he was in pecuniary straits. There were a number of pawn tickets showing that he had pawned his watch, ring, and other valuables, and there was also a sheet of paper on which were recorded a large number of names and amounts, indicating that he had borrowed small sums of his acquaintances. The sum of $480 had been borrowed in this way, all in small amounts. When the relatives of the suicide were notified of his death they were amazed. Neither his father nor his brothers knew that he needed money, and all said that if he had applied to them he might have had any amount. It is marvellous that, instead of applying to his father, who could and would have helped him, he should have humiliated himself by borrowing of others. We think him foolish, but many Christians are doing the same thing. Though God has promised to supply all their need, they do not apply to Him in their difficulties (Jer. 2:13).

A Crash on Shipboard Caused Six Deaths and many injuries recently. The Westernland, of the Red Star Line, which arrived at New York from Antwerp on Thursday last had a remarkable experience during the voyage. She left Antwerp on November 21st and had a fair voyage until the fifth day out, when the wind veered from the south-west to the north-west with heavy cross seas. The ship labored all night, and the next day the weather did not improve. The spray rose in such quantities that the men on deck availed themselves of any shelter they could find when not actually at work. About three in the afternoon a number of the crew and steerage passengers were under an arch near the bows called the turtle-back deck, composed of a pine flooring four inches thick, resting on quarter-inch steel plates, the whole supported by steel beams of great strength. The ship's head had plunged down a long swell when two seas struck it, one on each side, and a huge mass of water fell over on the turtle-back deck, cutting it clean in two. The water flowed aft, carrying all before it, and as it rushed off the damage done appalled every one who witnessed it. The heavy turtle-back deck was crushed flat, and under it were six men dying or dead, and about twenty with broken limbs. The injured were cared for by the ship's surgeon and a physician among the passengers, until they arrived in New York, and were taken to a hospital. The melancholy calamity suggests the thought that we cannot be too careful about the character of the refuges we seek in the storms of life. The deck which sheltered the men from the spray seemed strong, but its very strength rendered their destruction more certain when it succumbed under the heavy sea. Satan offers many such refuges to men weary with the smaller vexations and trials of life. If they fly to drink or worldly pleasure for comfort instead of to Christ, the impregnable refuge for the troubled, their eternal ruin is swift and inevitable (Ps. 91:1-7).

An Erring Wife's Search for a Home Ended at her father's house on November 27th. Some time ago a lady residing in New Jersey with her husband and one child fell under the power of temptation and quitted her husband's house, taking her child with her. The man for whom she thus sinned, and sacrificed her honor and her home, was arrested shortly afterward on the charge of stealing money, which, in the present state of society, is stupidly regarded as a more heinous offence than stealing a man's wife. The woman consequently was without a home or means of support. Having sought these unavailingly for some time, she applied to her father. She wrote: "I know I have done wrong, and am ashamed to face the people of my former home. I hope you will not forsake me in my hour of need and turn me from you," signing herself, "Your own daughter, who is now an outcast from the world." The father promptly replied, inviting his erring daughter to his home. It was all he could do; he cannot remove the stain from her character. It is a better thing that God does for His erring children who, confessing their sin and seeking forgiveness through Christ, ask Him to receive them (Isa. 1:18,19).

A Suggestion to a School Principal was handed in by one of his pupils in Boston, Mass., recently. The Boston Traveller says that a few days ago the principal of a school in South Boston was reluctantly compelled, by the extreme misconduct of one of the boys, to depart from his customary habit and give him a severe flogging. The next day the boy "brought a note." The principal opened it and read, "Licking don't do this boy no good—talk to him." The grammar and caligraphy of the note suggested a doubt whether it was written, as it purported to be, by the boy's father. The principal questioned the lad, and hinted at a visit to his father to explain. Then the boy was alarmed, and admitted that he had written the note himself. It may be surmised that in his future treatment of the lad the principal will not pay much attention to the suggestion. Doubtless the lad is disappointed by the failure of his plot. To be talked to instead of being punished would be less disagreeable to him. When men argue against the doctrine of eternal punishment they feel the same way, but, as with the boy, it does not rest with them to decide the future of the incorrigible (Rev. 21:8).

A Bride was Imprisoned on Board a Steamer at Hartford, Conn., last week. The Hartford Courant says that after a wedding in that city the bride and bridegroom went on board a steamer on which they had secured passage to New York. They went to their state-room, and had just laid down their lighter baggage when it was discovered that something had been left behind. The bridegroom rushed out, turning the key in the lock from the outside from the force of bachelor habit, and went up town with the key in his pocket. When he got back it was to see the boat a hundred feet from the dock. The boat got some miles down the river before the imprisoned bride was able to communicate with an officer of the boat, who unlocked her door with a pass key. It may be hoped for the lady's sake that her husband will be able to overcome his bachelor habits and adapt himself to his new relation in life. There will be less need of the vigilance he was evidently accustomed to exercise now that he has a wife to care for his interests. It would be well if, when men enter into union with Christ by conversion, they also realized that there is no need of worry or apprehension, and would commit all their cares to Him (I Peter 5:7).

IS IT TRUE?

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Nebuchadnezzar spake and said unto them, Is it true, O Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, do not ye serve my gods, nor worship the golden image which I have set up?"—DANIEL 3:14.

Courage Required of the Christian Soldier—A Serious Question—Asked on all Hands—I. How to Act if it is Not True—Do Not Make a Profession—If Made Quit it—The Dishonor of Unfaithfulness—III. How to Act if it is True—Be Bold—Reckon on Deliverance—Adam Clarke's Employer.

DEAR friends who are not yet decided, if you would become followers of the Lord Jesus Christ it will be well for you to count the cost. It was our Lord's custom to bid men consider what His service might involve. His frequent declaration was: "He that taketh not his cross, and followeth after Me, is not worthy of Me." He knew and would have us know that it is no child's play to be a soldier of the cross. If we count upon ease in this warfare we shall be grievously disappointed; if we would reign. One reason of this is that the world, like Nebuchadnezzar, expects us all to follow its fashions and to obey its rules. The god of this world is the devil, and he claims implicit obedience. Sin in some form or other is the image which Satan sets up and requires us to serve. The tyranny of the world is fierce and cruel, and those who will not worship its image will find that the burning fiery furnace has not yet cooled. If you mean to be a Christian, and therefore intend to cast off the bondage of this present evil world, your resolve must be taken to bear all consequences rather than worship the idol of the hour. The world's flute, harp, sackbut, and psaltery must sound for you in vain. A nobler music must charm your ears and make you bid defiance to the world's threatenings.

WE MUST FIGHT

Peradventure some of you may say, "We will not bow before the gods of the world, but we will worship God only: we will follow Christ and none beside." This is a brave resolve; you will never regret it if you stand to it even to the end.

We are glad to hear you speak thus; but is it true? "Is it true?" These words I shall take by themselves, and set them on fire. No question can be more necessary or more searching than "Is it true?" It is very well to profess, but "Is it true?" It is very fine to promise and vow, but "Is it true?" It is a bold thing to talk of defying Nebuchadnezzar and his fiery furnace, but "Is it true?" Sceptics question your declaration with a sarcastic sneer; sinners question it with an open unbelief; and saints question it with deep anxiety to have you sincere. From many sides comes the query, "Is it true?" It must be asked, it will be asked, it ought to be asked, and therefore I ask it, "Is it true?"

I. Follower of Christ,

BE READY FOR THE QUESTION,

"Is it true?" Do not reckon to live unnoticed, for a fierce light beats about every Christian. You will be sure to meet with some one or other whom you respect or fear, who will demand of you, "Is it true?" Nebuchadnezzar was a great personage to these three holy men; he was their despotic lord, their employer, their influential friend. In his hands rested their liberties and their lives. He was, moreover, their benefactor, for he had set them in high office in his empire. All hope of further promotion lay with him, and if they would prosper and rise in the world they must earn his smile. Many young Christians are tried with this temptation. Many worldly advantages may be gained by currying favor with certain ungodly men who are like little Nebuchadnezzars; and this is a great peril. They are bidden to do wrong by one who is their superior, their employer, their patron. Now comes the test. Will they endure the trial hour? They say that they can endure it, but is it true? Let my hearers stand prepared for such an ordeal, for in all probability it will come. Some Nebuchadnezzar will put it to you pretty plainly: "Will you do as I wish you, or will you obey God?" At such a time I pray that you may answer in the right manner without a second thought, and so prove that your love to God is true.

Nebuchadnezzar spoke in peremptory tones, as if he could not believe that any mortal upon the earth could have the presumption to dispute his will. He cannot conceive that one employed under his patronage will he demands indignantly, "Is it true?" He will not believe it! He must have been misinformed! Can there exist a being in all his wide dominions who can have the impudence to think for himself, or the audacity to insinuate that it can be wrong to do what Nebuchadnezzar commands? He will not believe it. It is condescension on his part even to ask, "Is it true?"

Often ungodly men profess that they do not believe in the conversion of their fellow-workmen. Is it true, John, that you have become religious? A pretty fellow! Why, you used to sing a jolly song, as well as other people, and now you whine out a psalm like other canting hypocrites. Is it true? Why, you could empty a glass and follow pretty games, like the rest of us; and now you profess to be afraid of doing wrong. Is it true? Are you really such a fool? You seem almost afraid to put one foot before another for fear you should be hauled over the coals. Are you really the same fellow who could once drink and swear? "Is it true?" Beloved brethren and sisters, I want you to be ready for this assault, and ready to answer without hesitation, "It is most certainly true."

You will not be able to go through life without being discovered; a lighted candle cannot be hid. There is a feeling among some good people that it will be wise to be very reticent, and hide their light under a bushel. They intend to and come out when the palms are being distributed. They hope to travel to heaven by the back lanes, and skulk into glory in disguise. Ah, me, what a degenerate set! Rest assured, my fellow-Christians, that at some period or other, in the most quiet lives, there will come a moment for open decision. Days will come when we must speak out or prove traitors to our Lord and to His truth. Godliness, like murder, will out. You will not always be able to travel to heaven incog. In every house there comes a time when each person of the family has to take sides, and acknowledge to whom he belongs. The most timid wife, or the most unassuming child, will be compelled to say, "I also am Christ's disciple." Be ready at once to answer the question, "Is it true?"

To be fully prepared to answer the inquiry of opposers, act upon sound reasons. Be ready to give a reason for the hope that is in you with meekness and fear. Be able to show why you are a believer in God, why you worship the Lord Jesus Christ, why you trust in His atoning sacrifice, and why you of your life. Show why you cannot do what others do; why, being a child of God, your nature is changed, and you have no wish to do that which you once delighted to do in the days of your unregeneracy. I am sure that Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego would never have stood out against the imperious monarch as they did, if they had not known their bearings and well understood why it was that Jehovah alone is to be worshipped as God.

MAKE HIM THE REGULATOR

Next, take care that you always proceed with deep sincerity. Superficial profession soon ends in thorough apostasy. Only heart-work will stand the fire. Never let your speech outrun your heart. Do not profess to be more than you really are. Remember, all your professions will have to be tested, and the question will be made a burning one for you: "Is it true?" Mind that it is true, all true, thoroughly true. Put yourself through your paces, and do not believe that your religion is worth a penny unless it will bear death, judgment, and the eternal world.

This being done, accustom yourself to act with solemn determination before God on every matter which concerns morals and religion. Many very decent people are not self-contained, but are dependent upon the assistance of others. They are like the houses which our London builders run up so quickly in long rows; if they did not help to keep each other up they would all tumble down at once, for no one of them could stand alone. How much there is of joint-stock-company religion, wherein hypocrites and formalists keep each other in countenance. Where things are not quite so bad as this, yet there is too little personal establishment in the faith. So many people have

A "LEAN-TO" RELIGION.

If their minister, or some other leading person were taken away, their back wall would be gone, and they would come to the ground. In some cases the wife and mother, or the husband and father, or the friend and teacher, constitute the main support of the individual's religion; he leans upon others, and if these fail him there is an end of his hope. Friends, this sort of religion will not do. We must purpose in our own heart what we will do, and then stand to our purpose. Happy he who dares to be in the right with two or three. Happier still is he who will stand in the right, even if the choice two or three should quit it. He who can stand alone is a man indeed; every man of God should be such. Athanasius contra mundum is a grand figure. Against the whole world Athanasius proclaimed the godhead of Christ, and he won the day. If you will not go to the world, the world will have one day to come to you.

God make us champions of His holy cause! Heroism can only be wrought in us by the Holy Ghost. Humbly yielding your whole nature to the power of the divine Sanctifier, you will be true to your Lord even to the end. At the cross-foot, with your eyes upon those blessed wounds, and your whole soul trusting in Him that liveth and was dead, you will not be ashamed of your Lord, nor afraid of the consequences of obeying Him.

II. But now, secondly, if you cannot say that it is true, what then? If, standing before the heart-searching God at this time, you cannot say, "It is true,"

HOW SHOULD YOU ACT?

If you cannot say that you take Christ's cross, and are willing to follow Him at all hazards, then hearken to me and learn the truth. Do not make a profession at all. Do not talk about baptism or the Lord's Supper, nor of joining a church, nor of being a Christian; for if you do, you will lie against your own soul. If you have made a profession, and yet it is not true, be honest enough to quit it, for it can never be right to keep up a fraud. A false profession is a crime, and to persevere in it is a presumptuous sin. Whatever you are, or are not, do be transparent, sincere, truthful. If there be any man here who says in his heart, "No, I cannot suffer for truth's sake; I will follow Christ as far as it is good walking, and costs nothing; but I will not go through the mire for Him;" well, then, turn back at once, for you are no true pilgrim. If you are determined not to press onward even though the way should lie through the Slough of Despond, you had better make the best of your way home to the City of Destruction; for you are not a man that God has called into this kingdom. "Strange advice," say you. Yes, but prudent advice, too.

If your avowal of faith in Jesus and opposition to sin is not true you had better withdraw it and be silent; for by a groundless pretence you will dishonor the cause of God, and cause the enemy to take up a reproach against His people. If Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego had stood before Nebuchadnezzar and had made a compromise, it would have dishonored the name of the Lord. Suppose they had said, "O king, we believe in Jehovah, but we hardly know what to do in our peculiar circumstances. We desire to please thee, and we also dread the thought of the burning fiery furnace, and therefore we must yield, though it greatly grieves us." Why, they would have cast shame upon the name of Israel. It would have been idle to say that they would only do it once, that it would be only a mere form, and so on; for had they bowed the knee to the graven image, they would have set Nebuchadnezzar before Jehovah. They might have pleaded that to refuse the great king was virtually to commit suicide; but they kept from such

CROOKED REASONINGS.

They might have argued that it was wise to save their lives, because they could be so very useful to the Israelites, and to the cause of true religion. I am glad that the three holy children were not "careful to answer," or they might have fallen upon some crooked policy or lame excuse for compromise. What have we to do with consequences? It is ours to do the right, and leave results with the Lord. To do wrong cannot under any circumstances be right. Thousands of men and women are doing this continually. Shame upon them! They plead their own necessities, their large families, their position, their hopes of usefulness, and the examples of others; but none of these things can excuse cowardice toward God. If by doing a little wrong we could effect a great deal of good, we should not thereby be excused. This is a common way of drugging conscience, and I beseech you be upon your guard against it.

III. But now, thirdly, let us consider what follows

IF IT BE TRUE.

I hope that many here can lay their hands upon their hearts, and quietly say, "Yes, it is true; we are determined not to bow before sin, come what may." Well, then, if it is true, I have this much to say to you: dear brother, state this when it is demanded of you. Declare your resolve. This will strengthen it in yourself and be the means of supporting it in others. This word is meant for certain Christian people who come in and out of this house, and join with us in public worship, but have never openly avowed themselves to be disciples of the Lord Jesus. Whenever we gather to the remembrance of our dying Lord, they either take their seats among the onlookers, or else they go home.

This raises many anxious thoughts in our minds. Specially we are exercised with this question—these people have a faith which they refuse to acknowledge, will such a faith save them? Scripture evidently lays great stress upon obedience to the Lord, and taking up His cross and following Him. Will Jesus save those who will not come out and bear His reproach? He claims of all His followers that they follow Him in the daylight. It is written: "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved."

These are not words of mine, but of the Lord Jesus Himself; take heed unto yourselves that ye do not slight them. I dare not leave out part of His Gospel command when I am preaching it. If you believe in the Lord Jesus stand forth on His side.

Is it true? Then joyfully accept the trial which comes of it. Shrink not from the flames. Settle in your minds that, by divine grace, no loss, nor cross, nor shame, nor suffering, shall make you play the coward. Say, like the holy children, "We are not careful to answer thee in this matter."

THEY DID NOT CRINGE

before the king, and cry, "We beseech thee, do not throw us into the fiery furnace. Let us have a consultation with thee, O king, that we may arrange terms. There may be some method by which we can please thee, and yet keep our religion." No; they said, "We are not careful to answer thee in this matter. If it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and He will deliver us out of thine hand, O king. But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up."

Dear friends, let us be ready to suffer for Christ's sake. Some will say, "Do not be imprudent." It is always prudent to do your duty. We have not enough nowadays of the virtue nicknamed imprudence. I would like to see a display of

in these cold, calculating, selfish days. Oh for the days of zeal, the days when men counted not their lives dear to them that they might win Christ! Men sit down and reckon up what it will cost them to do right, and weigh their conduct as a matter of profit and loss, and then they call such wicked calculations prudence. It is sheer selfishness. Do right, if it cost you your life. You may lose a great deal for Christ, but you will never lose anything by Christ. You may lose for time, but you will gain for eternity; the loss is transient, but the gain is everlasting.

If it be true that you are willing thus to follow Christ, reckon upon deliverance. Nebuchadnezzar may put you into the fire, but he cannot keep you there, nor can he make the fire burn you. The enemy casts you in bound, but the fire will loosen your bonds, and you will walk at liberty amid the glowing coals. You shall gain by your losses, you shall rise by your down-castings. Many prosperous men owe their present position to the fact that they were faithful when they were in humble employments. They were honest, and for the moment they displeased their employers, and in the end earned their esteem. When was put out apprentice, and his master showed him how to stretch the cloth when it was a little short, Adam could not find in his heart to do it. Such a fool of a boy must be sent home to his mother; and his godly mother was glad that her boy was such a fool that he could not stoop to a dishonest trick. You know what he became. He might have missed his way in life if he had not been true to his principles in his youth. Your first loss may be a lifelong gain. Dear young fellow, you may be turned out of your situation, but the Lord will turn the curse into a blessing.

Lastly—and this is a consideration not to be forgotten—if you will stand up for Jesus, and the right and the true and the pure and the temperate and the good, not only will you be delivered, but you will do great good. This Nebuchadnezzar was a poor piece of goods; yet he was compelled to acknowledge the power of these three decided and holy men. They were thrown into the furnace, and of it; and what said Nebuchadnezzar? Just now it was: "The image that I have set up," and now he declares that no man shall speak a word against the God of Israel on pain of being cut in pieces. There is no having influence over the great men, or the little men of this age, except by being firm in your principles, and decided in what you do. If you yield an inch you are beaten; but if you will not yield—no, not the splitting of a hair—they will respect you.

The man who can hide his principles, and conceal his beliefs, and do a little wrong, is a nobody. He is a chip in the porridge; he will flavor nothing. But he who does what he believes to be right, and cannot be driven from it—that is the man. You cannot shake the world if you let the world shake you; but when the world finds that you have grit in you, they will let you alone. Nebuchadnezzar was obliged to feel the influence of these men, and even so, the most wicked and the most proud feel the force of the true-hearted, the brave, and the good. For this let us pray God to give us new hearts and right spirits. For this let us cling to the blessed cross of Christ, and yield ourselves up to the power of the blood and water which flowed from His wounded side. So shall our lives be powerful; if not illustrious in the eyes of men, they shall be acceptable in the eyes of God.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

MATRIMONIAL MANNERS.*

It has been remarked that there are six "ifs" by any of which a stranger may know a man and woman to be husband and wife. These rules, it is said, are infallible in just interpretation. They may be resorted to with confidence, as they are deduced from every-day experience.

1. If you see a gentleman and a lady disagree upon trifling occasions, or correcting each other in company, you may be sure they are married.

2. If you see a silent pair in a hackney or any other coach, lolling carelessly, one at each window, without seeming to know they have a companion, the sign is infallible.

3. If you see a lady drop her glove, and a gentleman by the side of her kindly telling her to pick it up, you need not hesitate in forming your opinion.

4. If you see a lady presenting a gentleman with anything carelessly, her head inclined the other way, and speaking to him with indifference, that is a clear sign.

5. If you meet a couple in the fields, the gentleman twenty yards in advance of the lady, who, perhaps, is getting over a stile with difficulty, or picking her way through a muddy path, there is no doubt about their relationship.

6. If you see a gentleman particularly obliging, courteous, and good-natured, relaxing into smiles, saying smart things to every pretty woman in the room except one, to whom he appears particularly reserved, cold, and formal, and unreasonably cross—who that one is no one can be at a loss to discover.

If we would be happy in married life we must reverse such notes of barbarous dissonance. When an exhortation is given after the wedding ceremony, it would be well if the clergyman were sometimes to take for his text: "Be courteous" (1 Peter 3:8). If he be an observing man he will know that more coldness and estrangements, if not absolute quarrels and separations, grow out of a disregard of the common rules of courtesy in married life than from any other cause. The wife gets up and goes off to give a direction to her servants while her husband is in the middle of a sentence; if he were any other gentleman she would at least say, "Excuse me for a moment." The wife comes into the room and the husband sits still in his chair; if any other lady enters he rises and offers her one. If a guest is coming to the house the lady of the house is dressed and at the door ready to receive him; if it is only her husband she has no welcome. If a lady is at the table as a guest, the husband brings some topic of social conversation to entertain her; if his wife is the only lady, he sits silent, or may even take a letter or a newspaper out of his pocket and read it to himself.

How many divorces would be avoided if the advice of Governor Trumbull were taken, who, when a friend applied to him for advice about a divorce, asked, "How did you treat your wife when you were courting her?" "Why, I treated her as well as I could, for I loved her dearly." "Well," said the Governor, "go home and treat her as well as you did then for a year, and come and tell me the result." At the year's end it was, "My wife and I are as happy as when we were first married, and I mean to court her all the days of my life."

The Whirlpool Rapids of Niagara, the Scene of the Recent Foolhardy Exploits.

God counts their tears. Of course women may use their tears in an improper, cowardly manner to induce men to turn aside from the path of duty; and there are those who have recourse to melting moods to gain a mastery over good-natured, weak-minded husbands. They have water-works in their heads, and can turn the tap on when they like. But we have not been referring to selfish sighs, and made-to-order woe of this kind, which need not and ought not to be regarded. If these crocodile tears are counted by God, we may be sure that they count against the woman who can so far abuse her irresistible might of weakness.

THE WHIRLPOOL RAPIDS.

(See Illustration.)

FOR the first time, so far as is known, a woman safely passed the famous Whirlpool Rapids of Niagara on November 28th. She and a young man, who had previously made the passage, entered a long boat of the shape of a torpedo or cigar. The top of the strange craft was screwed on to prevent the water coming in, and then it was towed out to the rapids and let go. It was tossed about and whirled around for nearly an hour, and then passed out into calm water, where it was lassoed and drawn ashore. The girl, who is eighteen years old, was very seasick, but was otherwise unhurt. She expects to obtain an engagement to go on exhibition in a museum.

The rapids have long exercised a strange fascination over persons inclined to feats of daring. The enormous waves, beating in their fury around the rocks, appear to the ordinary observer to be inevitably destructive to any life once within their grip. Any one carried there by a catastrophe, and against their will, would excite pity as one whose death was certain, but the danger attracts some persons, who, for mere fame, or sometimes for money only, voluntarily put their lives in peril. While the bravery which animates a man who risks his life to save others, or to avert some impending calamity, excites our admiration, the reckless daring that prompts an act of foolhardiness merits nothing but contempt. The best blessing we can wish for them—that of which they stand most in need—is that God would open their eyes to their responsibility, and to the true value of the life they so heedlessly expose to danger.

THE MINER'S LOST LIMB.

"ANYBODY know aught of Bill Dawson?" The question was asked in a social club composed of the more jovial set of the miners in a certain coal mine. They met in a club-room adjoining a saloon to smoke, sing songs, and drink beer. It was not a full meeting. Indeed, there seldom could be all the men there at the same time, as some of them had to be on the night gang and some on the day gang, but as they changed about, all had their chance of club sociality at some time. Bill Dawson, the man whose welfare was the subject of inquiry, was one of the most popular men among them. He could always be relied upon for a roaring song, and his jokes and general high spirits made things lively. He was not present on this occasion, being in hospital, where he was carried the night before with a serious injury caused by the fall of a quantity of stones and earth. The meeting was dull in consequence, though it was likely to end more harmoniously than usual, for Bill's jokes were sometimes so pointed, after he had imbibed a few pots of beer, that some one was apt to get tired of being laughed at, lose his temper, and, perhaps, retaliate with a blow. Still, Bill was missed and his absence regretted.

"Pretty bad hurt, I presume?" said a miner. "Don't know," was the reply. "He looked it. I helped carry him up, and I never saw anybody's face look so white. It showed under the dirt. I thought he was a dead 'un at first, till he groaned. Guess he must have fainted."

"Where was he hurt?"

"Well, he was pretty well smashed up all over, and he'll lose his leg, I guess. That must be past mending anyhow, but it's the inside damage as'll fix him, I think. The doctors can't get at them innard hurts."

"You don't think he'll get over it, then?"

"Oh, I can't tell. Bill's pretty strong, and he ain't over thirty-five. He's been a heavy drinker; that's agen him they say. But what's that; they don't know."

The evening dragged on without the customary songs, and the bar-keeper had a smaller sum in his drawer than usual. The men did not know until then how much the life and fun of the meetings had depended on Bill Dawson. One after another went home, and the room was nearly empty when another miner entered.

"Where you been? Come to see if we were ready to go? What's wrong wi' you?" were the salutations with which the new-comer was greeted.

"You're a mean lot," he said, weighting his uncomplimentary remark with a profane adjective. "There's Bill Dawson down in hospital wuth the hull lot o' you, and here you sit and drink and never give him a thought. Ain't been one o' you to ask whether he's dead or alive. I despise ye."

"You been to see?"

"Ay, and I'd ha' been ashamed to show my face on the street if I hadn't."

"How is he?"

"Go and see if yer want to know, same as I've done."

Under the influence of beer, however, the man thawed, and presently vouchsafed the information that Bill would not die, but his right leg had been amputated, and if no inflammation set in that would be all.

"And enough, too, I should say. My opinion is Bill would as lief be dead as go about with one leg."

You go and talk to him. Bill don't feel that way. He don't like losing one quarter of himself, but he's mighty anxious to save the other threequarters, and so you'd be."

"Well, I don't know. I'd hate to be a cripple, and Bill 'll feel pretty bad after being such a lively fellow. What'll he do?"

"He ain't got to that point yet. He's thinking o' nothin' else but whether he's going underground."

There was general regret throughout the pit when it was known that Bill had lost his leg, and a large number of men were of the opinion expressed at the club, that he would prefer being dead to being a cripple.

"Thank the Lord, he'll live," said "Methodist" Harry, the one pious miner in the pit. "Bill warn't fit to die." Bill had been the leader of the ridicule that had been Harry's great cross in the mine, but the good man was sincerely thankful that Bill had not been cut off in his sins.

Harry went to see Bill next day, got the minister to go and see him, too, and took as much interest in his welfare as if Bill had been a friend instead of a foe. The other men did not go after the first week, and gradually Bill's name dropped out of recollection.

After some weeks Bill was allowed to leave the hospital and hobbled on crutches to his home. It was something to be among familiar scenes again and be free to go about as he chose. He was glad of the change, and took advantage of it to limp up and down a few yards of the road that led to the mine. The men were all at work or asleep just at that hour, and the road was deserted. Presently, however, Bill heard his name called, and, turning, saw Mr. Sharpe, the superintendent.

"Out at last, Dawson?" he said. "Glad to see you. I wish they had left you whole. I am afraid they have spoiled your life for you taking off that leg."

"Oh, no, sir," said Bill, cheerily. "My life ain't spoiled. Don't you believe it. I'm a new man, sir. It's wuth the loss o' both legs to get what I've got in hospital."

"Ah! and what may that be?"

"I've got religion, sir. When I went in there I was on my road to hell. As bad a man, sir, I was, as e'er a man in the mine. What w' drinking and other things I'd a brought up in hell afore long. And now, sir," and Bill, supporting himself on his crutch, and throwing up his hand while a smile spread over his broad features, exclaimed, "thank the dear Lord, He's given me a new heart and saved me, and I'll find heaven at the end o' my course."

Bill went to the club that night and told the same story there. "His friend, "Methodist" Harry, opposed his going, fearing the power of temptation, but Bill said he must bear his testimony, and he did.

"Ye'll never sing no more for us now, Bill," said one of the old friends, ruefully.

"Not sing?" said Bill, in amazement.

"Why, I'm singing always, and I'll sing all the evening for ye, only ye'll hev' to come up ter church or somewhere away from here. Not sing? Why, just hear," and Bill sent forth such a volume of sound with "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," that showed his lungs, at any rate, had not been injured.

Bill had the pleasure not only of singing for them afterward, but of getting many others to join him in the sacred harmony.

THE FRIENDS AT ASPENDALE.

A SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. J. Jackson Wray, *

Night in Aspendale:

My story opens in "canny" Yorkshire; for in the hill country of that biggest, and as I may be forgiven for thinking, that bonniest of English shires lies the valley of Aspendale. The season is autumn and the time is evening. The red sun, after lingering awhile on the distant wold as if to fling a valediction on the vale beneath, is setting amid attendant clouds, which receive, as courtiers do, the reflected glory of their royal lord. Blushing with a proud content, they wear their purple garments and golden fringes in stately fashion, but only to doff them by and by as courtiers have to do when their liege lord withdraws his countenance and transfers his favors elsewhere.

The soft twilight broods above the quiet beauties of Aspendale. The landscape is limited but lovely, and the eye rests upon it with a "soothing sense of pleasure." It is like a vignette, which is all the more a masterpiece because the eye and the mind can take it in at one view; can print it on the memory and reproduce it at will; not by degrees as in a panorama, but at one bright glance; a photograph with the added charm of color.

Yonder at the head of the valley stands an ancient, castle-like mansion known through many a changeeful century as Aspen Towers. Its turrets, covered with ivy to the very top, are the most conspicuous objects in the picture, always excepting the remarkably tall and slender spire of Thorpe Aspen church, which is said to be the most perfect specimen of its kind. Aspen Chase, amid whose wealth of timber the mansion stands, is of large dimensions, and at one time could vie as a deer forest with any in the king's domains.

There is something very delightful about those ancient dwelling-places of old families. They have passed, in many cases, from sire to son through centuries, and each has taken pride in the old place and its surroundings. Occasionally one owner has been a spendthrift and burdened the estate with incumbrances, but again a more careful owner has come into possession and has retrieved the fortunes of the family. I know one instance of this. An earl of ancient name on entering upon his possession found it burdened with debt and creditors pleading and threatening and insisting on payment. To clear the family name of disgrace he went to Germany and lived there in obscurity on peasant's fare for more than twenty years, relinquishing the pleasures and joys of aristocratic life, that he might redeem the family estate and name from the disgrace of debt. It is only recently that he has returned and is now able to boast that he owes no man anything. There was true heroism in the act, and many such acts have been done by these English aristocrats.

The village of Thorpe Aspen, snugly laid in the centre of the valley, is composed of two or three clusters of neat cottages, besprinkled here and there with farmsteads, and the roomier premises of the village carpenter, blacksmith, and general shopkeeper. Around the most of these the humbler kinds of climbing shrubs and creepers pursue their wilful way, and in such abundance that it is not easy to tell of what material the walls are built. Each cottage has its rood or two of garden ground, and each plot, thanks to the laws and usages of Aspendale, is fairly trim and tidy, some of them bright and beautiful all round the year.

Near the bottom of the valley stands a mill which can perform its grinding operations either by the power of wind or water, and its four broad sails and its big wide mill-pool give happy touches to the rural picture. The pool is fed by a brook of clear water that has its rise miles away beyond the distant woods of Aspen Chase. After flowing through the park and skirting the village, it broadens and deepens into a spacious sheet of water. Then it pours its waters across the sluice or upon Peter Prout's undershot water-wheel, and wanders away to "join the brimming river" a few miles beyond the valley, where the thriving town of Chilworth lies hidden in a valley of its own.

In order to make this brief picture of bonny Aspendale and bonnier Thorpe Aspen complete, the reader must commission his imagination to fill in the sketch with green fields, snug farmsteads, shady paddocks, orchards, bush and coppice, clumps of beeches, small plantations of fir, and the "Chase" in the distance, whose foliage is already beginning to show those charming tints which only autumn can supply. Here and there the eye falls on a field of turnips, green and flourishing, waiting the advent of the sheep, who will have happy times there by and by. One or two late corn-fields, too, are dotted with golden stooks of barley, which are also waiting—waiting for the Widow Atheling's wagons to come and bear them away to the spacious stockyards of Aspen Garth.

I tell you that you cannot very well paint the landscape lovelier or fairer than it really is as it gleams in the soft twilight, or rather in the mild radiance of the harvest moon, which is now sailing across the heavens with patches of fleecy clouds around it—white-robed nymphs attendant on Diana, queen of night. Even while we look, however, the bright visions begin to pass, as all bright visions in this world do pass! all the more reason why we should rejoice in them while we may, and cultivate the while the inner vision of Faith and Hope which can look upon and claim still brighter things that never pass. The autumn wind blowing from the southwest is bringing up a broad bank of cloud. Like a heavy curtain it gradually drapes the sky—swallows up the lighter cloudlets and puts the moon under strong eclipse.

The darkness gathers round. The night falls upon the ivy-covered turrets of Aspen Towers. Night has fallen on creeper-covered cottage, gabled farmstead, and silent mill. A chill autumn fog comes down to make the scene more gloomy, and we who have sketched the scene are willing enough to turn away, and seek shelter and warmth beneath some hospitable roof and beside some cheerful hearth.

However pleasant it may be to "take mine ease in mine inn," it cannot be done so far as the village of Thorpe Aspen is concerned. For that kind of accommodation you must trudge up the valley to the "Royal George," or down the valley to the "Chequers." Both of them are beyond the parish bounds, for by almost common consent the Thorpe Aspeners say of the tavern that its room is better than its company. There are a few who hold a different opinion, and who grumble; but these few would have been vastly benefited, poor bibulous mortals, if the veto had been in force fifty miles around. As for "good accommodation for travellers," however, there is no lack. Almost every house in the village is an open house of call; from Sir Godwin Spofforth's castellated mansion at the upper end of the valley, to the whitewashed dwelling of Miller Prout at the lower, each is upon occasion a "Traveller's Rest."

Shall we try our fortune at Aspen Towers? Nay, alas! It is night, dark night there, too, for the sorrows and the shadows of life know no partiality. They invade the threshold of hall and hut with equally resistless power, and leave both the one and the other at an equally laggard pace. The proud baronet's son and heir, self-willed and self-deluded, is far away from home, running a wild and reckless course; sowing such seeds of sin as are sure to produce, and are already producing for him and others, a harvest of thorns. It is night, chill night at Aspen Towers. For within the luxurious chambers Death has sent his stern process-server, dire Disease, and the fair young lady Ethel, sole daughter of the great man's house and heart, lies at this moment pale and helpless beneath the reading of the writ.

Shall we cast ourselves on the hospitality of the kindly household at Aspen Garth? Nay, alas! It is night, dark night in the home of the Athelings. The husband and the father has only just been laid in his grave beneath the yew-trees of Thorpe Aspen churchyard, and there is sorrow for his loss. It is night; for by the chimney-nook whereon the faggots crackle and sparkle all unnoted, a comely matron, with much silver in her hair and much sadness in her face, sits rocking herself in restless and silent ache of heart, the subject of a grief too deep for tears.

This widowed mother's bright and treasured boy, her youngest born, her Benjamin, "the son of her right hand," has become her Benoni, "the son of her sorrow." He is a wanderer, lost among the dark mountains; gone from home and from God; no, not from God; not from his mother's heart. These will not be left. They follow. But will their call bring the wanderer back again? Oh, dark night! dark, chill night! brooding over Towers and Garth! Oh, sorrowful widow and mother! Oh, sad father with a bitter grief at the heart and black care on the brow! Will the sun ever rise again? Will the Valley of Shadows ever greet the morn again? That is what Widow Atheling asks, as she bows her silvery hair and rocks herself in the ingle nook. That is what the haggard baronet says as he sits in the shadows of his library, oblivious to the lowering light of the lamp upon the table; lowering and lessening, like the life up-stairs, for lack of plenishment. Will the day dawn and the shadows flee away?

Near the centre of Thorpe Aspen, and at some short distance from the stately entrance to the park of Aspen Towers, stood the homestead of Simon Holmes, the village carpenter. The house itself, though low and humble in its architecture, and thatched like the rest of the cottages, was more spacious and commodious than its neighbors. Its large, diamond-paned windows were of Gothic shape, and had some small amount of ornamentation in their framework. Over its latticed porch roses and clematis and honeysuckle luxuriously intertwined. Altogether Simon's home gave evidence alike of comfort and good taste.

The house was surrounded by a large and well-kept garden, except at one point, the point of juncture between the cottage and the shop. The shop itself, in which were two long carpenters' benches, and all the necessary tools and tokens of the owner's trade, was flanked by a good-sized shed or two for the storage of dry and seasoned timber, and these again abutted on a spacious yard. In this was placed the saw-pit, and a moderate pile of timber, all of which in turn was destined to feel the tooth of the saw, and like Proteus to change its shape under the manipulation of Simon and his journeyman and apprentice, who called him "Maister," and who, together with their industrious employer, did carpenter's, wheelwright's, and general jobbing work among the farmers for many a mile around.

In the yard, too, were carts, wagons, drills, and other implements pertaining to farming operations. All these were, so to speak, in hospital, and were waiting for skilful treatment at the hands of Simon and his assistants. Taken altogether, Simon's house, garden, sheds, and yard were quite a feature in Thorpe Aspen; and so, for that matter, was Simon himself. He was "quite a character," and his name, fame, and credit stood high through all the region of Aspendale.

Picture to yourself, then, a rather tall and yet stoutish man of vigorous build, whose sixty years sat lightly on him, owing to the blended influence of a good constitution, a good character, and a well-ordered life. He is clean-shaven alike on cheek and chin, with the exception of short, half-length whiskers, almost as narrow as they are short, and whose presence has so little to do with his general appearance that you are led to wonder why they should be there at all. His small and somewhat humorous gray eyes are arched by a pair of bushy eyebrows, whose color, like his hair, is brown, with a tendency to become as gray as his eyes, and surmounted by a well-developed and intelligent-looking brow. His nose is prominent and slightly bulbous, and answers well to the twinkling eye as an evidence of a kindly and humorous disposition. There is that, however, in the shape of his mouth and the set of his chin which indicates an ability to have and to hold an opinion of his own. His hair is worn rather longer than is usual with his kind, a fashion which is probably owing to his notable poetic faculty and turn of mind. His nether garments for week-day wear are invariably of fustian, and generally bear evidence that he united the painter's craft with that which is more legitimately his own. Supply him with a sleeved waistcoat of some dark-colored cloth, and occasionally, if the weather is cold, with a sort of half-coat, half-jacket of the same material, with a low felt hat, never forgetting the indispensable white apron, sign and token of his profession, and you have a true portrait of honest, genial, quaint, poetic Simon Holmes.

Simon and his wife Rebecca—a stirring, comely, motherly body, whose stout figure was invested in a calico gown, and whose whitening hair was smoothly imprisoned in a white muslin cap with a double frill for either cheek—had just finished their morning meal, and Simon was about to return to his duties at the bench, when Sir Godwin Spofforth rode up to the garden gate. "Hallo, there, Simon!" shouted he, and the carpenter let down his white apron, which had been folded round his waist during breakfast, and made haste to receive the baronet's commands.

"Good-mornin', Sir Godwin," said the carpenter, touching his hat, "I've hopin' Miss Spofforth is better this mornin'?"

"I would to Heaven she were, Simon," replied the baronet, and there was that in his tone which told clearly enough how deeply he felt and how much he feared.

The face of the sympathetic Simon clouded over in a moment, as he said in a lower tone, "I do hope that the young lady isn't any woss."

"I fear she is, Simon, I—greatly—fear—she is." There was a quaking in the speaker's voice and a quiver about his lips which told that his soul was being stirred to its inmost depths. "The physician from London is coming again to-day," said the baronet, "and Ethel says that she would like to see you before he arrives."

"I'll be at the Towers directly," said the carpenter, "but, excuse my freedom, Sir Godwin. You hev a big load o' your own to carry. There's scarce a soul i' Aspendale 'at wouldn't help yo' to carry it if they could. We can't, Sir Godwin, but there's One that can. I couldn't help thinkin' o' you when I was readin' this mornin's psalm, 'Cast thy burden on the Lord.' It's wonderful easy when you're used to it."

"I dare say it is, Simon, I dare say it is," said the baronet, in a tone which showed that, however easy it might become, it was to him an unfamiliar doctrine now. "Come as soon as you can," he continued, and so saying he turned his horse around and pursued his morning ride.

Simon Holmes paced the garden-path in silence, but in his heart he said, "God help her, and God help him!" Simon's aspirations of that kind generally gained a hearing, and not seldom an evident answer from Him whom the godly carpenter had long been accustomed to call "a prayer-hearin' an' a prayer-answerin' God."

"Rebecca, my lass," said Simon to his wife, "the big shadow up at the Hall is settlin' doon, ah fancy, thick an' dark. Sir Godwin, poor man, 's in a parlous state o' mind. Miss Ethel's sent for me, so I'm goin' directly."

"Aye, go your ways, Simon," replied Rebecca, feelingly. "I doot the poor gell isn't long for this world. She's ower good for it, I'm thinkin'. I do pity Sir Godwin, his 'art's fair wrapped up in her. He looks a'most as pale as a ghost."

"Hey, poor man," said the carpenter, "he's well-nigh brokken-hearted, an' the worst on't is, he hezn't a grip on Him 'at can mend it. But, 'Becca, somehow or another, I niver feel as though Miss Ethel won't pull through. Nothin's ower hard for the Lord. Mortal man soon comes to the end of his tether; but wi' Him it's different. Who knows but—"

"Hey, hey, Simon. Bless your hopeful heart! you could always pictur' things bright anuff, an' I don't say 'at it isn't best, but you kno—"

"But, but! bother the 'buts,' Becky," interposed Simon, cheerily. "I wish the wud wasn't i' the dictionary. 'Buts' 'll niuver mak' butter hoo ivver hard yo' chon'em. The promises o' God hev a way o' knockin' 'em on the head, one doon an' t'other come on."

The honest dame smiled as usual at the ready answer of her warm-hearted and sanguine spouse, and proceeded to prepare him his Sunday suit that he might be made sufficiently presentable to pass the imposing portals of Aspen Towers.

THE GREAT INVITATION.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 19, Rev. 22 : 8-21. Golden Text, ver. 17.

John's Guides in the Revelation—His Mistake—Repeated in These Days—The Vision Sealed—The Unwritten Thunder Words—The Angel's Solemn Words—The Irrevocable Choice—The Active and Passive Work—The Authority Given—Those who are Without—The Universal Invitation—Bride Souls—The Warning.

THE Apostle John in his old age, when he was almost more in heaven than on earth, saw the future of the Church and of the world wonderfully mapped out before him in the visions of this Book of Revelation. Sometimes he saw and heard in silence; sometimes one of the heavenly beings whom he saw came and spoke with him. Once it was one of the four and twenty elders (chap. 7 : 13), once it was "a mighty angel" (10 : 11 : 1-10), and lastly it was one of the seven angels which had the seven vials full of the seven last plagues (17 : 21 : 9). John writes : "And I, John, am he that heard and saw these things" (R. V.). The apostle saw so much of glory about the angel that he

of falling down to worship him. But the angel stopped him in a moment, and said, "See thou do it not; I am a fellow-servant with thee, and with thy brethren the prophets, and with them which keep the words of this book: worship God" (R. V.). There are numbers of God's children who in their hearts worship the teachers whom God uses as instruments to help them, and when they disclaim any merit and testify that God alone has done the work, these children of God say, in a tone of profound admiration, "Oh, but you are the instrument," and the Christian teacher is driven to deep humiliation before God that anything in him or in her has stayed the eye of His child one moment from Him. The work of God's witnesses is to show forth God's praises, not their own (1 Pet. 2 : 9), God's holiness, God's love, not theirs. Every thought which is concentrated on a Christian is one thought less for Jesus.

The angel had a message for the apostle : "Seal not up the words of the prophecy of this book; for

THE TIME IS AT HAND

(R. V.). When Daniel saw in vision much of the same future which was revealed to John, he was commanded : "But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end" (Dan. 12 : 4). John himself was commanded to "Seal up those things which the seven thunders uttered, and write them not" (Rev. 10 : 4). But now the time of the end, the last days, had begun. Paul, writing to the Corinthians, says that the things which happened to the fathers are "written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the ages are come" (1 Cor. 10 : 11). Again and again this dispensation is spoken of as the last time or times (James 5 : 3; 1 Pet. 1 : 5, 20; 11 Pet. 3 : 3; 1 John 2 : 18; Jude 18). If eighteen hundred years ago these things were imminent, how much more so now when the Jewish people is so wondrously upon the move that we see these times of the Gentiles drawing to a close (Luke 22 : 22, 24).

The angel spoke some very solemn words : "He that is unrighteous, let him do unrighteousness still; and he that is filthy, let him be made filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him do righteousness still; and he that is holy, let him be made holy still" (R. V.). "Let him do," "let him be made"—solemn words, the choice between God and sin, righteousness and unrighteousness, rests with every individual man, but, having chosen the way of life, he

CANNOT MAKE HIMSELF HOLY,
the hand of a Master Workman is upon him, by Him he is made holy, transformed into the image of Christ. And just so with the man who, in spite of the loving call of God, and with his eyes open, chooses unrighteousness—it is the hand of Satan upon him which transforms him into his own dark, hideous image; the longer he lives the more filthy he becomes; he is transformed from man to devil.

ANOTHER VOICE

than that of the angel now breaks in, and One whom John had long known says, "Behold, I come quickly." It is the second time the words occur in this short chapter. First, He says, "Behold, I come quickly: blessed is he that keepeth the saying of the prophecy of this book." All the Bible, all God's revelation leads up to the Coming of Jesus in glory. Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of it, the patriarchs, Moses, Balaam, the Psalmists and the prophets, the old types of the law and the teachings of the Gospel all point on to the time when Jesus shall come again and reign. Now, He says, "Behold, I come quickly; and My reward is with Me, to give every man according as his work shall be." The wrong things shall all be put right, justice shall prevail, and the truth conquer; He that searcheth the hearts and knoweth the thoughts of the children of men shall "give every man according as his work shall be."

To this as endorsing what He says He signs His name : "I am the Alpha and the Omega, the First and the Last, the Beginning and the End. Blessed are they that wash their robes, that they may have the authority over the tree of life and may enter in by the gates into the city" (R. V., marg.). From first to last, there is neither life nor cleansing but by the blood of Jesus. But His precious atonement gives the authority over the tree of life. It is a wondrous thought that blood-washed, blood-bought sinners have authority over the well-spring of eternal life! One can hardly conceive the possibility of such a thing, and yet God cannot exaggerate. Our first parents had the privilege of eating of any of the trees in the garden of Eden; they had authority over all, the tree of life included; but sin lost them Eden, and instead of having authority over life, they came under the authority of death. But "the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil." He destroyed "him that had the power of death, that is, the devil" (Heb. 2 : 14). He "abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light" (11 Tim. 1 : 10).

are the dogs, and the sorcerers, and the fornicators, and the murderers, and the idolaters, and every one that loveth and maketh (or doeth) a lie" (R. V.). A man who makes or loves a lie is ranked by the Proprietor of all things with fornicators, murderers, and adulterers. A man who eats food or wears clothing for which he is in debt is doing a lie, for that which he has not paid for does not belong to him. To put out an advertisement which misleads is to do a lie. To profess an experience which is not real is to say a lie. All these things are a lie, and those who do them are, in God's sight, as unclean as murderers and fornicators. The woman who walks about in other people's clothes (i.e., unpaid clothes) is, in God's sight, on a level with the poor harlot woman. The man or woman who attempts to push himself into society which is above him, and to pass for what he is not, is, in God's sight, one who loves and does a lie. God keep us from all which is not transparent as the light. Again, we have the signature of Jesus : "I, Jesus, have sent mine angel to testify unto you these things over the churches (R. V.). I am the Root and the Offspring of David." Root and offspring? How? Why. David sprang from Jesus, for "all things were made by Him," and yet Jesus, as Man, sprang from David. Oh, how blessed are the links of oneness between God and man! "And the bright and morning Star,"

THE HERALD OF THE DAY.

Now comes the last great universal invitation from our Saviour King. The Father has said, "Come" (Isa. 1 : 18; 55 : 1, 2); the Son has said, "Come" (Matt. 11 : 28; Luke 14 : 17), and now "the Spirit and the bride say, Come." The bride is the voice of the Spirit, the Spirit is the life of the bride, the Church. Christians whose life and words do not say, "Come to Jesus," are not filled with the Spirit; they are not bride souls. But it is not only the Church as a whole which says, "Come." "Let him that heareth"—every converted man, woman, and child—pass on the gracious invitation and say, "Come to Jesus!" If they did, would the world be in the state in which it is at this day?

But, thank God, He often deals with souls independently of the Church of Christ. "He that is athirst, let him come." "All the fitness He requireth is to know your need of Him!" "He that will, let him take the water of life freely." "He that will." Here is the main point. "The water of life," the Holy Spirit (John 7 : 39), was given when Jesus was glorified, and He waits to possess every one who will receive Him, and to fill him with Jesus. That which made a Paul, a Peter, a John, was no natural qualification, but the Holy Ghost possessing them and making them His temples, His mouth-pieces, His willing, glad, happy instruments of righteousness. He did not annihilate them, but subdued and cleansed them, conformed and united them to Jesus, and thus the very power and presence of God was with them, and may be thus filled, conformed, and blest. Jesus still speaks, and it is with a voice of warning to those who shall add to the words of the prophecy of this book. Surely, surely, those brethren and sisters who are led astray with the idea that they receive revelations from God which are over and above His Word, and who think they can be guided by Him quite independently of His Word, must come under the curse of "the plagues which are written in this book." And they who take away from the words, whether they be the Romanizing curates who try to take away the Bible from the people, or whether they be those who would cut off this and that portion and say these are not for this dispensation, God says to them that He will "take away their part from the tree of life, and out of the holy city, which are written in this book" (R. V.). Once again, the Master says, "Yea, I come quickly." John said, and I say, with all my heart, "Amen, come, Lord Jesus."

"HE THAT WILL"

UNSEEN, BUT NOT UNKNOWN.

By Rev. RAY PALMER, D. D.

JESUS, these eyes have never seen
That radiant form of Thine;
The veil of sense hangs dark between
Thy blessed face and mine.

I see Thee not, I hear Thee not,
Yet art Thou oft with me;
And earth hath ne'er so dear a spot,
As where I meet with Thee.

Like some bright dream that comes unsought
When slumbers o'er me roll,
Thine image ever fills my thought,
And charms my ravished soul.

Yet though I have not seen, and still Must rest in faith alone,
I love Thee, dearest Lord,—and will,
Unseen, but not Unknown.

When death these mortal eyes shall seal
And still this throbbing heart,
The rending veil shall Thee reveal,
All-glorious as Thou art.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER of Nova Scotia—Sir A. STUART of New South Wales—A Court in the Colonial and Indian Exhibition.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER, Ex-Premier of Nova Scotia.

OUR Canadian friends have a very high esteem for the distinguished statesman whose portrait appears on the first page. He has served the Dominion faithfully and with consummate ability, and the cordial feeling existing between himself and the people is honorable to both sides. It is right that a man who gives his time and labor to the public service, instead of devoting them to the acquisition of a private fortune, should know that the people appreciate the sacrifice and are grateful for it.

Sir Charles Tupper was born at Amherst, Nova Scotia, on July 2d, 1821. He is, therefore, now in his sixty-sixth year, but he appears to have lost none of his energy and capacity for work. He decided on following the profession of medicine, and to prepare himself for that career he studied in Edinburgh University, where he became a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, and afterward received the diploma of M.D. Returning to Canada he soon obtained distinction by his learning and skill, and when he was only forty-six years old he was honored by being made President of the Canadian Medical Association.

Prior to that time, however, he had won DISTINCTION IN POLITICAL AFFAIRS.

In 1855, at the age of thirty-four, he was elected by Cumberland, his native county, to represent it in the Nova Scotian Assembly, and was re-elected again and again until 1867, when confederation was carried out. He was then elected by the same county to the Canadian House of Commons, where he has continued to represent it. Sir Charles Tupper has not only proved his capacity as a legislator, but has shown remarkable administrative ability. In 1864 he became Prime Minister of Nova Scotia, and held the office until it was extinguished by the union in 1867. He was then made a member of the Privy Council, and was President of that body from 1870 to 1872. In the following year he took an important office in the Inland Revenue Department, and shortly afterward was made Minister of Customs. He has also held the offices of Minister of Works and Minister of Railways and Canals.

During his public career, Sir Charles Tupper has, at various times, acted in a diplomatic capacity, and the proved that in that difficult position he possessed eminent talents. The tact and sagacity necessary for a successful diplomatic career have been conspicuous in each of his missions, and have not only won him the admiration of his fellow-citizens at home, but commanded the respect of the London statesmen with whom he was brought into negotiations. The first mission of this kind was in 1858, and in 1865 he was again sent to England in the interest of his Province. The following year, when the final arrangements for confederation were being made, Sir Charles Tupper had charge of the affairs of Nova Scotia, and took part in the Conference in London which settled the new system of Government. It might have been that in the larger Government he would have sunk into insignificance, but in Sir Charles Tupper's case that was impossible. In 1868 he was sent by the Dominion Government as a delegate to England, and in 1884 so much confidence had the Government in his ability and fidelity that the responsible office of High Commissioner for Canada in London was conferred upon him.

The many proofs Sir Charles Tupper has received of the confidence of his fellow-citizens are doubtless those which he values most highly as the distinctions of a public career, but he has not been without those which Europeans covet in spite of the fact that they are bestowed so often on unworthy persons. In 1867 the Queen made him "Companion of the Bath," one of the orders of knighthood which serve as a cheap means of rewarding merit in monarchical countries. The bit of ribbon and the star, to be worn on the breast, and the addition of the letters "C.B." after the name, are a distinction which cost nothing to the Sovereign, and, so long as the recipient values them, the system of reward is mutually satisfactory. In 1879 a fresh mark of Royal favor was bestowed, and Sir Charles Tupper became "Knight Commander of the Most Distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George," and could write after his name K.C.M.G. This year he has been promoted another step in the same order, being advanced to the "Grand Cross" class, and is now dubbed G.C.M.G., which we may hope is gratifying to him.

During this year his duties have been rendered more onerous by the Colonial and Indian Exhibition, in which the Canadian Court has been very prominent, and the success of which is mainly due to his energy and indefatigable labor.

THE LATE SIR ALEXANDER STUART, Ex-Premier of New South Wales.

ANOTHER distinguished statesman belonging to the British Colonies was the ex-Premier of New South Wales, whose portrait also appears on the first page. He died suddenly on June 16th last. Sir Alexander Stuart was one of the most successful merchants in the Australian colony. He was a man of remarkable business capacity, unflinching integrity, and public-spirited devotion. Where the interests of his fellow-citizens were concerned he showed himself ready to sacrifice his valuable time, lay aside his commercial pursuits, and devote himself to the public needs of the hour.

Sir Alexander Stuart first attained prominence as manager of the Bank of New South Wales at Sydney. Subsequently he quitted that office to enter the mercantile firm of R. Towns & Company, of Sydney and Melbourne. He was elected in 1874, by the constituency of East Sydney, to the Legislative Assembly, and after nine years of efficient public service in that capacity he was chosen Premier. For a short period he also held the office of Colonial Treasurer.

The Colonial and Indian Exhibition was a matter of high importance to the colony. It enabled the producers and manufacturers to bring their products into public notice, and if well managed might exercise a potent influence on the future of the colony by opening up new markets and producing a demand for its goods. Sir Alexander Stuart recognized the value of the opportunity, and went to London himself to see that the interests of New South Wales were diligently cared for. He labored earnestly in the work, and happily lived to see its completion. It was in the full tide of success when he was seized with his fatal illness six months ago. He, too, like Sir Charles Tupper, enjoyed the privilege of stringing four letters after his name. The Queen was graciously pleased to reward his distinguished services by dubbing him K.C.M.G. This mark of Royal favor was conferred upon him nearly a year before he died.

THE INDIAN AND COLONIAL EXHIBITION.

A PICTURE and brief description of this exhibition appeared in this journal on May 20th, soon after its opening. This week we give a picture of the Central Indian Court, in the centre of which stands the famous columbarium, or pigeon-house, one of the finest specimens of carved wood in existence. It was sent from India to the exhibition by the Gaikwar of Baroda. Many such pigeon-houses, of rougher and plainer workmanship, and less elaborate in detail, are to be seen in hundreds of towns in India, where the birds are held sacred by the people, and are fed daily by men and women who come at early morning and lay their offerings of grain before the columbarium as an act of pious devotion.

The exhibition, which closed on November

20th, has been during the fall and summer a popular resort for the London public. From May 4th, when it was opened, until its closing day, over five million persons visited it, and inspected the articles of interest it contained.

The closing of the exhibition was celebrated by

to which a very large and distinguished circle of guests was invited. The menu, which had been specially arranged to illustrate the high-class character of the lake fish of Canada and the wines of Australia, included fish soup, white fish, masquallonge, pickerel, pike, lake trout, and herring, accompanied by the different brands of red and white wines from New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia. The several varieties of fish had been supplied from the Duck Island Fisheries and had all been frozen when fresh from the water out of which they had been taken some eighteen months ago.

The varieties of fish inhabiting the vast Canadian inland fisheries comprise, in addition to nearly all the fresh-water fish of Great Britain, several species unknown in that country. Most of them are exceedingly palatable, the white fish having a particularly delicate flavor. This latter variety is also declared to possess great nutritive qualities, and as its supply is practically unlimited it is eminently adapted for English consumption.

At the conclusion of the dinner Mr. Tallerman drew attention to the steady development of the wine industry of Australia. He evidently thought it a matter for congratulation, as, indeed, it would be if the wealth of the country were the only question involved. If he and those who listened to him, however, had taken a wider and higher view they might rather have expressed regret that the Australians did not devote their attention to some product less injurious to public morals. Mr. Tallerman said that the leading planters all over Australia had obtained their vine cuttings from the best vineyards of Europe, while the suitability of the soil and climate was unquestioned. The exhibition had caused a marked improvement in the colonial wine trade, the total area under cultivation in Australia being about twenty thousand acres, while the imports into Great Britain for the last ten months amounted to one hundred and thirty-seven thousand gallons, representing a money value of one hundred and sixty thousand dollars. This import came in about equal quantities from each of the three wine-producing colonies.

THE PRINCE AND THE LABORER.

As the project of the exhibition had originated with the Prince of Wales, who in the course of his Eastern travels appears to have been struck with the great work which might be done by disseminating through his mother's dominions greater information as to the unrivalled industries and the magnificent races therein contained, the close of the exhibition was properly made the occasion of the recognition of the service he had rendered to the country. A large number of workmen, representing the leading trade societies, accordingly paid him a visit at Sandringham, his country house. Among them were builders, carpenters, painters, bricklayers, iron-workers, compositors, bookbinders, shoemakers, tailors, and representatives of many other occupations. The party travelled to Sandringham by rail, and at the station it was met by a number of the carriages of the Prince of Wales and conveyed to the residence of the Prince, where the men were hospitably entertained to luncheon. After luncheon they were received in the ball-room by the Prince of Wales, and presented to the Princess of Wales and the Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud, who were attended by the ladies and gentlemen of the household.

The delegates then presented an address and resolutions, which conveyed the grateful thanks and high appreciation of the thousands of working people represented by the company, to his Royal Highness for the kind and thoughtful consideration which had induced him to pre-the educational and entertaining influence of the exhibition within the means of the very humblest classes of Her Majesty's subjects, and further expressed the conviction that the exhibition would have beneficial results in bringing into closer union the home country and its vast and immense dependencies in all parts of the world, to the ultimate benefit of every section of the community.

The deputation were then shown over the principal rooms of the house by the Prince, and were subsequently conducted to view the gardens, farm buildings, and cottages on the estate. Tea was provided in the Sandringham Working Men's Club before the party left for Wolferton to return to London.

THE BENEFIT OF THE EXHIBITION

appears to have been mutual. Not only have colonists had an opportunity of exhibiting their products in the metropolis of the empire to the other subjects of the British Crown, but the Englishmen who stay at home have been aroused into a higher appreciation of the value of the colonies by the exhibition. England is prouder of her children than she was. This is well for England, for latterly there has been a tendency to regard them as of little value, to snub them, and to encourage, rather than repress, estrangements tending to separation from the mother country. Now that the colonies have given practical proof of what they are and can do, they may hope for more respectful and, perhaps, more affectionate treatment than heretofore from British statesmen. Probably the statesmen knew before all that the exhibition has taught, but now the British people know it, too, which is an important matter; for a statesman who snubs a colony now will realize that if the consequences of his act should prove disastrous the people will hold him to strict account.

The people have obtained through their visit to the exhibition far more accurate intelligence, in a vastly more thorough manner, about the

of the remote parts of the Empire than they could procure even if they were to devote all their leisure to ransacking the British Museum, or attending every lecture at the Royal Geographical Society and the Royal Colonial Institute. The vast extent and varied character of the outlying portions of the Empire have been forcibly presented by the exhibits. There were coal and iron from Canada, New South Wales, and South Africa. India and South Africa competed with Australia as gold-producing countries. There were tin and copper from Australasia and Africa; timber from Canada, Australia, and the East and West Indies; wool from Australia and New Zealand, Canada and Africa, India and the South Seas; pearls and diamonds from Ceylon, Fiji, and Cape Colony. Canada, Australia, New Zealand, India exhibited their capacity to supply ample stores of every variety of grain. Meats and hides, furs and feathers, fruits and vegetables of all kinds, Canada, Australia, and the Cape offered in abundance. Tea and coffee, cocoa, sugar and spices, and other tropical and sub-tropical products were represented among the exhibits from British possessions in both the Old and the New World.

It would be well if this realization of the vast extent of the British Empire led the statesmen and people of Great Britain to reflection in the light of history. At present there are few ties holding this gigantic Empire together. Loyalty to the Crown is almost the only one left in some cases. It is easy to see how frail that tie may prove, and how quickly the process of disintegration, if once commenced, might spread. Already the fact has been recognized by the most far-seeing leaders in England, who are strenuously advocating a system of federation. But John Bull is afraid of "Americanizing" his institutions, and if his manner of dealing with the moderate demand of Ireland for self-government may be accepted as an indication, he is likely to turn a deaf ear to his wisest counsellors, who are urging him to keep his family united by a more enlightened system of fraternal relations.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Negro's Odd Opinion of Tracts.—At a recent meeting Mr. Langley remarked: "A man once got a tract given to him which was the means of bringing him to Christ, and this is what he quaintly said, 'I know now why they call these things tracts, for that one tracked me home, tracked me to my meals, tracked me to bed, and tracked me to my work next morning, never stopping tracking me till it tracked me to the Cross, and there it left me.'"

A Terrible Human Wreck.—The Same speaker observed: "There was a young merchant whom I knew in Glasgow, who got on exceedingly well in business. He was very diligent, and did great credit to his family. He married, and a number of so-called friends advised him to buy some saloons. At first he refused, knowing the great temptation to which he would be exposed; but he afterward unfortunately yielded. A few years passed, and the once sober, diligent man had become one of the most complete wrecks in the great Scotch city—a perfect slave to drink. I shall never forget his look as he said, in a sad and hopeless way, and the tears in his eyes: 'And my wife, I think she is a drunkard, too.'"

Found After Many Days.—Mr. Jack observed: "For the encouragement of open-air workers I will relate an incident which came to my knowledge this week at the death-bed of an old woman in our village. Years ago some Christian workers were proclaiming the glorious Gospel of our Lord in the open air. Quite away from the crowd which surrounded them this woman stood in the entry to the court leading to her own house, and heard all that was spoken. Very quietly she accepted the offer of salvation without speaking a word to any one, or even joining the crowd to help in singing, but simply going into her house she took Jesus with her, and began to live for Him. These Christians never heard of her conversion, but there it is—a proof that we are often blessed without knowing it ourselves."

The Devil Dethroned in a House.—The Same speaker observed: "I am told that the age of miracles is past. This statement I deny. One night a man entered a mission hall which I have in London. Previous to this night he lived for himself, and greedily indulged in the pleasures of sin. I need not enter into the details of this man's case, but I may just say he was changed by the grace of God in a moment—a new man in Christ Jesus. I went to his home with him that night, and there I found his poor wife and children in a state of wretchedness and misery, covering from the anticipated beating from a drunken husband and father. I knelt with them in prayer. They were led to Christ. Now, if you should come with me to Shepherd's Bush, in London, I could take you to a comfortable and happy home; this man and his family dwell there. Oh, what a change is in that household, for the peace of God reigns in it now!"

The Dying Thief.—"In Clerkenwell a preacher and his helpers sang the hymn: 'When the harvest is past.' At one of the windows sat a poor man in an arm-chair, looking very pale, who, before the meeting closed, sent for the preacher. 'Please, sir, sing that again to me, that part,

"When the holy have gone to the regions of peace."

That's where I want to go. Do you think that I can get there?' The preacher said he could. 'But you don't know the life I've led. You see, sir, I've been in prison thirty times, so I think I must be too bad for Christ.' So the preacher read to him the story of the crucifixion. 'That's what I want the Lord to do for me,' exclaimed the dying man, as the prayer of the dying thief was read. 'Thank you for coming out to preach and sing,' he said, as the preacher departed. 'The chaplain of the prison used to tell me of a Saviour's love, but I did not care for it then. But I want it now, for I do want to be saved.' At the next meeting the poor man was not at the window. So the preacher went into the house, and saw that he was fast sinking. Faintly he said: 'Sir, the mist is rolling away now. I can see Jesus. Do sing it to me.' So the visitor sang, 'When the mists have rolled away.' Then the dying man said: 'I could hear you all singing so plain to-night, "Crown Him Lord of all." Will you please pray?' The preacher prayed. Then the man said: 'Please raise my head,' and with one hand under his head, and the other in his, he passed away. Two of his mates were present. One of them said: 'Guv'nor, didn't he make a fine prayer?' and both wiped the tears from their eyes. One of them said: 'Now, sir, we want to lead a new life, and be honest, if you will send us to another country to make a fresh start.' So the preacher undertook the matter, and sent them over the sea with a prayer that they might begin a new life in a new land."

Anguish Changed into Happiness.—A Devoted Christian lady remarked: "One night in a meeting when I was speaking from the verse, 'When I see the blood I will pass over you,' a woman had come in and sat listening to every word, and as I finished, I said, 'Are any of you under the shelter of the blood of Jesus to-night, or are you outside in the cold among the tempest-tossed souls?' And there came a cry of anguish from the depths of this woman's heart, 'O Lord, I am not under the shelter of the blood. Thou canst not see the blood on me.' Some one spoke to her, and told her that Christ would sprinkle His blood on her, even now, if she were willing. She was willing, and cried, 'O Lord, do not leave me till Thou hast beheld the blood on me.' Her prayer was answered; and before she left the meeting she realized that Jesus had sprinkled His shed blood upon her guilty soul, and she entered into peace."

A Japanese Atheist Accepts Christ.—A worker speaking at an evangelistic meeting observed: "A young Japanese gentleman, a descendant of one of those who had been converted from idolatry to Roman Catholicism by the Jesuits, but whose forefathers had relapsed for these two or three generations into their former state of heathenism, was sent to Europe to be educated. There he went from the one extreme to the other, from a believer in many gods to a believer in no God; he became an atheist. Soon he returned to Japan, and had not been long there, when he was obliged to set out for America. The ship, in which he was, touched at a port in China, and while there was visited by a missionary, who gave the young gentleman a tract. As the voyage was long, and there was not much to amuse one, he read the tract, and from reading he went to thinking, and before he arrived in America he had given up all his former atheistical opinions and resolved to come out for Christ."

The Irishwoman and her Sticks.—A Friend remarked: "There was an old Irishwoman going along a country road carrying a heavy load of sticks. She was overtaken by a jaunting car on which were three young men, one of whom cried, 'Hello! mother, you have a heavy load there; get up on the car and we'll give you a lift.' The old woman thankfully got on the car, but still continued to hold the load on her back. One of the young men asked her why she still carried the load on her back when she could put it down on the car. 'Oh, no,' said she, 'it's good of you, real good of you to help me along the road, but I'm not going to let you carry my burden too.' Poor woman, she did not see that the car carried both her and her load, whether it was on her back or not. Some Christians are just the same as that woman; after having put themselves and all their troubles and cares on the Lord they insist on carrying them themselves; or if they put their big troubles on the Lord still they keep the little cares on their own shoulders, carrying the small end of the load themselves. Is not the Lord Omnipotent able and willing to bear all our burdens?"

THE PROUD INVALID.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"He was a leper."—II KINGS 5: 1.

HERE we have a warrior sick, not with pleurisy, or rheumatism, or consumptions, but with a disease worse than all these put together; a red mark has come out on the forehead, precursor of complete disfigurement and dissolution. I have something awful to tell you. General Naaman, the commander-in-chief of all the Syrian forces, has the leprosy! It is on his hands, on his face, on his entire person.

THE LEPROSY!

Get out of the way of the pestilence! If his breath strike you, you are a dead man. The commander-in-chief of all the forces of Syria! And yet he would be glad to exchange conditions with the boy at his stirrup, or the hostler that blankets his charger. The news goes like wildfire all through the realm, and the people are sympathetic, and they cry out, "Is it possible that our great hero who overthrew Ahab, and around whom we came with such vociferation when he returned from victorious battle—can it be possible that our grand and glorious Naaman has the leprosy?"

Yes. Everybody has something he wishes he had not—David, an Absalom to disgrace him; Paul, a thorn to sting him; Job, carbuncles to plague him; Samson, a Delilah to shear him; Ahab, a Naboth to deny him; Haman, a Mordecai to irritate him; George Washington, childlessness to afflict him; John Wesley, a termagant wife to pester him; Leah, weak eyes; Pope, a crooked back; Byron, a club foot; John Milton, blind eyes; Charles Lamb, an insane sister; and you, and you, and you, and you, something which you never bargained for, and would like to get rid of.

of this is, that God does not want this world to be too bright; otherwise, we would always want to stay, and eat these fruits, and lie on these lounges, and shake hands in this pleasant society. We are only in the vestibule of a grand temple. God does not want us to stay on the doorstep, and therefore He sends aches, and annoyances, and sorrows, and bereavements of all sorts to push us on, and push us up toward riper fruits, and brighter society, and more radiant prosperities. God is only whipping us ahead.

The reason that Edward Payson and Robert Hall had more rapturous views of heaven than other people had was because, through their aches and pains, God pushed them nearer up to it. If God dashes out one of your pictures, it is only to show you a brighter one. If He sting your foot with gout, your brain with neuralgia, your tongue with an inextinguishable thirst, it is only because He is preparing to substitute a better body than you ever dreamed of, when the mortal shall put on immortality. It is to push you on, and push you up toward something grander and better, that God sends upon you as He did upon General Naaman, something you do not want.

Seated in his Syrian mansion—all the walls glittering with the shields which he had captured in battle; the corridors crowded with admiring visitors who just wanted to see him once; music, and mirth, and banqueting filling all the mansion, from tessellated floor to pictured ceiling—Naaman would have forgotten that there was anything better, and would have been glad to stay there ten thousand years. But oh, how the shields dim, and how the visitors fly from the hall, and how the music drops dead from the string, and how the gates of the mansion slam shut with sepulchral bang, as you read the closing words of the eulogium: "He was a leper! He was a leper!"

There was one person more sympathetic with General Naaman than any other person.

NAAMAN'S WIFE

walks the floor, wringing her hands and trying to think what she can do to alleviate her husband's suffering. All remedies have failed. The surgeon-general and the doctors of the royal staff have met, and they have shaken their heads as much as to say, "No cure; no cure." I think that the office-seekers had all folded up their recommendations and gone home. Probably most of the employés of the establishment had dropped their work and were thinking of looking for some other situation. What shall now become of poor Naaman's wife? She must have sympathy somewhere. In her despair she goes to a little Hebrew captive, a servant-girl in her house, to whom she tells the whole story; as sometimes, when overborne with the sorrows of the world, and finding no sympathy anywhere else, you have gone out and found in the sympathy of some humble domestic—Rose, or Dinah, or Bridget—a help which the world could not give you.

WHAT A SCENE IT WAS!

One of the grandest women in all Syria in cabinet council with a waiting-maid over the declining health of the mighty general! "I know something," says the little captive maid, "I know something," as she bounds to her bare feet. "In the land from which I was stolen there is a certain prophet known by the name of Elisha, who can cure almost everything, and I shouldn't wonder if he could cure my master. Send for him right away." "Oh, hush!" you say. "If the highest medical talent in all the land cannot cure that leper, there is no need of your listening to any talk of a servant-girl." But do not scoff, do not sneer. The finger of that little captive maid is pointing in the right direction. Forgetting her own personal sorrows, she sympathizes with the suffering of her master and recommends him to the famous Hebrew prophet.

And how often it is that

has pointed grown persons in the right direction. Oh, Christian soul, how long is it since that you got rid of the leprosy of sin? You say, "Let me see. It must be five years now." "Five years. Who was it that pointed you to the Divine Physician?" "Oh," you say, "it was my little Annie, or Fred, or Charley, that clambered up on my knees and looked in my face, and asked me why I didn't become a Christian, and all the time stroking my cheek so I couldn't get angry, insisted upon knowing why I didn't have family prayers."

There are grandparents here who have been brought to Christ by their little grandchildren. There are many Christian mothers here who had their attention first called to Jesus by their little children. How did you get rid of the leprosy of sin? How did you find your way to the Divine Physician? "Oh," you say, "my child, my dying child, with wan and wasted finger pointed that way! Oh, I shall never forget," you say, "that scene at the cradle and the crib that awful night! It was hard, hard, very hard; but if that little one on its dying bed had not pointed me to Christ, I don't think I ever would have got rid of my leprosy." Go into the Sabbath-school this afternoon and you will find hundreds of little fingers pointing in the same direction, toward Jesus Christ and toward heaven.

Years ago the astronomers calculated that there must be a world hanging at a certain point in the heavens, and a large prize was offered for some one who could discover that world. The telescopes from the great observatories were pointed in vain; but a girl at Nantucket, Mass., fashioned a telescope and, looking through it, discovered that star, and won the prize and the admiration of all the astronomical world, that stood amazed at her genius. And so it is often the case that grown people cannot see the light, while some little child beholds

the star of hope, the star of consolation, the star of Bethlehem, the morning star of Jesus. "Not many mighty men, not many wise men are called; but God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the mighty; and base things and things that are not, to bring to naught things that are." Oh, do not despise the prattle of little children when they are speaking about God and Christ and heaven! You see the way your child is pointing; will you take that pointing or wait until, in the wrench of some awful bereavement, God shall lift that child to another world, and then it will beckon you upward? Will you take the pointing or will you wait for the beckoning? Blessed be God that the little Hebrew captive pointed in the right direction! Blessed be God for the saving ministry of Christian children!

No wonder the advice of this little Hebrew captive threw all Naaman's mansion and Ben-hadad's palace into excitement.

GOOD-BY, NAAMAN!

With face scarified and ridged and inflamed by the pestilence, and aided by those who supported him on either side, he staggers out to the chariot. Hold fast the fiery coursers of the royal stable while the poor sick man lifts his swollen feet and pain-struck limbs into the vehicle. Bolster him up with the pillows, and let him take a lingering look at his bright apartment, for perhaps the Hebrew captive may be mistaken, and the next time Naaman comes to that place he may be a dead weight on the shoulders of those who carry him—an expired chieftain seeking sepulture amid the lamentations of an admiring nation. Good-by, Naaman!

Let the charioteer drive gently over the hills of Hermon lest he jolt the invalid. Here goes the bravest man of all his day, a captive of a horrible disease. As the ambulance winds through the streets of Damascus the tears and prayers of all the people go after the world-renowned invalid. Perhaps you have had an invalid go out from your house on a health excursion. You know how the neighbors stood around and said, "Ah, he will never come back again alive!" Oh, it was

A SOLEMN MOMENT,

I tell you, when the invalid had departed, and you went into the room to make the bed, and to remove the medicine phials from the shelf, and to throw open the shutters so that the fresh air might rush into the long-closed room! Good-by, Naaman! There is only one cheerful face looking at him, and that is the face of the little Hebrew captive, who is sure he will get cured and who is so glad she helped him.

As the chariot winds out and the escort of mounted courtiers, and the mules laden with sacks of gold and silver and embroidered suits of apparel, went through the gates of Damascus and out on the long way, the hills of Naphtali and Ephraim look down on the procession, and the retinue goes right past the battle-fields where Naaman, in the days of his health, used to rally his troops for fearful onset; and then the procession stops and reclines awhile in the groves of olives and oleander, and General Naaman so sick—so very, very sick!

How the countrymen gaped as the procession passed! They had seen Naaman go past like a whirlwind in days gone by, and had stood aghast at the clank of his war-equipments; but now they commiserate him. They say, "Poor man, he will never get home alive! Poor man!" General Naaman wakes up from a restless sleep in the chariot, and he says to the charioteer, "How long before we shall reach this prophet Elisha's?" The charioteer says to a waysider, "How far is it to Elisha's house?" He says, "Two miles." "Two miles." Then they whip up the lathered and fagged-out horses. The whole procession brightens up at the prospect of speedy arrival. They drive up to the door of the prophet. The charioteers shout, "Whoa!" to the horses, and the tramping hoofs and grinding wheels cease shaking the earth.

COME OUT, ELISHA, come out, you have company; the grandest company that ever came to your house has come to it now. No stir inside Elisha's house. The fact was, the Lord had informed Elisha that the sick captain was coming and just how to treat him. Indeed, when you are sick and the Lord wants you to get well, He always tells the doctor how to treat you; and the reason we have so many bungling doctors is because they depend upon their own strength and instruction and not on the Lord God, and that always makes malpractice. Come out, Elisha, and attend to your business. General Naaman and his retinue waited and waited and waited. The fact was,

NAAMAN HAD TWO DISEASES—pride and leprosy; the one was as hard to get rid of as the other. Elisha sits quietly in his house and does not go out. After a while, when he thinks he has humbled this proud man, he says to a servant, "Go out and tell General Naaman to bathe seven times in the River Jordan, out yonder five miles, and he will get entirely well."

The message comes out. "What!" says the commander-in-chief of the Syrian forces, his eye kindling with an animation which it had not shown for weeks, and his swollen foot stamping on the bottom of the chariot, regardless of pain. "What! Isn't he coming out to see me? Why, I thought certainly he would come and utter some cabalistic words over me or make some enigmatical passes over my wounds. Why, I don't think he knows who I am. Isn't he coming out? I won't endure it any longer. Charioteer, drive on! Wash in the Jordan! Ha! ha! The slimy Jordan—the muddy Jordan—the monotonous Jordan. I wouldn't be seen by any one WASHING IN SUCH A RIVER as that. Why, we watered our horses in a better river than that on our way here. The beautiful river, the jasper-paved river of Pharpar. Besides that, we have in our country another Damascene river, Abana, with foliated bank and torrent ever swift and ever clear, under the flickering shadows of sycamore and oleander. Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel?"

I suppose Naaman felt very much as we would feel if, by way of medical prescription, some one should tell us to go and wash in the Danube or the Rhine. We would answer, "Are not the Connecticut or the Hudson just as good?" Or, as an Englishman would feel if he were told, by way of medical prescription, he must go and wash in the Mississippi or St. Lawrence. He would cry out, "Are not the Thames and the Mersey just as well?" The fact was that haughty Naaman needed to learn what every Englishman and every American needs to learn—that when God tells you to do a thing, you must go and do it, whether you understand the reason or not.

TAKE THE PRESCRIPTION, whether you like it or not. One thing is certain: Unless haughty Naaman does as Elisha commands him, he will die of his awful sickness. And unless you do as Christ commands you, you will be seized upon by an everlasting wasting away. Obey and live—disobey and die. Thrilling, over-arching, under-girding, stupendous alternative!

Well, General Naaman could not stand the test. The charioteer gives a jerk to the right line until the bit snaps in the horse's mouth, and the whirl of the wheels and the flying of the dust show the indignation of the great commander. "He turned and went away in a rage." So people now often get mad at religion. They vituperate against ministers, against churches, against Christian people. One would think from their irate behavior that God had been studying how to annoy and exasperate and demolish them. What has He been doing? Only trying to cure their death-dealing leprosy. That is all. Yet they whip up their horses, they dig in the spurs, and

THEY GO AWAY IN A RAGE.

So, after all, it seems that this health excursion of General Naaman is to be a dead failure. That little Hebrew captive might as well have not told him of the prophet, and this long journey might as well not have been taken. Poor sick, dying Naaman! are you going away in high dudgeon and worse than when you came? As his chariot halts a moment, his servants clamber up in it and coax him to do as Elisha said. They say, "It's easy. If the prophet had told you to walk for a mile on sharp spikes in order to get rid of this awful disease you would have done it. It is easy. Come, my lord, just get down and wash in the Jordan. You take a bath every day, anyhow, and in this climate it is so hot that it will do you good. Do it on our account, and for the sake of the army you command, and for the sake of the nation that admires you. Come, my lord, just

TRY THIS JORDANIC BATH."

"Well," he says, "to please you I will do as you say." The retinue drive to the brink of the Jordan. The horses paw and neigh to get into the stream themselves and cool their hot flanks. General Naaman, assisted by his attendants, gets down out of the chariot and painfully comes to the brink of the river, and steps in until the water comes to the ankle, and goes on deeper until the water comes to the girdle, and now standing so far down in the stream, just a little inclination of the head will thoroughly immerse him. He bows once into the flood, and comes up and shakes the water out of his nostrils and eyes; and his attendants look at him and say, "Why, general, how much better you look." And he bows a second time into the flood and comes up, and the wild stare is gone out of his eye. He bows the third time in the flood and comes up, and the shrivelled flesh has got smooth again. He bows the fourth time into the flood and comes up, and the hair that had fallen out is restored in thick locks again all over the brow. He bows the fifth time into the flood and comes up, and the hoarseness has gone out of his throat. He bows the sixth time and comes up, and all the soreness and anguish have gone out of the limbs. "Why," he says, "I am almost well, but I will make

and he bows the seventh time into the flood and he comes up, and not so much as a fester, or scale, or an eruption as big as the head of a pin is to be seen on him. He steps out on the bank and says, "Is it possible?" And the attendants look and say, "Is it possible?" And as, with the health of an athlete he bounds back into the chariot and drives on, there goes up from all his attendants a wild "Huzza! huzza!"

Of course, they go back to pay and thank the man of God for his counsel so fraught with wisdom. When they left the prophet's house they went off mad; they have come back glad. People always think better of a minister after they are converted than they do before conversion. Now we are to them an intolerable nuisance because we tell them to do things that go against the grain; but some of us have a great many letters from those who tell us that once they were angry at what we preached, but afterward gladly received the Gospel at our hands. They once called us fanatics, or terrorists, or enemies; now they call us friends. Yonder is a man—I speak a literal fact—who said that he would never come into the church again. He said that two years ago. He said, "My family shall never come here again if such doctrines as that are preached." But he came again, and his family came again. He is a Christian, his wife a Christian, all his children Christians, the whole household Christian, and I shall dwell with them in the house of the Lord forever. Our undying coadjutors are those who once heard the Gospel and "went away in a rage."

Now, my hearers, you notice that this General Naaman did two things in order to get well,

The first was—he got out of his chariot. He might have stayed there with his swollen feet on the stuffed ottoman, seated on that embroidered cushion, until his last gasp, he would never have got any relief. He had to get down out of his chariot. And you have got to get down out of

if you ever become a Christian. You cannot drive up to the cross with a coach-and-four, and be saved among all the spangles. You seem to think that the Lord is going to be complimented by your coming. Oh, no; you poor, miserable, scaly, leprous sinner, get down out of that! We all come in the same haughty way. We expect to ride into the kingdom of God. Never until we get down on our knees will we find mercy. The Lord has unhorsed us, uncharioted us. Get down out of your pride. Get down out of your self-righteousness and your hypercriticism. We have all got to do that. That is the journey we have got to make on our knees. It is our infernal pride that keeps us from getting rid of the leprosy of sin. Dear Lord, what have we to be proud of? Proud of our scales? Proud of our uncleanness? Proud of this killing infection? Bring us down at Thy feet, weeping, praying, penitent, believing supplicants!

"For sinners, Lord, Thou camest to bleed,
And I'm a sinner vile indeed;
Lord, I believe Thy grace is free,
Oh, magnify that grace in me."

But he had not only to get down out of his chariot.

HE HAD TO WASH.

"Oh," you say, "I am very careful of my ablutions. Every day I plunge into a bright and beautiful bath." Ah, my hearer, there is a flood brighter than any other. It is the flood that breaks from the granite of the eternal hills. It is the flood of pardon and peace and life and heaven. That flood started in the tears of Christ and the sweat of Gethsemane, and rolled on, accumulating flood, until all earth and heaven could bathe in it. Zechariah called it the "fountain open for sin and uncleanness." William Cowper called it the "fountain filled with blood." Your fathers and mothers washed all their sins and sorrows away in that fountain. Oh, my hearers, do you not to-day feel like wading into it? Wade down now into this glorious flood, deeper, deeper, deeper. Plunge once, twice, thrice, four times, five times, six times, seven times. It will take as much as that to cure your soul. Oh, wash, and be clean!

I suppose that was a great time at Damascus when General Naaman got back. The charioteers did not have to drive slowly any longer, lest they jolt the invalid; but as the horses dashed through the streets of Damascus, I think the people rushed out to hail back their chieftain. Naaman's wife hardly recognized her husband; he was so

she had to look at him two or three times before she made out that it was her restored husband. And the little captive maid, she rushed out, clapping her hands, and shouting, "Did he cure you? Did he cure you?" Then music woke up the palace, and the tapestry of the windows was drawn away, that the multitude outside might mingle with the princely mirth inside, and the feet went up and down in the dance, and all the streets of Damascus that night echoed and re-echoed with the news, "Naaman's cured! Naaman's cured!"

But a gladder tune than that it would be in all this place or wherever this sermon shall be read, if the soul should get cured of its leprosy. The swiftest white horse hitched to the King's chariot would rush the news into the Eternal City. Our loved ones before the throne would welcome the glad tidings. Your children on earth with more emotion than the little Hebrew captive would notice the change in your look, and the change in your manner, and would put their arms around your neck and say, "Mother, I guess you must have become a Christian. Father, I think you have got rid of the leprosy." O Lord God of Elisha, have mercy on us!

AN INVITATION FROM ZULUS.

THE Zulus of Southern Africa have not been well disposed toward the white missionaries since the unpleasantness with England. A letter from Mr. Wilder, of Umtwalumi, published in the Missionary Herald, shows, however, that God is moving them to seek the light. He writes:

"A new and urgent call for help has come from the Polela district of Natal. The mission formerly had a station within this district, Indunduma, a place some seventy miles north-west of Umtwalumi. The best chief in that region, Sakayedwa, has sent, both last year and this, an urgent request to his American friends to come up and reside with his tribe." Mr. Wilder gives the following history of the case:

"Our mission was the first, and for years the only, mission in all that district, covering a region thirty by fifty miles. For twelve years the Gospel has been preached to this tribe of Sakayedwa's, first by brother Pinkerton and since then by the native evangelist Kandakulu. My father, while exploring this district, contracted a disease which forced him to leave the mission work, and ultimately closed his life. Ira Nem-bula, after laboring in the district ten years, died last April.

"The chief, Sakayedwa, went from the Umtwalumi district twenty-five years ago. As a boy he was present at a service held at his father's kraal, conducted by the Rev. S. B. Stone and by my father. The meeting was called to pray for rain. The chief had paid two rain-doctors six head of cattle to bring rain, but no rain came. Before the missionaries reached home from their meeting they were caught in a rain-storm. The chief demanded the cattle to be returned, and since then those doctors have never attempted to make it rain.

"Last March this chief wrote me: 'Let the children come and rain in light on my dark eyes that I may see where my father did not see.' In my interview with him in May he said: 'Dumisa, my father, led me astray by giving me many wives; I do not wish my son to be looked upon by the white people as a fool, as they look upon me. I wish him to take but one wife. A long time have I been looking for the American missionaries.'"

A SCENE IN A GIRLS' MISSION SCHOOL.

IN the island of Madura, in the Indian Archipelago, is a boarding-school for girls. Miss Swift, who has it in charge, sends to the Missionary Herald a description of a remarkable scene she witnessed recently. She states that when she had been there a few months and had spent much time in prayer for each of the girls, she one day asked in the school how many were Christians; and requested all who were to rise. To her surprise every one, large and small, responded. Further questions elicited the fact that the girls claimed to be Christians on the ground that their parents professed the Christian faith. No special meetings were held, but Miss Swift labored earnestly with prayer to enlighten them and to convince them of the necessity of a change of heart. The result may be given in her own words. She writes:

"I was in my room on Monday evening at the hour when the school-girls have their evening prayers, when I heard an unmistakable sound of weeping. I went over and found nearly half the girls who were present upon their knees and so oblivious of everything that they did not know when I entered the room. Some of them were completely prostrate, and all were crying out that God would forgive their sins. I called Mr. Jones, who came, and with some difficulty quieted them enough to pray with them. I led away the more excited of them to a quiet place where I could talk to them one by one and learn what the source of their sorrow was. They all had but one reply to make, 'I am such a great sinner! How can I meet God?'"

"After talking with these girls until they were quieted, I went back and told them about the Word of God, which was the only foundation for our feet. I had them repeat a number of the promises for forgiveness, if we confess our sins, and the assurance of acceptance if we believe, and then asked who among them were ready to give now their hearts to the Lord, and to accept now the Saviour who was waiting to receive them. Nearly thirty girls rose to their feet. I knelt with them to offer their hearts and lives to God, and my prayer was followed by short prayers from nearly all present, expressing their penitence and their faith. That night there was much prayer and thanksgiving offered up by the whole mission."

Since that evening, now some ten weeks ago, over thirty girls have given evidence of a change of heart, and the good work is still going on. Its effects are seen by all. Miss Swift says that "the matron comes every little while to talk over the great change, and to say the peace and the order in the school make everything so much easier; that where it was difficult to rouse the girls at five o'clock they now wish to rise half an hour earlier, in order to have more time to sing and pray. The nature of their feelings is being tested in all these quiet, practical ways, and they are bearing the test well."

NEWS OF DR. SUMMERS.

MANY readers of this journal are acquainted with Dr. Summers, and many more have heard of him. They will be pleased to learn that Dr. Dowkontt, whose first student he was, has received tidings of him, which he publishes in his Medical Missionary Record. Dr. Summers wrote from Cetallo, in Central Africa, just as he was setting out to meet Bishop Taylor, with whom he is serving. He says:

"I can't tell you a tithe of the wonderful things God has been doing for me. I have now thirty-six carriers, goods, riding bull, and two sheep to bring to Lubuco, where I hope to arrive in three months, and perhaps meet the bishop there, whither he is journeying from another direction.

"I expect to settle in Cashilange for two or three years to study the language. I shall not be any burden to the mission, as I expect to earn my living, as I have done ever since I came to Loanda, eighteen months since (except thirty-eight cents). I have purchased my own outfit by what I have earned, and have nothing belonging to the mission but a shot-gun. The price of food at Melange is as follows: Rice, one cent a pound; oranges, twenty for three cents; bananas, ten to twenty for one cent; beef, three to five cents a pound; fowls, six to twelve cents each. A man can live here for fifty cents a week.

"A word for negro integrity. I paid all my carriers in advance some three months ahead. They went to their homes and I had some doubts about their 'turning up,' but with only two exceptions the thirty-six came.

"A curious combination was recently met with in my experience. A poor Portuguese died of fever. I had been called to attend him, and made a journey of three hours to do so, but on arriving there found he was dead. He was a Roman Catholic, but I took the funeral services. I was dressed in top boots, flannel shirt, large leather girdle with immense buckle, etc. I had as my assistant a well-known Jewish trader. "Had no books, but said as much of the burial service as I could remember, and then preached Christ as the resurrection and life. Every one seemed much interested. It was all new to them, for it was the first funeral service they had seen.

"During this year, in addition to other labors, I have treated two thousand cases, mostly, of course, negroes. And such patients! Women and men from the far interior.

"We had an epidemic of cholera, which disease killed many hundreds. It showed all the symptoms of cholera except extreme exhaustion. I appealed to the Government to erect a temporary hospital, but they did not do so. I then put up a tent some distance from my residence and cleared out all the cases from the native senzalas. The disease, however, went on spreading until I had to treat four hundred and fifty cases, but by God's blessing did not lose one, while the poor carriers between here and Dondo died by hundreds. I supplied the traders with medicine to treat cases on the road, as I could not certainly be everywhere. The native carriers, bringing rubber and wax, were completely decimated.

"I have myself had since my arrival here in February, 1885, about a dozen attacks of fever, one remittent, also pleurisy and heat-stroke, but am at present well."

The Two Divisions of the Wheat—Firstfruits and Harvest—The Levitical Law as to Firstfruits—Conversion Does Not Secure the Position—Watching and Prayer Required—Their Disappearance—Only a Handful—Their Occupation—Their Characteristics—An Interval Before the Harvest.

AS I have already shown, the vintage in this chapter represents the unsaved of Christendom. The Church is represented by the wheat, and this is divided into two portions: the Firstfruits and the Harvest. Let us consider first

THE FIRST-FRUITS.

Now, the idea of the division is, of course, taken from Old Testament times, in which the offering of first-fruits, of whatever kind, was to an Israelite one of the most solemn of duties. Indeed, he was not permitted to partake of anything until he had offered its firstfruits to God. "Thou shalt not delay to offer the first of thy ripe fruits" * was one of the earliest commandments. And among the few emphatic laws which God repeated when He consented to renew the covenant forfeited by the idolatry of the calf we read: "The first of the first-fruits of thy land thou shalt bring into the House of the Lord thy God." †

But the special reference in our passage is to the ceremony connected with the sheaf of firstfruits, of which we read in the twenty-third chapter of Leviticus (vs. 10-14). As we might infer from the fourteenth verse, Josephus tells us that, until the ceremony had been performed, no man might dare to lift up the sickle in his field, nor could any harvest-work be commenced. ‡

Thus the offering of the sheaf of firstfruits was the presentation to God of a few ears of corn, full and ripe, before the harvest was reaped. Now the Lord Jesus, in His parable of the Wheat and Tares, gives us to understand that the wheat-harvest symbolizes the gathering in of His people to Himself. Therefore, the first-fruits must stand for the assembly before Him of a comparatively small number, elected out of the Church previous to the ascent of the whole body, which is afterward typified by the Harvest. And, as we shall presently see, this passage, like many others, shows that the persons who are thus favored will be safe in the presence of the Lord before the outbreak of the last persecutions and the terrible woes of the end. Therefore with those who will be found obeying the command to watch and pray that they may be accounted worthy to escape the things that are coming to pass, and to stand before the Son of man. When John sees them they have obeyed to the end, and have received their reward; they appear lifted far above the earth before the hour of world-wide temptation has arrived, and standing with the Lamb—the best MSS. give the article—upon the heavenly Mount Zion.

Now, putting together the passages from which we have just been quoting, let us carefully observe that we cannot attain to the position of the First-fruits unless we get beyond simple faith in the Lord's atonement. That does, indeed—Praises to our God—bring salvation and eternal life; but here is something more. You must believe in Christ as the only propitiation for your sins if you would be gathered even with the Harvest; but to be numbered among the First-fruits, there is need also of watching and prayer that you may be accounted worthy. In other words, the latter privilege is one of the rewards of service-after-conversion.

* Ex. 22: 29. † Ex. 34: 26. ‡ Joseph. Antiq. ii. 10, 5.

This point is very beautifully brought out in the Old Testament. If you turn to the twenty-third chapter of Leviticus you will find descriptions of the Feasts of First-fruits and of Pentecost, which correspond to the First-fruits and Harvest of the chapter before us. In each of these Feasts there was one of those peculiar offerings—the sheaf in the one, and the two leavened loaves in the other—which could not be burned upon the altar, but were only waved before it, and then accepted for the sake of a sacrifice which was at the same time ascending in smoke toward heaven. And you will have little difficulty in recognizing such offerings as a type of the acceptance of the Lord's people for the sake of the great Sacrifice which has been once offered for sin.

Observe, then, the difference between the

on these two occasions; for it is of momentous importance. In the eighteenth and nineteenth verses you will see that at the Harvest Festival of Pentecost sacrifices were offered which typified the whole round of Christ's work for us, from atonement to perfect sanctification and reconciliation. On the other hand, as you will find from the twelfth verse, only a single sacrifice was commanded at the offering of the sheaf of first-fruits, and that was a he-lamb, without blemish and of the first year, for a Burnt Offering, together with its proper meat and drink offerings.

Now, the Burnt Sacrifice, at least from the time of Moses, was a sweet savor offering; and its prominent idea is the whole-hearted devotion of the Lord Jesus, even unto death, presented to His Father on our behalf. In the case, then, of the First-fruits, there is no question of atonement, but only of service. This, however, is not because those who will make up their number will not require the propitiation of the ever-blessed Saviour. Oh, no! it is because you cannot so much as enter the lists for that prize until it has been certainly settled that He loves you, and has loosed you from your sins by His blood. Those who obtain it will be suddenly and without notice translated from earth to heaven, even as Enoch was. And will be a sign that the third period of Daniel, the time which John describes as "hereafter," or "after these things," has commenced.

As we before remarked, the Mount Zion upon which these 144,000 stand is in heaven, and not upon earth. For they are said to have been redeemed from the earth, and, therefore, cannot be still upon it; the sound of their harps comes from heaven, and they sing their song "before the Throne, and before the Four Living Creatures and the Elders."

They are 144,000 in number, but are in no wise to be identified with that other and Israelitish band which John describes in the seventh chapter as being sealed upon earth in order that they may be uninjured by the impending judgments of God. The latter are the earthly people who, after the destruction of the antitype of Nebuchadnezzar's visionary image, shall take the place of "the Kings of the Earth upon the earth" (Isa. 24:21); the former are the heavenly saints who, under Christ, their King, shall reign as "the High Ones that are on high," after the expulsion of Satan and his angels from the Heavenly Places.

Does their number seem small? Well, the first-fruits from which the figure is taken were whereas many wagons, pressed down with sheaves, would be required for the bringing in of the harvest. And if we look around us, how many Christians do we see who are wholly surrendered to the service and good pleasure of their Lord? Are we so ourselves? Alas for the multitudes who, although they have praise of men, and are, perhaps, satisfied with themselves, would, if they were not spiritually deaf, be continually hearing those awful words: "I have not found thy works perfect before God!"

Those who stand with the Lamb are said to have His name and that of His Father—such is the best reading—written upon their foreheads. It is very important to notice this point in the description; for by it we may identify the First-fruits with the overcomers of the Philadelphia Church, as you will see if you turn to the third chapter of this Book and its twelfth verse; and what we know of the First-fruits will enable us to understand the promise given to the Philadelphians: "Because thou hast kept the word of My patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth." From the we perceive that they are no longer in captivity, but have taken down their harps from the willows. Glorious sounds are heard from heaven; they come from those who have known what it is to be well-nigh broken-hearted with trouble, ay, and broken-hearted with sin, too; but that is all past now. They have overcome by the blood of the Lamb, and the joyful time to inherit all things is present at last. They stand before the Throne; but they have no fear as Isaiah had; they do not cry, "Woe is me! for I am undone; for I am a man of unclean lips." No; they are conscious that they are clean every whit, within and without; they have more than imputed righteousness now. Christ has transformed them; they have become intrinsically holy; there is not a motion of sin within them, nor ever will be again; their very bodies are changed into the likeness of His body of glory. All this He has accomplished "according to the working whereby He is able even to subdue all things unto Himself." No wonder that they sing a new song—who could sing any of the old ones in such new and glorious circumstances? But its theme must be largely made up of redemption; for we are immediately afterward told that they had been bought, or purchased, out of the earth.

And now four of

are mentioned, of which, however, time will permit only a brief notice.

In the first place, they were not defiled with women; that is, perhaps, with Jezebel and her daughters. They had nothing to do with the idolatries and harlotries of the Woman who sits upon the Beast, with the false Church of sensual emotions and worldliness. They are "virgins"—a description which reminds us of Paul's desire to present the Corinthians as a chaste virgin to Christ, and, possibly, enables us to identify the First-fruits with the wise virgins of our Lord's parable.

Secondly, they "follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth." On earth they followed in the steps of His humiliation; they abode with Him in His temptations; they obeyed His commandments, thereby showing their love for Him. Now they reap what they have sown, and follow Him in glory forever.

Thirdly, they were "redeemed from among men, as a Firstfruits unto God and to the Lamb." God's plan for the redemption of mankind and the world seems to be working out its accomplishment in a series of elections. The whole Church is but a Firstfruits of creation; here we have a Firstfruits of only a small part of the Church, since the Harvest undoubtedly represents only those members of the Church who will be alive in the last days.

Finally, "in their mouth was found no lie; they are without blemish." In their case, then, the Lord has already fulfilled His Word, and has presented them unto Himself a glorious company, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, but holy, and without blemish.

The Firstfruits having been thus safely conveyed to their Lord, there occurs

AN INTERVAL

—probably of some six or seven years—before the reaping of the Harvest. The marvellous events with which it will be filled are, I believe, described in order in chaps. 6-11, while some details are added in chaps. 12, 13, and 17. During its lapse the rest of the Church, those who were not found watching, will have to remain upon earth and pass through bitter trial; then their time of deliverance will come, at the sound of the seventh and last trumpet.

Here, however, we are told no more of what will take place during the interval than we can gather from the proclamations of the three angels. Nevertheless, by comparing these utterances with other portions of the Apocalypse, we shall find that they contain allusions to the events which will most nearly concern such of the members of the Church as will be upon earth at the time.

But before we inquire what these events are, let me entreat you to dismiss every thought of that method of exposition which would resolve all the Apocalyptic visions into figures capable of a variety of explanations, according to the mind and taste of each interpreter. Except where manifest figures are set before us, these stupendous predictions, if we may learn from the experience of the first advent, are to be taken literally; they are the "things that must shortly come to pass."

Nearly the whole of the period of judgment, with which the greater part of the Apocalypse is concerned, will be characterized by supernatural interferences. The arm of God will be revealed, and His judgments will be manifestly abroad in the earth. Those Positivists, Evolutionists, and other infidel Scientists, who affirm that they are rejecting revelation at the bidding of truth, will have their theories torn to shreds before their eyes. Thus an opportunity of repentance will be afforded to them if they are really deluded; otherwise, before they are cast into the Abyss it will be made sufficiently clear that they propagated their corrupting doctrines, not through any love for truth, but because, to the bottom of their hearts, they were rebels against the supreme and absolute sovereignty of the God Who made them.

The fulfilment, then, of the Apocalypse will be supernatural; and if you still doubt this, glance for a moment at, perhaps, the earliest indication of

THE COMING TIME OF TERRORS.

You will find it in the tenth verse of the thirty-fourth chapter of Exodus. The children of Israel had, in their own strength, promised to keep the Law, and had then immediately broken their promise by the idolatry of the calf. God's anger was kindled, and, for a while, despite the entreaties of Moses, their life was hanging in doubt before them. But at length the Lord showed Himself gracious, and found a way by which He would in His own time completely reinstate them. "Behold," He said, "I make a covenant: before all thy people I will do marvels, such as have not been done in all the earth: and all the people among which thou art shall see the work of the Lord; for it is a terrible thing which I will do with thee."

Thus the great and final restoration of Israel cannot be accomplished until this verse has found its fulfilment. Now observe, that in declaring that He would yet do wonders such as had never been done in all the earth, nor in any nation, God was speaking just after He had made Himself glorious by the marvels of Egypt, by the dividing of the Red Sea, by the provision of food and water for His people in the desert, and, above all, by the appalling manifestation on Mount Sinai. Never since that time has He repeated such a group of wonders, much less surpassed it. His word is, therefore, still awaiting fulfilment.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Important Decision of the United States Supreme Court rendered last week settles a question which has long been a source of international dispute. The question was whether a person whose surrender by a foreign government under extradition proceedings is granted on one charge can be tried on a different charge after he has been brought within the jurisdiction of the United States. The court decides that he cannot until a reasonable time and opportunity have been given for his return to the country from whose asylum he has been taken. This decision is in accordance with the doctrine insisted upon by Great Britain and denied by our Government. The court was not unanimous, but its decision may be taken as final.

The President's Message Presents a Picture of national prosperity which is in startling contrast with the condition of almost every other nation on earth, and which ought to produce in every patriotic mind profound thankfulness to the Giver of all good things. In discharging his constitutional duty of imparting to Congress "information concerning the state of the Union," the President follows the usual custom of dealing first with the foreign relations of the Government. These are wholly peaceful. China is prepared, the President states, to meet us half way in arranging for a readjustment of the immigration question. The Chinese Government to impose restrictions on immigration, while we give guarantees for the safety of Chinese citizens who are here or may come. Of the embarrassing fishery disputes with Canada the President speaks hopefully. Although no settlement has yet been made, negotiations are still pending which may reach an "acceptable conclusion" before the close of the session. The Cutting episode, and the need of legislation to carry into effect the reciprocity treaty with Mexico, occupy a prominent place in the message. The President expresses the hope that the Mexican statute, under which Cutting was arrested, will be so modified, as to prevent any recurrence of the difficulty, and shows why it will be impossible to recognize the extraordinary claim put forward by Mexico of the right to deal with offences committed outside its borders. A proposal to present Liberia with a ship to enable the Government of that land to protect its coastwise revenue is suggested by the President, who, while distinctly admitting that a formal protectorate would be contrary to our traditional policy, reminds Congress that Liberia is an offshoot of our own system, and as such has claims on our assistance. These matters, with congratulation on the satisfactory termination of the difficulty with Spain over the tonnage duties, exhaust the subject of foreign complications. The fact is significant, and the peoples of Europe groaning under the burdens entailed by the constant danger of war may well envy the nation whose international disputes are so few and so trivial that an army of twenty-six thousand men and a navy of three iron ships suffice for the protection of its sixty million people.

The Reduction of the Financial Burdens of the people is the topic which will be of the greatest interest to the public in the message. On this subject the President's opinions cannot be mistaken. He tells Congress that "when more of the people's substance is exacted through the form of taxation than is necessary to meet the just obligations of the Government, and the expense of its economical administration, such exaction becomes ruthless extortion, and a violation of the fundamental principles of a free government." There are several ways in which relief may be given, and the selection rests with Congress; but Mr. Cleveland commends especially to its attention one class of the people having claims of much weight, The farmers, he believes, are entitled to the first attention in this matter. He says: "None labor harder or more continuously than they. No enactments limit their hours of toil, and no interposition of the Government enhances to any great extent the value of their products. And yet, for many of the necessities and comforts of life which the most scrupulous economy enables them to bring into their homes, and for their implements of husbandry, they are obliged to pay a price largely increased by an unnatural profit, which, by the action of the Government, is given to the more favored manufacturer." The farmers will doubtless make a note of this recognition of their claims, and if their representatives in Congress fail to adopt the President's suggestion they will know with whom the responsibility rests.

The Extension of the Free Delivery System mentioned in these columns some weeks ago as an event to be expected promises to be realized. On Thursday last the House passed a bill to extend the free delivery of all mails to every town having a population of ten thousand, or paying a gross revenue to the Post-Office Department of at least ten thousand dollars a year. It is believed that the bill will pass the Senate without difficulty. The measure, if enacted, will apply to one hundred and seventy-nine towns, and will cost the department four hundred and eleven thousand dollars a year.

A Remarkable Exhibition of Intolerance, or petty spite, as it would be called, if it occurred in private relations, came to light in New York last week. The funeral services of ex-Judge Alker, of the City Court, were advertised to take place in the Roman Catholic Cathedral, but when his friends went there to take part in them they were informed that the services would not be held there, but in a small church at some distance. Some curiosity was excited by the change of arrangements, and it has been discovered that the archbishop ordered it on account of Judge Alker's opposition to the iniquitous Freedom of Worship Bill. That bill was an attempt on the part of the Roman Catholic priesthood to gain control of the religious teaching in a public institution. It failed, and Judge Alker, though a Roman Catholic, contributed to its failure and continued his connection with the institution afterward. In consequence the archbishop closed the cathedral against his remains. Those persons who think that religious questions should not enter into politics will do well to note this fact. It was a punishment administered by a Roman Catholic prelate for a political offence. If a Roman Catholic's official action is to be controlled by the priests it is time that the people were made aware of the fact.

The Difficult Task of Forming a New Cabinet in France has been intrusted to M. Goblet, who is understood to be an ally of M. Clémenceau, the noted Radical leader. He was originally a protégé of Gambetta but afterward opposed him on important questions. He is fifty-eight years old, and has sat in the Chamber of Deputies since 1876. He was also a member of the National Convention of 1871. As neither the Radicals nor the Monarchists support him it is predicted that his lease of power will be short. A significant feature of the new Cabinet is the retention of General Boulanger in office as Minister of War. He is really the most prominent and capable man of the Cabinet, and his influence will probably be paramount. That fact is not encouraging to people who are hoping for peace, for General Boulanger's policy is decidedly warlike. He made it a condition of his entering the Cabinet that his colleagues would support his demand for a grant equivalent to sixty million dollars to be spent in arming the troops with the new repeating rifles. Another ominous circumstance is that President Grévy invited M. Floquet to accept the Premiership, but when it was found that the Czar of Russia did not approve of him, M. Floquet's acceptance became impossible. That indicates that the friendship of Russia is regarded in France as a vital matter. Germany will not be slow to note the fact and draw inferences.

The Curious Alliance Between a Section of the English Liberals and the Conservatives was cemented last week by a species of Convention. The Marquis of Hartington, supported by Lord Derby and other members of the aristocracy, convened a meeting of those members of Parliament who call themselves "Liberal Unionists," and their friends. Lord Hartington presided, and explained the object of the meeting, which was to organize the party. He thought the time too early to lay down a line of policy for the party in Parliament, but intimated in general terms that the duty of his followers would be to support the Conservative administration. This policy is rather a novel one for a Liberal leader to recommend, but Lord Hartington justified it on the ground that if the Conservatives were overthrown they would be replaced by Mr. Gladstone and his friends. He expressed the hope that the Conservatives would be willing to pay for liberal support by adopting some reforms. He said siege would be laid to the Gladstone position, which had not been taken by storm, and the Liberal Unionists would have to work until either they were defeated or they obtained a more decisive victory. Mr. John Bright did not attend, but sent a letter "deploring and condemning" Mr. Gladstone's policy.

The Rumor that Ireland Might Obtain some concessions from the Conservative Government is discredited by the speech Lord Salisbury made at a meeting on December 8th. He characterized the Home Rule project as "a cunning manipulation of municipal institutions," from which Ireland could get no relief. He diagnosed the malady of Ireland as "organized embezzlement," and said that the Irish were endeavoring "to keep other people's money in their own pockets." Lord Salisbury regretted their adopting this course, because they were destroying the confidence of man in man, which was the root and hope of prosperity of a nation, and the evil effect of which destruction generations could not remove. As to the remedy, the noble lord thought that it was to be found in "the strong arm of the law persistently applied." The Premier clearly lacks originality in his system of treatment. It is precisely because the strong arm of the law has been tried and has failed, that the Irish malady has become acute. The statesman who will have the glory of solving the Irish problem will be the man who devises a scheme that will, on the one hand give Irishmen the right to manage their own affairs, and on the other hand secure to England permanence of union.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal were received last week to the amount of $28. They were as follows: From Seward, Me., $9; Denbigh, Ont., $4; Berthoud, Col., $1; Rock City, Ill., $1; Omaha, Neb., $1; E. Cleveland, O., $2; Indiana, Pa., $10. The friends who have thus liberally responded to the appeal on behalf of the colored pastors may be assured that their money will do much good in aiding men who are working for Christ under many disadvantages.

The Revival at Tuscaloosa, Ala., Continues, and is spreading to neighboring cities. At Livingston special services are being held by Pastor Riley and the Rev. B. H. Crumpton, with many tokens of God's blessing. At Georgiana and Brewton a similar movement is reported under the preaching of the Rev. T. F. Thomasson. In our previous notice of this movement it was mentioned that the places of business in Tuscaloosa were closed daily at the time of holding the services, and that even the saloons were shut. It is now reported that one of the saloon-keepers has seen the evil of his business and expressed his willingness to quit it. The Prohibitionists promptly bought his stock of liquors and emptied them into the Warrior River. The university students have been active workers in the meetings.

The Evangelistic Services held by Mr. Charles Herald, at Pittston, Pa., have been much blessed. The Evening Gazette of that city says that never has such an awakening been known in that locality before. Mr. Herald has now gone on to Pleasant Valley, but the ministers at Pittston are continuing the meetings with the most encouraging results. The revival commenced with a visit from Mr. Moody on November 11th. He was followed by Messrs. Whittle and McGranahan, who closed on November 29th, and were succeeded by Mr. Herald.

The McAuley Mission in Water Street, New York, where the late Jerry McAuley commenced his labors, has been holding its fourteenth anniversary. Many old friends of the mission, including Mr. J. F. Shorey, its ex-superintendent, attended to take part in the celebration. Between the addresses songs were sung and several converts gave their testimonies of changed lives through the blessing of God on the services at the mission. The current expenses of the mission have been $3,392.54. It has received in gifts $1522, in collections $393.67, and by the legacy from the Morgan estate $5000. The record of work done shows that the usefulness of the mission continues and increases.

The Effect of Prohibition in Atlanta, Ga., is described by the mayor of that city as beneficial in every way. Since it was adopted, he says, the city "has peaceful streets and happy homes, with sober husbands, sons, and brothers, with plenty to eat and to wear, where before there were broken hearts, fear of domestic outrage, and sometimes actual want." He adds the cheering announcement, "The bar-room nuisance has gone out from Atlanta forever, and we would like the world to know it. Our people are practically united in the belief that the bar-room will never come back."

A Valuable and Much-Needed Work has been undertaken by the New York Bible and Fruit Mission. It is endeavoring to extend Christian aid and sympathy to friendless women and unprotected young girls, and has established a new department of protective work. Women desiring such aid, or wishing for cheap and respectable lodgings, are invited to make themselves known to Miss Etta I. Clark, the Protective Missionary of the New York Bible and Fruit Mission, 416 East Twenty-sixth Street, New York.

A Strange Scene at a Prize Fight in California is described in a press telegram from San Francisco. It states that at the "set to" between the American champion, John L. Sullivan, and "Steve" Taylor, at Los Angeles, on November 27th, Ben Hogan, the converted pugilist, presented himself among the fraternity of which he was once an honored member. He did not propose to take part in the exercises of the evening, but asked permission to pray and deliver an address. Sullivan good-humoredly gave his consent, and Hogan preached a short but earnest sermon, using the patois of the ring, with which he is familiar, and affectionately warning his hearers of the consequences of their ways, and bearing testimony for Christ. The crowd listened in respectful silence, and cheered him at the close, evidently realizing that the courage he had displayed was higher than that which had formerly characterized him in the ring.

An Amusing Illustration of the Absurdity of red tape management was furnished recently in Columbia College. A connecting door between recitation rooms in Hamilton Hall formerly used by the students has been closed. On November 23d, during the rain-storm, the classes protested against being forced to go out in the rain and called for the janitor to unlock the door. He pleaded that he had no power to do so, and advised that the president of the college be consulted. The president was obliged to confess that he was unable to order the door opened, but referred the students to the Chairman of the Trustees' Committee on Buildings. The juniors waited while a delegation went down to see the chairman. But he was also unable to assume the dread responsibility of the order, and he recommended that a formal petition be presented to the Faculty. After waiting while these applications were made the students submitted, and went out through the rain, but they afterward held a mass meeting and prepared their formal petition as suggested by the chairman. The students would not have made so many unavailing applications had they known who it was that had power to have the door opened. They would have gone right to that person. Christians in their difficulties are less sensible. They do know who has power to deliver them, but they often waste their time like the students in vain appeals elsewhere (Ps. 108: 12, 13).

An Offer to Purchase Social Recognition was made in a daily journal in New York recently. An advertisement appeared stating that "a gentleman of wealth and respectability would pay well for the introduction of himself and family into the higher circles of fashionable society." The advertisement was shown to a member of those circles, and he was asked whether such offers were common, and whether it was possible to secure introduction in that way. His reply was significant. He said that men become suddenly rich often tried to buy their way into society, and generally found some one ready for a consideration to act as sponsor for them; but the result was uniformly a failure. They found the coveted prize dust and ashes in their mouth, an intolerable burden, and society, after trying them for a time, rejected them, finding them unfit for it, and incapable of sharing its pleasures or appreciating its privileges. Though money might secure an entrance, something more than money was required to maintain a position in the highest society, and a poor man if well bred would succeed where a vulgar millionaire would fail. It would, therefore, appear that the advertiser is likely to waste his money through not understanding the essentials of social life. The same mistake is sometimes made as to the church: large gifts may secure recognition, but it is of no benefit to the unsanctified, and of the eternal privileges promised to the church, money cannot secure one (Acts 8: 20, 21).

The Mistake of an Undertaker's Assistant had a startling effect in a house of mourning recently. A dispatch to the New York Sun states that an undertaker was summoned at midnight to a house in which a lady had just died. He went immediately, taking with him a female assistant. On arriving at the house the undertaker sent the assistant to an upper chamber to prepare the corpse. Taking her box of bandages, sponges, etc., the assistant went, as she thought, to the room indicated, but instead she entered the room of a young lady, a member of the bereaved family, who had fallen sound asleep from exhaustion caused by her constant attention at the sick bed. The attendant had an old-fashioned tallow dip, which she set on the stand, and, depositing her box on the bed by the side of the sleeping lady, she began operations. Taking a soft sponge, she carefully washed the face, observing, what was not unusual, that the flesh was still warm. The young lady slept on, but when a fine-toothed comb was drawn through some tangled crimps of her hair she awoke with a suddenness that upset both the attendant and the box of implements. Both ladies gave a shriek, and the one seemed as much alarmed as the other. The noise brought the undertaker and the family to the room, and explanations were made. The lady's sleep must have been unusually deathlike or the undertaker's assistant could not have made the mistake. It is so when Satan's wiles cast the soul into slumber. Ministers and Christian workers often find the soul as unresponsive to their appeals as if it were dead (1 Cor. 11: 30).

Greased Air as an Illuminator is Recommended by a writer in the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette. He states that a machine has been perfected in that city for manufacturing gas absolutely without cost. The principle of the machine is a system of siphons, and air is forced alternately through water and through oil, resulting in gas. The tests made on the machine first finished resulted in getting 450,000 cubic feet of gas from a barrel of oil. As an illuminant it is said to be far superior to the gas manufactured under the ordinary process, and as a fuel it is vastly better than natural gas. Its heat is intense. A bar of lead was thrust into the blaze and immediately fell apart. From a pipe which is placed in the inventor's laboratory issues a blaze eight feet long that makes an intensely brilliant light. The most remarkable feature of the invention is that after so much gas has been obtained from the oil, the oil itself is worth as much as it was before. It does not deteriorate as coal does in the process of making ordinary gas, leaving nothing but coke as a residue. If this claim is established it will be from an economic standpoint, one of the most remarkable inventions of the day. To use a material without diminishing or depreciating it is a triumph of inventive genius. The principle, though hitherto unknown in mundane affairs, is familiar in spiritual things. The Christian knows that the grace by which his spiritual life is sustained increases as his demands upon it increase, and is inexhaustible (Eph. 4: 7, 13).

The Shock a Patient Received in a Physician's office recently is vividly described in a Boston journal. A judge was in the waiting-room of a great physician with other patients waiting his turn, when one of them, a stout, genial, middle-aged man, began talking to him. "It is ridiculous, my coming here," he said; "it is a mere trifle that will wear off by itself. But my wife would have me come—you know what women are. It is nothing but a peculiar feeling at the tip of my tongue—a kind of numbness." At that moment he was summoned to the physician's office. The conference was a long one. At last the door opened. The man came out. He was pale. His large face was covered with drops of sweat, as if he had received a mortal blow. He stopped and turned to the physician, saying, hoarsely, "Doctor, you're sure? There is nothing to be done—no operation—no—" "I know of nothing," said the physician gently. "No cure has as yet been discovered for your disease." "And—how long?" There was a moment's silence. "Not more than two months. Sit down. Let me bring you some water." "No, no." He hurried, staggering, to the door, muttering, "I have not time. I have so much to do. Only two months!" He died within the two months, but in the interval he worked incessantly to get his affairs in order. The time was so short, yet even that was a longer notice than many men receive. The fact is well known, but few use the time they have for the most important concerns (II Cor. 6: 2).

THE OFFERED DELIVERANCE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be delivered: for in mount Zion and in Jerusalem shall be deliverance, as the Lord hath said, and in the remnant whom the Lord shall call."—JOEL 2: 32.

The Doctrine of Eternal Punishment—An Impulse to Christian Earnestness—I. A Glorious Proclamation—Deliverance Offered—A Diamond of many Facets—The Offer Still Open to All—No Toll-Bars on the Road to Heaven—The Plain Man's Pathway—What Calling Means—Prayer and Confession—A Personal Message—A Word to a Careless Fellow—II. An Instructive Declaration—Only a Remnant Saved.

I THOUGHT within myself, "What shall be the topic for the last sermon before I depart to my quiet resting-place?" Peradventure my sermons for the last day of this long stretch of work may be my last altogether, for life is very frail. When I hear of first one and then another in strong health being suddenly taken away, I am made to know the uncertainty of life in my own case. So I said within myself, "Shall I feed the flock of God in the rich pastures of choice promise?" Truly it would have been well to have done so; but then I bethought me of must I not go after them? The ninety and nine are not in the wilderness, and, therefore I shall not be leaving them in any danger. But as for the wandering ones, can I leave them among the wilds and wolves? I have tried to bring them to the great Bishop and Shepherd of souls, but they have not yet returned; how can I forget them? How can I endure to think of their being lost forever?

So I thought I would go out once more after the lost ones hoping that the Lord would help me to find them, even now, and bring them to Himself! I earnestly ask your prayers that a very simple Gospel address may be blessed of God to the immediate conversion of those among us who have long halted, and are hesitating even unto this day. I could not have chosen for such a purpose a more suitable text; it is one of the broadest declarations of Gospel doctrine that could be found in Holy Scripture.

I shall handle it in the plainest manner. In a book of practical surgery you do not look for figures of speech; all is plain as a pike-staff; such will my sermon be. I hand out the bread of heaven, and you do not expect poetry from a bake-house.

Look at the connection of our text in Joel, and you will find that it is preceded by terrible warnings; the diamond is placed in a black setting, and its brilliance is thereby enhanced. As a lamp is all the more valued when the night is dark, so is the Gospel all the more precious when men see their misery without it. To remove from men's minds the salutary fear of punishment for sin is to draw up the flood-gates of iniquity. He who does this is

A TRAITOR TO SOCIETY.

If men are not warned of the anger of God against iniquity, they will take license to riot in evil.

Certain modern teachers pretend that they are so delicate that, if they believed in the scriptural doctrine of eternal punishment, they could never smile again. Poor sufferers! One is therefore led to suppose that they are persons of superior piety, who are so deeply in love with the souls of men that they weep over them day and night, and labor to bring them to repentance. We should expect to see in them a perpetual agony for the good of their fellows, since they judge themselves to be so qualified to instruct others in the art of compassion. But, my brethren we have not been able to discover in these sensitive persons any very hallowed sympathy with the ungodly; nay, we have heard of their having communion with the worldly in their sports rather than in their sorrow for sin. On the other hand, the seraphic evangelists who have journeyed around the earth to preach the Gospel, and have worn themselves down with evangelical earnestness, are, in all cases, men who feel the pressure of the wrath to come. These, though sneered at by the superfine delicates, have shown a tender love to which their judges are strangers.

My brethren, the love of Jesus did not prevent His warning men of future woe. He cried aloud, amid a flood of tears, "Oh, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together!" and He did not withhold the dreadful fact—"Your house is left unto you desolate." The knowledge of the coming destruction of the city aroused His sympathy; and He showed His pity, not by concealing the dreadful future, but by

of it. Preachers gradually get farther and farther from the Gospel, and its atoning sacrifice, in proportion as they delude themselves with the idea that, after all, sin is a small matter, and its punishment a questionable severity. Those also who look for a future opportunity for the impenitent may well consider it to be of small consequence whether men now believe in Jesus, or remain in unbelief. Such a taking of things easy cannot suggest itself to me, for I believe in everlasting punishment.

With that preface I come to the handling of my text, moved by a burning desire that God may bless it. First notice that it contains a glorious proclamation—"It shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be delivered." But this is accompanied with an instructive declaration, to which we shall give a measure of attention as time permits—"In Mount Zion and in Jerusalem shall be deliverance, as the Lord hath said, and in the remnant whom the Lord shall call."

I. Listen, first, to

THE GLORIOUS PROCLAMATION.

As we have no time to spare, we will proceed at once to our theme. The blessing proclaimed in our text is precious—"Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be delivered," or "shall be saved." Salvation is a diamond with many facets. You who dread the eternal consequences of iniquity will be glad to learn that there is salvation from the punishment of sin—complete and eternal salvation. This is no small matter to a soul crushed beneath a consciousness of guilt, and the certainty that the necessary consequences of sin must be overwhelming. Whatever may be the gloom of that bottomless abyss, into which the guilty shall sink forever, we are enabled to proclaim complete deliverance from that endless fall—salvation for every soul that believeth in Jesus Christ the Lord.

We also preach salvation from the power of sin. Sin finds a nest in the carnal nature, but it hides there as a thief; it shall not have dominion over you, for ye are not under law, but under grace. Oh, slaves, whose fetters clank in your ears, at this moment you may be free! Whether the bonds be those of drunkenness, or licentiousness, or worldliness, or despair, the prisoners. Jesus has come to break the manacles from your wrists, the fetters from your feet. "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved." Happy herald who has such a proclamation to make! The boon is incalculably precious.

Further, notice, in the next place, that the time of this proclamation is present; for Peter tells us that the time spoken of by the prophet Joel began at Pentecost. When the rushing, mighty wind was heard, and the flaming tongues sat upon the disciples' heads, then was the Gospel dispensation opened in all its freeness. The Holy Ghost, who then came down to earth, has never returned; He is still in the midst of the Church, not working physical wonders, but performing moral and spiritual miracles in our midst, even to this day. To-day, through His power, full remission is preached to every repenting sinner; to-day is complete salvation promised to every one that believeth in Jesus. This day the promise stands true; "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved."

I put aside as altogether unscriptural the notion that the day of grace is past for any man who will call upon the name of the Lord. If you will call, you shall be heard, be the day what it may; yea, though it wane to the eleventh hour. The day of grace is never past to any soul that lives, as long as it is willing to believe in Jesus. I am not told to go and say there is grace for men up to a certain point, and beyond that point there is none. I have my Master's order to preach the Gospel to every creature.

Next, notice that, as the boon is precious, and the time is present, so the range of this proclamation is promising. "Whosoever." There is in this word no fence, or ditch, or boundary line. You are out upon the open mountains of grace. In riding through Switzerland you will find gates put up here and there along the road, for no reason that I could see but to tax and worry travellers; many of the limits which are set to the Gospel proclamation answer no other purpose. Down with these

TOLL-BARS ON THE ROAD TO HEAVEN!

We cannot and dare not discourage any man from calling on the name of the Lord. "Whosoever" includes the slum people, even the poorest of the poor; but it does not exclude the carriage people, not even the richest of the rich. "Whosoever" beckons to the educated, and looks favorably upon the cultured and the refined; but none the less does it invite the illiterate, to whom all learning is an unattainable mystery.

Young men and maidens, whosoever offers its embrace to you! Good and bad, honorable or disreputable, this "whosoever" speaks to you all with equal truth! Kings and queens may find room in it; and so may thieves and beggars. Peers and paupers sit on one seat in this word. "Whosoever" has a special voice for you, my hearer! Do you answer, "But I am an oddity"? "Whosoever" includes all the oddities. I always have a warm side toward odd, eccentric, out-of-the-way people, because I am one myself, at least so I am often said to be. I am deeply thankful for this blessed text; for if I am a lot unmentioned in any other catalogue, I know that this includes me; I am beyond all question under the shade of "whosoever." No end of odd people come to the Tabernacle, or read my sermons; but they are all within the range of "whosoever."

"Alas!" cries one, "I am dreadfully desponding, I am too low-spirited to be intended by the promise of grace!" Are you? I do not believe it. "Whosoever" goes to the very depths of despair, and up to the heights of glory. "Alas!" murmurs another, "I am not sad enough on account of my sin. I am of too frivolous a nature!" Very likely, but "whosoever" includes you; if you call on the Lord, you shall be saved. I hope I have not diminished the range of the text; certainly I have not intended to do so.

Furthermore, the requirement is very plain. "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord." You do not need a library to explain to you how you can be saved. Here it is: "Call on the name of the Lord." This is to heaven." You will not need to go to the Sorbonne at Paris, nor to the University of Oxford, to be tutored in the art of finding salvation. Believe and live. Is not that plain enough? "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved." What does calling upon the name of the Lord mean? To call on the name of the Lord means, first, to believe in God as He reveals Himself in Scripture. His revelation of Himself is His "name." The pity of it is that the most of people in these days worship a god of their own invention. They do not make an image of clay, or of gold, but they construct a deity in their minds according to their own thoughts. They proudly judge as to what God ought to be, and they will not receive

God as He really is. What is this but a god-making as gross as that which is performed by the heathen? What can be more wicked than to attempt to imagine a better god than the one true and living God? As the deity of your fancy has no existence, I would not recommend you to trust in him. There is one living and true God, and that living God has revealed Himself in the two Books of the Old and New Testament. In these He is more clearly seen than in His works of creation or of providence. In this God you must trust; and if you trust Him, He will not deceive you.

To call on the name of the Lord also means to pray. That is the idea which naturally arises to the mind at the first sound of the word. You are lost in a wood. What are you to do? You are to

CALL FOR HELP.

"O God, hear my cry! Deliver me, for my trust is in Thee!" If I compare you to a wandering sheep, what can you do? You cannot find your way back to the fold; the brambles hold you fast, and tear your flesh. Well, you can bleat, and thus call for the Shepherd. Prayer, real, sincere, believing prayer will never fail. The Lord has said, "Call upon Me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver thee."

And when you have done this, then remember that to call upon the name of the Lord means also to confess that name. We read in the Old Testament: "Then began men to call upon the name of the Lord." Not that they then first prayed, but they then began to meet together avowedly to worship Jehovah. They came out from among men, and named the sacred name as that of their God and Lord; declaring that, whatever others did, they would serve Him. The Lord requires all saved ones to do this.

I will spend a minute or two in reminding you that, as the requirement is plain, so the assurance of blessing is positive. "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be delivered," or "saved." In this there are no provisos and peradventures. The text is not a bare hope, but a solemn assertion. If thou believest, poor soul, though thou art altogether a mass of sin, thou shalt be saved! Do you not see how sure it is? God, who cannot lie, pledges His word to you; risk your soul on it. Indeed, there is no risk. If you trust in the Lord God Almighty, He will save you as surely as He is God.

And now, to wind up as to the proclamation; remember that, although it is so far-reaching as to embrace a wide world of believers, yet it is to you at this hour. "Whosoever" includes yourself; and if you see it from the right angle, it peculiarly looks at you. You, calling upon God, shall be saved; you, even you! Friend, I do not know your name, nor do I need to know it; but I mean this word for you. You shall be saved if you call upon the name of the Lord. Despair itself can scarcely evade the comfort of this blessed text.

But perhaps you have not called upon the name of the Lord. Then begin at once. Cry, "Lord, have mercy upon me!" and cry after that sort immediately. If you have never prayed, pray now. May God the Holy Spirit lead you to call upon the name of the Lord at this exact moment, without waiting to go home, or to get into another room! Though you have never believed in the Lord Jesus before, believe in Him now. If this be the first breath of faith that you have ever breathed, the promise is as sure to you as it is to those of us who have known the Lord these forty years. "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved," is a word to a careless fellow who has never prayed in his life.

Oh, my hearer, the text speaks to you. How I wish I could get at you, and take you by the hand, and hold you till I had made you think! I remember when Mr. Richard Weaver preached at Park Street chapel, in his younger days, he came down from the pulpit, and ran over the pews to get at the people, that he might speak to them individually, and say, "you," and

"you," and "you." I am not nimble enough on my legs to do that, and I do not think I should try it if I were younger; but I wish I could, somehow or other, come to each one of you, and press home these glad tidings of great joy. You, my dear old friend, it means you! You, young woman, over there to the right, it means you! You, dear child, sitting with your grandmother, it means you! "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved." O Lord, bless this word to every unconverted person to whom it comes!

II. I could almost wish to close with this soft music, but I dare not maim a text. I will deal with the second part of it with exceeding brevity, but I dare not silence it altogether. The second portion of the text contains

AN INSTRUCTIVE DECLARATION.

"It shall come to pass that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be delivered." That was abundantly fulfilled at Pentecost, for on that day a great multitude believed, and were baptized, and were saved; thus, those who called on the name of the Lord were delivered.

Notice that the prophet says, "In Mount Zion and in Jerusalem shall be deliverance, as the Lord hath said." He promised deliverance, and He sent it according to His Word; if they would not have it, He sent it as He said, and their blood was on their own heads when they refused it. The Lord went to the full length of His mercy in sending salvation to those leaders of iniquity, who with wicked hands had crucified their own Messiah.

As a result of the Lord's goodness, a remnant was saved. Notice it, "and in the remnant whom the Lord shall call." A remnant did call upon the Lord and live. Those eleven that stood up at Pentecost, and bore witness to the resurrection, were all Jews; and those who met in the upper room, when the Holy Ghost came down, were Jews; this was the remnant. But the solemn thought is that it was only a remnant of God's favored people. Centuries of visitations, prophets, miracles; yet only a remnant saved! Poor Israel, poor Israel! Most favored for many an age, and yet brought to call upon the saving Lord! Many come from distant lands, and sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of God; but the children of the kingdom are cast out into outer darkness—all but a mere remnant.

To my mind it is most instructive to notice that even that remnant never called upon the name of the Lord until the Lord called upon them—"The remnant whom the Lord shall call." We all of us need a miracle of grace to make us perform the simple act of calling upon God. This was manifestly true in the case of Israel, for as a nation it rejected Jesus of Nazareth, and only a few were converted by the power of the Holy Ghost.

Oh you that are children of godly parents, you that habitually attend places of worship, you who sit in this house of prayer year after year—you are much in the same position as Israel of old! Yours are the outward privileges, will you reject the hopes which they set before you? My fear is lest you should get so accustomed to hearing the Gospel that you should think that mere hearing is enough. I tremble lest you should grow so habituated to the externals of religion that you should be dead to all the internal parts of it, and only a remnant of you should be saved. Oh, come, and receive the gift of free grace! Alas! I see men sunk in the darkness of unbelief, and only a remnant rising to the light of faith! Altogether, in this London, out of four or five millions, we have not half a million at worship at any one time! Out of that half million, how many do you think are real Christians? Truly, it is a remnant still. Oh, that you and I may be of that remnant!

Let us further pray the Lord to gather in the multitude, and so to accomplish speedily the number of His elect. Go forth, ye messengers of Christ, into all the world! Rise up, my brothers and sisters, from this service, and go forth, every one of you, to call in as many as you find; yea, to compel them to come in! May the Lord cause that in London, and in Britain, there may be deliverance; yea, may His salvation be made known unto the ends of the earth! Amen.

A LETTER FROM MR. SPURGEON.

To the Host of Friends who Read the Sermons.—My larger congregation consists of multitudes whom I have never seen. But I know full many of you from your kind letters of thanks, and from the large amount of help toward the Lord's work which you have sent me. Doubtless thousands of you are not even known to me in either of these ways, and yet you remember me in prayer when the Lord blesses the sermons to you. Accept my Christian love at this time, and permit me to ask a double interest in your prayers just now, when I am trying to take in fresh supplies for another year. The weekly sermons are continued, whether I am at home or not, for I have prepared several of my evening discourses for publication. I should be glad if you could use some little effort to increase the circulation of the weekly sermons. It is wonderful that they should have been issued regularly for thirty-two years; for sermons are not according to the literary taste of the many. The largeness of their acceptance leads me to hope that others might profit by them, if they were introduced to their notice. Those who cannot preach the Gospel themselves may yet do substantial service by placing in the hands of others a sermon which the Lord has already used for good. Please do me this kindness.

In any case, let us unite in earnest prayer for the spread of true religion in every place, and the overthrow of error in every form.

Your loving servant, for Christ's sake,
C. H. SPURGEON.

BETTY visited her father one day at his office, and on the way home he had to stop at the court-room. He took Betty with him, and there she saw a court for the first time.

That night she was cruel to her kitten, and her mother reproved her, and she went to bed very sorry that she had been bad and very sorry that she had caused her kitten pain.

During the night Betty dreamed that while she was playing with her doll and wooden horse a great gray cat came and told her she must go to court and be tried for hurting her kitten. She thought she went to court, and instead of men, the judge and jury and lawyers were all cats.

The judge, who was a great white cat with spectacles, took up his pen and said to the big gray cat, "Now, what have you got to say about this little girl?"

"She beat her kitten with a stick," said the gray cat.

"Did she have any cause?" asked the judge.

"Not the least," said the gray cat. "Her kitten is as good as any of our kittens, and will do only what is right if she has the patience to teach it."

"This is a very bad case," said the judge to the jury, "and we may have to send this girl to our prison. However, I will leave it for you to say what her punishment shall be."

Then all the cats who were acting as the jury began to mew at each other, and all the cats

Then all became quiet, and an old cat in the centre of the room stood up and said, "What say you, gentlemen of the jury, shall we scratch her eyes out or send her to prison?"

But before they answered Betty woke up and found it was all a horrid dream.

GENERAL CLINTON B. FISK.

(See Portrait.)

PROMINENT among the workers in the cause of temperance, and the evangelization of the masses, is the genial, popular gentleman whose portrait appears on this page. With a perseverance on which discouragements seem to have no power, and a courage undaunted by difficulties, he has labored in the front ranks of those who, in New York and the adjacent States have consecrated time and work to the effort to deliver the slaves of vice from their thralldom. He has not only worked himself, but has stood gallantly by the side of Jerry McAuley and other evangelists, encouraging them by cheering words and unostentatiously helping them when substantial aid was needed for their work.

General Fisk is fifty-eight years of age, having been born at York, N. Y., in the year 1828. In his boyhood the family removed to Michigan, and in that State General Fisk spent his youth and early manhood. He was successively merchant, miller, and banker there before removing to St. Louis, Mo., in 1859. At the outbreak of the war he entered the Union Army, and before the end of 1862 rose to the rank of brigadier-general. Since the war he has engaged in various railroad and insurance enterprises in New York State, and popular report has it that he has amassed a considerable fortune. In the political campaign of this fall he accepted the Prohibition nomination for the Governorship of New Jersey. He was unsuccessful, as was to be expected, but it was not an ignominious defeat. He polled 19,810 votes—a remarkable total in comparison with the 191 votes polled by Neal Dow in 1880 and the 6153 cast for St. John in 1884.

THE NATIVES OF UGANDA.

(See Illustration.)

A MELANCHOLY interest attaches to the sketch on this page of the group of African natives. The persons depicted are subjects of the King of Uganda, the savage king by whose orders Bishop Hannington was put to death. A glance at the bloated forms, and coarse, repulsive features, gives sad confirmation of the distressing details recorded by the martyred bishop in his diary. The heartless mockeries and the pitiless cruelty to which the good Christian missionary was subjected are just what such men and women might be expected to inflict on a helpless victim. The record of the last days of the bishop's life, which has so strangely found its way to his home on the first anniversary of his death, needs only this picture of the people to enable us to form a conception of that sad scene in the hut where the bishop lay sick, while around him stood his captors, taunting him before they led him out to execution.

Evidently his treatment by the King was extremely treacherous. The king invited him to remain as his guest for a few days, and the bishop complied. While taking a walk the bishop was attacked by about twenty natives. He struggled with his assailants, but became weak and faint, and was dragged violently a long distance by the legs. When his persecutors halted they stripped and robbed him, and imprisoned him in a noisome hut full of vermin and decaying bananas. He remained in bed during the following days, parties of the chief's wives, out of idle curiosity, coming daily to see him. On the seventh day he writes that the fever continued, that at night the place swarmed with vermin, that the guards were drunk and noisy, and that he was unable to sleep. At last he became delirious. On the eighth day, October 29th, he was conscious. His entries on this day are brief. "No news. A hyena howled all night, smelling a sick man. Hope he will not have me yet." This is the final entry. It is believed that shortly after writing this he was taken out and put to death. Throughout the week there are frequent entries referring to the comfort he derived from reading the Psalms.

CHARLES MARKHAM'S WEDDING-TRIP.

A WRITER, whose works are to be found in every home in America, ventures the opinion in one of his smaller volumes that it would be a good thing for many couples on their way to be married, if they could be stopped in time and brought back separately. There were many persons in Jacksonville who thought it would have been a good thing for Charles Markham and Mary Edson if that could have been done for them, but no one ventured to do it, because no one who thought so had the right to do it. Mary's father had a large family and a very small income, so that when the young bookbinder proposed for Mary, the father consented to their marriage.

It was not so good a match as Mr. Edson would have liked Mary to make, but Charles was a steady fellow, kind, and affectionate, and, on the whole, it might have been worse, so, while he was not jubilant about it, he was cordially acquiescent. There were persons who blamed him, and said that two children like those ought not to marry; but, as Charles was twenty-one and Mary was twenty-four, they could not be considered children in years. What the neighbors meant was that, in mental equipment and moral character they were children, and so they were. Careless, improvident, thoughtless, and self-indulgent, they were not fit for the responsibility of the marriage state. Charles fished nothing better than to get a day off from his work and go fishing, while Mary depended on her mother even for the mending of her stockings.

But they were in a hurry to get married, and so, as Charles had not the money to furnish a home, and was never likely to have by his own earning, it was settled that the young couple should live with Mary's parents. Mary's mother arranged and planned how the whole thing was to be done, but there was one detail that the young folks did fix for themselves and held to, in spite of opposition. They were determined to spend their honeymoon in New York. Neither Charles nor Mary had ever seen the big city, and the idea of spending a week there seemed to them both the most delightful prospect imaginable. It would cost a great deal of money, which they could ill afford to lose, but that consideration was little likely to weigh with two persons so unaccustomed to self-denial as they. Accordingly, immediately after the wedding, they set out for the Empire City to enjoy themselves.

It is not difficult for any visitor to New York no matter what his idea of enjoyment is, to find provision made for it. Unhappily, however, strangers are liable to be deceived as to the character of places of amusement. Plate-glass windows, expensive fittings, and a superabundance of brilliant lights are not pledges that the places so adorned are not the scene of deeds of darkness. The newly-married couple were just of the character most likely to be victimized, and on the first night of their visit they were about to enter one of the worst of those traps for the unwary. As they stood under the glare of the electric light, a clergyman saw them, and understood the situation at a glance. The country garb, the affectionate simplicity of the two, marked them out as victims, and the clergyman, in true Christian kindness, accosted them.

"Pardon me," he said, "but I think you are strangers here and may not know the character of this place. It is a dangerous place for innocent persons. Many have been ruined there for time and eternity."

"Thank you, dominie, for your good intentions," said Charles, lightly, but not without instinctive respect for the clergyman's calling, "but I guess we are able to take care of ourselves."

"You may be, but if you go in there you would need better protection than your own. I should have better hope of your safety if I heard that your confidence was in God and not in yourselves; but in that case you would not go in at all. Come with me and I will show you a place where you will not be dull, and where you may get good, too."

"We can go to prayer-meetings at home," Mary put in. "We want something more lively just now. Don't worry, we shall be all right."

"Yes, I'll take care of her, dominie," Charles added, "and myself, too. We only want to see a little life. It's very dull down where we live."

"You will see no life there, my dear fellow; it is death of the soul that you will see, and very often death of the body is seen there, too. Let me beg of you, as one who would be your friend, not to go in." The clergyman laid his hand tenderly on the young man's shoulder as he spoke, and added, "You know the wise man's advice, 'Enter not into the path of the wicked, and go not in the way of evil men.'"

Charles hesitated, but Mary had no fear. "Let's go and see what it is like," she said. "It's only for once, and we may never have the chance again. We can come out if it is so very bad."

The clergyman saw it was no use to plead against her, and sighing heavily he turned away in despair. "Here is my card," he said, "if you need a friend do not hesitate to call upon me. I shall be glad to serve you."

Charles took the card, and thanked him, but he disregarded the advice, and went in with his young wife. There was nothing so very dreadful to be seen. In fact the sight was one that by its magnificence delighted the country couple, unaccustomed as they were to such dazzling splendor. It was quiet, too. Few people were there, and an efficient band discoursed sweet and seductive music. The two seated themselves at a little table and a waiter presented them with the wine-list. It was a novel sensation, and Charles, having consulted his wife, ordered champagne, as being a drink of which both had heard much but had never tasted.

Before the bottle was exhausted the character of the scene had changed. Groups of hilarious men and gaudily-dressed women came in, and found unexpected pleasure in guying the country couple. Charles felt his head a little unsteady, but at the same time was conscious of stimulated courage, and an indisposition to submit patiently to ridicule. The wine, the music, and the glitter bewildered him, and Mary, too, was excited, and, as he saw, was wounded by the coarse jests levelled at her.

What actually occurred he did not know then and could not remember afterward. A confused recollection came to him the next morning of a scuffle, a desperate struggle, and a fall. The next morning when he recovered consciousness he was in a cell, the door of which was opened only to allow of his being conducted into court, to answer a charge of being "drunk and disorderly." He had nothing to say in defence, and he was fined ten dollars. It was then that he discovered the full extent of his calamity. His pockets were empty, and the pocket-book that contained the money to defray the expenses of the week's pleasure was gone. Ten days in prison seemed inevitable when the thought of the kind clergyman crossed his mind.

This was no time for false pride, and Charles was only too eager to have a friend. He sent for him, and the clergyman was quick to respond. It was not difficult to secure a remission of the fine on the clergyman's intercession, and with that and the loan of a sufficient sum to pay his passage home Charles quitted the court, glad to find his wife and start promptly on the journey. It was a humiliating end of the wedding-trip, but as things might have been so much worse the crestfallen couple were not sure whether congratulation would not be more appropriate than sympathy.

"I wish we had taken the dominie's advice, Mary," Charles said, as they travelled homeward.

It was a wish many a man has uttered in various circumstances. Happy they who do not have to utter it amid sighs and groans on a death-bed, when remorse is all that is possible, and repentance is beyond attainment.

THE FRIENDS AT ASPENDALE.

A SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

The Atheling Family.

WHILE Simon was pursuing a process of ablution before going to visit the sick lady, the door opened and admitted the rotund miller, Peter Prout, whitened even to the hair and eyebrows with the powdery tokens of his calling. "Mornin', Mrs. Holmes," said he, in a shrill and squeaking voice not at all in proportion to his size. "Is t' maister in?"

"Yes, he's in," said Rebecca, "but he's just gettin' tied up a bit. He hez to go up to the Hall."

"You don't say seca! What, then, is t' young lady woss? Ah's sorry to hear it. But there, rich fooaks ha' te feel t' rub o' t' grun'-stun as weel as poor fooaks. There's mair then them i' Thorpe Aspen 'at's gettin' t' han'le tonn'd pratty fast just noo. Ha' yo' heeard t' news?"

"No, what is it?" said Rebecca, who could not be expected to be without the attribute which is supposed to belong specially, though by no means peculiarly, to her sex.

"Why, they say," said the miller, "that young Alfred Atheling's run off wi' a big round bag o' guineas belangin' to 'is maister, an' 'at 'im an' young Spofforth's gone abroad to spend it."

"They say," said Simon Holmes, who had now come down-stairs and was putting on his boots as he sat on one of the lower steps—"They say 'is one o' the biggest liars i' all the country side, an' them that quotes him ower often gets tarred wi' the same brush."

"Lawk a massy, Simon! Ah didn't knoa 'at you were there," said the miller, taken aback by the warmth of the carpenter's remark. "Ah's nobbut tellin' yo' what ah've heeard."

"Oh, dear, poor Mrs. Atheling!" said tender-hearted Rebecca. "However will she bear it?"

"Why, badly aneeaf, you may be sure, poor creatur," said the miller, who looked rather pleased than otherwise. "I'll tell you what, Mrs. Holmes, it's my opinion 'at a yard or two o' Tyburn hemp weel twisted wad be about the best thing for 'im; an' accordin' te my opinion, he's likely te get it."

"I knoa o' something a't would suit him a good deal better," said Simon, rising to his feet and confronting the loose-tongued man of meal, "a good deal better, an' some other folks an' all."

"Why, what's that, Simon?" said the miller, in the tone of one who is deprecating a too-strong rejoinder.

"Why, the grace of God in the heart, Miller," said the carpenter. "Plenty o' that would keep him out o' mischief, an' put a bridle on talkative tongues 'at sadly want some reinin' up."

"Oh, dear me!" said Peter Prout, pulling out his big silver watch from his fob, "ah didn't knoa ah'd been here se lang. Ah mun be off noo."

The fact is that the watch had been brought out in readiness to cover his retreat, for the miller had expected a rebuke, for downright Simon was very awkward handling. Still he managed to give a kind of Parthian shot as he prudently retreated: "I say, Simon, you weean't forget them floorin' boards. Ah'll try to keep me-sen frey a broken neck while yo' cum back fre' 'The 'All.' Just tickle 'is memory up a bit, missis. Ah's frightened 'at 'The 'All' 'll be gettin' 'im altogether."

Hereupon the miller betook him to his cart, which had all the while been standing at the gate, and in which he now departed to make his daily round; to deliver sundry sacks of flour, "sharps," and barley meal, and to gather grain to feed his mill-stones and his pouch. It is much to be feared that Dobbin received more than her usual share of whip, having in that respect to stand proxy for Simon Holmes, the carpenter.

Before we follow Simon Holmes on his errand to Aspen Towers, we must turn aside a while and look in upon the shadowed household of Aspen Garth, upon the widow with the silver hair who sits in the "night," rocking herself in sad silence by the old-fashioned ingle-nook. Widow Atheling's weeds of widowhood have only been very lately donned, and the sorrow of that great loss still sat heavy on her soul. What manner of man her husband was will be discovered by the necessary mention of a solemn and important incident that occurred as he lay upon his death-bed.

"My poor lad! My poor wandering lad! Robert, my son, promise me that you will never give up all hope of him, never give up joining with your mother in prayer for him, never grow tired of seeking him, never rest content until Alfred, your brother Alfred, comes home again to Thorpe Aspen, and to his father's God and Saviour."

These words, earnest words, were spoken by Farmer Atheling, as he lay back upon the pillow from which his good gray head will never more be lifted, except for his removal to his final resting-place beneath the spreading yew-trees in Thorpe Aspen churchyard, the sacred spot in which many generations of Athelings were laid asleep. By the bedside of the dying man was seated his eldest son, a fine-featured, stalwart young yeoman, of some six or seven and twenty years of age, whose fingers were held lovingly in the hand of his beloved and dying parent. The young man's grief at his impending loss was not to be measured by words; and as he sat watching and listening in that solemn midnight hour, his strong frame trembled, and his heart beat strong and quickly with suppressed emotion. Robert Atheling's love and devotion to both his parents amounted to a pious passion, and it may well be said that both they and he were worthy of the strong, absorbing love that bound their hearts in one. Through all the parish of Thorpe Aspen, through all Aspendale, and even in regions beyond, Robert's tender attention, his assiduous care, his loyal service and self-sacrifice on their behalf were known and honored.

It may well be understood, therefore, that the young man's heart was sore, and that his very soul was sad and sorrowful as he sat by this death-bed, and watched his honored father slowly gliding out of life before his eyes. Every line in that noble face, every gray hair above those pale brows was dear to him; so he sat, making strong effort to swallow down the choking in his throat, and for a few moments he made his father no reply. The old man pressed his hand more firmly, fixed his dimming eyes upon him more eagerly, and with all the energy of his failing powers, said, "Robert, my son! My dear, good, faithful son! Will you promise?"

Recalled to a full conviction of all that his father's words implied, for latterly Alfred had dropped entirely out of sight and hearing of home and friends, Robert placed his other hand on that of his aged sire, and said earnestly and solemnly, "Yes, dear father, I promise. I will never give up uniting my prayers with my mother's on his behalf; I will never give up hoping for him; I will never grow tired of seeking him; I will never rest contented until Alfred comes home again to Thorpe Aspen, and to his father's God."

"God bless thee, my son!" said the old man, with a smile on his face and a light in his eyes which more than half repaid the young man for his solemn vow, "the God of thy fathers bless thee! Now, Robert, I can die content. We shall meet again, an unbroken family in heaven. As for thee, my son, thine shall be the best of blessings from the hand of God: 'The Lord bless thee, and keep thee; the Lord make His face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace!' And, Robert, my son, He will!"

The young man felt that then and there a benediction had fallen on him; that then and there his father's words had received the sanction of his God. This interview had been held in private at his father's own request. The rest of the family were now admitted, the weeping mother, soon to be a widow, two sorrowing daughters, and a younger son, worthy scions of a noble stock—the whole family, except, alas! that young, misguided brother whose sad lapse from the path of virtue was the only thorn in his father's pillow as he was lying there upon the bed of death.

Each of them in turn received a loving word, a farewell kiss, a final benediction, and then after a little while came the end. It was a peaceful end; the death of the righteous always is; it is the fitting finish of a godly life. It was a calm sunset, and the western sky was bright with the golden light of a "sure and certain hope;" and then, on this side, night; on the other, morning!

"After the middle watches,
As they softly near him trod,
His soul from its prison fetters,
Was loosed by the hand of God.

"One moment his pale lips trembled
With the triumph he might not tell,
As the sight of the life immortal
On the spirit's vision fell.

"Then the look of rapture faded,
And the beautiful smile was faint,
As that in some ancient picture
On the face of a dying saint.

"And they felt, in the lonesome midnight,
As they sat by the silent dead,
What a light on the pathway of others
The feet of the righteous shed.

"And they thought how with faith unshrinking
He came to the Jordan's tide,
And taking the hand of the Saviour
Went up on the heavenly side."

As soon as opportunity served him Robert Atheling went into his chamber, not to weep there, like Joseph of old, but again to register the serious promise he had made to his dying father, and on his knees to seek for strength and guidance for the fulfilment of that fraternal mission to which he had just set solemn seal. In due time the tombstone beneath the yew-trees covered another tenant, and on it was inscribed, together with a truthful record of his virtues, another name, the name of Edward Atheling, whose memory is held in special honor in Thorpe Aspen to this day. Standing by that grave, Robert Atheling shed many a tributary tear. Then he turned away to pursue his double mission in life—to sustain and comfort his widowed mother, and to win back the wandering prodigal to his mother's home, and to both his mother's and his father's God.

During those first thick-shadowed days that followed after the funeral of Farmer Atheling, the old carpenter, Simon Holmes, was often at Aspen Garth, where his visits were warmly welcomed and much esteemed. He was a genuine "son of consolation," Simon was, for he was learned in the higher lore, the knowledge and wisdom which comes by a devout study of the Book and by inner revelations from Him that wrote it, the knowledge and wisdom that grows and ripens in them who by experience can testify concerning the deep things of God.

Thorpe Aspen was not highly favored in the matter of true Christian teaching. The vicar of the parish was one of that ineffective and formal class, now fast dying out before the dawn of a better and brighter day, who fancied that their duties were rounded by the set performance of all the appointed ecclesiastical formalities in the church and out of it, and that a page or two from the Prayer-book was sufficient to satisfy all their parishioners' spiritual needs. Besides this, the good man was aged and infirm, so that even his superficial notions of the duties of his sacred office were almost as rarely put into practice by him as they were sought for by his parishioners.

The family at Aspen Garth, and that of Simon Holmes and one or two others, were in the habit of attending church on the morning of the Sabbath day, mainly from custom and from some respect to the vicar and Sir Godwin, for there was no great antipathy at Thorpe Aspen to the Church as an institution. In the afternoon, however, they generally repaired to the neighboring town of Chilworth, which was within easy distance, and where there was an evangelic minister who did provide for his hearers "the true bread that feeds the soul." Both at Aspen Garth and at Simon Holmes's humbler dwelling there was what Paul says of Philemon's—"The church that is in thine house," and thus the flames of true Christian light and life were kept burning, even in Thorpe Aspen's indifferent and apathetic air.

And so it came to pass that the godly carpenter was looked up to by many, and, sooth to say, was scoffed at by a few, as the spiritual adviser of the villagers, an unsought, though by no means irksome or unwelcome, vocation, for which Simon's high character, unassuming piety, and strong intelligence peculiarly fitted him. Even those who saw fit to sneer at him, to make a mock at his religion and to call him "praying Simon," or "Simon the psalmist," in allusion to his poetic proclivities, during their days of health and prosperity, were glad enough in the hour of sickness, death, or adversity to solicit the old carpenter's counsel and prayers, and got besides his kindly sympathy and ever-helpful hand.

"Good-evening, Simon," said Mrs. Atheling, as he crossed the threshold a day or two after they had committed Farmer Atheling to his last resting-place. "I'm glad to see you; glad always, kind neighbor, but most glad when, as now, my hearth is shadowed, and my heart is sad! Draw your chair to the fire; or stay, take the ingle-nook and my goodman's chair. He honored you while he lived, and he would be the first to say that you will honor it, now he's gone." The last words provoked, and not unnaturally, both a sigh and a tear.

"Thank yo'," said Simon, accepting the invitation. "There's something sad i' one's fost look at a vacant chair, an' one thinks 'at them 'at's gone 'il nivver sit there no more. But, I say, Mrs. Atheling, I think that isn't the thawt 'at comes either to you or me about him. Where is he sittin' noo? They don't mak' sitch seats doon here; no, indeed, nut for king's palaces."

A faint smile like a sunbeam flitted across the widow's face, flitted back again and sat there, as she replied, "You are right, Simon. It doesn't seem right, does it, to mourn that one who was so ripe for heaven has gone there, or that while he is praising God for taking him there, we should be complaining because he has not been left here? Oh, dear!" she continued with a sigh, "what a strange mixture life is!"

"Yes, that's true anuff. There's no denyin' it. But there's a vast difference i' life accordin' as it's mixed by us or for us. If we undertak' to mak' it up for ourselves, there's no wonder 'at it gets bad to tak', an' hez some awkward effects when it is ta'en. If it's mixed for us ivery day by the Good Physician, things is put into it in a right proportion, an' even when it's nut pleasant it's medicinal, an' the result is perfect health. That's just hoo it is wi' your husband, Mrs. Atheling. Doon here we're often squeamish an' sickly both i' body an' mind; an' at the best oor souls hev ague fits o' fear an' doot. Noo, Farmer Atheling is i' perfect health. He let the good Lord mix the cup of his life for him all the tahme, an' so to-day he stands up before his God as ruddy as David, as strong as Samson, as beautiful as Jesus, an' as his Saviour looks on him, He says, 'Thy faith hath made thee whole!' An' that's hoo you'll see him, Mrs. Atheling, when you see him again."

The widow had already conjured up in her mind, under Simon's stirring words, the picture of her departed treasure as he looked on the happy day of their espousals, and the smile brightened on her face still more as she thought of the coming hour when she should look on that dear face again. "Thank you, Simon," said she. "You've done my heart good. He shall not return to me, but I shall go to him."

"Nowt so sure, Mrs. Atheling. Nowt so sure, only let Him mix your cup. Don't try either to mak' or to meddle, or to question about the prescription or the like o' that. 'My Father's cup, shall I not drink it?' You know who said that; an' He's bound to work the same merracle of healin' upo' you; an' by the grace of God, I'll be there to give yo' both a warm hand-grip in the Land of Health!"

(To be continued.)

CASTING ALL YOUR CARE.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 26, Phil. 4: 4-7.

The Lord's Nearness a Fact—Often Unrealized—Christians Perplexed about Sanctification—Near at the Time of Surrender—What He Does—What Giving Implies—Christians Anxious about Unserved Loved Ones—About Business—Jesus not Beyond Call—Parental Anxieties—The Heart-Maker the Heart Educator—Anxieties about Christian Work—About Healing—The Unchangeable Jesus.

THE Lord is close by, "at hand," within touch; don't be anxious—"in nothing be anxious." How can we be anxious within sight of Jesus? "He careth for you," therefore cast all your care upon Him (1 Peter 5: 7). Yes; but where is He? How can I get at Him? "The Lord is at hand," close by. Not only at hand as to His second coming, but at hand to deliver, at hand to undertake, at hand to conquer, at hand to comfort. Therefore, "rejoice in the Lord always," in a near, present Jesus, "and again I say, Rejoice."

"Rejoice?" says a poor perplexed child of God, who has heard much of

and has sounded again and again the depths of his own heart to see if he can recognize it there. "Rejoice? when I cannot even be quite sure that I have rightly surrendered myself to God? Rejoice? why, my burden seems to be always on the increase. Again and again I have given myself over to God, and thought I was in earnest, and yet I have found no difference in myself, and at last I have given it up." Dear brother or sister, where was Jesus all the time? When you surrendered yourself to Him, what did He do? Were you so taken up with the giving up of yourself that you never gave Him credit for taking the gift you gave? In the giving of a gift there must be two parties concerned—the one who gives and the one who receives. If you did present your body a living sacrifice, if you did recognize that you were not your own, but bought with a price,

WHAT DID JESUS DO?

His own testimony of Himself is: "Him that cometh to Me, I will in no wise cast out" (John 6: 37). Did He break His word to you? Or was it that you were too busy with yourself to notice Him? He was at hand, close by, but unnoticed by you. Therefore, now, while you read this page, turn quickly to Him who is close by, tell Him you take Him at His word, you believe He receives the offering, and then the anxiety about your state will pass away out of your hands into His. He takes the care, the responsibility, the keeping of all which we drop into His hands. "But," you ask, "how do I know that I have rightly given myself over to Him?" Just as you know that you have given away any other gift—by the fact that the thing given has changed hands. If our precious Lord means what He says (and He surely does), then you have changed hands—have gone out of your own into His. He is close by; rejoice in Him that He has accepted you. How do you know that you have entered a railway carriage? From the fact that instead of hastening toward it, you are there, and are being borne along by a power not your own, and you can rest and cease from your own works.

"But," says another, "I must be anxious about the conversion of my unsaved relatives; how can I help being anxious?" Where is Jesus? Close by, or afar off? Has your anxiety brought one of those relatives to Christ yet? Has it not, rather, made them avoid you, and have not your constant appeals seemed only to harden them?

WHERE IS JESUS?

Is it of no importance to Him whether they are lost or saved? "Oh," you say, "I pray continually, by day and by night, for them, but I see little or no change." Where is Jesus? He calls you to cast all your care upon Him, even the care about the conversion of your friends; for in this, as in all else, "He careth for you." And you have been walking in the vain shadow of your own energy and anxiety, and disquieting yourself in vain (Ps. 39: 6). He who gave His very life-blood for those relatives is not gone away out of call; He is close by, waiting for you to trust them over to Him, and to cease from your anxiety. His Word is: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thine house" (Acts 16: 31); and to believe is to enter into rest about them, because Jesus, when trusted with them, makes their conversion His business.

"But what if they resist, what if they will not come?" Is it not that very consideration which has kept you so long wrestling in prayer, with your eye upon them all the time, and is it not that which is making you anxious now? But God says: "In nothing be anxious (therefore, in this be not anxious); but in everything by prayer, and supplication with thanksgiving (thanksgiving that there and then the Lord does take the matter in hand) let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall guard your hearts and your thoughts in Christ Jesus." Your hearts and your thoughts are not guarded in Christ Jesus while you are occupied about the resistance manifested by your dear ones. You are in heart making something impossible to God, and you are taking upon you that part of the transaction which can only be regulated between them and God. Does God want them saved? Is Jesus at hand to undertake it? Do you, when you pray, believe that you do receive their salvation, because God has promised it, and that without doubting in your heart? If so, you cannot longer have a shadow of anxiety about the matter, because it has passed into the hands of the living God, and Jesus is close by to hear you whisper again and again that you know it is safe with Him.

"But how can I help being

ANXIOUS ABOUT BUSINESS?

Why, things are as wrong as they can be. My partner has the chief power; I see unrighteous dealing and transactions which seem to me like gambling, but I have no more power than a common clerk, and I am bound by an obligation of honor to stay in the business." Some such cases are always turning up. But where is Jesus? Is He gone out of call? "The Lord is at hand (close by). In nothing be anxious." "But my conscience is involved." Yes; thank God it is so when there is unrighteousness going on; but your conscience cannot alter matters, but God can. Now, can you trust Jesus with business matters? Can you believe that He understands all the intricacies of business life, and that He can unravel the tangle which threatens to bind your very soul? Will you trust it over to Him, leaving Him to tell you whether to go out of the business, and face ruin, leaving also your reputation to Him, or whether to stand still where you are, and see the salvation of God in His complete subversion of all the business habits of your partner? Thank God, "He careth for you" just in this very trial; but while you are bearing the burden of it, though He stands close by, He is unable to help you.

"Not anxious!" says some father or mother. "Why, there is everything in my

to cause anxiety. My children are impatient of control, and I see them escaping from my influence one after another. I see them sowing seed which cannot fail to produce a harvest of sorrow and suffering." Yes; but where is Jesus? Is He not at hand, still close by? Is He indifferent to the welfare of your children? Is He not equal to the care of them? Has He ceased to be "the God of all the families of the earth"? He undertook the education of Peter, James, John, Paul, and turned them out good and consistent Christians. Suppose you believe that in this also His command applies: "In nothing be anxious." Suppose you hand over this anxiety into His able hands, and let the heart-maker be the heart-educator? "But if they go on just the same?" Well, suppose He sees there is no other way of teaching them some lessons which they must learn; of Him who sees the end from the beginning? Did He make a mistake when He let Peter go the length of denying Him with oaths and curses that he might learn his own depravity and nothingness? Did He make a mistake when He let Job go on condemning God and asserting his own righteousness, so that he might learn the lesson which nothing had yet taught him, that he was vile, and that he might come to abhor himself and repent in dust and ashes? If you can trust God out of your sight, and farther than you can understand His dealings, you will commit that family of yours to Him, and, instead of being racked with anxiety all the time, every manifestation on their part which used to try you will bring forth a joyous song of praise that the Lord is faithful and that He will prevail. And "God shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly." It is wonderful how God educates our children when we trust them to Him, while He at the same time is educating us in the school of faith.

IS THIS UNWISE

"But then, there's my

how can I help being anxious when I see so much inconsistency among workers?" Well, has your anxiety ever made an inconsistent worker consistent? No. But God, when He is trusted, can do this work, and He is waiting now to do it. "But then, I must be anxious as to results. How can I help being troubled if I do not see souls converted?" Where, again I ask, is Jesus? Is He close by? Has He any care about the salvation of souls? Does He care for them as much as you do? If so, then go a step backward, just behind Jesus, and instead of being anxious, rejoice in the Lord that He loves them to the death. Trust Him to work for their salvation by His blessed Spirit in their hearts.

"But I have claimed Him as my Healer, and I am

what can the matter be? I fear something is wrong with my faith, or He has something to teach me, or it is not His will to heal." Where, again, is Jesus? Is He close by? Does not He who took away sickness from all who came to Him when He was upon earth care whether you are healed? Cast all the care of your body upon Him, "He careth for you," "the Lord (is) for the body" (1 Cor. 6: 13). If faith is lacking, cast on Him the care of your faith; you cannot create it, trust Him to give it you. If He has something to teach you, trust Him to teach it you, you cannot find it out; only the Holy Ghost can show it you. If you doubt about His will, ask the Holy Spirit to reveal His will, that you may see it in His Word. He is at hand, close by, to show it you; therefore, for the body, as for the soul, be careful for nothing; His care suffices.

In a former issue of this journal was a notice of the arrival of a young student from Persia, who had come to America to prepare himself for more effective missionary service in his native land. We are now enabled to publish his portrait and a brief sketch of his eventful life, with a picture of the walls and city of Teheran in Persia.

Yaroo M. Neesan was born on a farm situated among the mountains of Koordistan between Persia and Asiatic Turkey. He is now thirty-three years of age, having been born in the year 1853. His parents were Syrians, or, as they are called, Nestorian Christians, who were at one time thought to be part of the lost ten tribes of Israel. The Neesan family possessed considerable property, the bulk of which was in sheep and cattle. It was a precarious life that they passed on that mountain farm. Gangs of Koords infested the neighborhood, who lived by plunder, and no plunder was so welcome as that snatched from the Christians. Mr. Neesan's parents were known to be Christians, and were therefore frequent objects of attack by the Koordish Mohammedan desperadoes. One of the young man's earliest recollections is of spending to which he and the women and children of the village were hurriedly carried when the news was brought that the Koords were coming. In that cave they lay concealed, suffering agonies of suspense, while the men of the village quitted their agricultural pursuits to fight for their hearths and homes. Through three days and nights the battle raged, but on the third night the Koordish robbers were driven off, and the women and children were conducted back to their homes. That happened in 1861, when Mr. Neesan was only eight years old.

It was, unhappily, no uncommon experience. Time after time the Koords descended, and when they took the village by surprise the farmers lost cattle and crops, and thought themselves happy if their houses were not burned, and their lives and the lives of their families were spared. In 1864 Mr. Neesan's parents relinquished this painful effort to exist on their farm. The attacks of the Koordish brigands became more frequent and more formidable, and after seven more raids, in which they lost a large portion of their property, they packed up the little that remained to them and set out on their long and weary journey to Oroomiah in Persia.

The family settled in Oroomiah County, not far from the city of Oroomiah, the father, uncle and elder brothers working on a farm, no longer able to be their own masters. At a later date they succeeded in arranging with a landowner a species of lease of his farm. The terms were that the produce of the farm should be divided into two equal portions, of which the owner took one as rent and the Neesan family the other. There was no mission school near the farm so the boy was sent to the next village for his education. There had been established by the American Board, which has now, and for the fifteen years last past, passed under the control of the Presbyterian Missionary Board.

The boy remained in that school two years, and during that time his fine natural abilities, his aptitude for study, and his unwearying industry attracted notice. His progress encouraged his father to send him to the Missionary college. This institution was under Presbyterian control and is still flourishing. It has been recently removed to a spot about one mile and a half from the city of Oroomiah, but at that time it was six miles away. He entered college in the year 1870, when he was seventeen years of age, and during his college course he was initiated into the hardships and trials of missionary life. Between the terms he taught in the mission schools, or accompanied the missionaries on colportage and preaching tours in the surrounding country.

During one of these tours Mr. Neesan had a narrow escape from death in

A CONFLICT WITH BRIGANDS.

He was invited to accompany a party of ladies into the Koordish Mountains, where they were going with money, clothing, and books to relieve the prevailing distress among the Koords, consequent upon the famine, and to preach the Gospel and distribute Christian books. Among the ladies were the wife and daughter of Dr. Cochran, the eminent medical missionary in Persia. The assistance of Mr. Neesan was especially valuable to them on account of his familiarity with the language of the Koords.

One night while the party was encamped in two tents on the outskirts of a village, a deacon of the mission church came out to them and spent the evening. As darkness fell, the alarm, sadly familiar to Mr. Neesan's ears in his boyhood, was given, "The Koords are coming." Instantly he was upon his feet preparing to protect his charge. He had two old-fashioned pistols and an axe, and with these he advanced upon the brigands. The deacon and the cook came to his assistance and the Koords received a warm reception. The deacon soon fell, shot in the back, and the cook was wounded in the head, but the young student continued to fight against the robbers. The sound of the shooting was heard in the village and a number of the villagers came to the scene of the struggle. Not knowing in the darkness how many brigands might be engaged, they deemed it the wisest course to remove the ladies and the wounded deacon to the village for safety. They were accordingly hurried away. They could not find Mr. Neesan and

FEARED HE MUST BE KILLED.

Returning upward of an hour afterward they were rejoiced to find him in the tent. He was a pitiable sight. For three hours he had maintained the fight in the dark and was badly bruised and wounded. One wound in the jaw was bleeding profusely, and his hands and face and clothing were covered with blood.

In their alarm they begged him to return with them to the village, but, having succeeded in beating off the robbers, he was disinclined to leave the mission property as a prey, in the event of their return. He therefore packed up the most valuable part and sent it on to the village by the men, and bade them return as quickly as possible for another load which he would have ready for them when they came back. On their return they found the Koords again advancing on the tents, and they proposed to lie still until the brigands came close, when they might kill them. Mr. Neesan, however, interfered. That was not the missionary method, he said. The ladies wanted no one to be killed. The party, therefore, fired their guns in the air, and the robbers, realizing that their intended victims had been reinforced, were scared away. The work of transporting the contents of the tent was then continued, and Mr. Neesan remained until the last bundle had been packed and was safely on the way to the village. Then he followed and his wounds were dressed. As may be imagined he received, on arriving at the village, a warm welcome from the ladies, whose lives and property he had so valiantly defended. The ladies and Mr. Neesan completed their journey under the protection of a guard of Persian soldiers whom the Shah had sent to put down the brigands.

ANOTHER JOURNEY

taken the following year was not less perilous.

Mr. W. L. Whipple proposed making an evangelistic tour, and Mr. Neesan consented to go with him. As they were leaving Oroomiah Mr. Whipple changed his plans. Mr. Stocking was setting out for Europe and Mr. Whipple decided to accompany him a part of the way. He therefore told Mr. Neesan to proceed with the baggage and the Bibles three days' journey and wait for him in Garwar, which he would reach by another road from the point where he would leave Mr. Stocking. On arriving at Garwar Mr. Neesan received a letter from Mr. Whipple changing the meeting-place to Amadia, and requesting Mr. Neesan to proceed thither without delay. Hiring a mule for the baggage Mr. Neesan, with one companion, set out across the mountains for Amadia. After proceeding some distance they met several groups of wounded men. Inquiring what trouble was on foot they learned that two tribes were at war, and that a battle was then raging which had already lasted three days. Committing himself to the Lord's keeping Mr. Neesan decided to go on. Several times he was molested on the way, but his declaration that he was going to the camp sufficed to secure his safety.

On his arrival at the camp the mule was taken from him, and, with the baggage was taken into the keeping of the army, while Mr. Neesan was CARRIED BEFORE THE CHIEF.

The chief inquired his business, and where he was going, and received truthful answers with a request for an escort. The chief took time to consider, and meanwhile the young Christian and his companion sat under a tree and watched the strange scene. At supper-time they were invited to partake at the chief's table and were courteously treated. After supper there was dancing, wrestling, and drilling, from which scene Mr. Neesan found opportunity to slip away in quiet that he might pray. As the lights went out he threw himself down under the tree again and fell asleep as peacefully as if in bed in college, though he was surrounded by reckless, desperate men who were accustomed to deeds of robbery and bloodshed. Once or twice during the night he awoke and saw figures of men near him, but, having confided his life to God's keeping he was at rest and went to sleep again.

When morning dawned he had another interview with the chief who agreed to let him have an armed escort to Amadia. Then for the first time he learned that the figures he had seen near him in the night were the chief's two sons, who, fearing that the soldiers might rob, and, perhaps, murder him as he slept, had watched beside him all night. In answer to his prayer protection had been granted him, and if God had not sent His angels to give it, He had sent human protectors. Mr. Neesan was taken in charge by the armed escort that day and safely conducted to Amadia, where Mr. Whipple joined him and commenced the Gospel tour.

In 1876 Mr. Neesan took a third journey, this time having Mr. Stocking for a companion. This journey was like its predecessors, characterized by hair-breadth escapes and perils of many kinds, notably from the old enemies, the Koords. Lack of space forbids a description of them. As in the former journeys Mr. Neesan was wonderfully delivered and succeeded in doing a good work through the country. In his annual report Mr. Stocking said that never before in the history of the mission had so many Bibles been sold on a single journey.

Mr. Neesan graduated at the close of the college course with much credit. He was a hard student, laboring assiduously to fit himself thoroughly for the work to which he had consecrated his life. How laboriously he must have toiled may be inferred from the fact that he can read the Bible in most of which he can speak with some fluency, and he is able to go through the whole of Asia, with the exception of China, and preach to every people in their own language. After his graduation he was employed as teacher in the high schools, first at Tabriz, and afterward at Maragah

ON TRIAL.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Dec. 19, 1886.

"We have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous."—1 JOHN 2 : 1.

A Momentous Case—The Indictment—Breaking the Commandments—Breaking a Solemn Contract—Inflicting Injury on Religion—The Witnesses—The World—Conscience—An Angel—The Holy Spirit—No Defence—The Advocates—Famous Pleaders—Justice—A Volunteer Counsel—The Best Advocate—The Judge—Will You be Ready?

STANDING in a court-room you say to yourself, "At this bar crime has often been arraigned; at this witness-stand the oath has often been taken; at this jurors' bench the verdict has been rendered, at this judge's desk sentence has been pronounced." But I have to tell you to-day of a trial higher than any in Oyer and Terminer, or Circuit, or Supreme Court, or Chancery. It is the trial of every Christian man for the life of his soul. This trial is different from any other in the fact that it is both civil and criminal. The issues at stake are tremendous, and I shall in my sermon show you, first, what are the grounds of complaint; then who are the witnesses in the cause, and lastly, who are the advocates.

When a trial is called on, the first thing is to have read. Stand up then, oh Christian man, and hear the indictment of the court of high heaven against thy soul! It is an indictment of ten counts, for thou hast directly or indirectly broken all the ten commandments. You know how it thundered on Sinai, and when God came down how the mountain rocked, and the smoke ascended as from a smouldering furnace, and the darkness gathered thick, and the loud deep trumpet uttered the words: "The soul that sinneth, it shall die!" Are you guilty or not guilty? Do not put in a negative plea too quick, for I have to announce that "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God. There is none that doeth good; no, not one. Whosoever shall keep the whole law, yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." Do not, therefore, be too hasty in pronouncing yourself not guilty.

This lawsuit before us also charges you with the breaking of

A SOLEMN CONTRACT.

Many a time did we promise to be the Lord's. We got down on our knees and said, "O Lord, I am Thine, now and forever." Did you keep the promise? Have you stood up to the contract? I go back to your first communion. You remember it as well as if it were yesterday. You know how the vision of the cross rose before you. You remember how from the head, and the hands, and the side, and the feet, there came bleeding forth these two words: "Remember me!" You recall how the cup of communion trembled in your hand when you first took it; and, as in a sea-shell you may hear, or think you hear, the roaring of the surf even after the shell has been taken from the beach, so you lifted the cup of communion, and you heard in it the surging of the great ocean of a Saviour's agony; and you came forth from that communion-service with face shining as though you had been on the Mount of Transfiguration; and the very air seemed tremulous with the love of Jesus, and the woods and the leaves and the grass and the birds were brighter and sweeter-voiced than ever before, and you said down in the very depths of your soul, "Lord, Thou knowest all things; Thou knowest that I love Thee."

HAVE YOU KEPT THE BARGAIN, oh Christian man? Have you not sometime faltered when you ought to have been true? Have you not been proud when you ought to have been humble? Have you not played the coward when you ought to have been the hero? I charge it upon you, and I charge it upon myself—we have broken the contract.

Still further, this lawsuit claims damages at your hands. The greatest slander on the Christian religion is an inconsistent professor. The Bible says religion is one thing; we by our INCONSISTENCY say religion is some other thing, and what is more deplorable about it is, that people can see faults in others while they cannot see any in themselves. If you shall at any time find some miserable old gossip, with imperfections from the crown of her head to the sole of her foot, a perfect blotch of sin herself, she will go tattling, tattling, tattling all the years of her life, about the inconsistencies of others, having no idea that she is inconsistent herself. God save the world from the gossip, female and male! I think the males are the worst! Now the chariot of Christ's salvation goes on through the world; but it is our inconsistencies, my brethren, that block up the wheels, while all along the line there ought to have been cast nothing but palm branches, and the shout should have been lifted "Hosanna to the Son of David."

Now you have heard the indictment read. Are you ready to plead guilty or not guilty? Perhaps you are not ready yet to plead. Then the trial will go on.

will be called, and we shall have the matter decided. In the name of God I now make proclamation: "Oyez! Oyez! Oyez! Whosoever hath anything to offer in this trial in which God is the plaintiff and the Christian soul the defendant, let him now step forth and give testimony in this solemn trial."

The first witness that I call upon the stand in behalf of the prosecution, is the World—all critical and observant of Christian character. You know that there are people around you who perpetually banquet on the frailties of God's children. You may know, if you have lived in the country, that a crow cares for nothing so much as carrion. There are those who imagine that out of the faults of Christians they can make a bridge of boats across the stream of death, and they are going to try it; but, alas, for the mistake! When they get amid-stream away will go the bridge and down will go their soul to perdition. Oh World, of the greedy eye and the hard heart, come on the stand now and testify against this Christian soul on trial. What do you know about this Christian man? "Oh," says the World, "I know a great deal about him. He talks about putting his treasures in heaven, but he is the sharpest man in a trade I ever knew. He seems to want us to believe that he is a child of God, but he is just full of imperfections. I do not know but I am a great deal better than he is now. Oftentimes he is very earthly, and he talks so little about Christ and so much about himself, I am very glad to testify that this is a bad man."

Stop, oh World, with the greedy eye and the hard heart, I fear you are in this trial to give impartial evidence. Let all those who hear the testimony of this witness know that there is an old family quarrel between these two parties. There always has been a variance between the World and the Church, and while the World on the witness-stand to-day has told a great deal of truth about this Christian man, you must take it all with some allowance, remembering that they still keep the old grudge good. Oh World, of the greedy eye and the hard heart, that will do. You may sit down.

The second witness I call in this case is CONSCIENCE.

Who art thou, oh Conscience? What is your business? Where were you born? What are you doing here? "Oh," says Conscience, "I was born in heaven! I came down to befriend this man. I have lived with him. I have instructed him. I have warned him. I showed him the right and the wrong, advising him to take the one and eschew the other. I have kindled a great light in his soul. With a whip of scorpions I have scourged his wickedness; and I have tried to cheer him when doing right; and yet I am compelled to testify on the stand to-day that he has sometimes rejected my mission. Oh, how many cups of life have I pressed to his lips that he dashed down, and how often has he stood with his hard heel on the bleeding heart of the Son of God! It pains me very much that I have to testify against this Christian man, and yet I must, in behalf of Him who will in no wise clear the guilty, say that this Christian man has done wrong. He has been worldly. He has been neglectful. He has done a thousand things he ought not to have done, and left undone a thousand things he ought to have done." That will do, Conscience. You can sit down.

The third witness I call in the case, is of God. Bright and Shining One, what doest thou here? What hast thou to say against this man on trial? "Oh," says the angel, "I have been a messenger to him! I have guarded him. I have watched him. With this wing I have defended him, and oftentimes when he knew it not I led him into the green pastures and beside the still waters. I snatched from him the poisoned chalices. When bad spirits came upon him to destroy him I fought them back with infinite fierceness; and yet I have to testify to-day that he has rejected my mission. He has not done as he ought to have done. Though I came from the sky he drove me back. Though with this wing I defended him, and though with this voice I wooed him, I have to announce his multiplied imperfections. I dare not keep back the testimony, for then I should not dare to appear again among the sinless ones before the great white throne."

There is only one more witness to be called on behalf of the prosecution, and that is the great, the holy, the august, of God. We bow down before Him. Holy Spirit, knowest Thou this man? "Oh, yes," says the Holy One, "I know him. I have striven with him ten thousand times, and though sometimes he did seem to repent, he fell back again as often from his first estate. Ten thousand times ten thousand has he grieved Me, although the Bible warned him saying, 'Grieve not the Holy Ghost. Quench not the Spirit.' Yes, he has driven Me back. Though I am the Third Person of the Trinity he has trampled on My mission, and the blood of the Atonement that I brought with which to cleanse his soul, he sometimes despised. I came from the throne of God to convert and comfort and sanctify, and yet look at that man, and see what he is compared with what, unresisted, I would have made him."

THE OMNIPOTENT SPIRIT

NO DEFENCE.

The evidence on the part of the prosecution has closed. Now let the defence bring on the rebuttal testimony. What have you, oh Christian soul, to bring in reply to this evidence of the world, of the conscience, of the angel, and of the Holy Ghost? No evidence? Are all these things true? "Yes, unclean, unclean," says every Christian soul. What? Do you not begin to tremble at the thought of condemnation?

We have come now to the most interesting part of this great trial. The evidence all in,

THE ADVOCATES SPEAK.

The profession of an advocate is full of responsibility. In England and the United States there have arisen men who in this calling have been honored by their race, and thrown contempt upon those who in the profession have been guilty of a great many meannesses. That profession will be honorable as long as it has attached to it such names as Mansfield and Marshall and Story and Kent and Southard and William Wirt. The court-room has sometimes been the scene of very marvellous and thrilling things.

Some of you remember the famous Girard Will case, where one of our advocates pleaded the cause of the Bible and Christianity in masterly Anglo-Saxon, every paragraph a thunderbolt. Some of you have read of the famous trial in Westminster Hall, of Warren Hastings, the despoller of India. That great man had conquered India by splendid talents, by courage, by bribes, by gigantic dishonesty. The whole world had rung with applause or condemnation. Gathered in Westminster Hall was one of the most famous audiences ever gathered. Foreign ministers and princes sat there. Peers marched in clad in ermine and gold. Mighty men and women from all lands looked down upon the scene. Amid all that pomp and splendor, and amid an excitement such as has seldom been seen in any courtroom, Edmund Burke delivered a speech which will last as long as the English language, concluding with this burning charge, which made Warren Hastings writhe and shrink: "I impeach him in the name of the Commons House of Parliament, whose trust he has betrayed. I impeach him in the name of the English nation, whose ancient honor he has sullied. I impeach him in the name of the people of India, whose rights he has trampled on, and whose country he has turned into a desert. And, lastly, in the name of human nature, in the name of both sexes, in the name of every age and rank, I impeach him as the common enemy and oppressor of all."

But I turn from the recital of those memorable occasions to a grander trial, and I have to tell you that in this trial of the Christian for the life of his soul, the advocates are mightier, wiser, and more eloquent. The evidence all being in, rises on behalf of the prosecution to make his plea. With the Bible open in his hand, he reads the law, stern and inflexible; and the penalty: "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." Then he says, "O Thou, Judge and Lawgiver, this is Thine own statute, and all the evidence in earth and heaven agrees in stating that this man has sinned against all these enactments. Now let the sword leap from its scabbard. Shall a man go through the very flames of Sinai unsinged? Let the law be executed. Let judgment be pronounced. Let him die. I demand that he die."

Oh Christian, does it not look very dark for thee? Who will plead on thy side in so forlorn a cause? Sometimes a man will be brought into a court of law, and he will have no friends, and no money, and the judge will look over the bar and say, "Is there any one to take this man's case, and defend him?" and some young man rises up and says, "I will be his counsel," perhaps starting on from that very point to a great and brilliant career. Now, in this matter of the soul, as you have nothing to pay for counsel, do you think that any one will volunteer? Yes, yes; I see One rising. He is a young man, only thirty-three years of age. I see His countenance suffused with tears and covered with blood, and all the galleries of heaven are thrilled with the spectacle. Thanks be unto God! "We have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous."

Oh Christian soul, your case begins to look better. I think, perhaps, after all you may not have to die.

THE BEST ADVOCATE

in all the universe has taken your side. No one was ever so qualified to defend a man as this Advocate is qualified to defend you. He knows all the law, all its demands, all its penalties. He is always ready. No new turn of the case can surprise Him, and He will plead for you for nothing as earnestly as though you brought a world of treasures to His feet. Besides that He has undertaken the care of thousands who were as forlorn as you, and He has never lost a case. Courage, oh Christian soul! I think that after all there may be some chance for you, for the great Advocate rises to make His plea. He says, "I admit all that has been proved against My client. I admit all these sins, ay, more; but look at that wounded hand of Mine, and look at that other wounded hand, and at My right foot and at My left foot. By all these wounds I plead for his clearance. Count all the drops of My tears. Count all the drops of My blood. By the humiliation of Bethlehem, by the sweat of Gethsemane, by the sufferings of the cross, I demand that he go free. On this arm he hath leaned; to this heart he hath flown; in My tears he hath washed; on My righteousness he hath depended. Let him go free."

I AM THE RANSOM.

Let him escape the lash, I took the scourgings. Let the cup pass from him, I drank it to the dregs. Put on him the crown of life, for I have worn the crown of thorns. Over against My cross of shame, set his throne of triumph."

Well, the counsel on both sides have spoken, and there is only one more thing now remaining, and that is the awarding of the judgment. If you have ever been in a court-room you know the silence and the solemnity, when the verdict is about to be rendered, or the judgment about to be given. About this soul on trial, shall it be saved or shall it be lost? Attention! above, around, beneath: All the universe cries, "Hear! Hear!"

rises and gives His decision, never to be changed, never to be revoked. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus."

"The soul that on Jesus hath leaned for repose, I will not, I will not, desert to His foes; That soul, though all hell should endeavor to shake, I'll never, no never, no never forsake."

But, my friends, there is coming a day of trial in which not only the saint, but the sinner must appear. That day of trial will come very suddenly. The farmer will be at the plough, the merchant will be in the counting-room, the woodman will be ringing his axe on the hickories, the weaver will have his foot on the treadle, the manufacturer will be walking amid the buzz of looms and the clack of flying machinery, the counsel may be standing at the bar pleading the law, the minister may be in the pulpit pleading the Gospel, the drunkard may be reeling amid his cups, and the blasphemer with the oath caught between his teeth.

LO! THE SUN HIDES.

Night comes down at mid-noon. A wave of darkness rolls over the earth. The stars appear at noon-day. The earth shudders and throbs. There an earthquake opens and a city sinks as a crocodile would crunch a child. Mountains roll in their sockets and send down their granite cliffs in an avalanche of rock. Rivers pause in their chase for the sea, and ocean, uprearing, cries to flying Alps and Himalaya. Beasts bellow, and moan, and snuff up the darkness. Clouds fly like flocks of swift eagles. Great thunders beat and boom and burst. Stars shoot and fall. The Almighty, rising on His throne, declares that time shall be no longer, and the archangel's trumpet repeats it till all the living hear, and the continents of dead spring to their feet, crying, "Time shall be no longer!" Oh, on that day,

WILL YOU BE READY?

I have shown you how well the Christian will get off in his trial. Will you get off as well in your trial? Will Christ plead on your side or will He plead against you? Oh, what will you do in the last great assize, if your conscience is against you, and the world is against you, and the angels of heaven are against you, and the Holy Spirit is against you, and the Lord God Almighty is against you? Better this day secure an Advocate.

AN ORDEAL OF CONVERTS.

In describing in the Foreign Missionary a missionary excursion to new ground in Mexico, the Rev. Isaac Boyce says: It took two days' hard riding to reach Concepcion, and five hours more to cross the mountains to Mazapil. We reached the place late on Saturday evening, and received a warm welcome from our people, and were near getting a still warmer reception from the Catholics. The first move made on their part was to throw us into prison, and they only just failed of accomplishing this end. We were the first Protestant preachers who had ever entered the place, and they wanted to make an example of us. Failing, however, in this attempt, they demonstrated their good-will in the matter by stoning the house of one of our members where we were stopping.

We remained in Mazapil from Saturday evening to Wednesday morning. We held services every night. Some of our inquirers manifested more firmness than I would have expected. Their employers told them that either they must keep away from the Protestants altogether or lose their work. In every instance they said, "Let the work go, then." Two were thus thrown out of work, and only the fact that our members are the best of their profession—bakers—saved them from the same fate. I have never seen such fanaticism as in this place; but, for all that, we scattered some two hundred tracts and three Bibles in the place.

TERRORISM IN IRELAND.

The picture on page 812 is not a fancy sketch. It is the reproduction of a photograph recently taken in the West of Ireland. The photographer actually saw the two ladies walking out to make calls attended by two military policemen, and thinking the spectacle, as Carlyle would have said, significant of much, asked permission to make a picture of them.

The elder of the two ladies, it appears, is "Lady of the Manor," and has been boycotted. "She owns," says an English journal, "a small town, all the tradespeople of which, including the butcher and baker, are her tenants, but they refuse to sell her anything. In consequence she is obliged to get her meat, bread, etc., from a town twenty miles away, and also has to send her horses there to be shod, as, by order of the League, the village blacksmith dares not work for her. Nevertheless, in spite of all the persecution she has endured, she has persistently refused to bow to the will of the League, and has recently opened a store from which other boycotted persons may purchase supplies." It would appear, too, that the lady is not only boycotted, but is in danger of personal violence, or she would not need a guard to protect her as she walks over her own property.

That any lady should live such a life is deplorable. Embarrassed in her domestic arrangements and in danger of assassination, her position is indeed pitiable, and there are many landowners in Ireland just now in the same condition. To such a pass have things come in Ireland, and they are growing worse.

The wise king tells us (Prov. 26 : 2) that "the curse causeless shall not come," and in this case the assurance holds good. The landowners of Ireland, as a class, have for generations back been heartless and cruel, doing as they would with their own and forgetting or ignoring the duties of property. They cared nothing for the misery of their tenants, but were eager only for the rents, which they spent in luxury in London. The peasantry grew up uneducated, half starved, and ill clad. They lost the higher instincts of men, and became little better than beasts. Now, when they have learned the power that comes by combination, they use it as ignorant, desperate men always use it, and it is idle for the landowners to expect intelligence, discrimination, or magnanimity from them. This generation of landowners is reaping the harvest of suffering that their fathers sowed in injustice and oppression. It is not improbable that this very lady, who owns "a whole town," might learn, if she inquired how the whole town came to be in the possession of her family, why God permits her to suffer.

When this fact that wrong sooner or later entails suffering, though it may not be until the third or fourth generation, comes to be recognized, as it is taught in the Bible and in the history of every land, then we may hope to see recognition, too, of the duty of atonement. It will be a happy day for England, as well as Ireland, when that atonement is made, and the generation that makes it will deserve honor among men and will have the blessing of God.

A GOOD MAN'S NEPHEW.

A CHRISTIAN worker in Manchester, England, has been visiting the boats plying on the canals of that city, with the object of reading the Bible and talking to the men. One day he found to his astonishment that one of the men with whom he had long been laboring was nearly related to an illustrious man. He says:

Calling one day at a long boat, I read a portion of the fifth chapter of Romans, when the captain said to me:

"You have read that to us before."

"I dare say," said I; "what do you think about it?"

"I will tell you what it has done for me. It has made me shed many a tear in this boat, and on the towing-path, too, on account of my sins. I was religiously trained by a good mother, but as I grew up I became very wicked, owing, in a great measure, to bad company. I became so bad in my conduct that no one would employ me. At last I took to boating. In this job I have done for years just as I liked. From your first coming among us your very presence has been a reproof to me. You have often brought to my mind the man I am named after, Roger Miller, who was my mother's brother."

"What, Roger Miller, the missionary, who went out with Mr. Williams to the South Seas?"

"He was my uncle, sir. I remember him well, and how he used to put his hand on my head, when I was a very little boy, and tell me about Jesus Christ, and told me to be a good boy, and love the Saviour who died for my sins. I have my uncle's name, and now, thank God, I believe I have my uncle's Saviour. I have often wept, and wept much, as I have looked back at my misspent life, especially since you read that passage to us before: 'God commendeth His love toward us in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.' Instead of killing us right out, He loves us, sinners as we are. His love has broken my heart to pieces."

"I hope, then," I said, "you will live for God, Roger."

"Yes, to the best of my power, I will live to Him every day."

AMONG THE ZENANAS IN INDIA.

IN a letter from Miss Ward, who is laboring as a missionary in Cawnpore, India, to the Missionary Link, she says:

Our work in Cawnpore is enough to keep both heart and hands full. Yesterday I went to a place three miles from Cawnpore, where we have had work a long time. As I was passing down the narrow lane I saw a fat Babu sitting in front of a fine house, and I stopped to ask him if any of the ladies there read? "No, they did not," he answered. "Do they wish to?" I continued. "No." Then I asked if I might go in and visit them, to which he assented.

I found his wife sick, and I may be able to help her a little. His little girl of six years came to me and I taught her some of the letters of the alphabet, and then proposed that the mother should buy a book for the child, which she did. In the mean time some other women from neighboring houses gathered in and I talked to them all of Jesus and sang a hymn. To my surprise one of the women asked if I could sing a certain hymn, of which she gave me some of the lines. When I asked her where she had learned it, she said a lady visited a friend of hers and then she had heard about Jesus. This showed me how the Gospel was permeating in silent ways through these homes of India, and I felt the time spent in this house had not been in vain. Especially did I appreciate it when the child followed me out, and her father seemed pleased and promised to teach her. Although he had said "no" at first, he now seemed willing we should continue our visits and give instruction there.

Another bit of comfort that came to me I pass on to you. In one house where I taught a woman of the highest caste, two little girls came from outside and seemed interested while I spoke of heaven and the way there. At this time there is a great deal of sickness and death in the city, and in talking of this to my pupils, it brings up the subject of preparation for our important last change. Before I left this house I sung a hymn which clearly brings forth the idea of Christ as the Saviour of sinners. The last verse is a little prayer, asking Christ to take care of us. As I left the house and was passing down the lane, I heard one of these children singing in a clear voice over and over again: "Come, take care of me," and I could but think: "All the fitness He requireth is to feel your need of Him," and that the prayers and praises of infants were dear to Him who said: "Suffer little children to come unto Me."

RUSKIN'S BIBLE.

IN a recently published compilation of anecdotes illustrative of Scripture texts, published by A. C. Armstrong & Son, is the following scrap of autobiography written by John Ruskin, the greatest art critic and one of the most eminent authors of the day:

I have just opened my oldest Bible, yellow now with age, and flexible, but not unclean with much use, except that the lowest corners of the pages at 1 Kings 8 and Deuteronomy 32 are worn somewhat thin and dark, the learning of these two chapters having cost me much pains. My mother's list of the chapters with which, thus learned, she established my soul in life, has just fallen out of it. I will take what indulgence the incurious reader can give me for printing the list thus accidentally occurrent. It comprises, in Exodus, chapters 15 and 20; 11 Samuel 1: 17-27; 1 Kings 8; Psalms 23, 32, 90, 91, 103, 112, 119, and 139; Proverbs 2, 3, 8, and 12; Isa. 58; Matthew 5, 6, and 7; Acts 26; 1 Corinthians 13 and 15; James 4; Revelation 5 and 6.

And truly, though I have picked up the elements of a little further knowledge—in mathematics, meteorology, and the like—in after life, and owe not a little to the teaching of many people, this maternal installation of my mind in that property of chapters I count very confidently the most precious, and, on the whole, the one essential part of all my education.

ONLY ONE LEAF IN THE DESERT.

A REMARKABLE incident is related by Dr. Pentecost in his Words and Weapons. He says: Some Hindoos were on a journey in India. The road was rough and long, and the sun burned hotly in the skies. Slowly they passed on the way, and as one day after another came to an end, many of the party grew faint and weary. There was one poor man who seemed a stranger to the rest; he was old and feeble and ready to sink from the heat and labor of the way. At last he fell and could not rise again. The Hindoos looked upon him, and finding that he was likely to die, they left him to perish without pity or help, for these heathen are unkind to the sick and dying.

But there was among those travellers a missionary, on his way to a distant place to preach the Gospel; he saw the old man fall, and ran to aid him, while the rest passed along. Yet all his help could not now save his life. He knelt by the poor man's side and softly said in his ear: "Brother, what is your hope?" The dying traveller raised himself to reply, and with a great effort said: "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin," and then laid down his head again and died.

The missionary was greatly astonished at the answer; and, from the calm and thoughtful manner in which the words were spoken, he could not but feel that the man had died safely in Christ. "How or where," thought he, "could this Hindoo have got his hope?" And, as he looked at the dead body, he saw a piece of paper grasped tightly in one of the hands. He carefully took it out, and what was his surprise and delight when he saw it was a single leaf of the Bible, on which was the first chapter of the first Epistle of John, where these words are found. On that page a heathen man had met with the Gospel.

Now, a great part of the Apocalypse—or, I should say, the greater part—is simply an expansion of Exodus 34:10. Soon, as we may read in the description of and the Vials of Wrath, not one country, but many will be writhing beneath strokes similar to those by which Egypt was destroyed. The tongue-sea of Egypt will be dried up that the Jews may pass through it on their way to Palestine; and the great river Euphrates will be smitten in its seven streams, in order that the Israelites, coming as "Kings from the East," may go over it dry-shod. And even the terrors of Sinai will seem insignificant when, amid the convulsions of nature, the lightning flash shall sweep round the globe, and the Lord Jesus be revealed in flaming fire.

There ought, therefore, to be no question in regard to the supernatural character of the Apocalyptic prediction; nor is there any reason why we should not understand our present passage in its obvious and literal sense, that three of God's angels will fly in succession through mid-heaven uttering their awful proclamations. Indeed, the very circumstances seem to demand that they should.

All the ways of God are devised in love; and, doubtless, the unexpected rapture of the First-fruits will bring about the mightiest shower of blessing that has ever fallen from heaven. For on that night, in which so many families and companions will be separated, and the one taken while the other is left, the spell of worldliness will be broken in the case of thousands. Multitudes who have hitherto been sleeping in security will be rudely awakened from their careless dreams, and become conscious that they are standing face to face with

TERRIBLE REALITIES.

How great a procession of prodigals will begin to return as soon as the solemn news is made known! How many godless children, whose parents found in them cause for naught save sorrow, and whose hearts seemed to be hardened beyond remedy, will, at this first interference of the Almighty, be melted to terror and penitence, ay, and presently also to the deepest love, when they discover that, although they have lost much and must now suffer much, yet the gates of salvation are still open before them!

Then will many a prayer for unsaved relations and friends be answered, many a broken-hearted supplication for those dearer than life be graciously remembered. Within twenty-four hours there will probably be a conversion of sinners on so great a scale that the work of Pentecost will seem small in comparison to it. And again, how stirring will be the effect upon real but slothful and worldly believers! What poignant grief will fill their hearts! How will they writhe with the stings of remorse that they should have suffered their Lord to find them sleeping! And what there will be to earnest effort, to zealous preaching of the Master's name, to urgent proclamation of His speedy appearing!

The results will be so great that they are represented in the seventh chapter of the Apocalypse as a multitude which no man can number, all the individuals of which are said to have come out of the Great Tribulation, or, as the Greek has it, with an emphatic repetition of the article, "out of the Tribulation the great one."

But this grand mission will not last long. The world will dislike it ; will put an end to it, and that persecution will probably be carried on by the false Church which is already making such giant strides toward power in Europe, and, as we are told, also in America. From the seventeenth chapter of the Apocalypse it appears that the Ten Kings will ultimately destroy her, in order that they may give her power to the infidel Antichrist. Now, the latter begins to reign in the middle of the period of judgment ; for he must continue in power forty and two months, or three years and a half, and be destroyed by the Lord Himself at His coming. Hence the Harlot Church will be upon her throne during the greater part of the first half of the seven years. And since John, when he is called to see her judgment, beholds her, at the time, "drunken with the blood of the saints," it is probable that she will spend her last days in persecuting the people of God ; while the violence with which the Ten Kings destroy her may, perhaps, point to considerable vigor and powers of resistance on her part even to the last.

A FRIGHTFUL PERSECUTION

Owing, then, to the virulence of persecution, it will be no longer possible for men to deliver the messages of God ; therefore He will have recourse to the angel-ministry of which we so often read in the Old Testament. Again the words spoken by angels shall be steadfast.

In the sixth verse we have an account of the first of these

who proclaim a new Gospel concerned with everlasting issues ; but it is the Gospel of the Days of Vengeance, not that of the grace of Christ. The world has stopped the mouths of those who were preaching the glad tidings of salvation through the Lord Jesus, and in anger God withdraws the loving offer, and substitutes a command that all men shall do homage to their Creator.

Fear God, the angelic preacher cries, and give glory to Him, not to yourselves as you have so long been doing. Bow the knee to the great Creator, or it will be too late ; for His hand is uplifted to strike. Worship Him That made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters. You have refused to acknowledge Christ as your Redeemer ; at least fall before Him Whose eternal power and Godhead you can discern in the things around you. Yield to the testimony of nature, if you will not to that of revelation ; otherwise it shall quickly be said of you, "Behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish !" For the glory of the Lord is about to be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together.

This message is plainly indicative of the state of society at the time. The evolutionary philosophy will have done its work, and the world will be filled with fools who have said in their heart, "There is no God."

Then follows the second angel with his proclamation—"Fallen, fallen is Babylon the Great"—the word "city" which appears in the English Authorized Version is a mere gloss, and should be omitted. At this point, then, the Harlot, or False Church, is destroyed by the Ten Kings, and the ANTICHRIST BEGINS HIS REIGN.

Accordingly, the third angel follows with a warning that should make both the ears of him that hears it tingle. The hour of temptation is at hand. The image of the Antichrist is about to be set up for worship, and the command to go forth that every man must be branded with the fatal mark on pain of becoming an outcast from society, forbidden to buy or to sell, and carrying about with him the sentence of death. Therefore, before the impious proclamation is issued, the Lord Almighty sends His messenger to declare what will be the result of obeying it. The instant any man does so his death-warrant will be signed ; the Spirit of God will cease to strive with him, and all offers of grace be withdrawn.

But the pressure applied to force men upon their knees before the great Abomination, and to compel them to receive upon their person, will be terrible. Hence the allusion to it is followed by the remark that it will be the test of the patience and obedience of the saints. And we may notice that the saints are said to be "they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus"—a twofold description, of which we have other examples, and which is, I believe, intended to include pious Jews, who are cleaving to the Old Testament, as well as believers in the Lord Jesus.

The thirteenth verse, the utterance of the voice from heaven, has received strange treatment. It has been usual to ignore the very words—"from henceforth"—which give it point, and to read it at funeral services and place it upon tombstones, as though it were a general truth. But this is by no means the case. Just as some among the Corinthians slept because God was angry with them, so, without doubt, in every age Christians have been and are cut off before their time on account of slothfulness, frowardness, or some culpable want of spiritual perception. Such persons cannot be regarded as blessed in their death ; for it comes upon them as a punishment. It deprives them of the great privilege of living and working for Christ ; and although they cannot be lost, because they have accepted Him, and the gifts and callings of God are without repentance, yet they can suffer loss, and will certainly forfeit their crown.

It is only, then, at the particular crisis dating from the setting up of Antichrist as God that the saying, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord," will be absolutely true ; and such is of course the significance of the words "from henceforth." For the intense severity of the persecution, together with the fact that all who worship the Beast, or receive his mark, will be irrecoverably hardened, will put and influence. There will be little to do for the Master, and His disciples will be ceaselessly harassed by terrors, pains, and threatenings of death. Blessed, therefore, will be their departure from the world whether by martyrdom or in any other way : for they will then rest from their labors during the short time which must elapse before the voice of the Lord is again heard summoning both living and dead into His presence.

I must now be brief in regard to the details of the last scenes in this wonderful chapter.

Miserable as is the plight of God's people under the oppression of Antichrist, it is not hopeless ; for John beholds the Deliverer seated on a white cloud, the Lord of the Harvest ready to gather in His own. But He appears as the Son of man, and is therefore waiting until He receives commandment to reap from His Father. There is a golden crown upon His head—not, however, a royal diadem, but only a στέφανος, or victor's crown, which is within our reach.

It is, perhaps, one of the most significant facts in the Apocalypse, that, until we come to the nineteenth chapter, the diadem is found only upon the heads of the Dragon and the Beast. For, subject to certain limitations, Satan is in a very real sense the Prince of this World, and that truth is the solution of all difficulties connected with the present condition of its inhabitants. The Lord will not wear the diadem until the time has arrived for Him to exercise its prerogatives. And so it is only when, followed by the armies of heaven, He comes forth to reign that we see His head at last crowned with many diadems. Consequently, there is at that time an instant change in His dealings with men : the season of forbearance is over, and all persistent rebels must now be destroyed. The evil that is among men will be suddenly checked : the tide of human misery will no longer flow, and the nations will realize the glad anticipations of David, when, being made to see the glorious form of the Lord rising above the confusions of this world, he exclaimed in ecstasy—

"A Ruler over men, just !

A Ruler in the fear of God !

And He is as the light of the morning when the sun riseth,

As a morning without clouds !

From the sunshine after rain verdure springeth out of the earth !"

But when John sees Him upon the white cloud, He has not appeared as the Sovereign of the World, but has come to gather in His own as soon as the angel-messenger shall announce :

of the earth is dried" (ἐξηράνθη). O how much sorrow and anguish has been required for the process of drying that grain ! But it is done at last, and, at the welcome summons, many a weary and terror-scared face will instantaneously change into glory as all the believers, who are still alive, leave the scene of their sufferings, and ascend in joyous throngs to the presence of their Lord. And so the Mystery of God will be finished.

And yet there are awful things still to follow upon earth. Like the big heavy drops which precede the storm, the last plagues of the vials are poured out upon the unrepentant world, and then the clusters of the vine of the earth are ripe ; and the vintage must be gathered, and the wine-press trodden. Of time will permit me to say but little. It is that great gathering of all nations against Jerusalem of which Zechariah and Joel tell us many particulars. The wine-press is Palestine, into which the Antichrist will lead all his forces, in order to exterminate the earthly people of God ; so that the stretching out of his wings will fill the breadth of Immanuel's land. This gathering, though supposed to be caused solely by the will of Antichrist, will be really brought about by the action of the angel with the sharp sickle ; and as the terrible batteries, horsemen, and battalions, pass into the fatal circle, they will have little suspicion that they are being led to their doom, even as those eighteen were gathered together for death beneath the shadow of the Tower of Siloam. They will cover the land of Canaan with their splendid array, fair as the untouched grapes in the press. Then the angel with the sharp sickle will have done his work, and will step aside for Him Who is to tread the wine-press Alone. Heaven will open, and the Lord will appear as He is described in the nineteenth chapter. There is, then, to be at Christ's second advent, and many that offend and do iniquity will have to be gathered out of His Kingdom. Moreover, as we learn from the sixty-sixth chapter of Isaiah, when the Lord comes with fire, and with His chariots like a whirlwind, to render His anger with fury, and His rebuke with flames of fire, He will find nations which have not heard His fame nor seen His glory. How, then, do these facts accord with the fancy that the world must be converted before He can return to it ?

O dear friends, let us put aside all such vain ideas, and fix our minds on the one hope which the New Testament sets before us, on the return of our Saviour and Lord, which may take place at any moment. Let us obey and watch and pray always that we may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man ; that on the night in which He will, as it were, pass His hand over the field of Christendom, and gently pluck the fully ripe ears to present them as Firstfruits to His Father, we also may be found acceptable to Him.

And do we feel that we care not to preach His word, if there is a limit set to the success of our efforts ? Then, in spite of our apparent devotion, we have been weighed in the balances, and are found wanting ; there is in us a motive more stimulating than the desire to obey our Saviour.

The Lord grant that it may not be so with any of us ; but that we may lay aside whatever is pleasing to ourselves, if we but do His will.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Suggestion in Respect to the tariff has had no influence on the House. By a vote of 149 to 154 the House last week refused to accede to Mr. Morrison's proposal to consider revenue bills. The vote is significant. It may have indicated simply indisposition to enter upon the subject at the time, but that is not the view of it that the country takes. That it is a vote against a reduction of the tariff of any kind may be inferred from the rejoicing of protectionist journals, both Republican and Democratic; from the character of Mr. Morrison, who would not have introduced the motion with any other object than furthering a reduction, and from the fact that Mr. Randall and his Democratic friends were found united with the Republicans in the division. It is evident that, whether a reduction in the tariff would be a good or a bad thing for the country, it will not be effected by either party as a whole. There are sufficient Democrats of protectionist principles to give the Republicans the majority on that question. It is, however, a pity that, reduction being impossible, there cannot be a revision of it. Our system comprises anomalies which embarrass business and are more vexatious than profitable to the Treasury and the people. It would be better for all parties that these were removed.

The Question of Open Executive Sessions in the Senate was disposed of on December 15th by a vote of 33 to 21. Mr. Platt was the advocate of open sessions, and Mr. Morrill suggested that while the consideration of nominations should be in secret, "reciprocity treaties, so called," might be discussed openly. Finally Senator Hoar moved to lay the resolution on the table, and his motion was passed. It is a significant fact that only six Democrats voted with the minority, in spite of the vigorous advocacy of open sessions in Democratic journals. There has rarely been a time when it has been so difficult to learn from party journals what are the principles and policy of either of the political parties. Measures which the journals denounce are supported by men whose election the same journals advocated.

The Reform in the Treatment of the Indians, which has so long been advocated, appears to be on the way to realization. The House on Thursday passed the bill allotting to the Indians their lands in severalty, and it only remains for a committee of conference to arrange the minor difficulties with the Senate before it goes to the President for his signature. The bill provides that any reservation now occupied by Indians may, if advantageous for agricultural or grazing purposes, be divided up into sections in proportion to the number of families upon it, and a quarter section be given to the head of a family and an eighth section to young men or orphans. The lands so allotted are inalienable for twenty-five years, and the owner receives with them the rights and privileges of citizenship. The object of the bill is to obliterate tribal relations, and it has been approved by the most prominent and sincere friends the Indians have.

The Second Trial of McQuade, the New York alderman charged with receiving a bribe in the matter of the franchise for the Broadway surface railroad, ended on December 15th in a verdict of "Guilty." The trial occupied nineteen days, twelve of which were taken up in securing a jury. The ridiculous law of New York, which requires the jury to be composed of men who do not read the newspapers, causes a similar waste of time in all great trials, and does not tend to promote the interests of justice. The case for the prosecution of the alderman was strengthened at this trial by evidence corroborating that of the aldermen who had turned State's evidence. There was, therefore, no excuse at this trial for disagreement on the ground taken by the former jury. The verdict was unanimous on the first ballot, and therefore the probability of the alderman going to prison for a lengthy term is encouraging. It may be hoped that the good work will go on, and the men who paid the bribes will also receive the district attorney's attention.

The Charleston Relief Fund Amounted to $815,000. On December 14th the Executive Committee presented the completed report of its operations. The report gives the names of the cities, towns, and counties contributing to the relief fund, and shows what disposition has been made of the money. Of the total above mentioned, New York City contributed $152,673 and the rest of New York State about $30,000. Boston's contributions amounted to $76,900; Baltimore sent $37,966; New Orleans, $7753, and San Francisco, $16,070. Nearly every State and Territory in the United States sent something to swell the fund, while from many countries of the Old World the charity came pouring in. Besides the amount sent to the Relief Committee, large contributions have been sent to private persons and for rebuilding the shattered churches. The committee have a balance of $186,000 in hand, of which amount they have appropriated $86,000 to complete the repairs to houses and the remainder to build a city hospital in place of the one destroyed by the earthquake. The total loss sustained by the earthquake was five million dollars.

The Need of Efficient Charitable Work was demonstrated in Brooklyn, N. Y., last week. The death of a widow's child from starvation was reported to the coroner, who when he went to the house found the widow in the only bed in the place, unable to move, and with only her six-year-old daughter to wait upon her. There was no food of any description in the house. All that the mother and her children have had to eat for weeks has been supplied by charitable neighbors, none of whom have much more than they can use. The dead child, in Coroner Menninger's opinion, would have lived if it had had sufficient and nourishing food. The coroner went about trying to interest some charitable organizations in the case, but met with little success. The daughter had not sufficient clothing to go out into the streets and beg. There may be circumstances yet to be published in explanation of this apparently culpable neglect, but it ought not to have happened in a wealthy Christian city.

The British Government Arrested Four prominent Irish Nationalists last week on the charge of "conspiracy to defraud." They were Dillon, O'Brien, Harris, and Sheehy, all members of Parliament. Their offence consists in receiving the rents of tenants under the new scheme for the anti-rent campaign. The plan was that in all cases in which a landowner declined to make the reduction in rents recommended by the Government, his tenants should offer him a certain sum proportioned to the total market value of the produce of their holdings. If he declined to accept that sum in full discharge of rent, the tenant should deposit it in the hands of trustees and notify the landlord of the names and addresses of the trustees, who were authorized to pay it over to him on his application. If the owner proceeded to evict the tenant the trustees were to turn the money into a general fund established to defend tenants in the law courts, and keep them from want. The four men now arrested have acted as trustees in such cases, and it is for doing so that they are being prosecuted. When the arrests were made, the police seized the money and books in the possession of the prisoners. The place of the deposit is in future to be kept secret, and it is believed that the money thus collected, and the funds of the League, will be sent to France for safe keeping. A circular to tenants has been issued by the Government warning them that the scheme is illegal, but in spite of that the majority of the tenants are paying the reduced rents to trustees. Michael Davitt, who is now in America, declares that this prosecution is the beginning of the fiercest and final struggle between the Irish people and the Government.

The Ominous Spectacle of European Governments pushing forward their military preparations, purchasing large quantities of the newest and most destructive arms, and raising their regiments to a war footing continues. Reports from the chief capitals of Europe represent diplomats as proving that a better feeling exists, but an uneasy sensation prevails that a gigantic struggle is imminent. Bismarck has obtained from the Reichstag only a part of the military increase that he demanded, and rumors are current that unless the Reichstag yields it will be dissolved. Bismarck is said to be determined to accept nothing less than his first demand. Even that would be little enough to defend the country against a combined attack of France and Russia, which appears to be the contingency dreaded. The period of suspense cannot be long protracted, as neither Germany, France, Russia, nor Italy can long bear the enormous expense of supporting their vast armaments.

The Transportation of British Mails to America still occupies the attention of the English public. The postmaster-general has advertised for contracts from March 1st, 1887, for a year, but shows at present no disposition to resume the old arrangements with the Cunard and White Star Companies. The British service is now in the same confused condition that the American service to England is in. It frequently happens that no direct mail to England leaves New York between Saturday and the following Thursday, while before the recent changes a mail on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday was despatched with regularity. Mr. Stevenson Blackwood, the General Secretary of the English Post Office, published on December 15th a labored defence of the Government's action, in which he contended that it was not unpatriotic because the German steamers now carrying British mails were built in England. The Government expect to save ten thousand dollars a year by the change. They sent the mails on December 11th by the Wyoming, which is due here this day, while the Aurania, which left on the same day, arrived here on Monday last.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal were received last week to the amount of $22.50. They were: from Marlborough, N. J., $1.50; Albany, N. Y., $5; Leeds, Me., $1; Sulphur Springs, O., $1; Mercer, Pa., $1; Franklin Park, N. J., $2.50; Poughkeepsie, N. Y., $4; E. Raymond, Me., $1; Medford, Minn., $3.50; Omaha, Neb., $2. On behalf of the beneficiaries of the fund we tender our friends sincere thanks for their gifts, which are also very encouraging to ourselves.

A Weekly Prayer-Meeting in the Hebrew Christian Church has been commenced. The Rev. Jacob Freshman, who is laboring earnestly for the conversion of the Jews of New York, and whose work has been much blessed, is anxious to obtain the encouragement and help that united prayer will give. He invites "all lovers of Israel," who heed the injunction, "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem" (Ps. 122: 6), to meet in the Hebrew-Christian Church, 17 St. Mark's Place, New York, every Thursday at three o'clock. The prayer-meeting will be for one hour only.

Successful Evangelistic Services have been conducted by Major Hilton at Greenville, Pa., under the auspices of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. The churches of all denominations have united in supporting the meetings, and a genuine old-fashioned revival has taken place. The Pittsburg Dispatch says that so general is the interest aroused that the merchants contemplate closing their places of business and attending the meetings en masse. The night meetings have an attendance of nearly two thousand each evening. Amid tears and sobs of repentance, crowds flock to the mercys-seat and yield themselves to the Master. All the churches have thrown aside petty differences, and are working heroically in the harvest of souls. It was first designed to continue the meetings but a week, but the great success has warranted indefinite protraction, and they are now in their third week with no abatement of interest.

A Protest against the Style of Ladies' Dresses now worn in the upper circles of society was uttered by the Rev. Morgan Dix, D.D., in the course of his sermon, on December 13th, on behalf of a home for the reception of fallen women. He also vigorously denounced the sins of fashionable society. The New York Sun thus summarizes his remarks: "The evidences of corruption he found in the increasing disposition to make light of sexual sins, the willingness of women 'to expose their bodies at the command of fashion,' and the taste for works of art which are 'monstrosities of nudity.' Referring evidently to the many indications we are now getting of social degradation among the English aristocracy, he declared that we need not go abroad to find examples of such moral decline in a society which arrogates to itself the highest refinement. Therefore he appealed to the women of that society to frown down all toleration of vice, and to defy the laws of fashion which require of them immodest apparel."

A Medical Missionary Conference was Held in the Hall of the Young Men's Christian Association last week. Mr. Kotaro M. Shimo Mura, professor-elect in the Missionary College at Tokio and now of the Worcester Technical Institute, delivered an address showing the progress of medical missions in his native land. Addresses were also given by Mr. F. K. Saunders, recently instructor in Jaffna's College, Ceylon, who told of Dr. Chester's good work at Madura, India, in the hospital and in the medical training of young men, and the Rev. A. P. Hopper, D.D., M.D., Vice-President of the Medical Missionary Society at Canton, China, who has spent forty years in missionary labors in the Celestial Empire, and purposes soon to establish a Christian college there. Dr. George D. Dowkontt, of the New York Medical Mission Society, recited briefly the work of that organization since its establishment in 1881. The society now has four dispensaries in this city, and in the past five years has given treatment either at home or in dispensaries to fifty thousand poor people. Missions were as badly needed in some parts of this city, the doctor said, as they are in heathen lands.

An Artificial Earthquake Caused a Panic in Shenandoah, Pa., on Friday morning. Coal Street in that city lies directly over the Kohinoor Colliery, and the excavations underneath have left a mere crust resting on pillars of coal. These pillars have been robbed rather extensively of late, and about three o'clock on Friday morning there was an alarming subsidence of an area on which sixty families lay sleeping. The first shock separated one house from the house adjoining, carrying away a gable from the latter. The cracking of timbers and the fall of plaster aroused the family, and they gave the alarm. The wildest excitement prevailed. The earth did not fall in, but the sinking has done heavy damage, estimated at over two hundred thousand dollars. The catastrophe was clearly due to the weakening of the pillars underneath, and those who did it deserve punishment. There are men engaged in a similar occupation in the Church. The faith of many is being insidiously undermined, and that, too, by men whose business it is to strengthen it (II Peter 2: 1-3).

The Alternative of Working or Drowning is to be offered to tramps caught henceforward in Westchester County, New York. On Thursday last a member of the Board of Supervisors moved a resolution providing for the erection of a new building on the county farm for the reception of tramps, who have recently become very numerous and impudent in that locality. The novel feature of the building is "the tramp pit," which, according to the plans submitted, consists of a number of water-tight compartments that can be flooded with water to the height of six feet. When a tramp is caught the justice or magistrate is required to sentence him to this "tramp pit." He is to be placed in one of these compartments and the water is to be turned on. To save his life he must bail the water out as fast as it comes in or, in the language of the resolution, "be submerged thereby." The Board, it must be supposed, does not intend to drown the men, but merely to compel them to work, believing that even a tramp will work when he realizes that nothing else will save his life. They are probably right; men generally dread death so much that they will do anything rather than die. It is extraordinary that the second death does not appall them still more. It is infinitely more dreadful, yet they neglect the only way of escape (Rev. 21: 8).

A Wedding was Stopped by the Bridegroom at Danbury, Conn., recently. A despatch to the New York Sun from that city, dated December 17th, states that a wedding party there had just separated under embarrassing circumstances. The bridegroom was a young hatter residing in a town at some distance, who, having saved up a small sum of money to furnish a home, looked around for a wife. He was introduced at a dancing party to the Danbury young lady, and was attracted by her. He afterward met her at other parties, and after her return to her home corresponded with her. Finally an engagement was made and the wedding day fixed. The young hatter did not arrive until the morning of the day fixed for the ceremony. When he called upon his bride he acted like a man bereft of his senses. He had seen her only in the evening at parties, and when he saw her by daylight he scarcely knew her. Her complexion and general appearance not only amazed, but disgusted him. Declaring that he had been deceived, he rushed into the hall, snatched his hat, and quitted the house. There was no wedding, and the Fairfield County Court will have to try a breach of promise case shortly. The affair must have caused the bride much chagrin, especially if she was not conscious of her imperfections, and was therefore unprepared for her suitor's disappointment. If she had been, she must have dreaded that first meeting by daylight. Such dread need never disturb the Church, the bride of Christ. She knows that she is unworthy of Him, but on the day of the nuptials she will be without blemish (Eph. 5: 27).

A Life was Sacrificed for an Ox in the Wreck of the White on the Mississippi River on December 13th. The cargo of the steamer caught fire while on its way to New Orleans, and as it was laden with cotton and oil, it burned with great rapidity. The fire was discovered by the engineer, who shouted to alarm the watchman. The watchman rang a great bell, and the captain sent men through the ship to arouse the passengers. All sprang out of their beds and rushed on deck. Some jumped overboard and clung to the cotton bales which were thrown out until rescued by boats. Twenty-five lives were lost, however. Some of those who jumped overboard were drowned, owing to the eddies of the river, but some were burned to death. Among the latter was a Nebraska farmer, who had a valuable ox in charge. He was seen by the men in the boats trying to push his ox overboard. They called to him to leave the ox and jump for his life, and they would save him; but he refused. He continued his exertions to save the ox until the flames surrounded him and escape was impossible. The scene typifies the condition of the world. The general alarm has been sent out, messengers repeat it everywhere, a personal appeal is made and safety promised, yet men are concerned with their possessions rather than with their salvation, and die unsaved (Luke 14: 16-18).

A Remarkable Railroad Fatality is Recorded by the Springfield Republican. It states that at a dangerous crossing of the railroad station in that city a man has been employed to keep people from being run over. One day last week he was himself run over and killed. How it happened no one knows, but he was found near the track in a dying condition and unable to speak, at the time of the usual making up of one of the trains. It is not an unusual thing for an employé of the railroad to be injured or killed there—in fact, as they are less careful than the public in crossing the tracks, they are the most frequent sufferers. It is, however, most remarkable that the very man whose business it was to watch for danger to others should himself have fallen a victim to the danger. Probably he, like the other employés, became heedless, and suffered in consequence. To this danger other watchmen beside those employed on railroads are liable. Numerous scandals which have recently brought a reproach on the Church of Christ show that those who are set to watch for souls may themselves fall into grievous sin through neglecting to follow the apostolic example (I Cor. 9: 27).

A Brave Boy Rescued his Sister from a Life of shame last week in Cleveland, O. The police of that city received a visit on December 13th from a boy, who begged their aid under sad circumstances. He had come from Pittsburg, Pa., to seek for his sister, who had been enticed from home by a dissolute man and who, as he learned, was in Cleveland. His mother was a poor widow, and without means to institute a search for her daughter, so the brave lad set out in quest of her. He had travelled on freight trains part of the way, and had walked a considerable distance. After three days of hunting among disreputable resorts, he had found his sister in one of them. He had not been able to get her out of the place, so he sought the aid of the police, to whom he told his story with deep emotion. An officer went with him to the house, and through threats of arrest prevailed upon the keeper to produce the erring girl, who went home with her brother. She would have been an ingrate had she refused to do so after his long travel and toilsome exertions. He had not considered whether she was worthy of them, but she was his sister, and he wanted to save her. When the Gospel is proclaimed to erring men and they hear what our Elder Brother endured to save them, it is marvellous that any reject the salvation He purchased with His blood (Phil. 2: 6-8).

LOVE'S LAW AND LIFE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"If ye love me, keep my commandments."—JOHN 14: 15.

The Seven If's—Involving Vital Issues—I. A Very Serious If—A Physician's Dread—Love Precedes Obedience—The Mother of It—The Best Reason for It—The Need of the Question—Should be Answered Personally—Is Answerable—II. A Judicious Test—Not Lawless Liberty—Not a Fanatical Challenge—Why it is Given—A Proof of Loyal Reverence—Indicates Faith in a Living Presence—A Wife's Portrait in a Watch-case—III. The Test Endured—The Commandment Most Imperative?

THIS is a chapter singularly full of certainties, and remarkably studded with if's. Concerning most of the great things in it there never can be an "if;" and yet "if" comes up, I think, no less than seven times in the chapter; and "if," too, not about trifles, but about the most solemn subjects. It is, perhaps, worthy of mention that with each of these "if's" there is something connected, as following out of it, or appearing to be involved in it, or connected with it.

THE SEVEN "IFS."

Look at the second verse. "In My Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you." If there had been no place for us in the glory land Jesus would have told us. If there were anything yet to be revealed which would render your hope a delusion at the end, you should have been made acquainted with it; Jesus Himself would break the sad news to you; He would not leave you to be horrified by finding it out for yourselves; He kindly declares, "I would have told you."

Notice the third verse. Again we meet with "if," and its consequence. "If I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself." If the Lord Jesus should go away (and this is a supposition no longer, for He has gone), then He would return again in due time. Since He has gone, He will come again; for He has made the one to depend on the other. His homegoing pledges Him to come, and compels us to look for Him.

The next "if" comes at the beginning of the seventh verse: "If ye had known Me, ye should have known My Father also." If we really do know the Lord Christ, we know God. In fact, there is no knowing God aright except through His Son Jesus. It is evidently true that men do not long hold to theism pure and simple. If our scientific men get away from the Christ, the incarnate God, before long from God altogether. They begin to slide down the mountain when they quit the incarnate Deity, and there is no more foothold to stay them. No man comes to the Father but by the Son, and no man long keeps to the Father who does not keep to his faith in the Son.

The next variety of "if" you will find a little farther down in the chapter, namely, in the fourteenth verse: "If ye shall ask anything in My name, I will do it." The "if" in this case involves an uncertainty about our prayers, if an uncertainty at all. Taking it for granted that we ask mercies in the name of Jesus, a glorious certainty is linked thereto. Jesus saith, "I will do it." Oh that we might put the first "if" out of court by continually petitioning the Lord, and signing our petitions with the name of Jesus! May we be importunate only in prayers to which we are warranted to set that august name; and then boldly using His name and authority, we need be under no apprehension of failure.

Now comes the "if" of our text, of which I will say nothing for the moment. "If ye love Me, keep My commandments." Something, you see, is to come out of this "if" as out of all the others. If something, then something—"If ye love Me," then carry it out to the legitimate result: "keep My commandments."

You have the next "if" in verse twenty-three: "Jesus answered and said unto him, If a man love Me, he will keep My words." Respect to his wisdom, and obedience to his authority, will grow out of love. "The love of Christ constraineth us." We hear that passage often quoted, "The love of Christ ought to constrain us;" but that is a corruption of the text; the apostle tells us that it does constrain us; and if it really enters the heart, it will do so. It is an active, moving power influencing the inner life, and then the external conduct. "If a man love Me, he will keep My words."

The chapter almost closes at the twenty-eighth verse by saying, "If ye loved Me, ye would rejoice, because I said, I go unto My Father; for My Father is greater than I." Where there is an intelligent love to Christ we rejoice in His gains even though we ourselves appear to be losers thereby. The corporeal absence of our Lord from our midst might seem to be a great loss to us; but we rejoice in it because it is for His own greater glory.

So you see the chapter, if you read it, though enriched with heavenly certainties, is yet besprinkled with "if's." Like little pools of sparkling water among the ever abiding rocks, these "if's" gleam in the light of heaven, and refresh us even to look upon them. Let us now think of our own text, and may the Holy Spirit lead us into the secret chambers of it! "If ye love Me, keep My commandments."

I. To begin, then, the if in our text is—

A VERY SERIOUS IF.

It goes to the very root of the matter. Love belongs to the heart; and every surgeon will tell you that a disease of the heart may not be trifled with. A clever doctor said to me, "I feel at my ease with any matter if it does not touch the head or the heart." Solomon bids us keep the heart with all diligence, "for out of it are the issues of life." If the mainspring fails, all the works of a watch refuse to act. We cannot, therefore, think little of a question which concerns our love, for it deals with a vital part. Oh friends, I hope there is no question about our love to Jesus.

Observe how our Saviour puts this if concerning love, in such a way as to teach us that love must be prior to obedience. The text is not, "Keep My commandments, and then love Me." No, we do not expect pure streams till the fountain is cleansed. Nor does He say, "Keep My commandments, and love Me at the same time," as two separate things, although that might in a measure correspond with truth. But love is put first, because it is first in importance and first in experience. "If ye love Me"—we must begin with love; then "keep My commandments." Obedience must have love for its mother, nurse, and food. The essence of obedience lies in the hearty love which prompts the deed rather than in the deed itself. I can conceive it possible that a man might, in his outward life, keep Christ's commandments, and yet might never keep them at all so as to be accepted before God. If he became obedient by compulsion, but would have disobeyed if he dared, then his heart was not right before God, and his actions were of little worth. The commandments are to be kept out of love to Him who gave them.

This matter of love to Jesus is put prior to every other because it is

to Him. Notice: "If ye love Me, keep My commandments." Personal affection will produce personal obedience. Do you not see the drift of the words? The blessed Jesus says, "If you love Me, keep My commandments;" because, truly, operative love is mainly love to a person, and love to our Lord's person begets obedience to His precepts. There are some men for whom you would do anything: you will to yield to their will. If such a person were to say to you, "Do this," you would do it without question. Perhaps he stands to you in the relation of master, and you are his willing servant. Perhaps he is a venerated friend, and because you esteem and love him, his word is law to you. The Saviour may much more safely than any other be installed in such a position. From the throne of your affections He says, "If ye love Me"—if really your hearts go out to Me—then let My word be a commandment; let My commandment be kept in your memory, and then further kept by being observed in your life.

It was greatly needful for our Lord thus to address His disciples. Yes, to speak thus even to the apostles. He says to the chosen twelve, "If ye love Me." We should never have doubted one of them. We now know by the result that one of them was a traitor to his Lord, and sold Him for pieces of silver; but no one suspected him, for he seemed as loyal as any one of them. Ah! if that question, "If ye love Me," needed to be raised in the sacred college of the twelve, much more must it be allowed to sift our churches, and to test ourselves. Perhaps you have almost taken it for granted that you love Jesus; but it must not be taken for granted. Some of you have been born in a religious atmosphere, you have lived in the midst of godly people, and you have never been out into the wicked world to be tempted by its follies; therefore you come to an immediate conclusion that you must assuredly love the Lord. This is unwise and perilous. I would have you fully assured of your love to Jesus, but I would not have you deceived by a belief that you love Him if you do not. Lord, search us and try us!

IT WAS NECESSARY

While considering the text, let each one view himself apart. What have you to do in this matter with keeping the vineyards of others? See to your own hearts. The preacher needs to be thus questioned; he gets into the habit of reading his Bible for other people. The Sunday-school teacher needs this inquiry; he, also, is apt to study the Scriptures rather for his class than for himself. We all need the truth to come home to us with personal and forcible application, for we are always inclined to shift unpleasant inquiries upon others. Let the text sound into your individual ear and heart: "If ye love Me, keep My commandments."

THE QUESTION IS ANSWERABLE,

however. It was put to the apostles, and they could answer it. Peter spoke as all the eleven would have done when he said, "Thou knowest that I love Thee." It is not a question concerning mysteries out of range and beyond judgment; it deals with a plain matter of fact. A man may know whether he loves the Lord or not, and he ought to know. He who is jealous of himself, and is, therefore, half afraid to speak positively, may all the more truly be a lover of the Lord. Not to know whether you love the Lord Jesus is a state of mind so dangerous that I exhort you never to go to sleep till you have escaped from it. It ought to be decided. It can be decided. It can be decided at once.

II. In the second place, let me observe that which is proposed in the text is a very judicious one. "If ye love Me, keep My commandments." This is the best proof of love. The test does not suggest a lawless liberty. It is true we are not under the law, but under grace; but yet we are under law to Christ, and if we love Him we are to keep His commandments. Let us never enter into the counsel of those who do not believe that there are any commandments for believers to keep. Those who do away with duty do away with sin, and consequently with the Saviour. He that is not under the law as a power for condemnation, yet can say that with his heart he delights in the law of God; he longs after perfect holiness, and in his soul yields hearty homage to the precepts of the Lord Jesus. Love is law; the law of love is the strongest of all laws. Christ has become our Master and King, and His commandments are not grievous.

The text also contains no fanatical challenge. Hermits, nuns, and all other religious mad-caps find no example or precept here. Every now and then we find members of our churches who must needs leave their trades and their callings to show their love for Jesus ; children may starve and wives may pine, but their

must be carried out for love of Jesus. Under this influence they rush into all sorts of foolery, and soon ruin their characters because they will not take the advice of sobriety, and cannot be satisfied with the grand test of love which our Lord Himself herein lays down. The text does not condemn these light-headed projects in detail, but it does so in the gross by proposing a far more reasonable test—"If ye love Me, keep My commandments."

Do not spin theories in your excited brains, and vow that you will do this desperate thing and the other. The probability is that you are not seeking the glory of the Lord, but you are wanting notoriety for yourself. You are aiming at supreme devotion that you may become a distinguished person, and that people may talk about your superior saintship. You may even go so far as to court persecution from selfish motives. The Saviour, who was wise and knew what was in men, and knew also what would be the surest test of true love to himself, says, "If ye love Me, keep My commandments." This is a much more difficult thing than to follow out the dictates of a crazy brain.

Why does the Saviour give us this as a test? I think that one reason is, because it is one which tests whether you are loving Christ in His true position, or whether your love is to a Christ of your own making, and your own placing. I am afraid that a great many people know a Christ who is meek and lowly, their servant and Saviour ; but they

DO NOT KNOW THE LORD

Jesus Christ. Alas, my friends, such people set up a false Christ ! We do not love Jesus at all if He is not our Lord and God. If you love Jesus aright, you view His every precept as a divine commandment. You love the true Christ if you love a commanding Christ as well as a saving Christ, and look to Him for the guidance of your life as well as for the pardon of your sin.

This test, again, is very judicious, because it proves the living presence of the object of your love. Love always desires to have its object near, and it has a faculty of bringing its object near. If you love anybody, that person may be far away, and yet to your thoughts he is close at hand. Love brings the beloved one so near that the thought of him acts upon its life. A gentleman has faithful servants ; he goes away, and leaves his house in their charge ; he has gone abroad, and yet he is at home to his servants, for every day their work is done as if he were there to see.

HE IS COMING

home soon ; they hardly know when, but they keep all things in readiness for his return, let it happen when it may. They are not eye-servants, and so they work none the less because he is absent. If he does not see them, yet the eyes of their love always see him, and therefore they work as if he were at home. Their affection keeps him ever near. Jesus seems to say, "If you love Me, now that I am gone you will do as you would have done if I were still with you, and looking at you. You will continue to keep My commandments, as in My presence."

It is a most judicious test, again, because, by keeping our Lord's commandments, we are doing that which is most pleasing to Him, and will most glorify Him. Some enthusiastic Methodist cries—

"Oh, what shall I do my Saviour to praise?"

Hearken, my brother : if you love your Saviour, keep His commandments. This is all you have to do, and a great all, too. Among the rest, you may come and be baptized, while you are thus earnest to praise your Lord. "If ye love Me, keep My commandments." There is the answer to every rapturous inquiry. You cannot do your Lord so great a favor, or, in the long run, bring to Him so real an honor, as by a complete, continual, hearty obedience to every one of His commandments.

But, indeed, I need not stand here and argue. When a friend is dying, and he asks you to prove your love by such and such a deed, he may ask what he wills ; you

GIVE HIM CARTE BLANCHE.

It may be the simplest thing or the hardest thing ; but if he will prescribe it as a test of love, you will not say him nay. If your wife should say to you, "You are going to journey far from me, and I shall not see you again for many days ; I beg you therefore to carry my portrait within your watch-case," you would not fail to do so. It would be a simple thing, but it would be sacred to you. Baptism and the Lord's Supper will never be slighted by those whose hearts are fully possessed with love to Jesus. They may seem trifles, but if the Lord Jesus commands them they cannot be neglected. To leave off your wedding-ring might be no great crime ; and yet no loving wife would do it ; even so, none who regard outward ordinances as love-tokens will think of neglecting them. Ours not to ask for reasons, ours not to dispute about whether the deed is essential or non-essential ; ours to obey right lovingly.

III. Time has well-nigh gone, or we would dwell upon the third head, which we must now leave, only praying God to prove the truth of it. The third head was this : true love will

ENDURE THIS TEST.

"If ye love Me, ye will keep My commandments." This is the Revised Version, and I hope it will be written out in capitals upon our revised lives ! We will obey, we must obey, since we love Him by whom the command is given.

Come, then, brothers and sisters, as the time has gone, let me say this much to you. If you love Christ, set to work to find out what His commandments are. Study the Scriptures upon every point upon which you have the slightest question. This sacred oracle must guide you. Next, be always true to your convictions about what Christ's commandments are. Carry them out at all hazards, and carry them out at once.

Take note of every commandment as it concerns you. Let me mention one or two, and beg you to obey them as you hear them. "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." Is not this a call to you, my brother, to be a missionary?

DO YOU HEAR IT?

Will you not say, "Here am I ; send me?" Another person has come into this house to-night full of enmity ; somebody has treated him very badly, and he cannot forget it ; I pray him to hear the Lord's command : "Therefore if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee ; leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way ; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift." And, again : "Little children, love one another." If any of you are in debt, obey this commandment : "Owe no man anything, but to love one another." If you neglect the poor, and live in a niggardly way, hear this commandment : "Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away." At the back of all comes this, "If ye love Me, keep My commandments." I might stop here all night, and mention, one after another, the commandments which would be specially applicable to each one of my hearers ; but I pray the Holy Ghost to bring all things to your remembrance.

If there be a commandment which you do not relish, it ought to be a warning to you that there is something wrong in your heart that needs setting right. If ever you quarrel with one of Christ's commands, end that quarrel by specially attending to it beyond every other. The point is to throw your whole soul into that very duty wherein you are most tempted to be slack. Jesus does not say, if ye love Me, keep this commandment or that, but out of love obey every command.

Many of you do not love my Lord Jesus Christ. I have not preached to you, but that very fact should make you thoughtful. Go home and consider that the preacher said nothing to you because you do not love the Lord Jesus Christ, and therefore cannot keep His commandments. Oh, may God the Holy Ghost lead you to repent of not loving Jesus, who is the altogether lovely One, and the great lover of men's souls ! Oh that you may begin to love Him at once ! Amen and Amen.

AN ALPINE TRAGEDY.*

THE great Pasterzen Glacier rises in Western Austria and flows into Carinthia, and is fourteen or seventeen miles long as you measure it from its birth in the snow-field or from where it begins to move from the higher snows, and its active course is marked from the first wrinkle. It flows in a steady sweep, a grand avenue guarded by giant mountains, steep and wide, a prototype, huge and undesigned, of the Giant's Stairway in the Venice Palace. No known force can block its path ; it would need a cataclysm to reverse its progress. What falls upon it moves with it, what lies beneath it moves with it ; no meteor of the air is so irresistible. Men have learned to congregate on its shores and admire. Scientists stick staves into the ground and appraise the majesty of its motion ; at supper they tell stories of their prowess, pay money to the guides who have protected them, and fall asleep from weariness.

Mrs. Knollys was a young English bride, sunny-haired, hopeful-eyed, who had come to Switzerland with her beloved husband, Charles Knollys, on their wedding-tour. She was eighteen and he twenty-one. Charles was a short foot taller than his wife, with much the same hair and eyes, thick, flossy whiskers, broad shoulders, and a bass voice. This was five and forty years ago. When Mrs. Knollys went to Switzerland last summer she was three and sixty. They first saw the great mountains from the summit of the Schafberg. This is a little height, three-cornered, between three lakes.

Mr. and Mrs. Knollys were seated on a couch of Alpine roses behind a rhododendron bush watching the sunset. A modern lady would have been talking of the scenery, giving word-color pictures of the view ; but Mrs. Knollys had been looking at her husband, and talking with him of the cottage they had bought in a Surrey village, and thinking how the little carvings and embroideries would look there which they had bought abroad ; and, indeed, Mrs. Charles secretly thought Box Hill an eminence far preferable to the Venediger, and Charles's face an infinitely more interesting sight than any lake, however expressive. Three days later Charles Knollys, crossing with her the lower portion of the Pasterzen Glacier, slipped into a crevasse and vanished utterly from view.

The young girl, bride and widow at eighteen, sought to throw herself into the clear, blue gulf ; she refused to leave Heiligenblut ; she would sit tearless by the edge of the crevasse day by day and gaze into its profundity. A guide or man was always with her at these times, for it was still feared that she would follow her young husband to the depths of that still sea. Her aunt went over from England to her ; the summer waxed, autumn storms set in, but no power could win her from the place whence Charles had gone.

If there was a time worse for her than that first moment, it was when they told her that his body never could be found. They did not dare to tell her this for many days, but busied themselves with idle cranes and ladders, and made futile pretences with ropes. Some of the big, simple-hearted guides even descended into the chasm, absenting themselves for an hour or so, to give an idea that something was being done.

Mrs. Knollys went back to the little cottage in Surrey and lived there. She rarely went out. There was no place where she could go to think of him. If he had only been buried in some quiet English churchyard, she thought, they would then be separated for her short life alone. Now it seemed to her that they were far apart forever.

But late the next summer she had a letter from the place. It was from Dr. Zimmermann. It told her that he had given a year's study to the place; with all his instruments of measurement he had tested the movement of the glacier, and believed that her husband's body might yet be found, though not for many years. This letter made Mrs. Knollys better; it made her willing to live; it made her almost long to live until old age, that her Charles' body might be given back. After the professor's letter she never quite seemed to realize that her husband was dead. Was he not coming back to her? I think she grew to imagine his presence. Charles still lived to her as her young love had fancied he would be. She would fancy his doing this or that with her; how he would joy in this good fortune or share her sorrows, which were few, mercifully. At sixty she thought of him as an old person, too, sitting by their fireside, late in life, mature, deep-souled, wise with the wisdom of years, going back with her fondly to recall the old happiness of their bridal journey, when they set off for their happy honeymoon abroad, and life stretched brightly before them both.

In the summer of 1882 Mrs. Knollys went back to Carinthia. If the calculations of the professor were correct, this would be the time when the depths into which Charles slipped would be uncovered by the movement of the glacier.

The sun had not yet risen one morning when she came, and she sat a long time in the cavern listening to the murmur of the river flowing under the glacier at her feet. Slowly the dawn began, and she seemed to see the shimmer of a face—such a face as one sees in the coals of a dying fire. Then the full sun came over the eastern mountain, and the guide heard a woman's cry. There before her was Charles Knollys! Safe in the clear ice, still, un mutilated, there lay—not her Charles; not the Charles of her own thought, who had lived through life with her and shared her sixty years; not the old man she had borne thither in her mind, but a boy—a boy of one and twenty lying asleep.

There he was in his quaint coat, of the fashion of half a century before; his blue eyes open; his young, clear brow; and she, his bride, stood there to welcome him with her wrinkles, her bent form and thin white hairs. She was living, he was dead, and she was two and forty years older than he. Then at last the long-pent-up tears came to her, and she bent her white head in the snow. The old man came up with his pick silently and began working in the ice. The woman lay weeping, and the boy lay motionless under the clear ice veil.

In the little Surrey churchyard there are now two graves and a single stone to Charles Knollys and Mary his wife; and the boy of twenty-one sleeps there with his bride of sixty-three.

No one could have been kinder to a little girl than Mr. and Mrs. Fletcher were to little Effie, but Effie was not happy. A day or two with grandpa and grandma had always been a great treat, and papa and mamma used to say that the old folks spoiled her, which Effie did not believe; but when it came to spending a year with them, Effie did not enjoy it at all. Effie was cheerful when she bade mamma good-by on board the steamer, and was not depressed by the knowledge that mamma and papa would not return from Europe for a year, but she was crying bitterly to go home before the first week was gone.

Neither of the old people saw the tears; only little Scipio, Effie's black kitten, witnessed them; but they saw the little swollen face and heavy eyes, and were not slow to infer what had gone before. They were much concerned about it, for Effie was their only grandchild and very dear to them.

"I'll take her for a drive to-morrow," said Mr. Fletcher, "and see if that will cheer her."

But to-morrow was wet and cold, and when Mr. Fletcher looked out of the window before he dressed and saw the character of the day, he said no more about taking Effie. His remarks, however, had more effect on his wife than she chose to let him see, and Effie, instead of being taught to read or sew, was taken up-stairs to help grandma look over her stores of relics—an occupation in which every child takes delight. Grandma had saved everything she had ever possessed that did not wear out. The queerest ear-rings, brooches, buckles, bracelets, and even the quaint dresses that grandma wore when she was a girl, were all carefully treasured up and protected from the ravages of moths. Effie forgot all about home and the trouble of yesterday in her exploration. Her delight knew no bounds when she was shown a dress that grandma wore when she was quite a grown up young lady to go to a Christmas party.

"But it was too short, grandma," said Effie. "It is only just big enough for me."

"Oh, no, child, it is much too large for you; but we used to wear them quite short then."

"Do let me put it on, grandma, it is so funny."

So Effie put it on, and wonderfully pretty the plump, infantile form looked in the quaint finery of sixty years ago—just like one of Lel's beauties who had stepped from the canvas and become endowed with life. Effie found the dress too long, of course. Her tiny feet just showed beneath it, and the sleeves had to be pushed up to leave her hands free; but she looked in it, as Mrs. Fletcher said, "as pretty as a picture." She capered about, turning this way and that to try the effect, and insisted on grandpa showing her how to make the stately, old-fashioned courtesy that was expected of young ladies in her young days. Then Effie begged to keep the dress on until grandpa came home, to see what he would say.

Effie was not disappointed in thinking that grandpa would be interested. His astonishment and amusement were inexpressible. He would not suffer the dress to be taken off, but kept Effie in sight all the evening, looking at her admiringly.

"Takes me back to the old times," he said. "Why, mother, I remember seeing you in a dress just like that almost the first time I saw you at all. Dear, dear, I was a boy then, but it seems like yesterday. Very much like you she looks, too. How you have changed since then!"

"So have you," said the old lady, sharply. "If you'd looked then as you do now, do you think I should have married you? You've got no cause to grumble."

"No, no, I don't complain; we've grown old together. I'm as proud of you now as I was then. I hope Effie will turn out as good as you have." And actually the old man crossed the room and gave his wife a kiss.

"I wish her father could see her like that," said the old lady, mollified by her husband's affection.

"Well, he shall see the next best thing to it," said Mr. Fletcher. "We'll have her picture taken and send it to him. He'll like that better than any of the old masters he thinks so much about, I'll be bound."

The old man kept his word. Effie had the old dress on the next day, and was carried off to the photographer's, where, seated in an old-fashioned chair to correspond with the dress, and with a pair of eye-glasses in her hand, she was photographed with Scipio by her side. She knew who the picture was for, and the thought of mamma and papa so far away would keep coming into her mind and effaced the bright, roguish look from her eyes that grandpa thought so charming. But it was a pretty picture, and Mr. Fletcher was quite right in predicting that no Old Master's production could compete with it in the eyes of those for whom it was taken.

A large copy specially prepared and elegantly framed soon made its appearance in grandpa's own room, where he would sit and look at it, his thoughts busy with scenes long past.

"Wonder how we'll look in heaven, mother?" he said one day, after meditating in silence for some time. "Do you think we'll grow young again up there? That's just your face as you used to be."

"I guess we'll know each other, however we look," said the old lady. "When we see the Lord as He is we'll be changed, but the Lord will know every one, and if we are in any doubt we can ask Him."

THE FRIENDS AT ASPENDALE.

A SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

A Mysterious Sufferer.

THROUGH the crisp and bracing air strode Simon Holmes, summoned, as we have seen, to the darkened chamber in which lay the sorely-stricken daughter of the lord of Aspen Towers. The sun, even on that late autumn morning, had come forth from his chamber rejoicing as a strong man to run a race, and was now pouring his beams upon the landscape with unstinted grace and with almost a summertime of power.

The foliage of the grand old trees in Aspen Chase was brightly burnished by his radiance, and their robes, lately green with summer glory, were now, like the cohorts of Assyria, "gleaming in purple and gold." The morning mist lay on the carpet of greensward in veils of sheeny silver, except in the more open glades where it rose in filmy diaphanous folds, slowly evaporating beneath the ardent glances of the sun. Here and there the musical matins of the blackbird and the mellow notes of other woodland warblers were heard as if each one "with sweet delight would greet the morn."

Arrived at the Hall, Simon was admitted with a hearty welcome by a comely, modest-looking maid who had Miss Ethel under her care. "Good-morning, father," said Nancy Holmes, kissing the old man with much affection. "I am so glad you've come, Miss Ethel does want to see you."

"Good-mornin', Nance, an' God bless yo', dear lassie. It's that 'at can mak' all mornin' 's good, an' evenin' 's too, hooiver dark the neet draws roond. What about your young mistress? Is she any better, think yo'?"

Nancy shook her head, and with a grave look on her face, and unbidden tears in her eyes, replied, "Worse, father, I think, though she says she's better. I'll go and tell her you are come."

Simon sat in the house-keeper's parlor waiting for Nancy's return; waiting, too, on God the while for Miss Ethel's sake. On the table lay a New Testament. He turned the pages over, thinking of the young girl who lay overhead on the uttermost borderland between life and death. His eyes caught sight of the words, "Damsel, I say unto thee, Arise."

"And why not?" said Simon, aloud. His religion was as downright as his character. He really had what many only profess to have—faith in Christ, the Wonder-worker. He could not doubt that He was as near and as ready to stretch forth the hand of power as He was in the days of His flesh if He was not hindered now as then, "because of unbelief." With Simon, to think was to act, and at once the cry escaped his lips, "Say it, Lord! say it! 'Is anything too hard for the Lord?'" Simon had risen to his feet as if to get a firmer hold on Him with whom Jacob wrestled until break of day. He found Sir Godwin standing before him with a wondering look upon his haggard face.

"Say what, Simon Holmes?" said the baronet. "The death sentence hath been said. All other words come too late. My darling's dying, and I am left without a hope—without a hope!" Then the strong man bowed himself; proud as he was the tears fell, and rich as he was he felt himself poor even to beggary in spite of all his wealth. There he stood, the very image of despair.

Honest Simon's sympathies were kindled to a white heat. He looked longingly at the baronet, as though he would fain impart something that was a power in himself. He pointed with trembling finger to the sacred page of the inspired Book, and read the narrative of the raising of Jairus's daughter from the fifth chapter of Mark's Gospel.

Sir Godwin Spofforth, Baronet, had no word in reply. He could only stand awe-struck and silent in the presence of the old carpenter's sublime simplicity of faith, and mourn, as he did just then, most truly, that there was no such link between himself and the All-controlling power. He felt strangely constrained to cry, "Lord, help my unbelief!"

Meanwhile Nancy had come to summon her father to the chamber wherein the sick maiden lay. Simon ascended the wide staircase with the step of a conscious conqueror. He entered the room in which for long and weary months there had been a hand-to-hand struggle between life and death across the fluttering heart of the fair young girl not yet out of her teens, who, lying there with that dark shadow on her, had sought and found the higher life that can never, never die. He entered the chamber, assured that he should find the Good Physician by her bed, and half-expecting to hear the omnipotent TALITHA CUMI then and there!

In a large and richly-furnished chamber, surrounded by all the tokens of luxury and wealth, Ethel Spofforth, the fair daughter of a noble house, lay pale and all but helpless in the grip of what the great physician from London himself had acknowledged to be a mysterious disease. For twelve long and weary months the amiable girl had lain upon her bed, held fast in almost every limb by a pitiable paralysis of nerve and muscle, which reduced her to almost infantile dependence upon others. Her mind, ever clear and bright, was, strange to say, still clear and bright, and that even to an unusual degree.

This singular affliction appeared to date from the time when Ethel's mother, a wise and gentle woman, to whom the girl was attached by a love of extraordinary strength, was suddenly snatched out of life by the relentless hand that lays its grasp on all in turn, whether they dwell in castle or in cot. When Lady Spofforth was being laid in the family vault beneath the chancel floor of the ivy-covered church of Thorpe Aspen, amid all due pomp and pageantry of woe, the loving and gentle Ethel was wrestling with a spasm of grief that locked up or dried the fount of tears. Then it was that this dread affliction seized her; and it had held her in its deadly clasp all the time, up to that bright autumnal morning when Simon, in response to Ethel's special call, was standing by her bed.

The baronet, shaken to the very centre of his being by this double visitation, had exhausted all the resources of medical skill in his efforts to rescue his darling from the power of the grave. Of her it might be truly said, as of an earlier sufferer, that "she had suffered many things of many physicians, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse." Nurse after nurse, too, had been tried and found wanting, either in tact, or strength, or sympathy, or patience, or fidelity, until, in order to fill a positive gap in the succession, the strong, sensible, sympathetic daughter of the village carpenter had volunteered her services, and proved herself, as Ethel declared, to be worth her "weight in gold."

Certain it is that in one respect Nancy Holmes had brought her beloved young mistress a good which no gold could buy. The Gospel grace which endows with superior wealth both rich and poor had been the strength of Lady Spofforth's life, and had brought her peace and triumph in the hour of death. This fact rendered Nancy Holmes's self-imposed task all the easier, for when that simple village maiden sought to lead her helpless charge to cast herself upon the tender love and pity of her Saviour, she found the young girl's mind and heart prepared by her sainted mother's teaching. And so it came to pass that on her sick-bed the fair Ethel was led by Nancy to open her young heart for the incoming and indwelling of the tender and compassionate Friend Divine.

So the light came to Ethel Spofforth. The sacred torch glowing on the hearth of the village carpenter, borne in the hands of a simple serving-maid, kindled the holy flame in the home of rank and wealth. The heiress and her humble servitor were co-heiresses by a genealogy of which no Heralds' College knows the secret; joint owners of a funded property free from all the fluctuations of the market; a fair estate unknown to the geographer, unmapped by any survey under the sun; a genealogy which linked them to the Divine; an estate which could never pass from their possession; a fortune which would take a whole eternity to spend.

One great grief, however, still oppressed the suffering girl, a grief so keen, so deep, that her pillow was often wet with tears. Her brother Harold, spurning all paternal counsel, defying all effort at control, had bidden, as it seemed, farewell to all the paths of rectitude and reason; and had embarked on a career so reckless as to threaten himself with near and utter ruin, and his name and family with enduring shame. During his long residence at Oxford he had fallen into evil hands; had now himself become a tempter and misleader of others. His latest success in this sad devilry, had to do with Alfred Atheling, the son of the widow, and the brother of Ethel's friend, Clara Atheling, who, next to Simon was of all outsiders most welcome by her bed. Ethel's mind was full of her erring brother now as Simon entered her chamber.

"Good-mornin', Miss Ethel," said the old carpenter, softly but cheerily, as he took his place beside her bed. He had often been summoned of late to speak words of counsel, and good cheer, to the maiden who was supposed even then to be gliding into the valley of the shadow of death, and to pray with her as one whose name was Israel, having "power like a prince to prevail." "I can see, even in this shadow, that you are better. Oh, Miss Ethel! God often mak's us to see i' the shadow better than we can see i' the shine. Am I right?"

"You are right in both ways, Simon," said the invalid, quietly and with a smile. "I am better, though I can see that those about me are not of the same opinion; and I have seen, and do see, in my shadowed life, bright visions and rich gleams, such as I never saw in the sunshine, and such as I cannot describe."

"I know," said Simon, as though he and she were living much on the same plane. "Un-speakable things which it isn't lawful for man to utter, eh? That's hoo Paul felt when he was cowl't up into the third heaven. Do you know, I think some tahmes 'at he wasn't really cowl't up at all, but that i' some of his 'perils' an' 'watchin's' an' sitch like, when his troubles was ten times woss than common, his gracious Lord just gav' him a rush o' compensation an' joy, so that whether he was i' the body or oot of it, he couldn't tell. I've felt a good deal like it myself some tahmes. A tremendous big wave comes like a green monster, all froonin' wi' foam, but it only lifts the ship up, up, up, an' the crew get a better sight o' the blue owerhead, an' o' the haven where they would be."

"Well, Simon, I don't feel as though I have many 'perils' and troubles of my own. At least I can say, 'His grace is sufficient for me.' But oh, Simon, my poor, poor brother Harold! It seems as though I can do nothing but pray for him, all the day and all the wakeful night. I was doing that when you came in."

"Was yo' noo?" said Simon, lapsing into broad vernacular, as he always did when he was greatly stirred. "But, I say, Miss Ethel, there's them 'at says it's all a pack o' nonsense; an' when we come to look at it, by t' leet o' reason, they maun be right."

"Whatever do you mean, Simon?" said Ethel, opening her eyes in wonder.

"Why, all this prayin' for fooaks an' things. It's all a fancy an' a delusion I hear. That poor fayther, the ruler o' the synagogue, he didn't get much, did he, when he prayed so hard an' wi' so many tears for his little dower? That poor woman up Sidonway, that prayed for a few crumbs from under the table, funnd her poor sick lassie as bad as iver when she got home again, didn't she? an' when a poor sister like Mary went weepin' to Jesus aboot her brother, it wasn't a bit o' use, was it? Noo, why is it, think yo', 'at you an' me can't just be content to believe 'at this world an' all that's in it is just under a hap-hazard, happy-go-lucky, an' sadly-go-unlucky gover'ment o' chance?"

"Because we know better, Simon," said the patient and peaceful sufferer, her face irradiated with a smile not born of earth.

"Hey, dear soul, that's just where it is. We knoa. Them 'at talks i' that way may raise doots an' questions, an' stummle at this, an' boggle at that, an' give t' other the go-by; but it's because they don't knoa. The secret o' the Lord is wi' them that fear Him, an' them 'at hezn't it's o' no more use in a witness-box on that subject then a blind man on a question o' color, or a deaf man in a dispute aboot t' comparative sweetness of a fiddle an' a bugle-horn. We knoa, as you say, an' you an' me 'll just go on trustin' an' prayin' an' waitin' on Him at says, 'Call on Me in the day of trouble, an' I will deliver thee.' He either means it or He doesn't. If He doesn't, why, there's nowt for it but just to shut up t' Bible an' drift doon i' the dark. But if He does, then He means it oot an' 'oot, an' t' biggest faith 'll fetch the biggest blessing from the throne of God. Oh, Miss Ethel! Neither your prayers nor mine can stop midway on the rooad te heaven. They're winged wi' faith that's stronger than an eagle's wing, an' accordin' to oor faith it shall be done. Mr. Harold's within the reach of his sister's God, an' it's my belief that his sister will live to fetch him home."

A faint blush of excitement overspread Ethel's pale cheeks as she listened to the old carpenter's hopeful words. With the simplicity and calm of a trusting child she clasped her thin white hands, raised her large blue eyes, that had a holy light in them, to heaven, and softly prayed "Father in heaven! Grant it in Thy mercy, for my Saviour's sake!"

"Amen!" said Simon. "Amen, Lord, so be it!" And it seemed to both that the sanction of the King was set like a seal to their united prayer.

Even while Simon spoke, the baronet's carriage, which had been to Chilworth Station to fetch the great physician, drew up at the door of Aspen Towers. Kneeling by the bedside, Simon Holmes besought a blessing on the doctor's visit, and retired with the words upon his lips that he had read to Sir Godwin from the Divine Book, "Lord, come and lay Thy hands upon her, that she may be healed, and she shall live."

Simon Holmes made haste homeward through the park. The sun was high in the heavens, its rays were gilding brightly the many-colored foliage of oak and beech and birch and sycamore, investing them with a more excellent glory in their season of decay than ever they had worn in the quickening spring-time, or the strong summer-tide of life. Just so, thought Simon, hath the Sun of Righteousness made the weak and helpless maiden "most beautiful, most fair," when most near the winter-time of death. Then he thought of the man of skill, standing, it might be, even then by the sick girl's bed, and there and then he stood and bared his head, and linking himself by faith to the throne of Him that kindles and sustains the sun's great heart of fire, he prayed aloud: "Shine down, O Sun! Shine into that darkened chamber! O Sun of Righteousness, arise with healing in Thy wings!"

Then pursuing his way, he found himself unconsciously repeating the words he had read to the silent and wondering Sir Godwin: "And He took the damsel by the hand, and said unto her, Talitha cumi, which is, being interpreted, Damsel, I say unto thee, Arise. And straightway the damsel arose, and walked; for she was of the age of twelve years. And they were astonished with a great astonishment." "Yes," said the old carpenter, as he involuntarily quickened his steps in answer to the growing lightness of his heart, a beaming smile resting on his face the while, "Yes, He hesn't given up astonishin' fooaks yet. The Lord nivver put that glorious little story i' the Book to mock poor weepin' parents with a sheer impossibility; or to mak' 'em wonder why He doesn't do sitch things noo; or to mak' 'em wish 'at they'd lived i' them times instead of these. It's there with a purpose. If oor faith hez no mair strength in it than a strand of untwisted tow, we limit Him an' hamper Him, an' rob oor selves o' mony an'

mony a famous blessin'; but if we wad let Him spin us a seven-twined rope o' faith, an' then pull with a will an' a niver-leave-off-till-we-get-it, He would astonish us, He would astonish us with a great astonishment. Nowt so sure!"

"Well, Simon," said Rebecca, as she greeted him at the door. "What do yo' think o' the poor gell? Hez the great doctor come?"

"Yes, 'Becca, the Greatest of All doctors is there; an' it's my belief," said Simon, with an emphasis on every word, "that He hez said, or will say, 'Talitha cumi.'"

"Oh, Simon! That will be astonishin'," said Rebecca, with eyes glistening with tears, for she, at any rate, had faith in Simon's word.

"Just what I've been sayin'," said he, "that's the Wonder-worker's way."

CREATION AND REST.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 2, Gen. 1: 26-31; 2: 1-3. Golden Text, 1: 31.

Four Important Words—Creation Culminating in Man—The Life-giving Spirit—The Three-fold Operation—Light, Division, Life—Reproduction but Not Evolution—The Climax of the New Creation—The Authority Given to Man—Extended in the New Creation—The God-appointed Ordinance—The Absence of Poisonous and Remedial Plants—The Institution of the Sabbath—Learning to Rest.

"In the beginning God." These are the first four words of God's revelation to man. He looks back and can say, "Before I, before my fellow-creatures, before the worlds, before the ages existed, there was God." "I am Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and the Ending," says He who "was in the beginning with God" (John 1: 2). "Of Him, and through Him, and to Him are all things" (Rom. 11: 36). There is no going back farther than God; there is no going forward into the future without meeting God there. "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." In a published volume entitled "Leaves from Genesis,"* we have formerly traced the analogy between the creation of the world and the new creation of man in Christ Jesus. But in tracing the broad lines of truth running through this chapter, we cannot but see how all creation culminates in man, just as man culminates in God. All created things were to serve the purpose of man, and man was to serve the purpose of God. Matter which God had previously created lay "waste and void" (R. V.) until the Spirit and the Word acted upon it. And just so it is with human reason and human energy—both are waste and void, as regards anything spiritual, until the Spirit of God moves upon the being and quickens the Word into a living voice in the soul. Apart from God, the thoughts of man are "vanity" (Ps. 94: 11) "waste and void." Apart from God, the energy of man is "as of one that beateth the air" (1 Cor. 9: 26). The Spirit of God, in unison with the Word, brings about

LIGHT, DIVISION, LIFE.

The "waste and void," the "darkness upon the face of the deep" yield to the incoming light, and day and night begin to succeed each other. Then the creative power of the Word brings about division, and by that power there comes order out of former confusion—the sky, the earth, the sea become defined and clear, and forms of life succeed one another, from the simple blade of grass to the highest forms of animal life. "The Lord by wisdom hath founded the earth; by understanding hath He established the heavens. By His knowledge the depths are broken up, and the clouds drop down the dew" (Prov. 3: 19, 20). Everything is in its own order; everything has reproductive power, yet no one form of life grows into a higher form of life; only the Spirit and the Word can produce each form. And so it is in the spiritual world, "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2: 14). The touch of God alone gives light, the touch of God alone brings order, the breath of God alone gives life; so the Spirit and the Word of God alone can produce in our souls fresh light or life. We may see something of God in a fellow Christian, and disquiet our souls in vain to produce it in ourselves, but only the Word of God quickened by His Spirit can speak it into being in our experience. But this He is waiting to do, if we will trust Him.

The climax of God's creation is man; the climax of His new creation is that mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to His saints; to whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles; which is

CHRIST IN YOU, THE HOPE OF GLORY.

God had looked out upon His fair creation; there was no flaw there; no hand but that of God had touched it, "and God saw that it was good." Sin, sorrow, death, decay were unknown in it; no breath of evil had passed over it. But the earth, although perfect and lovely was still empty; it lacked a master. And God, the Elohim, the Triune God, said, "Let Us make man in Our image, after Our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth." God had made "the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and everything that creepeth upon the earth after his kind," but man was not to be made after his kind, but after God's kind, "in Our image, after Our likeness."

MAN WAS CREATED TO PORTRAY GOD, to be a habitation of God, to breathe in and breathe out God. And so man has no independent existence even "in his kind." If he is not God's kind he will not be his own kind, but the devil's kind. His place is the place of dominion, the upper place on earth; he is to be above all that earth can be, or that earth can do—"I have overcome the world" (John 16: 33). "Be not overcome of evil" (Rom. 12: 21). "Sin shall not have dominion over you" (Rom. 6: 14). "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with My Father in His throne" (Rev. 3: 21). "He that overcometh shall inherit all things" (Rev. 21: 7). By creation, man had dominion over the serpent; by redemption Christ gave him "power (authority) . . . over all the power of the enemy" (Luke 10: 19). While man is thirsting for dominion over his fellow-man, and fretting impatiently against the authority of God over him, there is a sphere in which God confers dominion upon him—

A DOMINION WHICH IS INFINITELY MORE WORTH than that which he seeks for himself. A child frets impatiently against the control of parents and teachers; God gives him in Jesus, if he will take it, dominion over the very enemy who tempts him to this impatience. So "God created man in His image, in the image of God created He him; male and female created He them."

"And God blessed them," as He had blessed the fowls and fishes, saying, "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth," but He also added, "and subdue it; and have dominion." It is God's will for man and woman that they should marry, and that children should be born to them. There are some young people who always laugh when marriage is spoken of; some speak of it as a joke, and some as though it were impure. But it is the declared will of God; and it is a solemn and a blessed thing to be united in the Lord, and to bring up children for God. It may be the vocation of some to serve the Lord as single people, but the general rule of God is, "It is not good that the man should be alone."

Our loving God, in His fatherly kindness, provided food for His children. Surely, before the fall of man, poisonous plants, such as are now used for medicine, did not grow. "God said, Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat." What then about belladonna, hemlock, aconite, and other strong poisons? surely they could not have been in existence then! In these days of the creation, sickness is never mentioned, never provided for. He who created food and gave His blessing to it spoke nothing of remedies, for sickness was not a part of His creation. And for the beast, as well as for man, the vegetable kingdom was given. And God looked out upon His fair creation, and it was faultless, spotless—God "hath made every thing beautiful in his time" (Eccl. 3: 11)—"it was very good."

Six days were passed—days of creation; we are not told whether these days were of the same length as our present days, or whether, like the "day of salvation," and "the day of the Lord," they were extended periods; it matters not. "The heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them. And on the seventh day God ended His work which He had made, and He rested on the seventh day from all His work which He had made." When He had made man, He rested, for man was God's masterpiece. When He has found Christ in us, and so conformed us to His image, He can rest in us, for

CHRIST IN US IS GOD'S MASTERPIECE;

His ideal in its fulness and consummation. "And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it," i.e., set it apart from other days to Himself. Long before the law was given, and the command to keep the seventh day holy laid upon the children of Israel, God had given the Sabbath to the world. His thought concerning it was no special revelation to Israel. Every man has a birthright in the Sabbath day, and every beast which God has created has a right to the rest of the seventh day. There are on earth two classes of people—those who do not know how to work and those who do not know how to rest. To some, work of any kind is such a delight, the nervous energy they possess so drives them to it, that their difficulty is to keep Sabbath to rest as God would have them to do. There are others who are naturally listless, idle, without character, and to them the difficulty is to work; they would rather do nothing. This supineness is not rest, it is indifference. In face of the mighty needs of perishing souls, this listlessness is heartless. But when we learn to see God at work, and to know that only the works which are wrought in God can be of any avail,

THEN WE LEARN TO REST,

not in indifference, but in the consciousness that the work is being done by God. This is not the spirit of the sluggard, "Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep" (Prov. 24: 33), but that standing still to see the salvation of God, which finds one equipped and ready for action at the first word from the Master. Unless we work in the spirit of rest, knowing that the weight of responsibility rests on God, our work will wear us out. Unless we rest in the spirit of willingness for service whenever the Master shall call us, we shall rust out. God is at work now upon a new creation in Christ Jesus. We can only see the disorder of the workshop, confusion in the Church and in the world, many chips thrown away which, in our eyes, would be valuable, much retained which we should not value, in the way of men, time, money. When the Lord returns the work shall be made manifest, it shall be found to be "very good," and then the Lord will keep eternal Sabbath with His people.

A HAPPY CHRISTMAS TO YOU.

A HAPPY CHRISTMAS to you!

For the Light of Life is born,
And His coming is the sunshine
Of the dark and wintry morn.
The grandest orient glow must pale,
The lowliest western gleam must fail;
But His great light,
So full, so bright,
Arise for thy heart to-day:
His shadow-conquering beams shall never pass away.

A happy Christmas to you!

For the Prince of Peace is come,
And his reign is full of blessings,
Their very crown and sum.
No earthly calm can ever last,
'Tis but the lull before the blast;
But his great Peace
Shall still increase
In mighty, all-rejoicing sway;
His kingdom in thy heart can never pass away.

FERDINAND SCHIVEREA, the well-known Evangelist—Scenes in his Life and Work.

FERDINAND SCHIVEREA, The Open-Air Preacher.

God's Choice of Instruments—Schiverea's Birth and Early Life—A Negro Minstrel—Conversion under Mr. Moody—Employment in a Furniture Store—Studies in a Coal Cellar—Commences Open-Air Work—Threatened with a Revolver—Employed by Dr. Pentecost—Collecting a Congregation for a Church—Personal Work on the Streets and Ferries—The Bible Carriage.

THERE is no mistake more common among the churches than the mistake of supposing that profound learning and oratorical gifts are indispensable to usefulness in the Christian ministry. Of their value there can be no question, and Paul explicitly and earnestly urges Timothy to study and to seek earnestly the best gifts; but God can use the weakest and most ignorant instruments, and sometimes He uses them with more effect than those whom men consider better qualified for the service. He "has chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise;" "and the weak things to confound the things which are mighty." An instance in point is the man whose portrait appears this week on our first page.

Ferdinand Schiverea was born in New York in 1852. He is therefore now thirty-four years of age. His father was a Spanish Roman Catholic and his mother a Protestant. Ferdinand, though christened by Archbishop Hughes, was sent to a Protestant Sunday-school until he was about nine years old; and at that age he was taken from the public school and obliged to work on account of his father falling into drinking habits and reducing the family to poverty. Withdrawn from the religious influences which might have been brought to bear upon him by his mother, he grew up reckless and with little desire for spiritual things. Taking a liking for the stage, he made up his mind to prepare for it. Naturally gifted as a dancer and mimic, he bade fair to attain popularity as a performer. He obtained several engagements as (see illustration on first page, No. 1), and embraced every opportunity for better preparation. Spiritually he was in dense darkness, and at the time of his conversion, when twenty-four years of age, he had no hope in God and no care for salvation. Only a short time before his conversion he filled an engagement in a variety show with some ability and with every evidence of coming success.

A NEGRO MINSTREL

One evening in the year 1876 he, with others, received a ticket to Mr. Moody's meetings, then being held in the Brooklyn Rink. Out of curiosity he entered the Rink, and it was then and there that God met him and led him to see that He had something better in store for him than the career of a buffoon. He attended the meetings a few nights, and after a great struggle he was converted. From the very moment of his conversion he commenced to tell others what God had done for him. His brother George was converted about the same time. The two engaged a small house and fitted it up for prayer-meetings, and they would stand at the alley entrance, hailing all persons who passed by, and inviting them to the meetings in the upper room in the rear.

Abandoning the stage after his conversion, he succeeded in obtaining employment as packer in a furniture store, and spent his time hard at work of the building. The work was laborious, but Schiverea kept to it with a will, and without any regret for the days of comparative leisure he enjoyed while aspiring to the stage. Adjoining the basement was a coal cellar, and in the intervals of his work and during his dinner hour he would slip in there and study his Bible by the light that came down from the hole in the pavement above, through which the coals were delivered. (See illustration, No. 2.) For about three years he was thus employed, and during that time the coal cellar was the scene of earnest wrestling with God for light and strength to serve Him.

The result of his meditation and prayer was the conviction that God had called him to the work of evangelization. He promptly resolved to give up secular employment and devote himself exclusively to the work of telling the people who did not go to church the good things that God had done for him. He would become

A STREET PREACHER.

He left his occupation in the middle of the winter, with no money in store, without a dollar promised, trusting that God would feed and clothe him while he worked in His service. There was no need to inquire where non-churchgoers were to be found. Schiverea had belonged to that class himself, and knew where to find them. Day by day he took his way into the lowest quarters of Brooklyn, and on a street corner or in any place where there was a probability of people gathering he would stand and preach. Rough treatment, of course, Schiverea expected, and it was not an infrequent experience.

One day he had taken his stand outside a disreputable saloon which was being extensively patronized by men and boys, and began an earnest exhortation. A crowd soon collected—not to listen, but to jeer and ridicule. The young preacher was not to be silenced so, and the crowd from merriment passed to anger. Schiverea was mobbed and pelted, and at last one man, bolder and more reckless than the rest, drew his pistol, and holding it to Schiverea's head, warned him to desist if he did not wish to be shot. The excitement increased, and Dr. George F. Pentecost, who was passing, crossed to see what it was. The preacher's intrepidity excited his admiration, and he at once took the young man by the hand. That was the help Schiverea was needing, and it came just at the moment he needed it most. To the friendship and aid Dr. Pentecost gave him then, Schiverea is indebted for many of the opportunities he has since enjoyed of preaching the Gospel to large masses of people.

AN EVANGELIST

who had no objection to work in the slums, who could talk to the lowest class in their own slang, and who had no fear of mobs was precisely the man Dr. Pentecost had been seeking. One district of Brooklyn was notorious for its irreligion, and it had been sorely neglected. A work had been commenced there, a small Sunday-school established, and religious services occasionally held. This nucleus Dr. Pentecost was anxious should be extended, and a church built. Schiverea might perhaps aid in this enterprise, and Dr. Pentecost employed him. He worked the district thoroughly and with such success that Dr. Pentecost felt satisfied that as soon as a church was built there would be no doubt about its being filled. A commodious and substantial building (see illustration, No. 5) was built in Marcy Avenue near Ellery Street, and a pastor engaged. Mr. Schiverea preached in the street and invited his hearers to the church, frequently delivering an address or taking an entire service himself. The work grew and is still flourishing.

OPEN-AIR WORK,

however, was really Mr. Schiverea's vocation, and in that he could hope for success which might not attend a regular ministry. He is distinctively a pioneer adapted for the work of breaking up new ground on which other men can labor. It was a congenial occupation, and Mr. Schiverea was always happily busy about his Master's business. It mattered not where or when an opportunity came, he was ready to embrace it. On one occasion he entered into conversation with an aged man on a ferry-boat, and so earnestly did he plead and so effectively did God bless his appeal, that there and then the aged sinner was brought to his knees, and Schiverea knelt with him and prayed for his salvation. (See illustration, No. 4.)

On another occasion, being appealed to in the street for charity by a man evidently destitute and hungry, Schiverea turned into a bakery and bought the man several loaves. While the poor fellow satisfied his craving Schiverea talked to him of the Bread of Life, and eventually induced the man to put down the loaves and kneel down on the street and beg for mercy on his soul. (See illustration, No. 6.)

THE BIBLE CARRIAGE

(see illustration, No. 7) is one of his latest methods of reaching the people. The municipal authorities in our cities, while permitting gatherings in the streets for a variety of purposes, have an antipathy to preaching, and the street preacher has learned to dread the sight of a policeman almost as much as does a pick-pocket. Mr. Schiverea was so often "moved on" and interfered with in his work that he looked around for a method of evangelizing less liable to municipal molestation. Having heard of the success of Bible carriages in Europe, he decided upon that mode of work, and friends came to his aid in the purchase. A light wagon covered with Scripture texts, with a convenient standing place for a preaching platform, was secured and well stocked with Bibles. This Mr. Schiverea proposes to use in evangelistic work, going in it from place to place, preaching and disposing of his Bibles, and inviting his hearers to his Gospel services.

Mr. Schiverea has labored with success in New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Chicago, and other large cities in the United States and Canada. He is now in Toronto, where, for several weeks, his meetings have been crowded and much good has been done. One of his most enthusiastic admirers writes us that Mr. Schiverea "is fast coming to the front as one of those who God is especially using," but we may hope that Mr. Schiverea has no intention of coming to the front, but is desirous that his Lord and Master shall occupy that place.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Cruel Piece of Deception.—Mr. Paterson said at a recent meeting: "Two men worked side by side in the same establishment; one of them was a decided Christian, and he felt it his duty to speak to his companion, whom he had reason to believe was not a Christian, about the concerns of his soul, and when he did speak he was surprised to hear his friend exclaim: 'Why, did you not know I was a Christian?' 'No, I was not aware of it,' rejoined the other. 'Yes,' he continued, 'I have been a Christian for four years.' He actually thought, or rather fancied he believed in Jesus, and still he was living in sin."

A Twenty-five Years' Search Ended.—Mr. Watson observed: "I lately heard of two women who were very anxious to find the Saviour. When Mr. Moody last visited Scotland, one night, after he had been very busy all day, he had gone right off to his room, and late that night these two women came seeking for him at his hotel. A gentleman who had been helping Mr. Moody told them that they could not see him that night. They pleaded, saying they had walked many miles on purpose to see him. And then they told the gentleman that they had been seeking salvation for twenty-five years and had not got it. 'But,' said he, 'Mr. Moody cannot give it; it is the Lord alone that can give you salvation.' 'But we have sought it on bended knee for many years and have not obtained it.' 'Yes,' said the gentleman, 'you have been giving the Lord your heart, but always taking it from Him again. What you have to do is to spread out your sins and your heart before Him, and leave them with Him. Will you do so now?' The three knelt in prayer, and those two women gave themselves right over to the Lord, and went home happy, because they simply trusted in Him."

His First Visit to a Church.—A Gentleman said: "One piercing cold night in winter, a young lad was seen making his way through the snow that whirled furiously about. The boy looked cold and desolate enough, and many a pitying glance he got from the passers-by. He passed a church, from which he heard the sound of singing; he stopped and listened, and then, entering the porch, he heard the words they sang—"I do believe, I will believe, that Jesus died for me." Just at that moment he noticed a man standing in the doorway, and stepping up to him he said, "Please, sir, is this heaven?" The door-keeper looked down at the little shivering form, and said, "No, my boy, it is a company of people gathered together to praise the Lord, and you may go inside if you wish;" and he opened the door of the church and admitted the boy, who crept quietly into the nearest seat. At the close of the service some one spoke to him and told him of the Saviour, of whom he had never heard before. He went home very happy, repeating the words all the way, "I do believe, I will believe." As he entered his home he was greeted with a severe rebuke from his father, and the only reply he gave was, "I do believe, I will believe." And his mother, when she went into his room that night, heard him murmur in his sleep, "I do believe, I will believe." That boy grew up to be a great power for good in that godless home. This joy of his was as new and strange as if a second sun had appeared in the sky."

SIN AND DEATH.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 9, Gen. 3: 1-19. Golden Text, Rom. 5: 12.

The Divine Marriage Law—The Enemy of the Race—His Incarnation—The Talking Serpent—The Insidious Suggestion—Eve's Fatal Error—Answering Himself—Christ's Example—The Sure Way of Escape for the Tempted—The Only Way to be Like God—The Triumph of Sophistry—Death to Divine Relations—Their Eyes Opened—Hiding from God—The Defaced Image.

"By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned" (Rom. 5: 12). This is the awful fact; let us now look into the history. God had created woman, because, as He Himself declared, "It is not good that the man should be alone." The woman was to be man's complement; she was, equally with man, formed in the image of God (Gen. 1: 27). And God's marriage law went forth, "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh." And in this God-made union there was no mystery in God's order, no shame. His law of marriage and of generation was as holy as all His works. It was

THE DISORDER OF SIN, NOT THE ORDER OF GOD, which brought in shame, confusion, and uncleanness, as well as sickness and death. God made the life-long union of man and wife to be a precious foreshadowing of the union of Christ and His Church (Eph. 5: 23-33).

It was no wonder that Satan, in his diabolical malice and enmity against the new created lords of the creation, should sow his just where God had brought about the beauty of unity. "The serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field which the Lord had made;" therefore the great adversary, the devil, chose this reptile as his incarnation for the purpose of tempting man. He is designated "That old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan" (Rev. 12: 9). The word "Devil" means "false accuser;" the word "Satan" means "adversary." Just as in God is all that is pure and noble, so in the devil is all that is mean and cowardly. He said to the woman, attacking the Maker of the united pair, "Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of all the trees of the garden?" (R. V., margin.)

Satan would not come to the man and his wife together; he knew that unity is strength, and his manner of attack was not an open, frank condemnation of God, but just that of the modern Jesuits—a sinister, underhand suggestion which would leave an uncomfortable sense of insecurity behind. "Hath God said?" "Could God, He in whom you so trust, have been so unreasonable? How could He be called good if He were so tyrannical as to place within the reach of man the tempting fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, and yet withhold it from him?" Such was the import of his question. It was a critical moment; the plot was deeply laid. Eve, if she entered on the subject, must be worsted, for she had no knowledge of evil with which to judge the suggestions of the evil one. There was but

and Eve failed to take it. Had she instantly referred the matter to God, instead of attempting to answer the enemy, she would not have fallen. Had she consulted Adam, it is more than probable that the two would have gone to God. God has given to us a sure way of escape in every hour of temptation. It is to refer the temptation to God as soon as it presents itself. If we entertain it for a moment, we fall under its power. God had given man dominion over all creation. In listening to the serpent, who suggested a doubt of God, and answering him instead of letting God answer him, Eve was stepping out of her position as the creature, and becoming a party to the

and, at the same time, she was allowing the serpent to step out of his position, and to instruct her whom God had placed over him. When our beloved Lord was tempted, even He did not attempt to answer the enemy; He brought in a higher authority than even His own, and spoke His Father's words in answer (Matt. 4: 1-10). Thus was He "tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin."

The answer of the woman was a practical admission that she did not condemn, and therefore that she indorsed the imputation of the wicked one. Oh, it is so true that the very answering of a temptation, even though it be only in thought, is a giving of room to Satan! Well may we pray, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil" (R. V.). Eve's answer was the simple truth, probably exaggerated, added to, but her sad mistake was in answering at all. She "said unto the serpent, Of the fruit of the trees of the garden we may eat: but of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die" (ch. 2: 16, 17). The enemy had now introduced

THE THIN END OF THE WEDGE.

Eve had already fallen, and so he waxed bolder, and took upon himself to contradict God—"Ye shall not surely die," he said, "for God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as God, knowing good and evil" (R. V.).

A quick way, an easy way to be like God—this is the snare of the devil. The Roman Catholic and the Ritualist offer the way of frequent communion, confession to the priest, and unreasoning obedience to the Church, with allowance of just as much of the world as is desired. Some will make hyper-Calvinism, some will make an experience of sanctification which they imagine makes them absolutely sinless, the short way to be like God. There is but one true way, and it is no way of schemes and plans;

IT IS A LIVING WAY—IT IS JESUS HIMSELF, "I am the way, and the truth, and the life" (John 14: 6). It is only as Jesus Himself takes possession of us—that we are day by day conformed to the image of God's Son, that we, "beholding as in a glass (His own Word) the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image from glory to glory, even as from the Lord the Spirit" (II Cor. 3: 18, R. V.).

Eve fell into the snare; the specious sophistry of the tempter was too much for her. Alas! she had not brought God into the matter at all; the whole thing was settled between her and Satan, as though she held no relation at all to Him who made her. She "saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise," and in independence of God, and in direct disobedience to His command, "she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her; and he did eat."

AND THEY DIED

to their former relation to God; they died to their old innocence and purity; the seeds of death came to be in all their being; the knowledge of evil tainted all; peace and satisfaction with God and with each other was gone; that which God had created "very good," they now saw as evil. First, "the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked," and there arose within them an instinct that they had something to hide. Their first resource was fig-leaf coverings; their next, to hide away "from the presence of the Lord God among the trees of the garden." It is a guilty conscience which makes a man have something to hide. "Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day: we are not of the night, nor of darkness" (I Thess. 5: 5). "If we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we (God and we) have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin."

"They heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day." Till now the voice of God had been life to them. His voice had brought all creation into being, TILL NOW THEY COULD HAVE REJOICED IN IT as David did (Ps. 29: 3-5, 7-9). But now that they had the coveted knowledge of evil, all was evil to them; God Himself was dreaded, and their best good was shunned. "Where art thou?" was the fatherly call of God. Where was Adam? Hiding away from God, away from life, and joy, and glory! His answer betrayed him—"I heard Thy sound (margin of verse 8) in the garden, and I was afraid, because I was naked, and I hid myself" (R. V.). Fallen Adam! Oh, how fallen! He gives as the reason of his hiding away that he was as God had created him—naked—although at that very moment he had both covered and hidden himself. Just so is it with man to this day. One man says in his heart, "If God had not made me poor I should have had a better chance to serve Him; but He cannot expect it of me when I have my living to get;" thus he casts the blame on God.

"Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the tree whereof I commanded thee that thou shouldest not eat?" And Adam makes another attempt to cast the blame elsewhere—"The woman whom Thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat." And God turned to the woman, and said, "What is this that thou hast done?" The woman takes the same line as her husband; she says, "The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat." Neither came forward with an honest confession of sin; with the knowledge of evil had come duplicity and crookedness.

DEATH WAS AT WORK;

purity, honesty, love, joy, peace, had died out of our first parents' hearts and lives, and corruption had begun its work upon their souls, and would soon find its way into their bodies also. The curse of God was first of all pronounced upon the serpent, but in the midst of it was the promise of a Saviour, the seed of the woman, who should bruise the head of the serpent; God was in wrath remembering mercy. Not till then did He declare the woman's portion of the curse—sorrow in bringing forth children; and His judgment upon Adam, whom He held to be the more responsible of the two. Because Adam had hearkened to his wife instead of first referring the matter to God, had disobeyed His command, God said, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field: in the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread, until thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Thus did sin bring forth death, and the image of God in man become defaced. There was no longer any hope in man, but the promised Seed of the woman was yet to come.

RETROSPECT OF THE YEAR.

THE close of another year finds our beloved country at peace with the world, blessed with continued and increasing prosperity, and untroubled by the crucial problems of national existence which are agitating European nations. The patriotic Christian citizen cannot but see in the condition of public affairs, and in the strength and security of the Government, abundant reason for thankfulness to the God of nations for His loving care and guidance from the beginning of our national existence down to the present time.

In surveying the history of the year, now near its close, one social event must not be overlooked. For the first time in our history the President of the United States was married in the White House. The interesting event for the time disarmed political enmity, and all parties united in wishing the President and his young bride much happiness.

THE POLITICAL RECORD of the year is comparatively barren. The question of the President's removals and appointments occupied the Senate during the earlier part of the session, and much time and labor was spent in a fruitless endeavor to compel Mr. Cleveland to disclose his reasons in each case. Eventually the Senate confirmed all but one in a hundred of his nominations. Another waste of time was caused by passing special pension bills, nearly all of which the President vetoed. Beside the questions of pensions and appointments, Congress attempted to deal with several urgent matters, with, however, but little success. Mr. Morrison proposed to revise and reduce the tariff, but, though the Democrats had a majority in the House there were sufficient Protectionists among them to give the Republicans a majority on that question, and the tariff remained unaltered. As there was a large surplus, which by this time has grown to about $125,000,000, the opportunity to pass a liberal River and Harbor bill was, of course, not to be neglected. After some haggling over details, and a strenuous, but only partially successful, effort on the part of the friends of economy to reduce the gross amount, Congress appropriated for the purpose $14,473,900. This was the chief achievement of the session.

THREE INTERNATIONAL QUESTIONS

gave occupation to the Department of State during the year. One of them arose from the seizure by Mexico of Mr. Cutting, an American editor, who was charged with having published a libel on a Mexican citizen. Mexico might have dealt with him as she chose had not the offence been committed in the United States, a fact which revived the old dispute with Mexico over the claim she makes and we dispute, of her right to try cases in which her citizens claim to have been injured, though the crime charged may have been done outside her borders. After long negotiation and some threats of violence from Texas, Mexico yielded the point, and Cutting was released.

A second trouble was the product of the termination of the fishery treaty with Canada. The Canadian authorities, acting under the previous treaty of 1818 seized several American ships which were only released on payment of fines. The State Department is now claiming damages from the British Government on that account. The third difficulty was with Spain. Under a treaty negotiated during President Arthur's administration certain reciprocal privileges were conceded in the trade with Cuba. But the Cuban authorities desired to limit the privileges to American merchandise, while the treaty guaranteed the privileges to all goods carried in American ships though the cargoes might be of foreign products. As protests were of no avail, the President issued a proclamation withdrawing the privileges conceded on our side to Spanish ships, they being contingent on reciprocal advantages. Thereupon Spain conceded the demands of the Washington Government as to complete immunity of American ships, and the treaty was renewed.

have unhappily been a prominent characteristic of the year. In March there was a gigantic strike on the Gould system of railroads in the Southwest. For a long time traffic was blocked, and, before the strike ended, there were several armed conflicts between the militia and the strikers. In New York and in Chicago there were local troubles of a similar character. The former chiefly with the employes of the surface car companies, and the latter in the pork and beef packing establishments.

Anarchy reared its head to the horror of the whole community in connection with the Chicago conflict. On May 4th the police, in breaking up a meeting of anarchists were met by fierce resistance, and a dynamite bomb, similar to that which destroyed the life of the late Emperor of Russia, was thrown among them. It exploded, killing six policemen and wounding sixty others. For this crime eight men were arrested, and of these, seven were condemned to death and one to imprisonment for life. Efforts are now being made to obtain some mitigation of their sentence.

THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE

was made the occasion of another villainous crime. The Rev. George C. Haddock, a clergyman of Sioux City, Ia., was barbarously murdered on August 3d by the agents of the saloon-keepers to whom he had made himself obnoxious by persistent efforts to stop the traffic in intoxicating liquors. There is good reason to hope that the criminals will not escape punishment for this outrage.

It is gratifying to notice a marked advance in the progress of the temperance movement during the year. The election returns of last November show an extraordinary increase in the Prohibition vote throughout the country. A substantial victory was that in Rhode Island, where a Prohibition amendment to the Constitution was carried by an overwhelming majority.

THE DISASTERS OF THE YEAR

are, however, the feature of its history which will identify it in the recollection of the community. The great earthquake of August 31st can never be forgotten. The whole region east of the Mississippi suffered by it, and at Charleston, S. C., the effects were appalling. Wrecked houses, churches, and public buildings bore witness to its power, and the dead and injured people, with the homeless and destitute, were evidences of the widespread devastation which, in a moment, may be wrought by these convulsions. The only alleviating feature of the calamity was the sympathy it evoked throughout the country. From the North and West gifts poured in to the suffering South with a liberality and promptitude which must have convinced the afflicted people of the brotherhood of their old enemies. The catastrophe followed closely on a like upheaval in Greece on August 28th, in which six hundred persons perished, while two months before, in New Zealand, a convulsion of the earth, accompanied by volcanic eruptions, worked appalling havoc. These phenomena are generally recognized by students of prophecy as signs confirming their belief that the close of this dispensation is near at hand.

Many other fatal disasters have given the year a mournful association. On April 14th occurred the tornado at St. Cloud and Sauk Rapids, Minn., in which seventy persons were killed. On May 6th, Kansas City, Mo., was visited by a tornado and rain storm, with a record of twenty deaths, and only six days later twenty other persons were killed by a similar visitation at Xenia, O., and in various parts of Indiana. A little later was the hurricane on the Texas coast, with a ghastly record of thirty-eight deaths. Similarly destructive storms visited parts of Illinois, Indiana and Wisconsin on September 16th, and on October 12th came the distressing news that a storm at Sabine Pass, Texas, had caused the loss of over a hundred lives, and at Johnson's Bayou, La., one hundred and forty-five lives had been sacrificed by the violence of the elements.

Nor were these all the memorable fatal calamities of the year. The travelling public, as usual, suffered from the disasters now apparently inseparable from rapid locomotion. The accident at Greenfield, Mass., on April 7th, when an express train was derailed, and went over a precipice, causing the death of twelve persons, was the first of these. Later came the collision near Buffalo, N. Y., on the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad, in which twenty-three persons were killed, and the accident on the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul line in which the horror of fire was added to the shock, and thirteen passengers were held by the wrecked cars and burned to death. A still more startling, though providentially not fatal, disaster was the sinking of the steamship Oregon, of the Cunard Line, on March 14th, in which the passengers, though long in imminent peril, all escaped safe to land.

Turning to the

aspect of the year we rejoice to notice the increased attention that is manifestly being paid to the unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible. One by one, the more thoughtful and studious preachers are ceasing to proclaim the approaching conversion of the world, and are joining the ranks of those who look to the Second Advent of Christ as the sure and only ground of hope for the triumph of Christianity. The gathering of clergymen at the Bible and Prophetic Conference at Chicago in November, when compared with the little company that assembled at the former Conference in New York eight years ago, showed how extensive is the advance that has been made in the interval. The ministers have studied, and have realized how untenable is the commonly accepted theory of a gradually improving world, developing into Millennial peace and holiness before Christ comes, and how diametrically opposed the theory is to the doctrines taught by Christ and His apostles. They have perceived the truth and have begun to preach, as Peter and Paul did, the duty of watchfulness and separation because the Coming of Christ is at hand. The fact is full of encouragement, and cannot but lead, under God's blessing, to beneficent results in the lives of those who hear them. We may also hope that God will bless to a still wider awakening of Christian ministers and people on this subject the tour the Rev. M. Baxter is now making across the continent. If those who listen to his warnings are led by them to follow the "noble" example of the Bereans and "search the Scriptures daily whether these things are so" (Acts 17:11), the company of those who are looking for the Coming of the Lord and are living not unto themselves will grow and increase.

IN ENGLAND

the year has been one of political agitation, distress, and heartburning. Mr. Gladstone, the beloved and admired leader of the Liberal Party, adopted a course which rent the party in twain, and led John Bright, Lord Hartington, Mr. Chamberlain, in Parliament, and Mr. Spurgeon and other prominent men out of Parliament, to sever their relations with him. Believing that the peace and security and future prosperity of the British Empire would be promoted by conceding to Ireland the demands she presented for a separate Legislature, and believing, too, that by granting them, England would do an act of justice, and would also regain the alienated affection and loyalty of Ireland, Mr. Gladstone proposed to re-establish an Irish Parliament in Dublin to legislate for Ireland. The result is fresh in the minds of all our readers. Deserted by the followers of a lifetime, Mr. Gladstone was hurled from power, and his place filled by the Marquis of Salisbury.

Meanwhile the social condition of the English nation appears to be steadily drifting toward the breakers. In startling and dangerous contrast with lives of luxury and vice are the homes of the poor, where the presence of want has increased. Socialism has found ready listeners to its sophistries in starving workmen willing and able to work but unable to obtain employment. The riots in London on February 8th, when stores were wrecked and property destroyed, were a sign of the dangerous elements working beneath the decorous outer crust of social life, and warnings to the classes who are living in careless ease and self-indulgence that a day of reckoning may be at hand. A similar outbreak was expected on November 9th, but the formidable preparations made to crush it if it appeared, averted it for the time.

INTERNATIONAL COMPLICATIONS

have not been wanting in the general state of European unrest. As usual, the centre of disturbance is in that southeastern corner of Europe in which every European nation seems to have an interest. The sudden extension of the borders of Bulgaria last year awakened jealousies that were not easily allayed, but Greece, Servia, and even Turkey eventually accepted the situation philosophically. Russia, however, sent emissaries into Bulgaria to plot against Prince Alexander. They stirred up a revolution, and on August 21st the Prince was seized at midnight by a gang of conspirators and abducted. He was hurried out of the country before his subjects knew of the plot. Then there was a counter-revolution and he was brought back again with acclamation. It was then no longer possible for Russia to conceal her perfidious scheme. She could not represent the expulsion of the Prince as the work of the people, and when Alexander returned, she interposed her veto on his remaining. Aware that it would be impossible to rule in defiance of Russia, Prince Alexander abdicated, hoping that by sacrificing himself he might save Bulgaria from molestation. The settlement of Bulgarian affairs has set Europe by the ears. Russia finds herself opposed by England, Austria, and Italy. France, foreseeing the advantage of having an ally on the other side of Germany, has allied herself to Russia, hoping that the time may come when she as one millstone and Russia as another may, between them, grind her enemy to pieces. The problem in Bulgaria remains unsettled as the year closes, and the most sagacious statesmen in Europe are unable to foresee whether the coming year will or will not witness the most gigantic struggle of the century.

DEATH

has been busy on both sides of the Atlantic during the year, and many names once prominent in the world's affairs pass henceforth into silence, if not into forgetfulness. Among our own losses in the world of politics and statesmanship are ex-President Arthur, General Hancock, the Hon. Samuel J. Tilden, Horatio Seymour, David Davis, ex-Minister Welch, Senators Miller and Logan, ex-Governor Stevenson, of Kentucky, Charles Francis Adams, John Kelly, and Erastus Brooks. The Temperance world has suffered an irreparable loss in the death of John B. Gough. Scientists mourn the departure of John P. Philbrick, LL.D., Dr. Austin Flint, Dr. Isaac Lea, Dr. Frank H. Hamilton, and Marshal P. Wilder. The Church has now vacant places which the Lord will fill in His own good time, where once stood Bishop Robertson, of Missouri, Dr. John W. Nevin, Professor A. A. Hodge, Rev. Elias Magoon, Dr. Robert Nelson, the veteran missionary in China, Professor Calvin E. Stowe, and John Dougall, the Christian journalist of New York. Beside these the obituary list contains the names of Edwin P. Whipple, Paul H. Hayne, the Southern poet, Dio Lewis, John Esten Cooke, and many other famous names.

Abroad, Royalty furnishes one name to the list in Ludwig, the crazy King of Bavaria, who committed suicide on June 13th. Among deceased statesmen were Baron von Beust, Paul Bert, William E. Forster, and the Earl of Redesdale. Literature has lost the veteran historian Von Ranke, Sir Henry Taylor, and Archbishop Trench. The Church and philanthropists alike mourn the death of Samuel Morley, while the venerable Principal Tulloch, Rev. W. E. Boardman, and Hugh Stowell Brown must now be counted among the eminent preachers of the past. In addition to these are the celebrated names of Hobart Pasha, Captain Bedford Pim, Abbe Liszt, Erskine May, and General Macpherson.

THE CHRISTMAS JUBILEE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Dec. 26, 1886.

"When they had heard the king, they departed; and, lo, the star, which they saw in the east, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was."—MATT. 2:9.

The Infantile Guest—A Monarch Born in a Stable—The Sidereal Escort—The Import of the Star—Meteoric Appearances—The Obedience of the Star—The Homage of the Sages—The Brainiest Men of the Day—The Manger Attracts Wise Men—The Sages of the West—A Blessing for Animals—Sympathy with the Tortured Brutes—The Three Presents—Gold for Christ—The Myrrh of Sorrow—The Frankincense of Worship—The Two Censers of our Day.

At this season all Christendom celebrates the birth of Christ. Step down out of your comfortable surroundings into the chill December night of Bethlehem. Two plain people are hotelled in a village barn after a walk of eighty miles, too long a trudge for one in poor health. No lords of state awaiting in antechamber, as when other kings are born. No messengers mounted at the doorway ready to herald the advent from city to city. No medical skill in attendance. No satin-lined cradle to receive

THE INFANTILE GUEST.

But a monarch born in the hostelry called the house of Chimham, the night with diamonded finger pointing down to the place, the door of heaven set wide open to look out; from orchestral batons of light, dripping the oratorios of the Messiah; on lowest doorstep of heaven the minstrels discoursing of glory and good-will.

Soon after the white-bearded astrologists kneel, and from leathern pouch chink the shekels, and from open sacks exhale the frankincense and rustle out the bundles of myrrh. The loosened star; the escaped doxology of celestials; the chill December night aflush with May morn; our world a lost star, and another star rushing down the sky that night to beckon the wanderer home again, shall yet make all nations keep Christmas.

Are there no new lessons from the story not yet hackneyed by oft repeated? Oh, yes! Now, in the first place, it was that led the way. "Lo, the star which they saw in the East went before them." Why not a black cloud in the shape of a hand or a finger pointing down to the sacred birthplace? A cloud means trouble, and the world had had trouble enough. Why not a shaft of lightning quivering and flashing and striking down to the sacred birthplace? Lightning means destruction, a shattering and consuming power, and the world wanted no more destruction.

But it was a star, and that means joy, that means hope, that means good cheer, that means ascendancy. A star! That means creative power, for did not the morning stars sing together when the portfolio of the worlds was opened? A star! That means defence, for did not the stars fight in their course against Sisera, and for the Lord's people? A star! That means brilliant continuance, for are not the righteous to shine as the stars forever and ever? A star! That means the opening of eternal joy. The day star in the heart. The morning

STAR OF THE REDEEMER.

The unusual appearance that night may have been a strange conjunction of worlds. As the transit of Venus was foretold many years ago by astronomers, and astronomers can tell what will be the conjunction of worlds a thousand years from now, so they can calculate backward, and even infidel astronomers have been compelled to testify that about the year one there was a very unusual appearance in the heavens. The Chinese record, of course entirely independent of the Word of God, gives as a matter of history that about the year one there was a strange and unaccountable appearance in the heavens. But it such as you and I have seen flash in the horizon. Only a few years ago I saw in the western sky a star shoot and fall with such brilliancy and precision that if I had been on a hill as high as that of Bethlehem on which the shepherds stood, I could have marked within a short distance the place of the alighting. The University of Iowa and the British Museum have specimens of meteoric stones picked up in the fields, fragments flung off from other worlds, leaving a fiery trail on the sky; so that it is not to me at all improbable, the stellar or the meteoric appearance on that night of which we speak. I only care to know that it was bright, that it was silvery, that it flashed, and swayed, and swung, and halted with joy celestial, as though Christ, in haste to save our world, had rushed down without His coronet, and the angels of God had hurled it after Him!

MAY HAVE BEEN A METEOR

Not a black cloud of threat, but a bright star of hope is our glorious Christianity. One glimpse of that stellar appearance kindled up the soul of the sick and the dying college student until the words flashed from his pale fingers, and the star seemed to pour its light from his white lips as Kirke White wrote these immortal words:

"When marshalled on the nightly plain,
The glittering hosts bestud the sky,
One star alone of all the train
Can fix the sinner's wandering eye.
Hark! hark! to God the chorus breaks,
From every host, from every gem;
But one alone the Saviour speaks,
It is the Star of Bethlehem.

'Once on the raging seas I rode,
The storm was loud, the night was dark,
And rudely blew the wind
That tossed my foundering barque;
Deep horror then my vitals froze,
Deathstruck, I ceased the tide to stem;
When suddenly a star arose,
It was the Star of Bethlehem."

Notice, also, in this scene, that other worlds seemed to honor our Lord and Master. Bright star of the night, wheel on in thine orbit! "No," said the star, "I must come nearer, and I must tend, and I must watch and see what you do with my Jesus." Another world that night joined our world in worship. That star made

A BOW OF OBEISANCE.

I sometimes hear people talk of Christ's dominion as though it were to be merely the few thousand miles of the world's circumference; but I believe the millions and the billions and the quadrillions of worlds are inhabited—if not by such creatures as we are, still such creatures as God designed to make, and that all these worlds are a part of Christ's dominion.

I think all worlds were loyal but this. The great organ of the universe, its pedals and its pipes and its keys, are all one great harmony save one injured pedal, save one broken stop—the vox humana of the human race, the disloyal world. Now you know that, however grand the instrument may be, if there be one key out of order, it spoils the harmony. And Christ must mend this key. He must restore

THIS BROKEN STOP.

You know with what bleeding hand, and with what pierced side, and with what crushed foot, He did the work. But the world shall be attuned, and all worlds will be yet accordant. Isle of Wight, larger in comparison with the British Empire than our island of a world as compared with Christ's vast domain. If not, why that celestial escort? If not, why that sentinel with blazing badge above the caravan-sary? If not, why that midnight watchman in the balcony of heaven? Astronomy surrendered that night to Christ. This planet for Christ. The solar system for Christ.

Intensest microscope cannot see the one side of that domain. Farthest reaching telescope cannot find the other side of that domain. But I will tell you how the universe is bounded. It is bounded on the north and south and east and west by God, and that God is Christ, and that Christ is God, and that God is ours. Oh, does it not enlarge our ideas of a Saviour's dominion when I tell you that all the worlds are only sparks struck from His anvil, that all the worlds are only fleecy flocks following the one Shepherd, that all the islands of light in immensity are one great archipelago belonging to our King?

But this scene also impresses me with the fact that the wise men of the East came to Christ. They were not fools, they were not imbeciles. The record distinctly says that the wise men came to Christ. We say they were or they were the alchemists, or they were the astrologists, and we say it with depreciating accentuation. Why, they were the most splendid and magnificent men of the century. They were the naturalists and the scientists. They knew all that was known. You must remember that astrology was the mother of astronomy, and that alchemy was the mother of chemistry, and because children are brighter than the mother you do not despise the mother.

It was the lifelong business of these astrologers to study the stars. Twenty-two hundred and fifty years before Christ was born the wise men knew the procession of the equinoxes, and they had calculated the orbit and the return of the comets. Professor Smith declares that he thinks they knew the distance of the earth from the sun. We find in the Book of Job that the men of olden time did not suppose the world was flat, as some have said, but that he knew, and the men of his time knew, the world was globular. The Pyramids were built for astrological and astronomical study.

Then, the alchemists spent their lives in the study of metals, and gases, and liquids, and solids, and in filling the world's library with their wonderful discoveries. They were vastly wise men who came to the East. They understood embalment as our most scientific men cannot understand it. After the world has gone on studying hundreds of years, it may come up to the point where the ancients began to forget. I believe the lost arts are as mighty as the living arts.

They were wise men that came from the East, and tradition says the three wisest came—Caspar, a young man; Balthazar, a man in mid-life; and Melchior, an octogenarian. The three wisest men of all the century. They came to the manger. So it has always been—the wisest men come to Christ.

THE BRAINIEST MEN

come to the manger. Who was the greatest metaphysician this country has ever produced? Jonathan Edwards, the Christian. Who was the greatest astronomer of the world? Herschel, the Christian. Who was the greatest poet ever produced? John Milton, the Christian. Who was the wisest writer on law? Blackstone, the Christian. Why is it that every college and university in the land has a chapel? They must have a place for the wise men to worship.

Come now, let us understand in ounces and by inches this whole matter. In post-mortem examination the brain of distinguished men has been examined, and I will find the largest, the heaviest, the mightiest brain ever produced in America, and I will ask what that brain thought of Christ. There it is, the brain weighing sixty-three ounces, the largest brain ever produced in America. Now, let me find what that brain thought of Christ. In the dying moment, that man said: "Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief. Whatever else I do, Almighty God, receive me to Thyself for Christ's sake. This night I shall be in life, and joy, and blessedness." So Daniel Webster came to the manger. The wise men of the East followed by the wise men of the West.

Know also in this scene that it was a winter month that God chose for His Son's nativity. Had it been the month of May—that is the season of blossoms. Had it been in the month of June—that is the month of roses. Had it been in the month of July—that is the season of great harvests. Had it been in the month of September—that is the season of ripe orchards. Had it been in the month of October—that is the season of upholstered forests. But He was born in the month of December, when there are no flowers blooming out of doors, and when all the harvests that have not been gathered up have perished, and when there are no fruits ripening on the hill, and when the leaves are drifted over the bare earth. It was in closing December that He was born, to show this is a Christ for people in sharp blast, for people under clouded sky, for people with frosted hopes, for people with thermometer below zero, for people snowed under.

A DECEMBER CHRIST!

That is the reason He is so often found among the destitute. You can find Him on any night coming off the moors. You can see Him any night coming through the dark lanes of the city. You can see Him putting His hand under the fainting head in the pauper's cabin. He remembers how the wind whistled around the caravansary in Bethlehem that December night, and He is in sympathy with all those who in their poverty hear the shutters clatter on a cold night.

It was this December Christ that Washington and his army worshipped at Valley Forge, when without blankets they lay down in the December snow. It was this Christ that the Pilgrim Fathers appealed to when the Mayflower wharfed at Plymouth Rock, and in the years that went by the graves dug were more in number than the houses built. Oh, I tell you, we want a December Christ, not a Christ for fair weather, but a Christ for dark days clouded with sickness, and chilling with disappointment, and suffocating with bereavement, and terrific with wide-open graves! Not a springtime Christ, not a summer Christ, not an autumn Christ, but a winter Christ!

Oh, this suffering and struggling world needs to be hushed and soothed and rocked and lullabied in the arms of sympathetic Omnipotence! No mother ever with more tenderness put her foot on the rocker of a sick child than Christ comes down to us, to this invalid world, and He rocks it into placidity and quietness as He says: "My peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you." Oh, you broken-hearted, oh, you persecuted and tried souls, oh, you burden bearers, this day I declare unto you a December Christ!

Notice also a fact which no one seems to notice, that this Christ was

and the cattle and the horses and the camels, in order that He might be an alleviating influence to the whole animal creation. It means mercy for over-driven, under-fed, poorly-sheltered, galled and maltreated animal creation.

Hath the Christ who compared Himself to a dove no care for the cruelties of the pigeon shooting? Hath the Christ who compared Himself to a lamb no care for the sheep that are tied and contorted, and with neck over the sharp edge of the butcher's cart; or the cattle train in hot weather from Omaha to New York, with no water—fifteen hundred miles of agony? Hath the Christ whose tax was paid by a fish, the coin taken from its mouth, no care for the tossing fins in the fish market? Hath the Christ who strung with His own hand the nerves of the dog and the cat, no indignation for the horrors of vivisection? Hath the Christ who said, "Go to the ant," no watchfulness for the transfixed insects? Hath the Christ who said, "Behold the fowls of the air," Himself never beheld the outrages heaped upon the brute creation, that cannot articulate its grief? This Christ came not only to lift the human race out of its trouble, but to lift out of pang and hardship the animal creation.

In the glorious millennial time the child shall lead the lion and play with the cockatrice only because brute and reptile shall have no more wrongs to avenge. To alleviate the condition of the brute creation Christ was born in the cattle pen. The first bleat of the Lamb of God was heard amid the tired flocks of the Bethlehem shepherds. The white horse of eternal victory stabled in a barn.

But notice also in this account that are brought to the manger—gold, frankincense, and myrrh. Gold to Christ. That means all the affluence of the world surrendered to Him. For lack of money no more asylums limping on their way like the cripples whom they helped, feeling their slow way like the blind people whom they sheltered. Millions of dollars for Christ where there are now thousands for Christ. Railroads owned by Christian stockholders, and governed by Christian directors, and carrying passengers and freight at Christian prices. George Peabody and Abbott Lawrence and James Lenox no rarity. Bank of England, Bourse of France, United States Treasury, all the moneyed institutions of the world, for Christ. The gold for Christ.

THE THREE PRESENTS

Gold not merely paid the way for Joseph and Mary and the divine fugitive into Egypt, but it was typical of the fact that Christ's way shall be paid all around the world. The gold for Christ, the silver for Christ, the jewels for Christ. The bright, round, beautiful jewel of a world set like a solitaire on the bosom of Christ.

But I notice that these wise men also shook out from their sacks

THE MYRRH.

The cattle came and they snuffed at it. They did not eat it because it was bitter. The pungent gum resin of Abyssinia called myrrh brought to the feet of Christ. That means bitterness. Bitter betrayal, bitter persecution, bitter days of suffering, bitter nights of woe. Myrrh. That is what they put into His cup when He was dying. Myrrh. That is what they put under His head in the wilderness. Myrrh. That is what they strewed His path with all the way from the cattle pen in Bethlehem to the mausoleum at Joseph's country seat. Myrrh. Yea, says the Psalmist, "all Thy garments smell of myrrh." That is what the wise men wrapped in the swaddling clothes of the babe. That is what the Marys twisted in the shroud of a crucified Christ. The myrrh. Oh, the height, the depth, the length, the breadth of a Saviour's sorrow! Myrrh. Well might the wise men shake out the myrrh.

But I notice, also, from another sack they shake out

THE FRANKINCENSE.

Clear up to the rafters of the barn the air is filled with the perfume, and the hostlers and the camel drivers in the farther part of the building inhale it, and it floats out in the air until passers-by wonder who in that rough place could have by accident dropped a box of alabaster.

Frankincense. That is what they burned in the censer in the ancient Temple. Frankincense. That means worship. Frankincense. That is to fill all the homes, and all the churches, and all the capitals, and all the nations, from cellar of stalactite cave clear up to the silvery rafters of the starlit dome. Frankincense. That is what we shake out from our hearts to-day, so that the nostrils of Christ, once crimsoned with the hemorrhage of the cross, shall be flooded with the perfume of a world's adoration. Frankincense. Frankincense in song, and sermon, and handshaking, and decoration. Praise Him, mountains and hills, valleys and seas, and skies, and earth and heaven—cyclone with your trumpets, northern lights with your flaming ensign, morning with your castles of cloud, and evening with your billowing clouds of sunset!

Do you know how they used to hold

in the olden time? Here is a metal pan and the handle by which it was held. In the inside of this pan were put living coals. On the top of them, a perforated cover. In a square box the frankincense was brought to the Temple. This frankincense was taken out and sprinkled over the living coals, and then the perforated cover was put on, and when they were all ready for worship, then the cover was lifted from this censer and from all the other censers, and the perfumed smoke arose until it hung amid all the folds and dropped amid all the altars, and then rose in great columns of praise outside or above the Temple, rising clear upward to the throne of God. So we have

of Christmas frankincense. Here is the one censer of earthly frankincense. On that we put our thanks for the mercies of the past year, the mercies of all our past lives, individual mercies, family mercies, social mercies, national mercies, and our hearts burning with gratitude send aloft the incense of praise toward the throne of Christ. Bring on more incense, and higher and higher let the columns of praise ascend. Let them breathe all these pillars, and hover amid all these arches, and then soar to the throne.

But here is the other censer, of heavenly thanksgiving and worship. Let them bring all their frankincense—the cherubim bring theirs and the seraphim theirs, and the one hundred and forty-and-four thousand theirs, and all the eternities theirs, and let them smoke with perfume on this heavenly censer until the cloud canopies the throne of God. Then I take these two censers—the censer of earthly frankincense and the censer of heavenly frankincense—and I swing them before the throne, and then I clash them together in one great Alleluia unto Him to whom the wise men of the East brought the gold, and the myrrh, and the frankincense, when “the star which they saw in the East went before them.”

WORKING AND WAITING.

By G. H. Pember, M.A.

To the Christian, looking for the coming of the Lord, the waiting attitude of expectancy does not imply indolence. While we watch, we labor. We do not look for the conversion of the world as the result of our efforts, but the knowledge that He is near at hand incites us to shake off idleness and self-indulgence, and to obey His injunction to preach the Gospel to every creature. Not our own will—but His will be done. Not what we like, or choose, or think best, but His commands be the rule of our lives.

It is recorded that on one occasion His disciples did this with an ever-memorable result. He had just been feeding the five thousand who had followed Him, and their enthusiasm was running high. Who can be the Messiah but this man, they said, who, like Moses, is able to feed us in the wilderness? And so they proposed to take Him away with them to Jerusalem, and hail Him as King. The disciples were excited: that was what they also desired, and doubtless they encouraged the multitude, and felt that erelong they should themselves be great ones in Israel. But the Master, heedless for the moment of the people, came to the Twelve, and constrained them to embark in their ship, and go over to the other side far from the scene of excitement. It was a hard trial; but they obeyed, though, probably, as they pulled from the shore and the cheers of the people waxed fainter and fainter in the distance, they often desired to return. Soon they had something else to occupy their mind; for, by reason of a strong wind that blew, the sea arose, and they could make little way against it. Yet

THEY STRUGGLED TO OBEY

His command, and pass to the other shore. Night came on and midnight, and found them still tossed by the adverse sea; the fourth watch was drawing to its close and the day breaking, and yet, with all their wearying efforts, they were barely half across. Lo, an unearthly form walking upon the heaving waves. They shriek for fear, but from it comes a voice which they know full well. They rejoice to receive their Lord on board, and the instant He sets foot upon their ship, she has traversed the remainder of her course, and is at the shore. Their toil is ended.

Let us, dear brothers and sisters in Christ, imitate these disciples, and leave all that we love, or think good, when He commands us. Let us firmly and persistently struggle toward the shore to which He directs us. Does the wind arise? It is a trial of faith for our sanctification. Are we tossed by the waves? We must expect the opposition of men and demons. Let us only continue in obedience; and presently, when we may, perhaps, be well-nigh exhausted with the rowing, and seem to be making little or no way, we shall be suddenly confronted with a light far surpassing the sun, which would scare us out of our lives, did we not at the same moment feel that immortality had taken the place of blood in our veins, and did we not hear a sweet voice from the glory, saying;—It is I. Be not afraid.

THE OPIUM FIEND.

In a recently published work on China, Rev. B. C. Hervey, a missionary, thus speaks of the prevailing vice of China:

“To the Chinese opium-smoking presents peculiar temptations; their shop life is uniformly dull; they have no resources; no means of recreation; their homes offer no attractions in the way of comfort or society; and this insidious demon approaches them as they are suffering the horrors of incurable ennui, and easily draws them into its net.

“At calls for business or pleasure, it becomes the habit to offer and take a whiff at the opium-pipe, and at the closing of a feast or a night's debauch the dreamy demon comes as the soothing charmer that coils his folds about them. To the poor man, after his hard day's work in the cold, damp field, it comes to relieve his aching limbs and drive away rheumatics; the student finds it a delightful specific for an aching brain, and an easy transition from the musty, worm-eaten volumes of the dreamy past to the luxurious sensations of a dreamy present.

“Its victims, however, are not all willing slaves; they chafe and struggle, but in vain. I have seen hundreds come to the hospital to be cured; but even with this resolution strong in their hearts, they would secrete opium about their persons or bribe the gate-keeper to procure them supplies, so that it was necessary to keep them under the closest surveillance while undergoing the fifteen days' treatment necessary to a cure. I once had a boat-crew of opium smokers imposed upon me contrary to stipulation, and as the fumes were annoying and the habit interfered with their work, I hid their lamp, and forbade them to smoke; but they came crawling on the floor to me, knocking their heads on the boards, and pleaded so piteously to have it returned, saying they should die without it, that I was forced to give it back. I have had chair-coolies stop, contrary to express orders, in the midst of a journey, put me down in a crowded fair, and sneak off to an opium-den. I have seen men placed on their good behavior in hopes of gaining some permanent employment upon which their daily food depended, utterly unable to resist the craving. The Chinese were unfortunately at a low point in moral stamina when opium was first brought to them, and so fell an easy prey.”

A NOVEL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

THE best form of boycotting yet reported exists in India. The Indian Witness publishes an account of it. It states that the inhabitants of Khergaum and adjacent villages have profited by the example set them by the inhabitants of Ireland, and adopted a system of boycotting worthy of the inventors of that ingenious form of intimidation. The object of the boycotters' wrath, singular to relate, is the Abkari Department. Actuated by a stern sense of duty the inhabitants of the villages in question are said to have entered into a solemn compact not to swell the coffers of this iniquitous department by drinking spirituous liquors. A class of people called Dhedias have appointed a Patel, whose sole business it is to watch for sly toppers who break the compact, and report them to the Punchayet who have assumed the right of inflicting fines upon backsliders. In the event of the Patel failing to report cases of this kind he is liable to a fine of Rs. 25 ($12.50). Further, a reward of five rupees is promised to the man who may catch a Dhedia red-handed, or, perhaps, it would be more appropriate to say wet-lipped, in the act of drinking intoxicants.

THE FATAL LIQUOR IN AFRICA.

IN the course of an address in New York, on December 6th, reported in the Independent, Mr. Henry M. Stanley, the discoverer of Livingstone, explained the cause of the large mortality attending his expedition, about which so much has been said by the secular press. He attributed much of it to the use of intoxicating liquor. He said:

Lieutenant Grant is a splendid, stalwart-looking man from Luxembourg. He has an ambition to distinguish himself. He does not like the post assigned him; so I give him other work and fifty men to continue the road from Mananga to Stanley Pool. He has with him one bottle of Burgundy. He will keep that for a gala day—the birthday of the King. He means to drink that to a larger number of days to His Majesty. Some five miles on the road he meets a friend coming from Stanley Pool, and “How do you do; I am delighted to see you.” The friend has just one bottle of brandy. They club together, and they bring out—one his bottle of Burgundy and the other the brandy. Next morning the work must go on, of course. The trader bids him “Good-by,” and the officer must muster his working parties and proceed. But the effect of that night's dissipation is pretty soon seen. At nine o'clock the sun comes out strong. Before six o'clock that afternoon he is in his grave.

A man has been with me on the Upper Congo two years and nine months. He has distinguished himself. I can recommend him to anybody for industry, fidelity, and attention to his duties. I wish to preserve him. He has slight dysenteric symptoms. I say to him: “If I thought I could keep you from wine and liquor, I would send you to the coast, and send you home with good care; and if I had authority to bind you under an oath so that you could not touch a glass of liquor, I should be quite sure that you would arrive at home, and after a residence there of from three to six months you would be prepared to return.” He said, “But I promise you that I will not touch a drop of liquor.” “I do not want to exercise any restraint over you, but my firm conviction is that, if you do touch it, you will never reach home. Good-by. Boys, carry him.”

I gave him a dozen hammock-bearers. He reaches the coast. The doctors attend him. He recovers from the slight dysenteric malady. They say now he is in a fit condition to go home. That evening he swaps his coat to a native for a bottle of gin, and by midnight he is dead.

Therefore, when you ask about the climate and the healthfulness of the river valleys, people who are suffering from the depressing influences of such instances of fatality will naturally say, with great force: “Such and such a man died, and such and such a man, and so on, and look at that cemetery at Banana Point! Go there and you will see headstones marked: ‘Here lie the mortal remains of So-and-So, belonging to Stanley's expedition.’”

But they will not tell you the cause; and is it right that I should follow the dead to their graves and say that such and such a man died from such and such a cause?

There was a Scotch engineer who came out recommended by the British East India Company. He was a genius. He knew the tricks of making the rudest structure comfortable and home-like. He takes charge of the steamer, Belgic to go down to the mouth of the Congo. Three days afterward I ask the captain where his engineer is. He is dead. He was found sitting on a chair with a bottle of brandy in his hand—dead.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

AN unprecedented number of new subscriptions and renewals are coming to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD just now. Each of these is promptly entered to the credit of the person by whom it is sent, and the paper will be duly mailed; but it is impossible to keep pace in correcting the list with the rate at which the amounts come in. It happens, therefore, that in a few cases the date on the wrapper is not changed immediately, and even a postal card notifying a subscriber that his subscription has expired may be received by him after he has sent his renewal. He will please understand that this is an inadvertence occasioned by the unusual pressure of business and accept an apology in advance.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Both Houses of Congress Adjourned on December 22d until January 4th. During the short time they have been in session more progress has been made than usual. This is probably due to the fact that the legislators do not forget that this is the short session, and industry is indispensable if anything further is to be accomplished by this Congress. Several important measures have been advanced a stage nearer to enactment. These include the Electoral Count bill, the Interstate Commerce bill, and the bill for lands in severalty to Indians, which are all now in conference between the two Houses; two appropriation bills have passed the House, and three more are ready and reported. The Senate has passed bills to repeal the Tenure of Office act and to receive the trade dollars. The Houses thus show that, while they despair of entering successfully on the consideration of extensive questions such as the tariff, they are anxious to complete the unfinished business before this Congress gives place to its successor.

A Struggle in Congress is Expected Over the proposal to consolidate customs districts, introduced by Mr. Breckinridge. The idea of diminishing expenditure, especially when it also diminishes patronage, is, apart from the merits of this particular proposal, sure to arouse opposition. There may be cases in which Mr.

Breckinridge's scheme will operate to the prejudice of commercial interests, and it will be therefore necessary to scrutinize it carefully before adopting it. On the face of it the principle of the scheme seems worthy of support.
Reform is necessary when there is useless expenditure, as there appears to be in many cases.
In the list of custom-houses which cost more than they collect is one at which the salaries of the two officers amount to $1829, and their average collections are $11. At another it costs $257 to collect $70. At another $3180 is paid out and $99 collected. In thirty-four cases the expenditures are more than double the receipts. The consolidation proposed will affect more than twenty States. Among them is New York, where the reduction is from thirteen districts to nine; those in Maine are reduced from fourteen to five; those in Massachusetts from eleven to four. In these and other cases the scheme cannot but be unpopular, but the tax-payer will need to be shown strong and valid reasons before concluding that some such measure is not needed.

The President Has Ventured to Re-nominate James C. Matthews for the office of Recorder of Deeds for the District of Columbia. The act is unusual, the Senate having rejected the nomination once, and it is not approved by either of the political parties. The nominee is a colored lawyer, and that fact also appears to have operated to his prejudice. The President, however, presented strong reasons for renewing the nomination, and was especially careful to guard against the suspicion of being disrespectful to the Senate. His message stated that a large number of persons in the district had conceived a prejudice against Matthews, which fact doubtless influenced the action of the Senate; that Matthews had been in office several months, and had proved his capacity by rescuing the records of the office from loss and illegibility, and that his management of the office had had the effect of removing much of the opposition which formerly existed. For these reasons, and professing an earnest desire to co-operate in securing for colored men a just recognition, the President had decided, in the utmost good faith, to send in the nomination again. If Mr.
Matthews is really competent, as the President believes, race prejudice ought not to be allowed to prevent his confirmation.

Alderman McQuade, of New York, whose conviction on the charge of receiving a bribe of $20,000 for his vote on granting the franchise of the Broadway Car Route, was mentioned in these columns last week, was sentenced on December 20th. The Recorder in passing sentence took into consideration the fact that the prisoner had not gone on the stand as Jaehne did, and denied his guilt on oath, thus adding perjury to the original offence. He therefore received a lighter sentence than Jaehne, who was sent to the Penitentiary for nine years and ten months.
McQuade's sentence was seven years with hard labor, and to pay a fine of $5000. His lawyer found a Brooklyn judge willing to grant a stay of proceedings which has yet to be argued. Jacob Sharp, the man charged with paying the bribe, has applied for a change of venue on the ground that he thinks there is a prejudice against him in the city. There is no doubt of that fact, and it is creditable to the city.

The Death of General John A. Logan, United States Senator from Illinois, comes upon the nation as a surprise. Reports that he was suffering from a severe attack of rheumatism were published last week, but they were not of a character to prepare the public for the announcement of his death. It appears, however, that his physicians regarded the attack as serious when it first appeared two weeks ago. His general health was bad at the time, and the swelling of the right hand and arm, which was the first symptom, was slow in yielding to treatment. It was renewed by a slight cold and extended to his other arm and lower limbs. The senator suffered excruciating pain from that time until a few hours before his death. On Saturday last he was suffering from congestion of the brain, and sank into an almost unconscious condition, in which about three o'clock on Sunday afternoon he peacefully breathed his last. General Logan was in his sixty-first year.

The Resignation of Lord Randolph Churchill, the British Secretary of the Treasury and leader of the House of Commons, was announced last week. It at once became the chief topic of interest in European affairs. Lord Randolph was the most conspicuous member of the Conservative Cabinet, and his brilliant dash and impulsive disposition invested his personality with general interest. Speculation as to the reasons for his resignation is of a varied character.
Lord Randolph's own version of it is that he disapproved of the appropriations to be demanded for the army and navy at the next session of Parliament. As it would be his duty to provide the money to meet these increased expenses his reasons are plausible, but scarcely any one believes that they are the true reasons.
It is alleged with greater probability that his objections to the appropriations were based on the fact that there is no security for their being honestly spent. Lord Beresford has proved that much of the money annually voted for the army and navy is stolen by men in favor at court, and it is thought that he may have convinced Lord Randolph. Another possible explanation is that the secretary saw that his colleagues were making a mistake in applying coercion to Ireland, and has separated from them to save his own reputation from the discredit which they are bringing on the administration. The resignation is regarded on all hands as a serious blow to the Cabinet which will impair its efficiency.

Overtures for Reconciliation were Made by Mr. Chamberlain to Mr. Gladstone last week.
The news of the split in the Tory Cabinet arrived just as Mr. Chamberlain was about to make a speech to his constituents. As he is not deficient in cunning, he was quick to perceive that the defection from the Government would render Mr. Gladstone's return to office possible, if not probable, in the near future. He therefore framed his speech with the object of showing that he was separated from the great statesman by a difference so slight that it might be easily bridged over. "If," he said, "we do not agree on every point, at least we can agree to carry these important reforms, on which there is no difference of opinion between us, and leave it to time and a frank discussion of the subject to say whether, when we have accomplished these reforms, we may not go a step further in the direction of the views of those who are now, unfortunately, our opponents."

A Brave Man in Peril in Africa from an Attack similar to that under which General Gordon succumbed is the subject of an earnest appeal from Dr. Junker, the Russian explorer of Africa. A telegram dated December 20th was sent from Zanzibar by Dr. Junker to the office of the New York Herald. In it he described the urgent need for an expedition for the relief of Emin Pasha, a German physician, whom General Gordon placed in command of the Egyptian equatorial provinces in 1878. He kept his provinces loyal during the struggle in the Soudan with the Mahdi, and even after General Gordon fell he appears to have maintained order. His last letters were dated March, 1883, and since that time no news of him has been received until Dr. Junker's dispatch last week.
This communication implies that Emin will be able to hold out for some time longer, but also that no time should be lost in sending a relief expedition. The fatal result of delay in Gordon's case will probably expedite the efforts for Emin's rescue.

The Rev. M. Baxter has been Lecturing on the Second Advent of Christ and the Coming Great Prophetic Events, during the past month, in Milwaukee, Wis., St. Paul, and Minneapolis, Minn., Council Bluffs, Ia., and Omaha, Neb. Next Sunday he expects to speak in Kansas City, Mo.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal were received last week to the amount of $17.50. They were: From Farmersville, Tex., $8; Jamestown, Mo., $2; Centreville, Beverly, Mass., $2; Camden, N. J., $1.50; Wyoming, Pa., $2; Hillsdale, N. Y., 50 cents; Gambier, O., $1.50. These contributions will be a source of gladness in homes where there was some anxiety about the continuance of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for another year.

The Topics Suggested by the Evangelical Alliance for the Week of Prayer are as follows: Sunday, January 2d, sermons from Psalm 65:2; Monday, "Praise;" Tuesday, "Humiliation;" Wednesday, "Prayer for the Church;" Thursday, "Prayer for Families and Schools;" Friday, "Prayer for Missions;" Saturday, "Prayer for Nations;" Sunday, sermons on text from Matt. 6:10, "Thy Kingdom Come."

Inquiries about Mr. George Muller, of Bristol, England, have reached us lately in considerable numbers from persons who heard the report of his death. The report was not true. After leaving Australia he went to China and spent two weeks in Shanghai, where he preached nearly every day and twice on Sundays. He then left to visit the river ports, after which he proposed to spend a short time in Japan.

The American Sunday-School Union Reports enlarged work and genuine success the past year. Many hundreds of souls have given evidence of conversion; 1618 new Sunday-schools have been planted where but few religious privileges of any kind had before existed; over 60,000 scholars were gathered into these schools during the year, and nearly 150,000 in other Sunday-schools were aided.

Daily Afternoon Prayer Has Been Commenced in the chantry of Grace Church, New York. The rector, Dr. W. R. Huntington, hopes to continue it throughout next year. It will commence each day at half-past four o'clock. Dr. Huntington's object is best stated in his own words. He says, "What I hope for is that certain weary people passing up Broadway on their way home from the day's work, and especially those who have no opportunity of family prayer at home, may find it refreshing now and then to seek communion with Him who is alike the Author of peace and the Giver of rest."

The Religious Life in Yale College has been stimulated by the opening of the new "Dwight Hall." "Open day and evening," says the Congregationalist, "and furnished with a well-stocked library and reading-room, it makes an attractive resort for the students of the different departments, and its home-like aspect draws many there, especially on Sunday. A course of eight lectures is to be given this winter by eminent preachers, on the Evidences of Christianity and Current Religious Topics. The list of lecturers includes Dr. William M. Taylor, Dr. Parkhurst, Rev. Drs. Josiah Strong, A. F. Schaffner, and others." Systematic Bible study is carried on by one hundred and thirty of the academic students, who meet for an hour every Sunday afternoon, in groups of six or eight, for that purpose. The college Y. M. C. A. employs a general secretary, who devotes all his time to the religious interests of the students.

The Efforts of the White Cross Army for the moral elevation of young men have opened up new avenues which must be utilized to insure success to its main line of operations. An indication of these extensions of its work is given in a new circular just issued by the Central Committee. After reciting the object of the society and the methods adopted in the past to carry out that object, the circular states that the society will encourage the proposition to enact a national marriage law, and will work for the promotion of legislation particularly designated to protect the virtue of women, and seek so to guard them in their industrial pursuits that penury may not become a temptation to sin. The society's efforts in this direction will receive the hearty approval of every thoughtful Christian citizen, who cannot live in any of our great cities without realizing the danger which menaces the virtue of girls who have to earn their own livelihood.

An Impossible Attitude Toward the Cause of Christ was recently claimed by a young man in response to a question touching his personal salvation. "Are you on the Lord's side?" an earnest Christian asked him. "No," he said, "I am neutral." There are many people who imagine they can be neutral in this matter, but a time will come when they will see that their neutrality was actual hostility to Christ. A man on a burning ship refusing to enter the life-boat might call his inaction neutrality, and remain to be burned. He would be quite as consistent as those who, being unsaved, are offered pardon and eternal life, but neglect the offer on the plea that they are neutral (Matt. 12:30).

A Formidable Piscatorial Monster is Described by a New Hampshire journal. It is like a long black cord, apparently without any head. It is often mistaken for a piece of trailing seaweed when it comes to the surface, but on being placed in an aquarium it shows signs of life. A fish touching it is seized by a bell-shaped sucker the creature puts forth, and then twining itself serpent-fashion around its victim, the fish is brought near one of the ends of the innocent-looking black cord, a mouth opens, and the fish is swallowed. How like this is to the experience of Satan's victims! The tempter's appearance is generally innocent if not attractive. It is only when the prey is secure that the frightful power and cruelty of the captor are discovered (II Cor. 2:11).

A Shrewd Legal Trick Has Been Practised by a Chicago lawyer. A case was placed in his hands a few weeks ago which he had reason to believe would be lost if it were tried before the judge before whom it would come in the ordinary course. That was Judge Kistler, and he did not want to try the case before Justice Kistler. Should he ask for a change of venue it would bring the case before Justice Arnd, the next nearest justice, but the lawyer did not want Arnd. The next nearest was Justice Hawkinson, nor did the lawyer want him. How to secure a hearing and not have the matter come up before any of these justices was a problem. The lawyer solved it, however, in a highly original way. He took a change of venue from Justice Kistler, and then swore out subpoenas for the other two justices, Arnd and Hawkinson, as witnesses in the case. They knew absolutely nothing about the facts at issue, but that made no difference. As witnesses in the case they could not preside as magistrate, and by means of this trick the case was taken out of their jurisdiction. So it is in earthly courts, but in this they contrast with the last great day of judgment, when justice will be swiftly and surely done. Then legal tricks will not avail, witnesses will not be needed, and the judge will know all the facts of the case (II Cor. 5:10).

The Removal of a Part of the Spine of a patient was a rare and dangerous operation performed a few days ago in the Cincinnati Hospital. The patient suffered from spinal disease, and his lower limbs were completely paralyzed. He was unable to stand, sit, or lie on his side or back. The only position in which he could bear the torture in his back was that of lying on his face, and even so the pain was extreme. It was decided that his only chance of life lay in an operation for the removal of a part of the backbone, so as to stop the process of decay. The surgeon made an incision down the spine. In this region, where one slip of the knife or one false move would have been fatal to the patient, the surgeon with a chisel and hammer went down on the bone until he cut out all that which was in any way affected, never touching the spinal cord. All causes of suppuration and paralysis were removed, and the patient, having regained consciousness from the ether, was able to move his feet for the first time in a year. Sensation returned to his limbs, and his complete recovery is expected. If the expectation is realized he will owe his life to the skill and sure hand of the surgeon. There are cases of spiritual malady in which only severe treatment is efficacious. The fact is sometimes forgotten when we wonder why good men are severely tried in person or in circumstances. The Good Physician knows what is necessary for their spiritual well-being (John 15:2).

A Bride's Request to a Justice of the Peace at Deadwood, Dak. Terr., recently, could not be granted. The justice had been called upon to marry a young couple, and did so. Hardly an hour had elapsed before a female friend of the new-made bride came and explained that the latter had been married to spite a lover with whom she had quarrelled and had since made up the tiff, and therefore desired to be divorced. The squire was sorry he had to refuse the request. The impulsive lady seems to have had rather vague notions of the sanctity of the marriage institution. One of the greatest discouragements that are encountered by Christian workers among the fallen arises from this cause. When evil days come, and poverty and disease render the votaries of vice disgusted with the devil's service, they listen to the voice that directs them to Christ, but if they are not truly converted they are apt to return when their misery is relieved. The peril of such backsliders is appalling (II Peter 2:20-22).

A Maine Physician's Dog has Set an Example that may be commended to the members of our churches. The doctor's dog, an intelligent pointer, while following his master's carriage through the streets of Bath, Me., had the toe of his forefoot caught in a wheel. When he returned home the doctor saw Flash limping, and examined the foot. He thought it would be necessary to amputate the claw, but left it for a day or two to see if it would heal. But the dog evidently suffered great pain, so the doctor performed the operation, much to Flash's relief. Not long afterward the physician was surprised to see Flash come into his office one day, with a small black cur following him. Flash rushed up to the doctor, and back to the cur, and kept up this movement for some time. At last the doctor examined the strange dog, and found that he was suffering from a hurt very similar to that of Flash. He performed another operation, and the dog went away. In some way, which human beings would find it hard to understand, Flash had induced the wounded dog to come to the doctor's office and have his hurt attended to. If every man whom the Great Physician has saved and blessed would bring a fellow-sufferer to Him, how many might be delivered from perdition and won for Christ (John 1:41)!

Busts of Mrs. Cleveland, Made of Bank-Notes, are being sold in Washington, D. C. When mutilated currency finds its way back to the United States Treasury it is chopped up and made into a pulp which is moulded into various shapes and forms. The Washington correspondent of the Baltimore American states that the favorite model just now is that of a miniature bust of "the first lady of the land," and that he has seen several of them which have been sold at the Treasury for a nominal sum. Each figure was labelled: "Made from mutilated United States bank-notes worth ten thousand dollars." There is no mistake about the inscription, as every one understands its meaning. Neither the pulp nor the notes themselves were intrinsically worth anything approaching that amount, but before their return to the Treasury the holder who had faith in the solvency and honor of the Government counted them worth the money because they were promises to pay on presentation, which the Government would fulfil. The busts, therefore, are trophies of the Government's honor and honesty, and there is a gracefulness and significance in moulding them into the form of the wife of the head of the Government. The true Christian is in himself a living trophy of the same kind. Saved and kept from falling, he is a visible proof that God fulfils His promise to all who come to Him through Christ (Jude 24).

AMONG THE BREAKERS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters."
—EZEKIEL 27 : 26.

A Ruinous Policy—People who Get into Great Waters—I. Sinners Tasting the Fruit of their Sins—In their Bodies—In their Circumstances—In their Conscience—Get Rid of the Rowers—II. The Self-Righteous in Distress—His Hopeless Task—III. The Errorist in Difficulties—Rowed by his Judgment—Stages on the Road of Unbelief—Agnostic in Latin—IV. The Backslider—Welcomed on Return.

THIS was spoken by the prophet concerning Tyre, that great mercantile city where all the commerce of the East found its outlet toward the West. The merchant princes of Tyre had so managed the affairs of the State that they brought the Tyrians into desperate straits. They had incited them to stand out against the great king; and they discovered in due time that they were striving against a power too strong for them. Their policy had been a mistake. Comparing Tyre to one of its own galleys propelled with oars, the prophet declares, "Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters."

All the glories and the woes of Tyre are over now. "What city is like Tyrus, like the destroyed in the midst of the sea?" That page of history has long ago been turned over to give place to the rise and fall of other cities and empires; but the prophetic expression is still full of power. To many persons in our own day we may well cry with Ezekiel, "Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters."

I. First and foremost, this is truly who are beginning to taste of the result of their sins—ungodly persons, who have chosen their own ways and followed their own devices, and now at last are finding that the way of transgressors is hard. Sinners may go unpunished for many a bright hour of the morning of life; but as the day grows older, the shadows fall, and their way is clouded over. I meet with many who may be well assured that God will ultimately punish sin, because the first flakes of the endless fire-shower have begun to fall upon them, and they cannot escape. They are beginning now to reap the first ripe ears of that awful harvest whose sheaves of woe shall fill their bosoms, world without end.

APPLICABLE TO SINNERS

In those who sin with the flesh the result of their vices is seen and felt to a horrible degree

IN THEIR OWN BODIES.

Many a man bears in his bones the sins of his youth. Around us are many who already wish that they had never been born, because of the condition into which their wantonness has brought them. The sin which at the first seemed a dainty luxury, sweet to their palate, has now developed into a corrosive poison in their bowels, eating their flesh as with fire, and burning up their spirits. Lust was their pilot; the siren of pleasure lured them on, and now they are wrecks, breaking to pieces on the rocks. Despondent, ashamed, haunted with nameless terrors, afraid to hope, they dare neither live nor die. They are overcome with alarm, as they look forward; for if it be darkness behind, and night around, tenfold blackness lies before them by reason of their transgression and their sins. O sinner spent with sin, "Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters."

Certain transgressors are beginning to feel the result of wrong-doing

IN THEIR CIRCUMSTANCES.

They have brought themselves from wealth to poverty by drunkenness, dishonesty, or vice. The owner of a fair estate is compelled to herd with the lowest of the low in a filthy lodging. He who was educated for a profession, and is skilled in learned languages, employs his superior knowledge to beg and cheat, and even then remains in loathsome rags. Not even in this world does sin pay its servants good wages. Drunkenness and idleness clothe a man with rags; these are the livery of sin. "Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters." Thou wouldst not take Christ to be thy pilot in thy youth; thou wert too proud to accept thy father's God, thy mother's Saviour; thou must needs have thine own way, and follow thine own devices; and now the desperate tuggings of thy passions have brought thee into deep waters indeed. Thou saidst in thy pride, "I will not be tied to my mother's apron-strings;" but thou art now a captive, fastened with bonds of steel to one who will be no mother to thee, but a destroyer. Others who have not yet been afflicted by any outward providence are beginning to feel the sting of sin

UPON THEIR CONSCIENCE.

This will, I trust, be used for their good. I trust the Lord hath a kind intent toward them, and is condemning them in the inward court of conscience, that they may not be judged and condemned with the godless world at the last great day. The Lord's eye perceives many that once were at ease in their iniquities who now are sore troubled by their own reflections. Like the troubled sea, they cannot rest; their memories are constantly casting up the mire and dirt of their former transgressions. There is no peace for them day or night. As a man pursued by wolves in the steppes of Russia seeks to escape from the hungry pack which hurry on so swiftly, so art thou trying to escape from thy sins; but all in vain. Thy sins are upon thee, even now they overtake thee; and what wilt thou do? O gallant barque, of the silken sail, and the painted hull, where art thou now? "Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters."

Learn, I pray thee, this piece of timely wisdom. Thy rowers have brought thee into no quiet waters; they have found thee no harbors of delight; shall they any longer be thy rowers? Do this one thing to thine own soul if thou hast any sense left, or any pity on thyself; cry out against those who are ruining thee. Now say, "I will go no further with these rowers. God helping me, the helm shall be reversed." If such be thy resolve, and shall come to thy help, thou wilt never drink again of the accursed cup, and thou wilt shun the company which has lured thee to thy present wretchedness. Oh, that the Spirit of the Lord may help thee to break the oars and cast the rowers into the sea!

Remember, also, that they have rowed thee into the stormy waters, but they cannot row thee out of them. Thou canst find no rest by continuing in sin, neither canst thou save thyself from thy present forlorn condition. O man, cry mightily unto God. He will hear thee. He has revealed a way of deliverance for thee in the person of His dear Son, and all thy hope lies there. Hast thou not heard of Jesus, who can stay the wind, and bring thy vessel into an instant calm? While there is life in thee there is hope in Christ for thee. Despair not. There is a Saviour, and a great one, and He has come hither to seek and to save that which was lost.

II. And now, secondly, I think that I see another ship. It is not black with the grime of the world; it resembles the gilded barge of a mighty prince; but still, for all that, its rowers have brought it into great waters. This represents brought into distress. Many men are fondly persuaded that either they need no saving or that they can save themselves. Either in whole or in part, their natural goodness, or their benevolent actions, or their careful attention to external religion, will secure their safety. They suppose that by going to hear the Gospel, by participating in sacraments, by contributing toward church work, and the like, they will find themselves borne securely toward the desired haven. Yet to this glorious ship a trying voyage is appointed. Alas! my friend, thy rowers have brought thee into great waters. I would like you to think of the difficult journey which lies before you.

The proposal is that you shall row yourself by your good works across yon sea of sin to the port of glory. Before you enter upon a matter it is well to count the cost. Do you not know that, if you are to be saved by obedience to the law of God, your obedience must be absolutely perfect? Great waters, dear friend—waters too great for your frail vessel. Look, sirs, you who have been resting in your own righteousness: have you never sinned? Take even to-day to pieces; has no evil thought, or wrong desire, or wanton imagination, defiled its hours? Have you never spoken a sinful, unkind, untruthful, or proud word? Do you claim to have been absolutely perfect before your Maker from your childhood? Surely, you must have a brow of brass to make such a boast. If thou art to be saved by thy works,

SEE WHERE THOU ART!

Any day thou mayest slip and stumble, and then what becomes of all thy past life? for, "When the righteous man turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, all his righteousness that he hath done shall not be mentioned: in his trespass that he hath transgressed, and in his sin that he hath sinned, in them shall he die." If this be thy style of standing before God, it is a poor standing indeed.

I remember when I reached those same terrible seas. I used, as a youth, sometimes to think that I was as good as other lads, and perhaps I was, for I had not fallen into the grosser vices. I fancied that if anybody was saved by a moral life, I might be. But oh, when God lifted the veil of my nature, and I saw what my heart really was, I sang to another tune. I had been down into the cellar of my heart a great many times in the dark, and it seemed pretty fair; but when the Holy Spirit opened the shutters, and let in the light, what loathsome abominations I saw there! My life, too, no longer appeared to be the goodly thing I had imagined it. Ah! no, my comeliness was turned into corruption. Let but a man get the light of God streaming into his soul, convincing him of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment to come, and all reliance upon self, in any form, will seem to him to be the most hateful of crimes. Place your trust where God has placed His love, namely, in the Lord Jesus. Then shall you have good works indeed, but they shall be the cargo which you carry, not the ship which carries you. They shall then be grounded upon the motive of gratitude, and not of selfishness; and then shall real virtue be possible to you—virtue based on love to God. Thus have we seen two gallant ships in grievous straits, and we have hearkened to counsels by which we may avoid their dangers. May God bless my simple word!

III. But now, very briefly, there is a third case, in his difficulties. This is a very common sight in these wayward times. I might say to many a man who has ventured out to sea under the strong impulse of curiosity, trusting to his own proud intellect, "Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters." The only safe course for a thoughtful man is to trust in God, and to accept the Scriptures as infallible truth. There is our anchorage. Every mind needs a fixed point; we must have infallibility somewhere; my infallible guide is Holy Scripture. I know of no other anchorage.

But there are men who cannot abide this; and, first of all, I think that they begin to get into great waters when they resolve to be guided by their own judgment and their own intellect, without submitting to the teachings of Christ. It is proud and dangerous work to set up to be your own guide. Oh, my wise and thoughtful friend, do you know what will soon happen to you? You will probably fall under the domination of another's intellect; you will become the shadow of some greater man. The man who will be guided by nobody is usually guided by some one more foolish or more knavish than himself. I have seen both cases. I have seen a man of superior abilities crouching at the feet of a semi-idiot, who seemed to the other to be a profound mystic; and I have also seen the deep, designing man of brazen impudence towering above an abler man, and cowering him into submission. He swore that he would be independent, and to be so he cast off all old beliefs, and fettered himself to foolish falsehood. He would not stay at home with his father to partake of the joyous heritage, for he longed for freedom. Alas! before long a master sent him into his fields to feed swine.

"Hear the just law, the judgment of the skies!
He that hates truth shall be the dupe of lies;
And he that will be cheated to the last,
Delusion, strong as hell, shall bind him fast."

The man has given up the old doctrine because it was difficult, and has accepted new doctrine which is ten times more difficult. He would not be credulous, and now he is a hundred times more so. Creation staggered him, and he tries to believe in evolution. Faith in Jesus seemed hard, but he must now accept Agnosticism.

THE DIFFICULTIES OF UNBELIEF

are ten times greater than the difficulties of faith. Unbelief calls you to go from improbability to impossibility; from extravagance to romance; from romance to raving. I appeal to candid persons who have ventured from the moorings of faith to sport upon the waves of modern speculation, whether they are not conscious of a great loss. When faith evaporates there is a speedy departure of spiritual power. The new notions intoxicate, but they do not sustain. I have heard it remarked that the modern apostles, when they preach, often discourse very prettily—for they are clever men; but all sense of enjoyment of what they preach is wanting. They are not themselves feeding upon what they hand out. In the dogmas of modern thought there is not enough mental meat to bait a mouse-trap; as to food for a soul, there is none of it; an ant would starve on such small grain. No atonement, no regeneration, no eternal love, no covenant; what is there worth thinking upon? "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him."

I have seen men give up first of all the communion of saints; then all belief in the Word of God. After that they have gone into the common pleasures of worldlings, and so they have drifted and drifted till at length the song of the drunkard, or the stews of the wretched have afforded them carrion suited to their taste. How many who only meant to go a little from the old ways of truth have gone too far aside even for themselves! Truly, my speculative friend, "Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters." I am not intending to follow you. You are so wise that I am satisfied to be a fool, because I would wish to be the reverse of what you are.

Why, to me it seems very great waters to be brought into to be forced to say that I know nothing. One walking with me observed, with some emphasis, "I do not believe as you do. I am an Agnostic." "Oh," I said to him, "that is a Greek word, is it not? The Latin word, I think, is ignoramus." He did not like it at all. Yet I only translated his language from Greek to Latin. These are queer waters to get into, when all your philosophy brings you is the confession that you know nothing, and the stolidity which enables you to glory in your ignorance. As for those of us who rest in Jesus, we know and have believed something; for we have been taught eternal verities by Him who cannot lie.

IV. Now I pass on to dwell for a moment upon another sight, which is as sad as any of the others; perhaps more sad. Behold filled with his own ways. O wanderer from the Lord thy God, "Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters." I have seen and talked with some to whom this text has become an awful truth. There are some here to-night who, if I brought them upon this platform, and they had the courage to speak, could unfold a tale of measureless misery which they have brought upon themselves by departing from the Lord.

Look at yonder woman. She once rejoiced in the Gospel as one that findeth great spoil. It is thirty years ago; but at that time she knew the truth, and loved it. She was the joy of the pastor who brought her to Christ, for she was earnest, intense, devoted. There were years of gracious walking, and then there came a temptation. She grew cold in heart, she was poor, she was infatuated, she turned aside, she was wretched, she found comfort in the glass.

DROP THE VEIL.

It is many years ago since that fall, and she plunged on in suffering, misery, and sin, such as I will not attempt to describe. She became a mere wreck; death stared her in the face. She returned to us, and said, "Let me be taken into the church before I die; for I have never lost, after all, the life of God in my soul; but, oh, I stepped aside, and from that day sorrow has pursued me. Restore me to the church, for I am by grace restored to God." As you looked at her, you said, "Poor weather-beaten barque! it was an ill day for thee when thy rowers brought thee into these great waters."

You know how it begins: first of all, that holy, joyful walk with God is lost. You used to sing from morning to night for joy of heart, for, like Enoch, you walked with God. Alas! that music came to a close. It did not seem much—merely to lose rapturous enjoyment; but it was much in itself, and it meant more. Then there came a loss of relish for the means of grace. The services were long, and the ministry grew dull; the prayer-meeting was not worth attending, and week-night services were too much of a good thing. Secret prayer was neglected, and the Bible was unread. The forms of religion were kept up longer than the enjoyment of it; but there was no life, no power in them. The soul was drifting, and it fancied that the church and the world were just as men in a boat fancy that the shore is moving. Then there came a distaste for Christian company; godly people were too commonplace and prosaic. The love of something "brighter" called them away from solid conversation. Occasionally they were found in places doubtfully virtuous and unquestionably irreligious. Songs other than those of Zion began to be relished, and teachings not of the Bible were listened to. At last it went further: it came to actual and open sin, and ruin followed.

O brothers and sisters, when you begin to get a little away from Christ you do not know how far you may yet go, nor how soon you may commit the grossest crimes. There may be some here to-night who once were preachers of the Gospel, or earnest Sunday-school teachers, or Christian women devoted to the cause of God; and now, alas! they are separated from the fellowship of the church, aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, outcasts from the communion of saints!

O friend, "Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters." Oh, that He would come who shed His blood for thee! Oh, that He would step into thy vessel, and take the helm and turn thee round to-night by a great stroke of His almighty grace, and turn thy head to the port of peace! Do you ask, "Will He receive me again?" Listen to His voice; He saith to thee, "Turn, O backsliding children, saith the Lord; for I am married unto you." Take with you words, and come to Him at once, for He is ready to receive you. Do not linger. But oh, backslider in heart, ere yet thou art filled with thine own ways, come home, come home and save. "Return unto thy rest, O my soul." Remember that if you are a child of God you will never be happy in sin. You are spoiled for the world, the flesh, and the devil. In the day when you were regenerated there was put into you a vital principle, which can never die nor be content to dwell in the dead world. You will have to come back, if indeed you belong to the family; prodigal as you are, you are still a child. Though you return with every bone broken, you will have to return. "Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters." Oh, for a steersman to guide thee into port! Return, return. I leave my text and those to whom it applies with the God of all grace. May He bless you all, for Christ's sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE LADIES OF THE COURT OF SIAM.*

THERE are no Zenanas, strictly speaking, in Siam, and even the ladies of the royal harem are often allowed to go outside the walls and witness State ceremonies. Of course they occupy retired positions—often behind curtains or screens—and are not allowed to mingle with other spectators. But they are there, and with ears and eyes take in a great deal to carry back to their quiet, monotonous life in the palace, and to think and chat about till the next fête day. They have very little to occupy their time—no sewing to do, no studying of fashion plates, or deciding which love of a bonnet to buy. The Siamese costume has been essentially the same for centuries in palace and in hut, with only a difference in the number of cloths possessed and the cost and texture of the material; and one garment often suffices for the royal ladies of the harem, even as it did for the revellers in France in the olden time.

In such undress assemblies, with sometimes the slight addition of a silken scarf, do the ladies of the royal harem often meet. But of late years changes are busy even there, and I have heard whispers of foreign costumes which the ladies have tried on again and again to the infinite amusement of all beholders. The day is coming when they will not only order them from England and France, but wear them afterward, and even learn to appear in public—that is, outside the walls of their own private palaces, dressed in modern garments.

Hindoo and other peddlers often find admittance, and tempt the ladies to do a great deal of shopping in their own apartments. Some learn to embroider and do fancy work. They make wax and paper flowers for crematories and temple decorations, and lambrequins, table-covers, and even curtains of lace work of natural flowers, threaded and netted in beautiful patterns. Some, indeed, are not above preparing fancy confections and sending their slaves out to sell them. Others read novels, poetry, and plays, and spend countless hours in gambling. Sometimes there is a flirtation with a prince or noble outside; but if discovered the penalties are very severe. I have heard of both parties being put to death. The latest instance of flirting resulted in the disgrace of both: the flogging of the young nobleman and his banishment from the capital, while the lady was condemned to wear chains and cut grass for the royal elephants all the rest of her life.

After the King's visit to Petchaburee in 1876, we were on the mountain one evening and were admitted to the empty palace. We were interested in seeing the little pens set apart for the King's wives. They were side by side, and made of teak boards. They were no larger than the state-room of a steamer, and had but one little door, and this opened into the large room in which they were set, like so many little boxes on the floor; for the board walls of these stalls did not reach half way to the ceiling. Is it not dreadful to think of women, our sisters, being thus crowded together like stalled cattle?

A dear little pupil in one of our schools was telling me of her older sister, who was presented to the King when she was fourteen, and has been in the palace ever since. She has an annual gift from the royal treasury of some sixty dollars, and a slight monthly allowance besides. Her father sends her rice, and she has some of her other food from the royal kitchen. It is not true that these women each have separate palaces. They huddle together sometimes five or six in one house, with their relatives and servants. Those of higher rank may live more retired, and they also receive more from the royal treasury. But many of them are rich in their own right, and do not depend on the King for support; and indeed they are not responsible for their presence in the King's household, having had nothing to do with it except perhaps to consent, with a child's foolish heart, to the flatteries and representations of their designing relatives, who, in Siam as in some other lands, are always anxious to get their daughters married off, not particularly caring what they get them married into. So we must pity more than we blame these poor, blind, helpless women for living as we find them. Saddest of all, they know nothing, these poor palace women, of their Redeemer, the holy One of Israel, whose kindnesses are everlasting, and whose love and mercy are unbounded.

THE JUBILEE EISTEDDFOD.

THE Welsh people do not intend to be behind in evincing their loyalty to their Queen, and as they are aware that their English and Scottish fellow-subjects are preparing to celebrate with enthusiasm the completion next year of the fiftieth year of her reign, they are making arrangements to join in the jubilation in their own way. The Welsh societies held a meeting in London recently to settle the details of the celebration, and it is from scenes in that meeting, characteristically quaint, that our illustrations are taken.

The Welshmen propose to hold an Eisteddfod in London as their mode of displaying their joy and loyalty. An Eisteddfod is a competition of Welsh bards and minstrels. The Welsh people are exceedingly proud of their language and literature, and declare that the former is musical and harmonious; but the opinion is generally confined to Welshmen, foreigners who hear it without understanding it being of opinion that, however expressive it may be, its claim to euphony cannot be established. It is the Cymric branch of the Celtic language, which now shows more vitality than the Gaelic branch. Numerous societies have been established during the past century to perpetuate the language, and to stimulate the pride of the rising generation in it. These societies have striven to reproduce the ancient ceremonies of the bards and Druids, and a prominent feature of their performances has been the cultivation of the poetic recitations and songs with the harp accompaniment, which in ancient times, as practised by the bards, formed the recognized channel of historical tradition.

At the recent meeting, called in Welsh parlance a "Gorsedd," of the "Bards of the Isle of Britain" proclamation was made of the proposed "Eisteddfod," "in the chief city of King Lud." The prescribed rites of Bardic or Druidic tradition were duly observed; twelve unhewn stones were arranged to form a sacred circle; in the centre was a large stone, the "Maen Log," upon which the Arch Druid, a venerable gentleman eighty-six years old, Mr. David Griffiths, or "Clwydfardd," stood bareheaded in the cold rain. Beside him was the Welsh harper, Telynor Cymru, Mr. John Roberts, attired in a green cloak with red girdle, and a blue cap and scarf. Around were many bards of local and provincial repute, gentlemen who have studied Welsh history and literature, and composed pieces in Welsh. They wore different badges—green, blue, white, or red—to denote their official rank in the academic hierarchy.

Thus this quarter of her majesty's dominions will furnish its quota to the jubilation, and the other nationalities will doubtless contribute theirs. To the people of the United States who think four years long enough for the chief executive to hold office, who concede a second term only in exceptional circumstances, and who to the most distinguished and capable ruler have never granted a third term, it seems inexplicable that a nation should rejoice over a term of power being protracted to fifty years. However, the British people consider it a good thing, and are not only satisfied with it, but are jubilant over it. The thing is amusing to us, but it must be very gratifying to the Queen, who must surely be thankful that her lot has been cast in England instead of in the United States, where, if it were possible for the Executive to continue in power for half a century, it would not be the people who would do the rejoicing.

THE CARPENTER'S DILEMMA.

THE problem of "how to be happy though married" has been a perplexing one in all lands and in all ages. Many of Solomon's proverbs are couched in words so true to the life, and show so close an acquaintance with the peculiarities of the feminine temper, that many a hen-pecked husband has expressed his firm belief that—in the slang expression of the day—the king had "been there himself." Who that had not himself listened to the unreasoning and unreasonable complaints of a discontented wife would have thought of writing that "a continual dropping in a very rainy day and a contentious woman are alike" (Prov. 27: 15)? There is a suggestion of utter weariness in the words that must have been born of experience. So, too, the warning which he feels it necessary to record twice (Prov. 21: 9 and 25: 24), as if he foresaw that it would be disregarded, shows how sorely even a king may be pressed at times. One can almost hear the sigh with which he writes: "It is better to dwell in a corner of the housetop than with a brawling woman in a wide house." Like many other wise men, King Solomon, as we know from the history, seemed to take leave of his wisdom when he arranged his matrimonial affairs.

It is not to be wondered at that a poor carpenter not exceptionally endowed with wisdom should have blundered in the management of a business in which the wise king was at fault. The carpenter did blunder, but he showed wisdom in trying to make the best of a bad business. His wife was not invariably in a bad temper. Possibly she may have thought that uniformity might produce indifference, and so the acute suffering entailed by outbreaks would be dulled. As a school-boy who is sure that he is going to receive punishment sometimes interposes an additional temporary lining to his coat, so the man who is sure of a scolding or a "nagging" might prepare himself for it. That would spoil her enjoyment, which was enhanced by the idea that the husband might be coming home expecting a smile and a kiss.

The carpenter, however, meditating on the changeable matrimonial weather, perceived that the storm generally occurred after his wife had been worried by a day of domestic harass. A criticism of the cooking or a reminiscence of his mother's excellences as a manager would "draw lightning" on these occasions, while at another time they might be uttered with comparative safety. He came to the conclusion that if a storm signal could be exhibited on his entering the house on his return from work it would tend to peace, because he would then look carefully to the paths of his feet, or, what was still more important, to the words of his tongue, and avoid offering inadvertent provocation. It was a good idea, and showed that the carpenter was a philosopher in his way—able to trace the effect to its cause.

He talked it over with his wife one day when she was in one of her sunny moods, and he learned something that was a surprise to him. His wife informed him that some of the "rows" of which he complained were due to his own bad temper. The carpenter thought not; it was always the wife's fault. But the wife was sure, and she had chapter and verse—otherwise dates. At such and such a time he had come home "like a bear with a sore head." Nothing pleased him; he complained without reason, and everything was wrong. It had been a good thing, Mary thought, that she herself was in a good temper that night or there would have been a serious quarrel.

Yes, the carpenter remembered that day. He had been put out at his work; the foreman had blamed him without cause, and he had been hustled about a good deal. But that seldom happened; he generally came home feeling good. Not so often as he supposed, Mary thought. So there was a mutual discovery. The two were making progress. Both were to blame; in both cases previous worry led to explosions at home, and bad temper was a common enemy.

How to get the better of the enemy? that was the next question. The carpenter recurred to his idea of a storm signal. If, when Mary was fractious, and unable to bear a new vexation, she would tuck up the corner of her apron, then the carpenter would be warned, and "drive gently over the stones." And if the carpenter came home at any time feeling awry, and with less patience than usual, he was to wear his cap pushed to the side of his head instead of on the top, and Mary would be forbearing. Thus the storm signals were arranged to mutual satisfaction.

The dilemma came one night when the carpenter, after a day of worry, feeling cross and out of tune, shifted his cap to one side before he opened the door. Now, let Mary show whether their agreement was valid. He entered and went to lay aside his tools. Mary gave a quick glance at him, and saw the cap in the stormy quarter. The carpenter looked slyly at his wife to see how she was taking it, and saw that Mary had the corner of her apron tucked up! Here was a contingency not provided for! Who was to bear and forbear now? The carpenter turned aside for a moment resolved to pocket his temper for this time. When he came back his cap was in its normal position. But the strangest thing was that when he glanced at his wife he saw that Mary had pulled the tuck out of her apron.

Both joined in a hearty laugh. No claim on the other's patience was to be made by either party. The evening which each expected to be a time of tension passed pleasantly, and each had a better opinion of the other than ever before. The carpenter's opinion of matrimonial trouble is that, "if a man don't like fire and he finds one burning in his house, he is very stupid if he brings wood to keep it burning."

THE FRIENDS AT ASPENDALE.

A SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

The Prodigals.

LET us see what the two young men were doing of whom one was the subject of his godly sister's prayers, and the other was his widowed mother's burden and his brother's charge. Where have we to go to find them? In one of the fast quarters of London, the modern Babylon. Harold Spofforth and Alfred Atheling are there considering the question of occupation for the evening.

"Now, Alf, my boy, what 'gay and festive scene' are we to make more gay and festive by our presence and patronage to-night? Neither you nor I can stand this dreary den with only our two sweet selves to provide the entertainment."

"The fact is indisputable, Hal; the question, thine own superior wit shall answer."

"Then I vote for the Haymarket first; and then an adjournment to Evans's for supper. First the light fantastic, then the feast of cutlets and the flowing bowl. Then home in the small hours of the morning. Does the programme please your own particular palate?"

"Perfectly, my alliterative comrade; it promises positive pleasure. 'Youth at the prow, and pleasure at the helm,' can scarcely float on fairer seas, or into a more congenial harbor; and so—

'Weel may the keel row, the keel row, Weel may the keel row, that my Harold's in.'"

The room in which the two young men were seated, though somewhat dingy and in ill repair, was large and commodious. Its elaborate cornices and finely carved mantelpiece gave evidence of the wealth and position of its occupants in those earlier times, when that was quite an aristocratic region, and when the silver Thames that flowed close by was really deserving of the name.

Harold Spofforth was the only son of Sir Godwin Spofforth, and the heir of Aspen Towers. He was a young man of about five-and-twenty years of age, though he might well have passed for thirty, for those sure and rapid defacers, immorality and excess, had already begun to fix their ominous imprint on his face. His hair, of an almost raven black, shaded a brow that indicated considerable intellectual ability; but the dark moustache upon his lip could not hide the lines about the mouth which told of dominant passions and strong self-will; and the rich brown eyes were lighted with very questionable fires. He was attired in ultra-fashionable garb, and was not by any means improved in his personal appearance by those marked peculiarities of the tailor's art.

His companion, somewhat younger than he, bore all the tokens of his Saxon origin. The Athelings of Aspen Garth were able to boast that through a long line of Saxon yeomen they were descended from that unfortunate prince, Edward Atheling, who was jostled out of all chance of succession to the English throne by William the Norman and the swarm of bold, imperious barons that followed in his train. An open, winsome, and even handsome face was that of Alfred Atheling, a face upon which you scarce could look without feeling something of love and liking for its owner.

His light complexion, pale enough as he sits there with his fair blue eyes fixed upon his comrade, would have been ruddy if he had had the wit to be content with a home on bonny Aspendale. Those eyes indicated real amiability of disposition, and there was that in them and also in the arched eyebrows, the broad forehead, the slightly "tip-tilted" nose and smiling mouth, which denoted ready humor and quick perception. But there was evident also a certain pliability and indecision that would surely lead to grave results, if he came under the influence of a subtler spirit and a stronger will. He wore a profusion of light and curly auburn hair; and his was, taken altogether, one of those physiognomies which warrant its possessor to be "good company," a capital comrade; an acquisition in social circles where listeners are many and good talkers few.

The conversation of which I have just given a specimen continued for awhile in the same strain. The actors and actresses of the day were criticised and jested on; their own later escapades were reverted to and laughed at; certain impending races were discussed, and certain projects entertained which promised them a new sensation. Then the misguided pair, merrily sallied out into the dimly-lighted streets and from thence into the brightness and glitter of the theatre, at which operatic burlesque was much in vogue just then. Then followed an adjournment to the supper-table and the billiard-room; and from thence, long after the midnight hour had struck, back to the side street off the Strand with flushed cheeks and staggering gait, with lightened purses and confused wits, to seek their pillows and reproduce the misspent hours in troubled and excited dreams.

In the morning they rose with aching heads, listless limbs, with deep dark rings around their dull eyes, the victims of lassitude and nausea begotten of the "pleasure" of the previous night. Harold Spofforth, spoiled child of fortune, had neither need nor duty before him to rouse him to exertion. He toiled not, neither did he spin—which was all the worse for him. Surely there is not a more miserable being than a young man of fortune who has nothing to do but to find some new way of doing nothing; and to what dangers is not such an idler exposed! The bird that sits is easily shot; the flier escapes the fowler. "Idleness," says quaint old Quarles, "is the Dead Sea that swallows all the virtues, and is the self-made sepulchre of the living man."

In the case of Alfred Atheling, matters were somewhat different. He had both need and duty to stir him into action; but alas! in this case, the sitting bird acted only too successfully as a lure. In order to understand this young man's present position, we must retrace our steps a little. He and Harold Spofforth had not only known each other from childhood, but they had studied together at the same Oxford College. The Athelings farmed their own freehold, and as that was somewhat extensive, a college education for Alfred, who had a strong objection and distaste to a farmer's life, was well within the compass of their means.

Through Harold's influence he had obtained the position of a tutor to the only son of a man of wealth. The pupil died, and the father, won by Alfred's charm of manner, his unquestionable accomplishments, and especially by the way in which he had won the sympathy and esteem of his boy, made him his private secretary. Hudson Harvey, Esq., was not only a popular Member of Parliament, but a fairly successful author, and was also one of the principals of a large banking firm of great repute. Alfred's duties at certain seasons of the year were onerous enough but not irksome, and on occasions he had a good deal of that very valuable, but dangerous commodity, spare time on his hands.

Harold Spofforth's loose tendencies had been strongly developed while at Oxford. More than once, or twice or thrice, he had been in peril of expulsion; when he subsequently came up to London, these had full swing. He soon found his college chum, who welcomed his presence in the great city as giving promise of pleasant companionship, and the welcome was all the heartier by reason of the gratitude which the young man honestly felt for the good service he had rendered him. Being flush of money, genial of manner, subtle of speech, and strong of will, Harry Spofforth had no great difficulty in leading the young man along those pleasant and flower-bordered slopes which grow steeper as men go, and which lead direct to ruin, whatever of mirth and music may enliven and charm the way.

And so it came to pass that in course of time Mr. Hudson Harvey had to complain of Alfred's irregularity, of his treacherous memory, of his untimely absences, and even of discrepancies and deficiencies in his accounts. At last, with all his patience and good-will to the young man, he told him that he would no longer endure it, and warned him that he would have to vacate his post. When Alfred told his friend Harold of his impending dismissal that dangerous companion was flushed with wine, had been planning an excursion to Paris, and, moreover, had in his pocket a parental cheque for a considerable sum of money.

"Never mind old Harvey, Alf. I know he was fond enough of sowing his wild oats when he was a young fellow," he said. "You let the old curmudgeon go. It's no gold mine that you are losing after all. Come and lodge with me awhile. We'll have a holiday, and make a trip across the briny. Something better than scribbling at his table will turn up, by and by. I can keep the ball rolling. Let us make hay while the sun shines, and enjoy life while we are young."

Such was the state of Alfred Atheling's fortunes on the night that I have referred to. The results of the debauch of the previous evening had altogether unfitted him for his duties; a splitting headache and an unusual dizziness made it almost impossible for him to sit upright. He felt that he could not go to business, and so he wrote a hasty note to his employer, and despatched it by a special messenger, excusing his non-appearance by not untruthfully pleading "severe indisposition."

The young men were seated at a midday lunch; Alfred had somewhat recovered, thanks, as he said, to "a hair of the dog that bit him," which in this case was a synonym for a glass or two of champagne, when the serving-maid entered the room, instantly after she had given a warning tap, and said, with a flurried look and in an excited tone,

"There's a policeman a-talkin' to missis, an' I heard him asking for a Mr. Alfred Atheling, as he was a-wantin' of."

"A policeman," said Alfred, turning red and then white again. "None of your jokes, Harriet."

"No, sir. It's no joke," said the prompt official, who had entered unperceived. "I am sorry to give you any trouble, sir, or to spoil your dinner, but you must come with me."

The policeman spoke quietly and respectfully enough, but the words fell on the ear of Alfred Atheling like the knell of doom. He lifted his dazed eyes to the policeman's face, but for the life of him he could not get his tongue to shape the question, "What for?" Not that the young fellow was in anywise a coward, except in the sense that Shakespeare uses the words, when he says that "conscience makes cowards of us all." He knew that he had done wrong; that he had done many wrongs, but he was not conscious that he had done anything which would bring him under the strong grip of the law. He could not be very sure, however, even about that, for latterly he had so often given way to the temptations of the wine-cup, that that insidious enemy, which dethrones the reason and "steals men's brains," had again and again despoiled him of the power of self-government. That, however, which now arrested him in a far more peremptory fashion than the respectful policeman had done, that which laid its iron grip on his heart and conscience just then, was the thought of his mother and of the blameless name of Atheling, hitherto nobly worn and honorably borne by a stout-hearted, high-spirited, clean-handed Saxon race.

"What do you mean, sir?" said Harold Spofforth, sternly and haughtily, as he turned to the invader of their privacy. "What right have you to enter into my private apartments after this fashion?"

But it is of very little use "riding the high horse" in a tilting-match against the authority of the law. The policeman was put upon his mettle, and all the answer he got from the man in blue was that he meant "just what he said." At last Alfred managed to falter out, "Upon what charge?"

"For himbezzlement from your employer, 'Udson 'Arvey, Esq., Hem Pee," said the policeman, who with regard to the use of the aspirate was evidently a "law unto himself." "If I were you," he continued, "I wouldn't say hanything about it, for whatever you do say will be produced as hevidence."

Alfred saw the wisdom of this advice, and was silent. He was a good deal fluttered too, and had good reason for being so. He knew that, more than once or twice, his master had discovered and forgiven series discrepancies in money matters. In no case had he intended any wrong; but he very reasonably imagined that his employer had discovered some still more serious flaw, and he was proportionately troubled as to what might be the result. He felt that there was nothing for it but to do the policeman's bidding, and so he set about making ready for his compulsory departure, feeling just about as miserable as a man could be.

But though Alfred Atheling saw no course open except to go with the policeman who had come on so unpleasant an errand, Harold, for several reasons, was indisposed to permit matters to come to such an issue. He very bluntly and very foolishly made offer of a golden bribe, which the policeman even more bluntly refused.

"I beg your pardon, sir," said he; "Jim Tugwell isn't made of that sort o' stuff. And let me tell you that you are doing your friend no good by making such a hoffer. It'll 'ave to come out in hevidence, and it's just the sort o' thing to knock a extra nail in his coffin; leastwise," he continued, seeing Alfred's pitiable look, and thinking that the metaphor was needlessly strong, "leastwise, it's likely to 'ammer another rivet in his chain. I've got to do my duty, and I call upon you to 'elp me in the name of the law. I've got a search warrant, too. I 'ope you won't make hany difficulties. Whatever facilities you give will tell in the prisoner's favor."

"Oh, certainly," said Harold, with a smile, his mood suddenly changing. He was conscious that he had made a great mistake in offering money, but was by no means disposed to give up the game. The fact is that he had serious doubts about Alfred's innocence; such is the natural effect of comradeship in wrong-doing; and somewhat selfishly thought of its probable effect on his liberty of action. "Oh, certainly," said he; "there's the bedroom; make yourself at home."

As the constable turned himself to enter into Alfred's bedroom, Harold managed to slip a bank-note into Alfred's hand, and accompanied the action by a hasty glance at the door. Alfred understood its meaning, and without waiting to ask himself as to the prudence of the step, resolved, if possible, to make his escape.

"I suppose we may go with you, policeman," said he, calmly, though his nerves were at their full tension.

"Say must, if you please," said Tugwell. "I sha'n't lose sight of you." Then with a self-satisfied smile as of one who thoroughly understands his business and is not to be caught napping, he proceeded to the bedroom, his prisoner behind him, and Harold bringing up the rear.

"My boxes are in that dressing-room," said Alfred, handing some keys to his captor, with a submissive air, as who should say, "I see resistance is of no use."

The policeman passed into the room, followed by Harold, who had changed places with his friend. No sooner were the two well within the smaller room than Alfred pulled the door to, turned the double lock, put the key in his pocket, and with the angry shout of the policeman in his ear, sprang on to the landing, and, overturning the listening Harriet, rushed downstairs. His hat and coat were hung handily in the hall, and in a few moments he was walking with well-assumed quiet of deportment among the crowds that trod the thronged pavement of the noisy Strand!

An omnibus happened to be drawn up to the pavement with ready-opened door, through which a passenger had just alighted. Alfred jumped in and rode some distance before it occurred to him to think as to what part of the metropolis it was going. When he saw on it the name of the Victoria Park, he was well content to go thither, as he felt that he could not do better than to get away from the West End with what speed he could, and that the East End promised him safer shelter until such times as he could decide what it was best to do. When the omnibus arrived at the corner of the Park, he got out and set himself to look for some quiet and not much frequented coffee-house where he might sit awhile, with a cup of coffee as a reason, and try to collect his scattered wits.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR! Oh such may it be!
Joyously, surely, and fully for thee!
Fear not and faint not, but be of good cheer,
And trustfully enter thy happy new year!

Happy, so happy! Thy Father shall guide,
Protect thee, preserve thee, and always provide!
Onward and upward along the right way
Lovingly leading thee day by day.

Happy, so happy! Thy Saviour shall be Ever more precious and present with thee!
Happy, so happy! His spirit thy Guest,
Filling with glory the place of His rest.

Happy, so happy! Though shadows around
May gather and darken, they flee at the sound
Of the glorious Voice that saith, "Be of good cheer!"
Then joyously enter thy happy New Year!

INTRODUCTION BY
Rev. ARTHUR EDWARDS, D.D.,
Editor N. W. Christian Advocate.
The object of this volume is to give to that great army who are fast hastening toward the "great beyond" some practical hints and helps as to the best way to make the most of the remainder of the life that now is, and to give comfort and help as to the life that is to come.
"They are the writings of the most eminent men, living and dead. It is by no means a gloomy book, and can be marked as excellent on every page."—CHICAGO INTER-OCEAN.
"It is a tribute to the Christianity that honors the gray head and refuses to consider the oldish man a burden or an obstacle. The book will aid and comfort every reader."—NORTH-WESTERN CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.
"The selections are very precious. Springing from such numerous and pure fountains, they can but afford a refreshing and healthful draught for every aged traveller to the great beyond."—WITNESS.
